STATE TRIALS,

THE PREFACE.

THE CROWN LAW is no where ſo fully explained and illuſtrated, as in the STATE TRIALS: But, as every Man is not qualified to diſtinguiſh Caſes that have a near Reſemblance to each other, or diſcern the Force of every Argument advanced by the Learned Counſel in theſe Trials, it has been thought fit to draw up a Summary of them, and make ſuch Remarks on each Caſe, as may enable common Readers to collect what the Law antiently was, and how it has been altered, and ſtands at this Day, in criminal Matters; which is a Part of Learning, that every Man, who is a Subject of England, ought to have a general Knowledge of, ſince at one Time or other, he may poſſibly be concerned, either in proſecuting or defending Suits of this Nature, for himſelf or his Friends. But Gentlemen in the Magiſtracy, or Commiſſion of Peace, can never be qualified to exerciſe their reſpective Offices, or ſerve their Prince or Country with any tolerable Reputation, who are perfectly Strangers to this Branch of our Laws. Therefore the Digeſting theſe Trials, and reducing them within ſuch Bounds, as Gentlemen may be able to come at them on moderate Terms, will, probably, be of ſome Service to the Publick.

Another Deſign of this REVIEW is to enquire into the HISTORY and CHARACTERS of thoſe who have been thus brought upon the Stage, and in whoſe Fate all Mankind almoſt have intereſted themſelves. The Want of this Enquiry, has been held a material Omiſſion in the STATE TRIALS, and occaſioned ſome Reflections on the Compilers: Though it may very juſtly be ſaid in their Excuſe, That as their Deſign was Great and Noble, and of itſelf itſelf of infinite Service to the Publick, ſo never any Thing was brought to Perfection at once. There will in Eſſays of every Kind, be Room left for Additions and Improvements; and I am ſatisfied the World will be pleaſed to ſee ſuch a Supplement to that Work as will render it ſtill more Uſeful and Entertaining, and accordingly afford it a favourable Reception, and the rather, as the Law is here exemplified by ſuch familiar Inſtances, as renders this Kind of Reading eaſy and pleaſant, which would otherwiſe prove a dry, laborious Study.

A CRI-

A CRITICAL REVIEW OF THE STATE TRIALS.

Proceedings in Parliament againſt ALEXANDER NEVIL Archbiſhop of York, ROBERT VERE Duke of Ireland, MICHAEL DE LA POLE Earl of Suffolk, ROBERT TRESILIAN Lord Chief Juſtice of England, and Sir NICHOLAS BRAMBRE ſome time Mayor of London, Feb. 3. 1388. 11 Richard II.

1388. 11 Rich. 2. Trial of Treſtilian, &c.

1388. 11 Rich. 2.

Imperfect.

THIS is a patched, up partial Narrative of a ſucceſsful Rebellion, rather than a Trial: However, as it is bound up with the ſecond Collection of Trials, it might be thought an Omiſſion not to examine it.

We are told, that the Nobility, ſeeing the miſerable State of the Kingdom under a profuſe and arbitrary Miniſtry, Men of mean Extraction, prevailed on the King (then a Minor of about ſeventeen Years of Age) to aſſemble a Parliament on the 1ſt of October, 1386. to redreſs their Grievances. In which Parliament, among other Acts, John Fortham Biſhop of Durham, was diſcharged of his Office of Treaſurer, and John Gilbert Biſhop of Hereford, appointed in his Place; and Michael de la Pole Earl of Suffolk, and Chancellor of England, was diſmiſſed, and immediately after impeached of the following High Crimes and Miſdemeanors, viz.

Miniſters diſplaced.

Earl of Suffolk impeached.

The Articles againſt him.

1. That being Chancellor, and ſworn to act for the Profit of the King, he had deceived his Majeſty in his Grants, and purchaſed Crown Lands at an under Value, not regarding the great Neceſſities of the King and Realm.

2. That whereas nine Lords were aſſigned by the laſt Parliament to examine the State of the King and Realm, and put it into better Order; this was not done, through the ſaid Earl's Default, who was the prime Officer or Miniſter.

3. That a Supply, given for the Defence of the Sea, had been miſapplied, by the Default of the ſaid Chancellor.

4. That he had obtained a Grant of fifty Pounds per Annum out of the Cuſtoms.

5. That whereas the Maſter of St. Anthony, by being a Schiſmatick, had forfeited his Revenues, amounting to 100 Marks per Annum, the Earl had farmed them of the King at 20 Marks per Annum, and kept the ſucceeding Maſter out of Poſſeſſion, till he had extorted a Sum of Money from him.

6. That, while he was Chancellor, he had ſealed divers illegal Charters and Pardons, for Treaſon, Murder, &c.

7. That he had miſapplied Money given for the Relief of the City of Ghent, which was loſt by his Default.

The Earl's Anſwer to Part of the Articles. The reſt omitted.

To which the Earl anſwered, that he neither purchaſed or accepted any Lands of the King while he was Chancellor, unleſs an hundred Marks per Annum, which he had by way of Exchange for a Revenue he was entitled to out of the Cuſtoms. The ſecond Article the Compiler of the Trials has omitted the Anſwer to: The third Article he denied, and they ſeem to allow it was not proved: Nor do they give us his Anſwer to the 4th Article; or to the 5th, 6th, or 7th. Only they tell us in general, that he denied ſome of them, and confeſſed and excuſed others.

The Commons Reply.

The Commons replied, That his having acknowledged the making an Exchange with his Majeſty, was a Confeſſion of his conſenting to alienate the Lands of the Crown, while he was Chancellor; which was contrary to his Oath and Duty. And the Lords thereupon adjudged, That the Grants the Earl had obtained ſhould revert to the Crown: That all his Lands ſhould be confiſcated: That he ſhould pay a Fine to the Crown, and be impriſoned in the Caſtle of Windſor.

Adjudged that he ſhould be impriſoned, and his Eſtate confiſcated.

Lords Commiſſioners appointed, in whom both the legiſlative and executive Power is lodged.

That the Parliament afterwards by ſeveral Acts, appointed ſeven of the Lords Spiritual, five of the Temporal Lords, and Sir John Devereux Kt. Commiſſioners, to reform the State, and adminiſter the Government for a Year, viz. 1. William Archbiſhop of Canterbury, 2. Alexander Nevil Archbiſhop of York, 3. Thomas Arundel Biſhop of Ely, Lord Chancellor, 4. William Wickham Biſhop of Wincheſter, 5. John Gilbert Biſhop of Hereford, 6. Thomas Biſhop of Exeter. 7. Nicholas Abbot of Waltham, Lord Privy Seal, 8. Edmund Langly Duke of York, 9. Thomas of Woodſtock Duke of Glouceſter. 10. Richard Earl of Arundel, 11. John Lord Cobham, 12. Richard Lord Scrope, and, 13. Sir John Devereux Kt. enacting, That if any refuſed to obey their Ordinances, they ſhould forfeit their Goods for the firſt Offence, and their Lives for the ſecond; and on the 20th of November 1386. the Parliament was diſſolved.

The Earl of Suffolk is charged with conſpiring againſt the Duke of Glouceſter.

That ſoon after the Riſing of the Parliament, the ſaid Earl of Suffolk and his Confederates, inſinuated into the King, that the ſaid Statutes were prejudicial to his Honour, and derogatory to his Prerogative; and while they were in force, he was but the Shadow of a King: That the ſaid Earl being releaſed out of Windſor Caſtle, he, with the Duke of Ireland, and Chief Juſtice Treſilian, incited the King to deſtroy the Duke of Glouceſter. The Earls of Arundel, Warwick, Derby, and Nottingham, with others of their Party, and for that End, conſpired with Alexander Archbiſhop of York, and Sir Nicholas Brambre, to diſpatch the ſaid Lords; and wrote Letters to the French King, to aſſiſt them in ſeiſing the ſaid Noblemen; and alſo prevailed with the Judges, to declare them guilty of High Treaſon, in procuring the ſaid late Statutes.

That the ſaid five Lords, keeping Spies in all Parts of the Kingdom, and intercepting ſome Letters from Court, diſcovered a Plot againſt them; and believing it to be agreeable to the Law of Nature to repel Force by Force, every one of them, according to his Ability, levied a power for the Preſervation of the King and Kingdom (which the Patriots of 41. made a Precedent, no doubt, for fighting in the King's Name againſt his Perſon.) And with theſe Forces the Earl of Arundel marched towards London: Whereupon the Earl of Suffolk and his Accomplices, adviſed the King to iſſue a Proclamation, commanding the Citizens to treat them as Rebels; and that he ſhould not meet the Parliament at Candlemas as the ſaid Commiſſioners had appointed, unleſs the Duke of Glouceſter, the Earls of Warwick, Arundel, and the reſt of the Commiſſioners, would ſwear, that neither they, nor any in their Name, ſhould accuſe the ſaid Earl of Suffolk, Duke of Ireland, and the reſt of the late Miniſtry.

The Duke of Glouceſter, &c. impeach the Earl of Suffolk, and the reſt of the late Miniſtry, of High Treaſon before the King

In the mean Time the Duke of Glouceſter, the Earl of Arundel, &c. being arrived with their Army at Waltham-Croſs, the 14th of November, ſent ſome of their Members to the King at Weſtminſter, to charge the Archbiſhop of York, the Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolk, Chief Juſtice Treſilian, and Sir Nicholas Brambre, with High Treaſon. 1388. 11Rich.2.

The King demanded what they would have: They anſwered, That the Traitors which were about him, and filled his Ears with falſe Reports, might be puniſhed; for it was better ſome few ſhould die for the People, than the whole Nation ſhould periſh.

Whereupon his Majeſty ſent the Lords Commiſſioners a ſafe Conduct, and they appeared before his Majeſty at Weſtminſter-Hall; where they again impeached the Archbiſhop of York, the Duke of Ireland, &c. of High Treaſon, offering to maintain the Charge by ſingle Combat: But the King, having appointed the Parliament to meet the next Day after Candlemas, told them the Controverſy ſhould be heard and determined there.

The Earl of Suffolk and ſome of the Miniſters fly.

But the Earl of Suffolk fled to Calais, and the Archbiſhop of York and the Biſhop of Durham abſconded; while the Duke of Ireland went into Cheſhire, Lancaſhire, and Wales, to raiſe Forces for the King, and oppoſe thoſe of the diſaffected Lords. The Earl of Arundel afterwards engaging the Duke of Ireland at Chipping Norton in Oxfordſhire, as he was marching to London, part of the Duke's Forces revolted, and he was defeated, and forced to fly into Flanders.

Is defeated, and fly to Flanders.

In the mean Time Alderman Brambre held the City of London for the King, and was in Expectation of being joined by the Duke of Ireland; but the Earl of Arundel having defeated the Duke (as before related) and appearing with his victorious Troops before the Gates, the Mayor and Citizens of London thought fit to deliver him their Keys. After which all Places ſubmitted to the diſaffected Lords, who compelled the King to give them Audience in the Tower. They appeared indeed in an humble, ſuppliant Poſture before his Majeſty; but brought ſuch Numbers of armed Troops with them, that he durſt deny them nothing; and here again they appealed (or impeached) the Duke of Ireland, and the reſt of the King's Miniſters, of High Treaſon: After which Proclamation was made, That a Parliament ſhould be held the Day after Candlemas, where the accuſed Lords ſhould appear and anſwer the Charge of the Malecontents. The King was alſo compelled by the Faction to iſſue Orders for the apprehending ſeveral Miniſters and Officers of his own Houſhold, and thoſe who had adhered to him; and Sir Simon Burleigh, Sir William Elman, Sir John Beauchamp, Sir Thomas Trevet, Sir John Salisbury, and Sir Nicholas Brambre, were thereupon taken up, with many others they ſuſpected to be in a different Intereſt; but the Duke of Ireland, the Archbiſhop of York, the Earl of Suffolk, and Sir Robert Treſilian, had withdrawn themſelves, and were not to be found.

London ſubmitted to the Malcontents.

They force the King to give them Audience.

And give Orders for apprehending his own Miniſters.

The Judges taken off the Bench.

The Parliament meeting the Day after Candlemas, the following Judges were taken off the Bench, and committed to the Tower, for anſwering ſeveral Queries that had been propoſed to them by the King at Nottingham, viz. Sir Roger Fulthorp, Sir Robert Belknap, Sir John Carey, Sir John Holt, and Sir William Burleigh, and and John Locton the King's Serjeant at Law, was alſo committed with them.

The Parliament opened with a Speech.

The Lord Chancellor, the Biſhop of Ely, opened the Parliament with a Speech, wherein he declared they were aſſembled to conſider how the Diſtractions of the Realm might be compoſed, the King better adviſed, the Mal-adminiſtration of the late Miniſters reformed and puniſhed, and the Kingdom defended by Sea and Land; declaring that all who had any Grievances to be redreſſed might be heard. Then the Duke of Glouceſter, and the other four diſaffected Lords, preſented themſelves before his Majeſty, and ſaid, they came to purge themſelves of the Treaſons laid to their Charge by the accuſed Lords, (of the late Miniſtry.) To whom the Lord Chancellor anſwered, That the King entertained ſuch honourable Thoughts of the Duke of Glouceſter, that he could not believe any one ſo near allied to him would be concerned in any treaſonable Attempt againſt his Majeſty: For which the Duke, and his four Companions (or rather Accomplices) returned the King their Thanks.

The Duke of Glouceſter and the malcontent Lords deſire to purge themſelves of the Charge of Treaſon.

The King obliged to acknowledge them innocent.

The Lords inſiſt on their Privileges.

The Lords Spiritual and Temporal afterwards declared, That all great Matters moved in Parliament, touching the Peers, ought to be diſcuſſed and adjudged by the Courſe of Parliament, and not by the Civil, or Common Law, in inferior Courts; which Claim or Declaration the King allowed.

The Malcontents exhibit 39 Articles againſt the King's late Miniſtry.

Then the five Lords Appellants (the Duke of Glouceſter and his Accomplices) exhibited thirty-nine Articles againſt the accuſed Lords, the King's late Miniſters and Officers of State.

1. And firſt, they charge them as falſe Traitors to the King and Kingdom, in taking Advantage of his Majeſty's tender Age, framing falſe Stories, and making him entirely their own: While they rendered ſuſpected his loyal Lords and Leiges, by whom he ought to have been governed. That theſe Traitors had accroached to themſelves royal Power, by enſlaving the King, and leſſening his Prerogatives, making him ſo obedient to their Will, that he was ſworn to be adviſed and governed by them.

2. The Second charges the Archbiſhop of of York, the Duke of Ireland, and the Earl of Suffolk again, with obliging the King to take the Oath, and thereby keeping him in a State of Servitude.

3. The Third charges, that the ſaid three Noblemen, by the Advice of Sir Robert Treſilian and Sir Nicholas Brambre, would not permit the great Men of the Kingdom to come near the King, or ſuffer them to ſpeak to his Majeſty, unleſs in their Preſence and Hearing; accroaching to themſelves Royal Power, and aſſuming a Sovereignty over the Perſon of the King.

4. That the ſaid five late Miniſters would not ſuffer the King to grant any Petitions without their Aſſent; thereby turning the Hearts of the great Lords from his Majeſty, with Deſign to eſtrange his Heart from the Peers, and have the ſole Government of the Kingdom.

5. That they adviſed the King to grant the whole Realm of Ireland, and divers other Caſtles, Lordſhips, and Manors, to the Duke of Ireland; and to make divers Grants to others of the Crown-Lands, whereby the King was ſo impoveriſhed, that he could not ſupport himſelf, without laying Taxes and Impoſitions on his Subjects. 1388. 11 Rich. 2.

6. That they cauſed the King to make other Grants of the Crown-Lands to their Relations and Friends, of whom they received great Bribes.

7. That they cauſed the King to grant the ſaid Duke of Ireland and others, the Jewels of the Crown, and the Treaſure of the Kingdom, with the Tenths and Fifteenths, given by Parliament for Defence of the Realm, to the Value of one hundred thouſand Marks; and cauſed many good Ordinances of Parliament to be interrupted.

8. That they put Governors into the Caſtles and Fortreſſes on the Frontiers of France and Scotland, who were not qualified for ſuch Poſts, without the Conſent of the Realm, whereby ſeveral Countries were loſt to the Enemy.

9. That they would not ſuffer the Laws to take their Courſe; but cauſed ſeveral Judgments of Parliament to be reverſed and annulled.

10. That they had cauſed ſeveral Pardons to be granted for Treaſons and Felonies.

11. That they adviſed the King to make the ſaid Duke King of Ireland, and excited his Majeſty to write Letters to the Pope to confirm the Grant, without the Knowledge or Aſſent of the Kingdoms of England or Ireland, in Diſheriſon of the Crown of England, and to the Deſtruction of the Nation of Ireland.

12. That the ſaid Sir Nicholas Brambre had taken two and twenty Perſons out of Newgate, ſome of them impriſoned for Debt, and others for Criminal Matters, and without any Proceſs of Law, cauſed all their Heads to be cut off (but one) at a Place called the Foul Oak, in Kent.

13. That the ſaid accuſed Miniſters had taken great Bribes for the Maintenance of Suits; and once took Bribes on both Sides.

14. That they cauſed ſome Lords, and others, to be put out of the King's Council.

15. That the laſt Parliament requiring the King to remove the five Miniſters from his Preſence, they cauſed the King to command the Mayor of London to kill ſuch of the Lords and Commons as were not of their Party; in which Execution the ſaid Miniſters were to have borne a Part.

16. That when the Mayor and Citizens of London had refuſed in the King's Preſence to murder the ſaid Lords and Commons, the ſaid five Miniſters prevailed on the King to leave the Parliament, and refuſe to treat with them on the Affairs of the Kingdom, unleſs they would promiſe not to proſecute the ſaid Miniſters.

17. That the Parliament having aſſigned twelve Lords to take upon them the Government of the Realm for one Year, with the King's Aſſent, againſt which no Man might adviſe his Majeſty, on Pain of Forfeiture of his Goods for the firſt Offence, and his Life for the ſecond; the ſaid five Miniſters inſinuated to the King, that the ſaid Ordinance or Statute, and Commiſſion in Purſuance of it, were made to defeat his Royalty; and that all thoſe, who adviſed or procured the framing of them, were worthy to be put to Death as Traitors.

18. That

1388. 11 Rich. 2.

18. That they cauſed the King to aſſemble certain Lords Juſtices, and others, without the Aſſent of the Lords Commiſſioners; and demanded their Opinions of divers ſuſpicious Matters, by which the King, the Lords, and the common People were brought into great Trouble.

19. That they cauſed the King to ride through the Nation, and ſummon the Lords, Knights, Eſquires, and others of the ſeveral Countries before him; obliging them to give Bonds, or take Oaths, to ſtand by him againſt all People, and to effect his Purpoſe, which was then the Will and Purpoſe of the ſaid traiterous Miniſters.

20. That the Realm was put to great Trouble by the ſaid Bonds and Oaths.

21. That they cauſed the King to go into diſtant Parts of the Kingdom, ſo as the Lords Commiſſioners could not adviſe with him; and the ſaid Ordinance, or Statute, was thereby defeated.

22. That the ſaid Duke of Ireland, by the Advice of the ſaid other four Traitors, had without the King's Commiſſion, or other ſufficient Warrant, made himſelf Chief Juſtice of Cheſter, and held all Manner of Places there; and alſo, accroaching to himſelf Royal Power, had raiſed Forces in that County, in order to deſtroy the loyal Lords, and others the King's liege Subjects.

23. Alſo, that they had cauſed John de Blois, Heir of Britany, and the King's Priſoner, to be ſet at Liberty, without Aſſent of Parliament, or any ſufficient Warrant.

24. That they cauſed the King to have a great Retinue, to whom he gave Badges, to impower them to execute their ſaid Treaſons.

25. That they cauſed the King to ſummon before him, to the Caſtle of Nottingham, the Day after St. Bartholomew then laſt paſt, divers Juſtices and Lawyers, and there conſtrained them to ſet their Hands to the Anſwers of certain Queſtions; by means whereof thoſe about the King might have Colour to put to Death the Duke of Gloceſter, and the other Lords, who in the laſt Parliament were ordained to have the Governance of the Realm.

Queries reſolved by the Judges at Nottingham.

(1.) The firſt Queſtion was, Whether the New Statute, Ordinance, and Commiſſion, were hurtful to the Prerogative?

It was unanimouſly anſwered, They were hurtful, becauſe againſt the King's Will.

(2.) How they ought to be puniſhed that procured the ſame?

Anſwered unanimouſly, They deſerved Death.

(3.) How they ought to be puniſhed that moved the King to conſent to the making them?

Anſw. They ought to loſe their Lives.

(4.) How they ſhould be puniſhed that compelled the King to conſent to the ſaid Statutes, &c.?

Anſw. They ought to ſuffer as Traitors.

(5.) How they ought to be puniſhed who interrupted the King in exerciſing his Royal Prerogative?

Anſw. They ought to be puniſhed as Traitors.

(6.) Whether the King might oblige the Parliament to diſpatch the Buſineſs propoſed by him, before they proceeded to any other?

Anſw. The King ought to have the Rule and ordering of all ſuch Articles as are preſented in Parliament; and if any one preſumed to go contrary to this Rule, he ought to be puniſhed as a Traitor.

1388. 11 Rich. 2.

(7.) Whether the King might not diſſolve the Parliament, when he pleaſed?

Anſw. He might.

(8.) Whether the Lords and Commons, without the King's Aſſent, might impeach his Officers and Juſtices in Parliament?

Anſw. They might not; and he that did, ought to ſuffer as a Traitor.

(9) How he was to be puniſhed who moved the Parliament, that the Statute wherein Edward, the Son of King Edward, Great Grandfather to the then King, was indicted in Parliament, might be ſent for? By Inſpection of which Statute the ſaid new Statute or Ordinance and Commiſſion was deviſed.

Anſwered unanimouſly, That as well he that called for, as the other, who by Virtue of the ſaid Motion brought the ſaid Statute into the Houſe, ought to be puniſhed as publick Offenders and Traitors.

10. Whether the Judgment given in Parliament againſt the Earl of Suffolk was erroneous and revocable?

Anſw. That the ſaid Judgment was erroneous and revocable in every Part.

Atteſted by Alexander Archbiſhop of York, Robert Archbiſhop of Dublin, John Biſhop of Durham, Thomas Biſhop of Cheſter, John Biſhop of Bangor, Robert Duke of Ireland, Michael Earl of Suffolk, John Rippon Clerk, and John Blake.

26. That ſaid five Traitors contrived that the ſaid five Lords Appellants (the Duke of Glouceſter, &c.) ſhould be privately indicted and attainted of High Treaſon in London or Middleſex; and for that End procured Thomas Huſke to be made Under-Sheriff of Middleſex, who undertook that the ſaid Indictments and Attainders ſhould be accompliſhed: That for the better effecting their ſaid Treaſons, they cauſed the King to ſend Letters by one John Rippon Clerk, to the Mayor of London, to arreſt the Duke of Glouceſter, and others; and one John Blake carried a Bill of Information to the Mayor againſt them, by which they were to be indicted and attainted; which Information ſet forth: "That the Appellants, and ſeveral other "of the Lords and Commons, had traiterouſly "conſpired and confederated to make a Statute "and Commiſſion againſt the Royalty of the "King, and in Derogation of his Crown, and "conſtrained the King to paſs it againſt his "Will; and had traiterouſly hindered the "King from exerciſing his Royalty, to the "great Diſheriſon of his Majeſty, and in "Derogation of his Crown:" And that the ſaid traiterous Miniſters ſet a Watch to give Notice of the Duke of Lancaſter's landing, that he might be arreſted on his Arrival.

An Information drawn up againſt the Lords Appellants.

27. That the ſaid five Miniſters, the Duke of Ireland, &c. alſo poſſeſſed the King, that all who cauſed the ſaid Statute, &c. to be made, had thereby a Purpoſe to degrade him, and finally to depoſe him; and cauſed him to hold them as Enemies and Traitors.

28. That the ſaid five Miniſters adviſed his Majeſty, by his own Power, and by the Aſſiſtance of his Enemies of France, to deſtroy the said Lords, and others, who assented to the making the said Statute as privately as might be.

29. That they advised his Majesty to send Letters to the King of France, requesting that Prince with all his Power and Advice, to be aiding and assisting in destroying the said Lords, &c.

30. That the said Archbishop, Duke of Ireland, and Earl of Suffolk, accroaching to themselves Royal Power, caused his Majesty to promise the French King, for such Aid and Assistance, to surrender to him Calais, and all other Fortresses on the Confines of Picardy and Artois, with the Towns of Cherburgh and Brest.

31. That the said five Ministers had contrived an Interview between the said Kings of France and England in the Marches of Calais; where the said Thomas Duke of Glocester, Richard Earl of Arundel, and Thomas Earl of Warwick, with several others, were to have been treacherously murdered.

32. That they caused the King to send for safe Conducts from France, for Sir John Salisbury, Sir John Lancaster, and others, who were to go over to France to put the said Treason in Execution.

33. That the said Sir Nicholas Brambre, and others of the said Traitors, went into the City without the King's Knowledge; and, in his Name, caused all the Trades in the City to swear to perform divers Matters not lawful; and particularly, to keep and maintain the King's Will and Purposes to their Power against all Rebels; and that they would live and die with him against all those who should design any Treason against the King; and for that Purpose should appear on the Summons of the Mayor, and be ready to resist all such Traitors: Their Design being to engage the People of London to raise their Power, to destroy the said loyal Lords and others.

34. That the said Ministers caused to be proclaimed through London, That none of the King's Subjects should aid or assist the Earl of Arundel, but avoid all his Party, upon Pain of being proceeded against as Rebels.

35. That the said Sir Nicholas Brambre, by the Advice of the said other Ministers, caused it to be proclaimed, that none should speak ill of the said evil Ministers, upon Pain of forfeiting all they had.

36. That the said five Ministers caused Sheriffs to be made, that they might get such Persons returned Knights of the Shire as they should name.

37. That they caused to the King to send Letters to the Sheriffs and other Officers, to assemble all their Power to join the Duke of Ireland against the said Lords Appellants, and to make War upon them.

38. That they caused the King to write to the Duke of Ireland, that they were all appealed (impeached) of Treason, and that he had given a Day till next Parliament, and taken both Parties into his Protection: But that, if the Duke of Ireland should have sufficient Power, he should however march on and come to him, and that he would meet him with all his Forces, and venture his Royal Person; and that he and the whole Nation were in great Danger, if they were not relieved: This the Duke was to declare to the People, and to assure them, that the King would pay them all their Wages. By Virtue of which Letters the said Duke raised great Numbers of Men at Arms, and Archers, in Lancashire, Cheshire, Wales, and elsewhere, to destroy the said Lords, and all others who assented to the said Statute, Ordinance, and Commission.

39. The last Article charges the Duke of Ireland with raising the said Forces, and marching with them from the County of Chester to Radcote-Bridge in Oxfordshire, in order to destroy the said Lords Appellants, viz. Thomas Duke of Glocester Constable of England, Henry Earl of Derby (who afterwards usurped the Throne) Richard Earl of Arundel, Thomas Earl of Warwick, and Thomas Earl Marshal, accroaching to himself Royal Power, and displaying the King's Banner in his Army, against the State of the King and his Crown.

The late Ministry summoned to appear and answer the Articles.

Then the Lords Appellants declared, they were ready to prove every Article; and the Persons appealed (the late Ministers) were solemnly summoned to appear and answer the Appellants: And the Parties accused not appearing, the Lords Appellants demanded, that they might be adjudged and convicted of the said Treasons: But the King ordered the Lords to examine the said Articles; and the Justices, Serjeants, and other Sages of the Law, were commanded to give their Advice to the said Lords of Parliament, how they ought to proceed in the said Appeal: Whereupon the said Justices, Serjeants, &c. declared, That the said Appeal was not made, or brought, according as the one Law or the other required.

The Judges declare, the said Appeal or Impeachment to be illegally brought.

The Lords resolve, it was legally brought.

However, the Lords, by the Assent of the King, resolved, That this Appeal was well and duly brought, according to the Laws and Course of Parliament, by which they would adjudge of it: Then the Appellants demanded again, that the Default of the Parties accused might be recorded; and the said Chancellor (the Bishop of Ely) in the Name of the Clergy, declared, that they could not by any Means be present at Proceedings where Sentence of Death was to be passed; and the Clergy delivered in a Protestation in Writing, importing, That neither in respect of Favour, or for fear of any Man's Hate, nor in hope of Reward, they desired to absent themselves; but only as they were bound by the Canon, not to be present at any Man's Arraignment or Condemnation; and they sent the like Protestation to the Commons, which was allowed of.

The Clergy protest they could not by the Canon be present where Sentence of Death was to be passed.

Four of the Ministers condemned as Traitors, unheard.

On the 13th of February the Bishop of York, the Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolk, and Sir Robert Tresilian, being summoned a third Time, their Defaults were recorded; and the Lords declared fourteen of the Articles to be Treason, and by Assent of the King, did adjudge the said four Ministers to be guilty of High Treason, and that they should be drawn and hanged as Traitors to the King and Kingdom, and their Lands and Tenements, Goods and Chattels, forfeited.

Sir Nicholas Brambre brought to his Trial.

On the 17th of February, Sir Nicholas Brambre, the fifth of the said accused Ministers, being in Custody in the Tower, was brought before the Parliament, and charged with the Treaſons contained in the ſaid Articles, when he deſired Time to prepare for his Defence, which was denied, and the Judges required him to anſwer immediately and diſtinctly to the ſaid Treaſons. Whereupon he declared, he was ready to fight with any Man that ſhould brand him with that ignominious Mark; and the Appellants declared they were ready to accept the Challenge. But the Lords reſolved, that Battel did not lie in this Caſe, and that the Matter ſhould be determined in Parliament.

Offers to clear himſelf by ſingle Combat.

The Mob come down to the Parliament Houſe, to accuſe him.

In the mean Time the Rabble came down from London, and complained of manifold Injuries committed by Sir Nicholas Brambre; and while the Caſe of this Knight was under Debate, the Lord Chief Juſtice Treſilian, being apprehended in a Houſe in Palace-Yard, was dragged into the Hall by the Soldiers. It was demanded of him, what he could ſay, why Judgment ſhould not be executed upon him? But the Compiler of this Volume of Trials tells us, he had nothing to ſay for himſelf, and that thereupon he was ſent to the Tower, from whence he was dragged on a Hurdle to the Gallows; and that he refuſed to mount the Ladder till he was beaten with Clubs, and forced up, and then he told the Hangman he ſhould not die as long as he had any Thing about him: Whereupon he was ſtripped, and certain Images were found like the Signs in the Heavens, and the Head of a Devil painted, and the Names of many Devils written in Parchment; which being taken away, he was hanged naked for ſome Time, and then his Throat was cut; and his Body, having hung till Morning, was given to his Wife, who buried it in Grey-Friers.

Ridiculous Account of Charms about him.

Sir Nicholas Brambre executed.

Sir Nicholas Brambre being brought before the Parliament again the 20th of February, and being able to make no anſwer to the Articles (ſays the Compiler) the like Sentence was pronounced againſt him; and he was drawn upon a Hurdle from the Tower to Tyburn, where he ſhewed himſelf very penitent, and begged Pardon of all he had offended, particularly of one Northampton, who attended his Execution, and whoſe Father had been Mayor of London, and wrongfully accuſed by Brambre of a Conſpiracy againſt the State, for which Northampton's Lands were confiſcated, and he very hardly eſcaped with his Life.

The Judges impeached, and tried.

After theſe Executions, viz. on the 2d of March, Sir Robert Belknap, Sir John Holt, Sir Roger Fulthorpe, Sir William Burleigh, and Sir John Carey, the Judges who had anſwered the King's Queries at Nottingham, together with John Locton, the King's Serjeant at Law, having been impeached by the Commons, were called to anſwer before the Lords. They ſaid in their Defence, that the Anſwers they were charged with were not the ſame they had given; and that they were threatened and forced to ſign them by the Archbiſhop of York, the Duke of Ireland, and the Earl of Suffolk; and deſired they might be mercifully dealt with. However, the Lords thought fit to adjudge them all to be Traitors, and paſſed Sentence on them to be drawn and hanged as ſuch.

Their Defence.

Condemned as Traitors.

This being reported to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and the Biſhops, who were retired into the King's Chamber while theſe Cauſes were trying, they returned to the Parliament Houſe, and begged of the King and Peers, for the Love of God, the Virgin Mary, and all Saints, they would not put the Judges to death: The five Lords Appellants alſo thought fit to interpoſe, and deſire their Lives might be ſpared: Whereupon they were remanded to the Tower, and afterwards baniſhed to Ireland.

1388. 11 Rich. 2.

The Lords Spiritual intrepoſe, and ſave their Lives.

John Blake, the King's Council, being impeached by the Commons for drawing up the ſaid Queries, and contriving the Death of the ſaid Lords Appellants; and Thomas Uſke, for procuring himſelf to be made Under-Sheriff, in order to get them indicted and attainted, were brought before the Lords, the third of March, to anſwer that Charge. They ſaid in their Defence, that what they had done was by the King's Command: But the Lords replied, this Excuſe made their Crime the greater; for they knew the Miniſters had accroached to themſelves Royal Power, and that it was theirs, and not the King's Command, and paſſed Sentence on them as Traitors; in purſuance whereof they were executed the ſame Day.

Blake and Uske impeached, and tried.

Condemned and executed.

On the 6th of March Thomas Biſhop of Chicheſter, being impeached by the Commons, for exciting and threatening the Judges, to make them ſign the ſaid Queries and Anſwers, and for concealing what they had done, was brought before the Parliament, and anſwered, that the Judges were not excited or charged to ſay any Thing but what the Law was; and as to his concealing the ſaid Treaſon, he was under Engagements not to diſcover it.

Biſhop of Chicheſter tried.

Avers the Judges were not threatened.

On the 12th of March, Simon de Burleigh, John de Beauchamp, James Baroverſe, and John Salisbury, were brought to the Bar of the Houſe of Lords, being impeached for the firſt of the ſaid Articles, and for concealing the ſaid Treaſons; and Simon de Burleigh, and John Beauchamp, were charged alſo as principal Actors in the ſaid Treaſons. To which they all pleaded Not guilty; and Sir Simon Burleigh being a popular Man, great Intereſt was made to ſave him: But at length, on the 5th of May, Sir Simon was condemned as a Traitor, and beheaded on Tower-Hill, the King pardoning the reſt of the Sentence. Sir John Beauchamp, Steward of the King's Houſhold, Sir James Baroverſe, and Sir John Saliſbury, Gentlemen of the Privy Chamber, alſo were condemned: The two firſt were beheaded on Tower-Hill, and Sir John Saliſbury was drawn to Tyburn and hanged there. The Biſhop of Chicheſter alſo was condemned; but, he being the King's Confeſſor, was only baniſhed to Ireland.

Burleigh, Beauchamp, &c. tried.

Condemned and executed.

Biſhop of Chicheſter condemned, but pardoned as to Life.

From theſe numerous Convictions and Executions, this was called the UNIVERSAL PARLIAMENT.

Theſe Proceedings have, ſince the Revolution, been mightily cried up, as Precedents for future Ages to imitate; but if we come to examine them with a little Attention, poſſibly there are few People that would deſire to ſee them copied in every Inſtance.

Remarks on the Trials of the Lord Chief Juſtice Treſilian, and the reſt of the King's Miniſters and Officers.

The diſaffected Lords had infuſed ſuch a Spirit of Diſcontent into the Members of Parliament

liament againſt the Adminiſtration, that notwithſtanding the French King was upon the Point of invading the Kingdom with a prodigious Fleet and Army, and the Miniſtry had raiſed two hundred thouſand Men to oppoſe the Deſcent, the Parliament would not grant the King one Penny towards the Defence of their Country, unleſs he would conſent to the Ruin of thoſe Noblemen who had ſerved him with the greateſt Fidelity and Affection. In Rapin's Words, So great was the Hatred they had entertained againſt the Lords in the Adminiſtration, that, in order to ruin them, the Parliament ſcrupled not to hazard the Loſs of the whole Kingdom, telling the King, the Confiſcations of the Eſtates of his Miniſters, who had miſbehaved themſelves, were ſufficient to anſwer the Occaſions of the State; in which obſtinate and perverſe Temper, I preſume, no Body deſires to ſee future Parliaments imitate them.

They afterwards compelled the King to diſplace ſeveral of his Miniſters, and to transfer his Authority, (and indeed a greater Authority than ever any King of England exerciſed) to certain Lords; among which were the Duke of Gloceſter, the Earl of Derby, the Earl of Arundel, and other Malcontents, who were in a Conſpiracy to depoſe him: And when the King reſumed his Authority, and reſtored the Miniſters they had forced him to diſplace and puniſh, they raiſed an Army to compel his Majeſty to yield to their Demands, and eſtabliſh their Tyranny over himſelf and his Subjects, cauſing ſuch a Houſe of Commons to be retained by their Influence, as were abſolutely at their Devotion; and they had already made a Majority in the Houſe of Lords.

It was when the Kingdom was in the extremeſt Danger of a French Invaſion, Anno 1386. that they compelled the King to turn out his Treaſurer the Biſhop of Durham, and the Earl of Suffolk the Chancellor, and impeached the Earl of high Crimes and Miſdemeanors; but if we take a View of the Articles againſt the Earl, it is no ſmall Argument of his Innocence, that they could find ſo little to accuſe him of; and would the Compiler have favoured us with his whole Defence, probably it would have appeared no more than a malicious Proſecution, to deprive him of that Poſt, and put one of their own Creatures in his Room.

Certain it is, the King looked upon it as ſuch, and accordingly ſoon releaſed the Earl, and recalled him to the Council-Table, together with the Duke of Ireland, another Object of their Envy, whom they had driven from his Majeſty, and confiſcated his Eſtate; and his Majeſty's entertaining theſe Noblemen in his Service again, was held a ſufficient Ground for their breaking out into actual Rebellion, and raiſing ſuch a formidable Army, as neither the King or his Miniſters could afterwards promiſe themſelves any Security. No Wonder, therefore, that the Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolk, and the reſt of the Miniſtry, fled from their Rage. What could they expect from a Parliament choſen and influenced by their mortal Enemies, and ſupported by an Army of forty thouſand Men?

We might juſtly expect, when the Malcontents were thus triumphant, All that Malice could ſuggeſt in the Proſecution of the King's Miniſters; and accordingly we find almoſt every poſſible Crime laid to their Charge in the thirty-nine Articles exhibited againſt the Miniſtry. But it is obvious, even from thoſe Articles, that the Treaſon they were proſecuted for, was Treaſon againſt the Malcontents, and not againſt the King. Their adviſing his Majeſty not to ſuffer himſelf and his Subjects to be tyrannized over by the diſaffected Lords, was the grand Offence, whatever elſe was pretended.

They charge the Miniſtry, indeed, with impoſing upon the King in his tender Age, inſinuating themſelves into his Favour, and keeping all others at a Diſtance they did not like; which are Arts poſſibly practiſed by moſt Miniſters: But as to the King's tender Age, he was now Eighteen or Nineteen, and might be allowed the Liberty ſure of chuſing his own Servants, and adminiſtring the Government, without delegating his Authority to others, much leſs to his Enemies. We find Edward III. his Grandfather, took upon him the Adminiſtration of the Government before he arrived at theſe Years; and by what Law then was King Richard to be treated as a Minor at a more advanced Age? Beſides, I do not know any Law that gives the Houſe of Lords the Guardianſhip of the King, if he was ſtill to be looked upon as an Infant. They charge the Miniſtry, indeed, with aſſuming, or accroaching to themſelves, Sovereign Power, and keeping the King in a State of Servitude, but it is evident, this was what they were aiming at and endeavouring themſelves; and their greateſt Quarrel with the Miniſters was, that they ſtood in the Way of theſe diſaffected Lords, and prevented their putting their Plot in Execution. And as to the principal Article, the Twenty-fifth, That they had obliged the Judges to give their Opinions on certain Queries put to them,

It ſeems they gave their Opinions voluntarily, and moſt of their Anſwers were very juſt. What ſhould we ſay to a parcel of diſcontented Lords, at this Time of Day, that ſhould compel the King to turn out his Miniſters, and puniſh them for obeying his Commands, and even to inveſt their factious Leaders with Legiſlative Authority? What is this ſhort of Treaſon?

And as to that Queſtion, Whether the King can diſſolve the Parliament? Does any one make a Doubt of it? And yet this is one of thoſe Queries, for the reſolving of which the Judges were impeached of High-Treaſon.

And when it was moved to bring the Proceedings againſt Edward II. into Parliament, as a Precedent for them to reſiſt and depoſe Richard II. What was this ſhort of Treaſon, as the Judges reſolved it? Eſpecially when it was notorious, that the diſaffected Lords intended to depoſe King Richard, and even threatened him with it to his Face, if he would not comply with them in the Ruin of his Miniſters.

The Malecontents, indeed, charge the King and his Miniſters with inviting over the French, to aſſiſt in making him abſolute; lute: But as it is acknowledged by all Hiſtorians, that no Miniſtry ever exerted themſelves more effectually in the Defence of the Kingdom, when the French were about to invade it, this ought to be looked upon as a malicious Calumny, raiſed only to captivate the People, and give them ill Impreſſions of the Court.

Another Article we find was, that the Miniſtry appointed ſuch Sheriffs as might be ſerviceable to them in Elections; and if this were Treaſon, I doubt every Miniſtry has been guilty of it from that Day to This: But, admitting that the Facts laid in the Articles were Treaſon, the Proceedings againſt theſe Miniſters were certainly illegal, unjuſt, and cruel. All the Judges (who were, at that Time, of the diſaffected Lords own chuſing) with the reſt of the Lawyers, called to their Aſſiſtance on this Occaſion, were unanimous in their Opinions, That the Appeal (or Impeachment) of theſe Miniſters was not made or brought according to Law. The Lords, indeed, influenced by the Faction, reſolved the direct contrary. But if the Judges and Lawyers do not underſtand what our Conſtitution is, who muſt we have recourſe to, for Satisfaction in ſuch Diſputes? I doubt we ſhall not find many in either Houſe that underſtand it much better; and, indeed, ſuch Preſentments are not at this Day, nor, as I remember, have ever been ſince, held to be legal: For theſe Miniſters were not appealed, or impeached, by the Houſe of Commons, but by the five diſaffected Lords. And it will be admitted by all, that have any Knowledge in parliamentary Affairs, that one Lord, or one Party of Lords, cannot impeach another. But theſe Noblemen went a Step further; for here were two Commoners, viz. Sir Robert Treſilian and Sir Nicholas Brambre, included in the ſame Impeachment; ſo that the Lords made themſelves both Proſecutors and Judges; and that of Commoners as well as Peers, which I believe the Commons, at this Day, would ſcarce acquieſce in.

There was this further Injuſtice and Irregularity in this Proceeding, that moſt of the Lords impeached were condemned unheard: But here was the Name of a Parliament, ſupported or influenced by an Army of forty thouſand Men, and that gave a Sanction to all their Proceedings, Right or Wrong. Indeed they compelled the King, afterwards, to paſs an Act in the ſame illegal Parliament, to confirm their Proceedings; but this could not warrant the Injuſtice of theſe Sentences, which were pronounced when there was no Act, or Law, to countenance them: And, beſides, we meet with an Act afterwards, in this very Reign, viz. 21 Richard II. Cap. 12. which declares all the Proceedings againſt the ſaid Miniſters, and others, in the 11th Year of the ſaid King, to be illegal and unjuſt, and reverſes the ſeveral Judgments given againſt them; and declares further, that the Judges, who had anſwered the Queries put to them at Nottingham, had given their Anſwers as good and lawful liege People of the King ought to do; and that the ſaid Parliament holden in the 11th Year of this King, ſhould be clearly annulled, and holden for none, as a Thing made without Authority, and againſt the Will and Liberty of the King, and the Right of his Crown.

And Reſtitution was ordered to be made to thoſe, that were then living, who had ſuffered by thoſe unjuſt Sentences, and to the Heirs of thoſe that were dead.

It is obſervable the Compiler of this Volume of State Trials, takes no Manner of Notice of this Act: But if no ſuch Act had ever been made, all that have any Knowledge in parliamentary Affairs, muſt admit, that the Lords cannot impeach their own Members, much leſs Commoners; and that there are but two Ways ſuch Cauſes can come before them, viz. either by the Preſentment of the Grand Jury of the County where the Facts were committed, or by an Impeachment of the Commons; unleſs we reſort to that extraordinary Courſe, an Act of Attainder, which is uſually an Act of Parliament, to deſtroy ſome Perſon who has not offended againſt any Law in being.

1407. 8 Hen. 4. Thorpe proſecuted for Hereſy.

Proceedings againſt Maſter WILLIAM THORPE, Prieſt, for Hereſy, before Doctor Thomas Arundel, Archbiſhop of Canterbury and Lord Chancellor of England, July 3. 1407. 8 Henry IV.

1407. 8 Hen. 3.

The Charge.

THE Charge exhibited againſt the ſaid William Thorpe was, That in a Sermon preached at Shrewsbury he had declar'd, Firſt, That the Sacrament of the Altar after Conſecration was material Bread and Wine: Secondly, That Images ought not to be worſhipped: Thirdly, That Men ought not to go on Pilgrimages: Fourthly, That Prieſts have no Title to Tythes; and, Fifthly, That it is not lawful to ſwear in any Caſe.

The Evidence.

The Evidence of the Priſoner's preaching theſe Doctrines, was a Certificate under the Seal of the Bailiff of Shrewsbury.

His Defence.

To which he anſwered, That he never preached or taught theſe Doctrines openly or privately. But being examined, particularly by the Archbiſhop, as to theſe Points, he did declare, That he held the Bread after Conſecration ſtill remained Bread: That no body ought to worſhip or kneel before an Image; and that no Image ought to be made of God the Father, who was a moſt wonderful and incomprehenſible Spirit: That Pilgrimages, in which People waſted their Subſtance in Taverns and Inns, and upon lewd Women, could not be pleaſing to God: That neither Chriſt 1407. 8 Hen. 4. or his Apoſtles took Tythes, or commanded the People to pay any: That Pope Gregory X. was the firſt who ordered Tythes to be given to Prieſts; And that, whatever Dignity or Order any Prieſt was of, if he did not imitate Chriſt in wilful Poverty, and other heavenly Virtues, he was a Prieſt but in Name: That whatever a Prieſt took of the People, whether Tythe or Offering, he ought to have no more than his bare Living, and diſpenſe the Reſidue among the Poor of his Pariſh. But as to the laſt Article of the Charge, he abſolutely denied it, acknowledging, that it was lawful to take an Oath before a Magiſtrate for the determining of Controverſies.

Adviſed to ſubmit. The Archbiſhop hereupon adviſed the Priſoner to ſubmit himſelf to the Holy Church, and to renounce his Errors; and, on his Refuſal, threatned to lay him in Irons: And if that did not reclaim him, he ſhould be con-

Threatned to be burnt. demned as an obſtinate Heretick, and delivered over to the Civil Power to be burnt, as Soutre had been a little before for the like Hereſies. What became of the Priſoner afterwards does not appear; but moſt probably he died in Priſon.

This Proceeding is very imperfectly tranſmitted to us; but the Compiler of the firſt Volumes of State Trials thought fit, however, to publiſh it, that the preſent Generation might have ſome Notion of what was deemed Hereſy in thoſe Days, and of the Manner of proſecuting thoſe who were charged with it; which was, by ſummoning the Perſon accuſed to appear in the Court of the Archbiſhop or Biſhop of the Dioceſe, who were Judges of theſe Offences, and had Priſons in their Palaces, where Hereticks, or Lollards, (as they were called) were kept. And a Charge being exhibited againſt the Priſoner in the Biſhop's Court, and Proof made of it by Depoſitions, or otherwiſe, he was firſt dealt with in a friendly Manner to renounce his Errors; which if he refuſed, he was laid in heavy Irons, uſed hardly, and ſometimes put to the Torture; and if he could not be reclaimed by any of theſe Means, the Biſhop condemned him as an obſtinate Heretick, and delivered him to the Civil Magiſtrate to be burnt. But there is ſcarce any Inſtance of burning a Heretick that offered to renounce his Errors, unleſs he relapſed after a Recantation.

Proceedings againſt Sir JOHN OLDCASTLE, Lord Cobham, for Hereſy, before Doctor Thomas Arundel Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Richard Biſhop of London, Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter, Benedict Biſhop of Bangor, and ſeveral other reverend Doctors aſſociated with him, Sept. 23, &c. 1413. 1 Hen. V.

1 Hen. 5. 1413.

Preſented by the Convocation. SIR John Oldcaſtle had been preſented by the Clergy of the Province of Canterbury, aſſembled in Convocation, as the great Supporter and Encourager of ſeveral Hereſies, particularly with maintaining, 1. That in the Sacrament of the Altar, the Elements, after Conſecration by a Prieſt, ſtill remained Bread and Wine: 2. That Confeſſion to a Prieſt was not neceſſary: 3. That Images, or the Croſs, ought not to be worſhipped: 4. That the Pope, with the Biſhops and Friars, conſtituted a complete Antichriſt: and, 5. That it was not neceſſary to go on Pilgrimages.

The Charge.

Excommunicated for Contumacy. This Nobleman had been cited by the Archbiſhop to appear, and anſwer to theſe Articles; and for his Contumacy, in not appearing, ſtood excommunicated. However, depending on the King's Favour and Protection, he did not abſcond, but remained ſtill about the Court; till at length the Biſhops and Clergy obtained an Order from the King to apprehend Sir John, and carry him to the Tower.

He is taken, and avows his Principles. On the 23d of September Sir John was brought by the Lieutenant of the Tower, before the Archbiſhop and his Aſſociates, at the Chapter-Houſe of St. Pauls; when the Court let the Priſoner know, that, notwithſtanding he ſtood excommunicated, he might be abſolved and admitted to a Trial, on making his Submiſſion: But Sir John boldly avowed all the Doctrines he was accuſed of maintaining; and applying himſelf to the People, declared, that thoſe who ſat in Judgment on him would ſeduce them, and lead them all to Hell.

Adjudged an Heretick. The Court was ſo incenſed at this Inſult, that Sentence was pronounced againſt Sir John as an obſtinate Heretick and Apoſtate; and he was delivered over to the ſecular Arm to be burnt; and a Writ iſſued accordingly for his Execution.

He eſcapes out of the Tower. The Priſoner afterwards eſcaping out of the Tower, his Enemies ſuggeſted that he was not only an Heretick, but a Rebel and Traitor to the Government, and had appointed the Lollards to aſſemble in St. Giles's Fields on a certain Night, in order to an Inſurrection, which the poor Proteſtants, or Wickliffites, had given ſome Colour to, by aſſembling for their Devotions in the Night-Time in St. Giles's Woods. The King being perſuaded to come thither in perſon with a Body of his Troops, on a Night when it was known they would aſſemble there, apprehended about fourſcore of the Lollards in Arms; among whom was Sir Roger Acton, a Knight of ſome Reputation; which confirmed the King in the Belief that an Inſurrection was intended; and Sir Roger, with ſeveral more of the Priſoners, were tried, condemned, and executed. Though it did not appear that Sir John Oldcaſtle was at this 1413. 1 Hen. 5. Sir John Oldcaſtle concealed in the Mountains of Wales.

Meeting in St. Giles's Fields, he was outlawed for High Treaſon, as a Promoter of that Rebellion, as it was called, and taking Refuge in the Mountains of Wales, defended himſelf againſt all the Force and Stratagems of his Perſecutors, for three Years, and upwards; and might have remained there much longer, poſſibly, if he had not given the Clergy freſh Provocation, by defacing the Pictures and Images of the Saints wherever he came: Of which Complaint being made in a Parliament held by the Duke of Bedford, Regent of the Kingdom during the King's Abſence in France, Anno 1417. freſh Forces were ſent down againſt Sir John, and a Reward offered to any Perſon that ſhould take him. Whereupon the Lord Powis ſurrounded the Lord Cobham and his Friends; and after a deſperate Engagement, in which many were killed on both Sides, the Lord Cobham was made Priſoner. This Service was then thought of ſuch Importance, that the Lord Powis received the Thanks of the Parliament for it; and Sir John, according to our Hiſtorians, being brought before the Houſe of Lords, was ordered to be executed both as a Traitor, and an Heretick. In purſuance whereof it is ſaid he was hanged by the Middle in an Iron Chain, and burnt as an Heretick under a new Gallows erected at St. Giles's for that Purpoſe; and while his Enemies curſed and reviled him, and ordered the People not to pity, or pray for him, he gloried in his Sufferings, and was not at all diſmayed at the complicated Execution.

He is taken.

and executed as a Traitor and Heretick.

The Proceedings againſt this noble Lord alſo are very imperfect; but they are the beſt the Compiler of the State Trials was able to procure. And in a Work of this Nature, he could not omit mentioning the Bravery and Sufferings of this Proteſtant Hero, who, in defence of Truth, defied all the Powers of Bigotry, and Superſtition; and for many Years ſkreened and ſupported the Diſciples of theſe Proteſtant Doctrines, againſt the Rage and Malice of their Adverſaries: And he might probably have brought about a Reformation, even in thoſe early Days, if the King, who was then engaged in a War with France, had not been in a manner compelled to ſubmit to the Dictates of the Popiſh Clergy, who ſupported him in that Enterprize, and indeed maintained him on the Throne, to which he had but a dubious Title.

1413 1 Hen. 5. Remarks on the Proceedings againſt Sir John Oldcaſtle.

I muſt confeſs, I am not ſatisfied with the Account our Hiſtorians give us of the Execution of this great Man. Methinks he ſhould either have been burnt as an Heretick, or hanged and quartered as a Traitor. How both Sentences were brought into one, is not eaſy to be conceived; or what Authority could pronounce ſuch a Sentence. Certain it is, there is no Inſtance of ſuch another Execution before or ſince: Beſides, neither the Sentence for Hereſy or Treaſon authorizes the Executioner to hang up the Priſoner by the Middle. Nothing ſhort of an Act of Parliament could appoint ſuch an Execution; and I do not find it pretended that any ſuch Act was ever made.

The Trial of Sir THOMAS MORE, for High-Treaſon, before the Duke of Norfolk, and other Commiſſioners of Oyer and Terminer, the 7th of May, 1535. 26 Henry VIII.

1535. 26 Hen. 8.

The Charge.

THE Charge contained in the Indictment was, 1. That the Priſoner had ſtubbornly oppoſed the King's ſecond Marriage: 2. That he maliciouſly refuſed to declare his Opinion of the Act of Supremacy: 3. That he endeavoured to evade the Force of that Statute, and adviſed Biſhop Fiſher by his Letters, not to ſubmit to it; and, 4. That upon his Examination in the Tower, it being demanded, if he approved the Act of Supremacy, he anſwered, That the Queſtion was like a two-edged Sword; if he anſwered one way, it would deſtroy his Body; and if the other way, his Soul; and theſe were laid to be Open or Overt-Acts of the Treaſon of his Heart.

The Evidence.

As to the two firſt Articles, he did not deny that he adviſed the King againſt his ſecond Marriage, or, that he declined giving his Opinion concerning the Act of Supremacy; and his Letters to Fiſher were ſaid to prove the third, but they were not produced: Rich, the King's Solicitor, gave Evidence of the fourth, concerning his Anſwer on his Examination in the Tower.

His Defence.

Sir Thomas ſaid in his Defence, That he had no Malice or Treaſon in his Heart, when he adviſed the King againſt his ſecond Marriage, but gave his Opinion according to his Conſcience and his Duty, when his Majeſty required it; and that, if he had refuſed to deliver his Opinion, his Majeſty might juſtly have reſented it: 2. As to the ſecond Charge, he thought Silence was no Sign of the Malice of his Heart; for, according to the Civilians, he who held his Peace ſeemed to conſent, declaring, he had never caſt any Reflection on the Act before any Man: 3. As to the third, which charges him with maliciouſly adviſing Fiſher not to comply with the Act, he deſired his Letters, that were ſaid to prove it, might be produced, and he was confident they would acquit him of ever giving ſuch Advice: 4. And as to the fourth Article, the Words were no Reflection on the Act, if he had ſpoken them; but he had never ſaid any Thing like them, excepting to the Evidence of Rich the Solicitor, on whoſe Teſtimony he was charged with them; and appealing to the Memory of the Lords who who were preſent at that Examination, They all declared, They heard no ſuch Words.

He is convicted.

The Jury, however, was ſo managed, that within a quarter of an Hour after they were gone out, they returned with their Verdict, That the Priſoner was GUILTY of High Treaſon.

The Court demanding of Sir Thomas, What he had to ſay, why Judgment ſhould not be pronounced againſt him, he only obſerved, That an Act of Parliament could not give the King the Supremacy of the Church, of which England was but a Part; and further, that none but Heaven could confer that Supremacy on any Perſon: After which Sentence was pronounced on him as a Traitor; though all except the Beheading, was pardoned, on account of the Priſoner's having borne the Office of Lord Chancellor.

His Execution.

He was ordered to be executed on the ſixth of July, about a Month after his Trial. He preſerved his uſual facetious Temper to the laſt; for obſerving the Stairs of the Scaffold very weak, he deſired a Friend to lend him a Hand to get up; but when I come down, (ſays he) let me ſhift for my ſelf. And when the Executioner, as uſual, aſked him Forgiveneſs, Friend (ſays Sir Thomas) you will get but little Credit in cutting off my Head, my Neck is ſo ſhort. Then he deſired the Executioner's Leave to lay his Beard aſide, for that had committed no Treaſon.

Remarks on the Trial and Execution of Sir Thomas More.

It is not eaſy to conceive what there was in this Charge, if it had been all proved, that could amount to High Treaſon, or even to a Miſdemeanor; unleſs it be criminal not to think always as the King thinks. Very precarious was the Life of a Subject in this Reign. Whatever the Court were pleaſed to denominate Treaſon, was adjudged Treaſon; and whoever the Miniſtry thought fit to accuſe, were found guilty. No Jury, or Court of Juſtice, durſt refuſe to convict any Man the King intimated he would have condemed to Death: And Parliaments met only to execute the King's Decrees. We may therefore look upon this Reign of Henry VIII. to be the moſt tyrannical, arbitrary, and cruel, that is to be met with in our Annals. From this Proſecution of Sir Thomas More, it appears that neither Virtue, Parts, Learning, or even Innocence, and the moſt inoffenſive Behaviour, were any Protection. This great Man, who had arrived to a good old Age, was not ſuffered to go to the Grave in the natural and ordinary way. His ſteady and perſevering Virtue was a Reproach to the Tyrant, who ſeems determined to ſuffer no Man to live that would not fall down and worſhip him, and change his Creed as often as He changed his Mind.

Sir Thomas is ſometimes cenſured for the Lightneſs of his Expreſſions at the Hour of Death; but to me it only ſhews his Innocence, and that he conſidered this but as the Paſſage to a better State, which made him more than uſually gay, at the Approach of his Execution; and as to his ſaying His Beard had committed no Treaſon, he certainly intended to intimate thereby, that his whole Perſon was equally innocent, and that nothing, how inoffenſive ſoever, could eſcape the Rage and Fury of that Adminiſtration.

The Attainder of THOMAS Lord SEYMOUR, Baron of Sudley, of High-Treaſon, in Parliament, Feb. 25. 1549. 2 & 3 Edward VI.

1549. 2 & 3 Edw. 6.

The Attainder of the Lord Seymour.

THE Protector, Edward Seymour Duke of Somerſet, on the 25th of February, 1549. cauſed the following 33 Articles, to be exhibited againſt his younger Brother, the Lord Seymour, then Lord High Admiral of England, before the Privy Council.

The Charge exhibited againſt him, before the the Privy Council.

1. The firſt Article recited, That, whereas the Duke of Somerſet had been made Governor of the King's Perſon, and Protector of the Realm, to which the ſaid Lord Seymour had conſented in Writing, he had, notwithſtanding, attempted to undo this Order, and endeavoured to obtain the Government of the King's Perſon, to the great Danger of his Majeſty, and the Subverſion of the State.

2. That he corrupted divers of the Privy Chamber, to perſuade the King to agree to his perilous Purpoſes.

3. That he indicted a Letter, for the King, to copy, to the Parliament, which he determined to have carried to the Houſe of Commons himſelf; and, with the Aſſiſtance of his Party there, which he had already prepared, to have cauſed a Diſturbance.

4. That he had laboured to bring over ſeveral of the Council, and the Nobility, to his Party, in order to procure an Alteration in the Adminiſtration.

5. That he had ſaid, he would make the blackeſt Parliament that ever was in England.

6. That being ſent for, to anſwer ſuch Things as were laid to his Charge (by the Council, I preſume) he refuſed to come.

7. That, notwithſtanding the Clemency that had been ſhewn him, he ſtill continued his miſchievous Purpoſes, and continually laboured to make the King diſlike the Lord Protector's Adminiſtration.

8. That the King not being of Age to direct his Affairs, he had endeavoured to perſuade his Highneſs to take the Government upon himſelf.

9. That he intended, and attempted, to get the King's Perſon into his Cuſtody.

10. That he had corrupted with Money certain of the Privy Chamber, to perſuade the King to have recourſe to him, and no Body elſe, for what he wanted, that he might have the Management of his Highneſs.

11. That

1549. 2 & 3 Edw. 6.

11. That he had promiſed the Marriage of the King at his Will and Pleaſure.

12. That he laboured to confederate himſelf with ſome of the diſaffected Nobility, and others among them, to depart to their ſeveral Counties, and ſtrengthen themſelves, that he might have always a Faction in Readineſs for his Purpoſes.

13. That he had endeavoured to ſtrengthen himſelf, by creating Factions among the Nobility.

14. That he had employed Perſons to ingratiate themſelves with the Yeomen, and leading Commoners of certain Counties, that he might have the Multitude at his Devotion.

15. That he had alſo acquired the Stewardſhips of Noblemen's Manors, and Lands, to make his Party the ſtronger.

16. That he hired, and retained, abundance of young Gentlemen, and Yeomen, to his Service, more than the Law allowed, to ſtrengthen himſelf in his evil Deſigns.

17. That he had uſed ſuch Application, and Diligence, in this Matter, that he could raiſe ten thouſand Men of his own Adherents, beſides his Friends.

18. That he had coined Money enough to maintain the ſaid ten thouſand Men for a Month, and given Orders to have the ſaid Money in Readineſs.

19. That he had attempted to marry the Princeſs Elizabeth, the King's Siſter, before his Marriage with the Queen: That during his Marriage, he continued to make Court to the Princeſs; and after the Queen, his Wife, was dead, attempted to marry the Princeſs Elizabeth again.

20. That he married the late Queen Dowager ſo ſoon after the late King's Death, that if ſhe had been with Child, it would have been doubtful, whether the Iſſue had been the King's, or his own.

21. That he firſt married the late Queen privately, and concealed it; and then obtained a Letter from the young King, requiring the Queen to marry him; and likewiſe, he prevailed with the Protector to ſpeak to the Queen in his Behalf; and, it was to be feared, he intended to uſe the like Practice in marrying the Princeſs Elizabeth.

22. That he interrupted the King's Affairs in Parliament, and elſewhere, and withdrew himſelf from his Service; and that all the Practices, and Preparations, abovementioned, were intended to make his way to the Throne by ſome heinous Enterprize againſt his Majeſty's Perſon.

23. That he had gotten Poſſeſſion of the ſtrong Iſles of Scilly, and laboured to obtain Londay; and, confederating with Sir William Sharington, had gotten the Mint of Briſtol into his Hands; and with the Aid of that Money, and the Strength of thoſe Places, and the Shipping he was Maſter of, he propoſed to defend himſelf, if his traiterous Purpoſes did not ſucceed, and he ſhould be called to account for them.

24. That, knowing Sir William Sharington had committed Treaſon, and defrauded the King, he did aid and aſſiſt him, and bear him out in it.

1549. 2 & 3 Edw. 6.

25. That, whereas he owed Sir William Sharrington Money, that he might have a Colour to protect the ſaid Sharington, and defraud the King, he pretended Sharington was indebted 2800 l. to him.

26. That he extorted Money from Ships bound to foreign Countries, to the Diſcouragement of Traffick, &c.

27. That he enriched himſelf by Goods that had been piratically taken, and diſtributed them among his Servants and Friends, refuſing to reſtore them to the Owners; whereby foreign Powers had been diſguſted.

28. That he had taken away the Prizes from thoſe who had taken Pirate Ships, and impriſoned the Captors.

29. That he had not only ſet Pirates at Liberty, but ſhared the Goods they had taken from honeſt Merchants with them, and was himſelf the chief Pirate.

30. That, when the Protector and Council (of which he was one) had given publick Orders for the Reſtoration of Goods piratically taken, he (the Admiral) hath ſent private Letters that ſuch Orders ſhould not be obeyed.

31. That, when foreign Merchants have had their Ships damaged upon the Coaſt (but not wrecked) and the Protector and Council have ordered their Ships and Goods to be preſerved, and reſtored to the Owners, he (the Admiral) hath given contrary Orders, and defrauded the Owners of them.

32. That he had not only revealed the King's Councils, but had prevented the Execution of Orders of Council that he himſelf had conſented to.

33. That in the County of Denbigh, his Stewards and Officers had amaſſed great Quantities of Proviſion, and vaſt Sums of Money; and given out that the King was dead, to the Amazement of the People, who expected ſome Diſturbance, if it had not been prevented by apprehending him.

Lord Seymour examined by the Council on theſe Articles.

The Lords of the Privy Council went to the Tower, to examine the Admiral upon theſe Articles; but he told them, he expected an open Trial, and that his Accuſers ſhould be brought Face to Face; and, being ſtill preſſed to anſwer them, he ſaid, If they would leave the Articles with him, he would conſider them, otherwiſe he would not anſwer them. This being refuſed, it was reſolved in Council to acquaint the King with the State of the Caſe, and know if he would have the Admiral proſecuted. To which the King, as he had been directed, anſwered, He perceived that treaſonable Matters were laid to the Charge of his Uncle the Admiral, and he thought it reaſonable they ſhould proceed againſt him as they deſired.

Examined by a Committee of both Houſes.

It being afterwards moved in Parliament, to bring in a Bill of Attainder againſt the Admiral, it was reſolved, That a Committee of both Houſes ſhould firſt attend the Admiral in the Tower, and require his Anſwer to the ſaid Articles.

Accordingly the Lord Chancellor, the Earls of Shrewsbury, Warwick, and Southampton; Sir John Baker, Speaker of the Commons; Sir Thomas Cheney, and Sir Anthony Denny, were ſent ſent to examine him; and, after a great deal of Perſuaſion, the Admiral anſwered to this Effect: That he had ſaid, he would be glad to have the Cuſtody, or Government, of the King's Perſon; but it was only in Mirth. He owned further, that he had ſearched for Precedents, and found, in the Minority of Hen. VI. one of his Uncles was Protector of England, and another had the Government of his Perſon; and, as his Brother was Protector, he had Thoughts of moving it to the Parliament, to be his Majeſty's Governor; but, it having been obſerved to him, that he had conſented his Brother ſhould be both Protector and Governor, he ſaid, he deſiſted from that Purſuit.

He acknowledged alſo, that he had ſent Money to the King ſeveral Times, at his Majeſty's Requeſt, and diſtributed ſeveral Sums to thoſe about him; particularly to Mr. Cheek and Mr. Fowler; but would give no further Anſwer, or ſubſcribe what he had ſaid; whereupon a Bill of Attainder was brought in againſt him, the 25th of February, read three Times in three Days, and paſſed the Houſe of Peers, who on the 27th ſent it down to the Commons, acquainting that Houſe, that if they thought fit, the Noblemen who had given Evidence againſt the Admiral, in the Houſe of Peers, ſhould give the ſame Evidence before the Commons.

A Bill of Attainder brought in againſt him.

But the Lower Houſe, it ſeems, were not in ſuch Haſte to paſs the Bill as the Lords had been. They thought it highly reaſonable the Admiral ſhould be heard in his Defence; with which they acquainted the Lords: Whereupon a Meſſage was procured from the King, to inform the Commons, that the Admiral's Preſence was not neceſſary; and they were prevailed on by the Court, to paſs the Bill, without hearing of him, on the 5th of March; and it afterwards received the Royal Aſſent.

It paſſes, without hearing the Lord Seymour.

In the Preamble of the ſaid Act, was recited the Subſtance of the thirty three Articles abovementioned; and it was enacted, That the ſaid Sir Thomas Seymour, Kt. Lord Seymour of Sudley, High Admiral of England, for the ſaid traiterous Offences and Deeds, ſhould, by the Authority of that Parliament, be adjudged and attainted of Treaſon, and ſuffer and forfeit as a Traitor.

The Tenour of the Act.

The Protector and Council preſs his Majeſty for his Execution.

The Council, on the 10th of March, with the Protector at their Head, preſſed his Majeſty that Juſtice might be done upon the Admiral. The young King, as he had been taught, thanked them for their great Care of his Safety, and directed them to proceed to Execution; whereupon a Warrant was ſigned by the Council, on the 17th of March, for the Execution of the Admiral, the Wedneſday following; the Protector's Hand being firſt ſet to the Warrant.

The Warrant ſigned.

Latimer's Invectives againſt Lord Seymour.

The Editor of this Proceeding concludes it with ſome Paſſages out of Hugh Latimer's Sermons, containing moſt vile Invectives againſt the Admiral, with abundance of ill-natured Suggeſtions, to induce the People to believe, he was damned.

His Behaviour at his Execution.

The Admiral being brought to the Scaffold, erected on Tower-Hill, on the 20th of March, appeared not at all terrified at the near Approach of Death; but making a ſhort Speech to the People, who were charmed with his graceful Preſence, and intrepid Behaviour, he took that Opportunity to aſſure them, That he had neither committed, or intended, any Treaſon againſt the King or Nation; and then ſubmitting to the Block, his Head was ſevered from his Body.

1549. 2 & 3 Edw. 6.

Remarks on the Attainder of Thomas Lord Seymour.

To underſtand the Reaſon of this Proſecution of the Lord Seymour, it is neceſſary to look back to the Beginning of this Reign. It is ſaid, he firſt diſcovered himſelf diſcontented on the opening of the late King's Will, (Hen. VIII.) who had appointed his Brother and ſeveral others Regents of the Kingdom, during the Minority of his Son; while he, (the Lord Seymour) who was alſo Uncle to the Infant King, was left out of the Number, and had only a Place aſſigned him in the Privy-Council.

However, being a fine Gentleman, of excellent natural Parts, and remarkable for the Beauty of his Perſon, he hoped to make himſelf ſome Satisfaction for this Slight, by matching with the Princeſs Elizabeth, Daughter to the laſt, and Siſter to the preſent King; but, not ſucceeding in his Addreſſes here, he made Court to Queen Katherine, Dowager of the late King, and carried her very ſecretly, and ſo ſuddainly, that it was made a doubt, whether ſhe was not then with Child by the King, her late Huſband. She was ſo much in haſte to poſſeſs this fine Gentleman, it ſeems, that ſhe did not obſerve the Rules of Decency: However, he managed Matters ſo as to get both the King's, and his Brother the Protector's Conſent to the Marriage, after it was done, and then he declared it publickly; and now, looking upon himſelf to be upon an equal Foot with his Brother, he murmured at the Duke's ingroſſing the Adminiſtration of the Government, and the Care of the King's Perſon to himſelf; ſuggeſting, that the Protector ought to be content with the Adminiſtration of the Government, and leave the Care of the King's Perſon to him, his other Uncle, as was practiſed during the Minority of Henry VI. However, his Brother having diſcovered his Views, and checked him for them, he ſeemed to wave the Purſuit for ſome Time; but the Protector marching with the Army into Scotland, the Admiral took that Opportunity to gain over the young King to his Intereſt, and obtained a Patent to enlarge his Authority of Lord High Admiral, with an Addition to his Pay; of which the Protector receiving Intelligence, haſtened back from Scotland; but the Admiral was now ſo much in the King's Favour, that he refuſed to deſiſt from his Pretenſions, and even procured a Meſſage, in writing, from his Majeſty to the Houſe of Commons, expreſſing his Deſire, that he (the Admiral) might be conſtituted Governor of his Perſon; and, the Council ſending to diſſuade him from delivering the Meſſage, he was ſo far from taking their Advice, that he threatened ſeveral of them, for interpoſing in the Matter: Whereupon an Order of Council was iſſued, for apprehending him; and he was given to underſtand, if he did not ſubmit himſelf, he would be proſecuted for High Treaſon; which had ſuch an Effect, that he feigned a Reconciliation with his Brother, the Protector, 1549. 2 & 3 Edw. 6. and was discharged. But having buried the Queen his Wife, and making Court again to the Princess Elizabeth, and at the same Time reviving his Pretensions to the Government of the King's Person; the Protector, who could bear no Rival in Power, determined to cut him off, by an Act of Attainder, without allowing him the Benefit of a Trial; which we see he found Means to accomplish.

It appears, by the Articles preferred against the Admiral, before the Privy Council, that his principal Crime was, his attempting to share the Administration with the Protector. Indeed his great Enemy, his Brother, suggested in some of the Articles, that his attempting to get the Government of the King's Person, was with a View of usurping his Throne, and that he had made a Provision of Forces and Money for that End; but from other Articles it appears, that he proposed no more than to gain the Government of the King's Person by the Consent and Concurrence of his Majesty, and the Parliament; which had been a more legal Way of arriving at that Honour, than his Brother, the Protector, had taken, to acquire the sole Administration of Affairs of State. The Protector had no more than a Grant, of his own framing, from an Infant King, to invest him with the executive Power; whereas the Admiral evidently proposed to have had an Act of Parliament to establish him the King's Governor; and it is a little amazing, that the Protector did not procure an Act of Parliament to support his Authority, at the Time he procured himself to be declared Protector: For, as the late King had appointed certain Noblemen to share the Regency with him, nothing less than an Act of Parliament could legally supersede and invalidate that Will, and transfer the Administration to the Protector. And, admitting that the King's Uncles had a Right to govern the State, during the Minority of their Royal Nephew, (from that Precedent in the Reign of Henry VI. and some others) which the late King's Will could not alter; yet those Precedents shew, that the Uncles of the Infant King divided the Executive Power amongst them. One was Regent of England, another of France, and a third Governor of the King's Person. There was no Precedent of one Uncle's engrossing the whole Administration, to the Exclusion of the rest. The Admiral therefore (supposing the late King's Will did not stand in his Way) had great Reason to demand the Government of the King, while his Brother held the Regency; and, as he attempted to invest himself in this Dignity with his Majesty's Consent, and in a Parliamentary Way, surely there could be no Treason in it: And it is evident, the true Reason, the Protector would not suffer the Admiral to be brought to an open Trial, or heard in Parliament, was, least his Claim should appear too specious, or his own Usurpation of the Royal Power too notorious.

He could suggest what Crimes he pleased against the Admiral, in either House; while that unfortunate Nobleman was not allowed to examine the Proofs he brought: He could make use of the Royal Name to support the defective Evidence, and in a Manner force the Odious Bill through both Houses, which he had Reason to apprehend could not have been carried, if he had suffered Matters to be fully discussed. There were many, probably, that would have been ashamed of giving their Voices for a Bill of Attainder, if it had appeared upon what trifling Suggestions, and slight Evidence, it was founded, who were willing to run blindfold into it; with a View, perhaps, of ruining the Protector, as well as his Brother. Most of the Regents, appointed by the late King's Will, were incensed to the last Degree, to see the Protector usurp the sole Government of the State; and they might look upon it as the readiest Way to destroy him, and recover their former Authority, to assist him first, in ruining his Brother. It is highly probable, that if the two Brothers had united their Interests, they would have been able to have borne down all Opposition. But when the Protector had so far contributed to the weakening the Interest of his Family, by cutting off his Brother, no Wonder his Enemies were inspired with Thoughts of depriving him of that Authority he had usurped. How suddenly they effected it, after the Death of the Admiral, will be shewn in the following Proceedings.

But, before I dismiss this unrighteous and arbitrary Attainder, I cannot but observe, with what indecent Zeal the Protector hastened the passing, as well as the Execution, of it. We find him, first, making use of the Name and Authority of his Royal Nephew, the Infant King, to prevent the Admiral's being heard in his Defence. We see him, afterwards, at the Head of the Council, petitioning his Majesty that Justice (as he called the most arbitrary and unjust Proceeding that ever was) might be done upon his Brother; and lastly, we see his Hand first set to the Warrant, for his Execution, which, one would have thought, he should have avoided, how much soever he had forwarded the barbarous Sentence behind the Curtain. There is no doubt to be made, as has been observed already, that this unnatural Prosecution contributed more Ways than one to that Destruction which so suddenly overtook him.

It has been suggested, by some Historians, that this Misunderstanding, between the two Brothers, arose from a Dispute of their Wives, about Place: But, as one very well observes, there could be no Colour for such a Dispute. The Admiral's Wife was Queen; and the Wife of no other Subject, how great soever, could have any Pretence to dispute the Precedence with her. Though there is no doubt, but the Admiral's marrying the Dowager Queen, and making Court to the Princess Elizabeth, created in the Protector a Jealousy of his ambitious Views; and induced him to apprehend, that he might one Day be eclipsed by the Figure his Brother would make. I am satisfied, the Protector's Concern, lest his own Power should suffer some Diminution, was the grand Spring that gave Motion to this Prosecution, and not his Care for the King's Safety; though he made that the chiefest Pretence. And thus, we see, whenever the exorbitant Power of a great great Minister is attacked, he constantly flies for Refuge to his abused Master, and endeavours to persuade, both him and the World, that those who censure his Conduct, are, indeed, Enemies to the Prince he serves; and that he suffers only for his Fidelity to his Sovereign.

The Privy Council confederate against him.

PART of the Privy Council, on the 6th of October, 1550. sent to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London, requiring them not to obey any Letters, or Orders, of the Protector: And receiving Advice, that he had removed the King from Hampton Court to the Castle of Windsor, and assembled Forces there, they published a Proclamation, declaring, that the Protector, by his Administration, had been the Occasion of the Insurrections, and Disturbances, that had lately happened in the Kingdom, and the loss of several Places on the Frontiers of France: That his Ambition appeared, by the building such magnificent Palaces in the Time of War, and his having no regard to the Advice of Council: That he encouraged the Faction, and Division, amongst the Nobility, Gentry, and Commonalty: That he was unnatural, and ungrateful, and had traiterously slandered the Council to the King, and did what in him lay, to cause Variance between the King and his Nobility; and, lastly, That he was a Traitor; and therefore they required the Aid of the Nobility, the City, and Commons, to take the King out of his Hands.

Signed by the Lord Chancellor Rich; the Lord St. John President of Council; the Earl of Warwick Great Chamberlain; the Marquis of Northampton; and a Majority of the Council.

He and his Adherents taken into Custody.

The Duke afterwards dismissing his Forces, the whole Council assembled at Windsor; and, having taken the Duke, and his principal Adherents, into Custody, they caused twenty-nine Articles to be drawn up against him: Wherein they charge, That he, having taken upon him the Office of Lord Protector, on Condition he should transact nothing without the Assent of the late King's Executors, assumed the Administration of the Government solely to himself, perverted Justice, subverted the Laws, released Persons imprisoned for Felony and Treason, appointed Generals, and other Officers, treated with Ambassadors, reprehended, and brow-beat the Privy Councillors, for giving the King their Advice, held a Court of Request in his House, and determined Suits relating to Freeholds there: That he disposed of Offices, Bishopricks, and Ecclesiastical Preferments, for Money; made Grants of Leases and Wardships, and alienated the Crown Lands, by his sole Authority: That he encouraged Alchymy, and Multiplication of Metals, and debased the Coin: That he gave out, the Nobility, and Gentry, were the only Cause of Dearth, and issued a Proclamation against the Advice of the Council concerning Enclosures, which occasioned divers Insurrections: That he gave out a Commission to determine Differences concerning Enclosures, Commons, Cottages, &c. whereby the Laws were subverted, and a Rebellion ensued: That he suffered Rebels to arm themselves against the Nobility, and Gentry, and did not suppress, but encouraged them; giving out, that the Avarice of the Gentry occasioned the Peoples Rising; and that it was better for them to die, than perish for Want; and as the Lords were loth to reform Enclosures, the People had good cause to reform them themselves: That he would not suffer the Places belonging to the Crown, in France, to be put into a Condition of Defence: That he published seditious Libels, at Hampton Court, in order to incite an Insurrection in his Favour: That he declared the Privy-Council to be Traitors; and, that the Lords at London intended to destroy the King, inciting the King to revenge it: That he had said, divers Times, the Lords of the Council, at London, intend to kill me; but, if I die, the King shall die; and, if they famish me, they shall famish him: That he moved the King to go to Windsor, whereby his Majesty was not only greatly terrified, but fell dangerously ill: That he armed his Servants, and Dependants, at Windsor, and disarmed the King's Servants, and Guards, leaving his Majesty's Person exposed in the Night-Time, while he was strongly guarded himself; and, lastly, that he intended to fly to Jersey, or Wales, and laid Horses, Men, and a Boat, for that Purpose.

He confesses the Charge, and makes his Submission to the Council.

The Duke, having read, and considered, these Articles, thought fit to confess his Guilt, and and make his Submission, in Writing, to the Lords of the Council; but intimated, that he hoped he should have the Benefit of his Majesty's Pardon (then lately passed); and that they would represent to his Majesty, that his Offences proceeded more from Ignorance, Negligence, or Folly, than from any malicious, or evil, Intention, tending to Treason against his Majesty, or the Realm: Begged his Majesty would take Pity upon him, his Wife, and Children; and not deal with him according to the Rigour of the Laws, but after his great Goodness and Clemency.

His second Submission.

Before the Council proceeded further, they deputed four Spiritual, and four Temporal, Lords, to examine the Duke in the Tower, whether he subscribed that Confession freely: To which the Protector answered, that he voluntarily made that that Confeſſion, on his Knees, before the King and Council, and ſigned it; proteſting, that his Offences flowed from Raſhneſs, and Indiſcretion, rather than Malice; and that he had no treaſonable Deſign againſt the King, or his Realms. So (ſays the Editor of this Volume of Trials) both Houſes ſoon paſſed the Bill againſt him, and he was fined by Act of Parliament, entitled, An Act touching the Fine and Ranſom of the Duke of Somerſet; that is, for the Puniſhment of his late Miſdemeanors: Whereby he was fined 2000 l. a Year of Land, and loſt all his Goods and Offices.

He is fined, and impriſoned.

This Matter was never brought before the Parliament, as the Editor of this Volume ſuppoſes.

But, I muſt confeſs, I never could meet with this Act, or the Title of it, in any of our Statute Books, which inclines me to believe this Matter was never brought before the Parliament: Beſides, this ſecond Submiſſion, which the Editor has given us, though it be directed to no Body, ſeems, from the Tenor of it, to be deſigned, either for the Lords of the Council, or the Star-Chamber. Had it been intended for the Parliament, it would, ſurely, have been addreſſed to one, or both, of the Houſes: But here the Priſoner is made to ſay, I am full of Heavineſs, my very good Lords, to underſtand my laſt Letter (of Submiſſion) was no better accepted at your Lordſhips Hands, to whom I am bound, during my Life, for your moſt gentle and merciful Dealing with me, that it pleaſed your Goodneſs to bring my Caſe to a Fine. And having repreſented, that the Fine was greater than his Circumſtances would bear, he deſires a Mitigation of it: But, had the Fine been laid by Act of Parliament, what Lords could have mitigated it? He adds, I ſubmit myſelf to the King's Majeſty, and to your good Lordſhips, appealing from the Rigour and Extremity of his Majeſty's Laws, to his Majeſty's great Mercy and Clemency. Surely he would have ſaid, the Rigour of the Act, rather than the Rigour of his Majeſty's Laws; if this Fine had been juſt then inflicted by Act of Parliament. He concludes, moſt humbly praying his Majeſty's and their Lordſhips Pardon, on his Knees; and that they would impute his Offences to the want of Diſcretion, truſting they would find him ſo ſubmiſſive to their Honours, and conformable to their Lordſhips Orders, that he ſhould make amends, and obtain Pardon for his former Folly: And this is dated from the Tower the 2d of February, which is the Day after the Parliament roſe; and conſequently, neither this, nor the former Submiſſion, mentioned in it, were addreſſed to the Parliament; but the whole Proceeding was certainly before the Council, or Star-Chamber.

He is ſet at Liberty.

He was releaſed out of the Tower on the 6th of February, firſt giving 10000 l. Security, for his good Behaviour, and that he would reſide, either at the King's Palace of Sheen, or his own Houſe at Sion; and not depart from either of them, unleſs he knew that the King was within four Miles of theſe Places, and then he was to withdraw from thence: Nor was he to come to Council, unleſs called. However, he had the King's Pardon the 16th inſtant, and on the 8th of April following, was ſworn, again, of his Majeſty's Privy-Council; and in June the beſt Part of his Eſtate was reſtored him by Patent, ſays the Compiler.

He is pardoned, and ſworn of the Privy Council again.

I proceed now to give an account of the ſecond Proſecution of the Duke, in the Year 1551.

1551. 5 Ed. 6.

Trial of the Duke of Somerſet.

The Trial of Edward Duke of Somerſet, for High-Treaſon and Felony, before the Lord Treaſurer, High Steward, and twenty-ſeven of his Peers, in Weſtminſter-Hall, Decemb. 1. 1551. 5 Edw. VI.

1551. 5 Edw. 6.

The Charge againſt him.

THE Indictment was found by a London Grand-Jury, on the firſt of November, in the Mayoralty of Richard Dobbes: And ſet forth, that Edward Duke of Somerſet, late of Sion, in the County of Middleſex, at the Pariſh of St. Andrew's Holbourn, within the ſaid City of London, on the 20th of April, then laſt paſt, and divers other Days before and after, did malicioufly, and traiterouſly, with divers other Perſons, conſpire, compaſs, and imagine to depoſe, and deprive, his Sovereign Lord, King Edward VI. of his Royal State, and Dignity; and, without any Authority, to aſſume the ſole Government of his Perſon, and the Adminiſtration of all Affairs of State: And that, to accompliſh his ſaid Treaſons, the ſaid Duke, together with Sir Michael Stanhope, Sir Miles Partridge, Sir Thomas Holcroft, and Francis Newdigate, Gent. with divers other Perſons, to the Number of an hundred, aſſembled themſelves, in order to take and impriſon the Duke of Northumberland, then Earl of Warwick, and one of his Majeſty's Privy-Council, againſt the King's Peace, his Crown, and Dignity, and contrary to the Form of the Statutes in that Caſe made and provided: And, further, that the ſaid Duke of Somerſet, on the 20th of May then laſt paſt, in the Pariſh aforeſaid, and at divers other Times, and Places, did feloniouſly move, and incite, ſeveral of his Majeſty's Subjects, to make an Inſurrection, and Rebellion, and to take, and impriſon, the aforeſaid Duke of Northumberland, againſt the King's Peace, &c. and contrary to the Form of the ſaid Statute.

Lords commiſſioned to try him.

His Majeſty having commiſſioned the Marquis of Wincheſter Lord Treaſurer, to be Lord High Steward, pro hac vice, and twenty-ſeven other Peers, for the Trial of the ſaid Duke, his Uncle, viz. The Dukes of Suffolk and Northumberland; the Marquis of Northampton; the Earls of Derby, Bedford, Huntington, Rutland, Bath, Suſſex, Worceſter, and Pembroke; the Lord Viſcount Hereford; the Barons Abergavenny, venny, Audley, Wharton, Evers, Latimer, Borough, Zouch, Stafford, Wentworth, Darcy, Sturton, Windsor, Cromwell, Cobham, and Bray.

1551. 5 Edw. 6.

The Duke was brought before them in Westminster-Hall, to take his Trial on the first of December; and the King's Counsel having opened the Evidence against him, which consisted of several written Depositions, these were read in Court.

Written Depositions read in Evidence.

And first, the Deposition of Sir Thomas Palmer was read, importing, that the Duke, being about to take a Journey into the North, proposed to have raised the People, if Sir William Herbert had not assured him, he should receive no harm; and, that he had contrived, to invite the Duke of Northumberland, the Marquis of Northampton, the Earl of Pembroke, and other Lords, to a Supper; and either to have murdered them in the Way, or at the Entertainment. He deposed also, that Sir Ralph Vane had 2000 Men in Readiness; that Sir Thomas Arundel was to secure the Tower; Partridge to raise London, and take the Great Seal; Seymour and Hamond were to attend him, and all the Gendarmerie, or Men at Arms, were to be killed. They were to be attacked by 2000 Men under Sir Ralph Vane; by an hundred Horse of the Duke of Somerset's, besides his Friends: After which, the Duke was to proclaim Liberty in the City, in order to raise the Apprentices; and if he did not succeed, he was to retire to the Isle of Wight, or to Poole.

The Earl of Rutland deposed, that the Duke had made a Party, to get himself declared Protector in the next Parliament.

Crane confirmed the Deposition of Sir Thomas Palmer; adding, that the Lord Paget's House was the Place, where the said Noblemen were to have been invited to an Entertainment, and murdered: And that the Thing had been done; but the Greatness of the Enterprize caused Delays, as well as some Diversity of Advice.

Hamond deposed, That the Duke of Somerset's Chamber at Greenwich had been strongly guarded, in the Night, by armed Men.

The Lord Strange deposed, that the Duke desired him to move the King, to marry his third Daughter, the Lady Jane; and to be his Spy about the King, to inform him, when any of the Council spoke privately with him, and what they said.

The Duke's Defence.

The Duke said, in his Defence, That he never intended to have raised the Northern Parts; or to have killed the Duke of Northumberland, or any other Person; but only talked of it, without any Intention of doing it: That it was impossible, he, with a small Troop, should destroy the Gendarmerie, who consisted of nine hundred Men: That he never designed to raise any Stirs in London, but looked upon it as a Place where he was most safe: That his having Men about him at Greenwich, was with no ill Design; nor did he ever make any use of them, but surrendered himself a Prisoner without Resistance: He objected also, that the Witnesses were not brought into Court, Face to Face.

The King's Counsel Reply.

The King's Counsel replied, That his assembling Men with an Intent to kill the Duke of Northumberland, was Treason by the 3d & 4th of Edw VI. Against unlawful Assemblies, which enacts, That if twelve Persons should assemble to kill a Privy Councillor, and did not disperse themselves upon Proclamation, it should be adjudged High-Treason: Or, if twelve such Persons assembled, to commit a Riot, and being warned, did not disperse themselves, it was Felony, without Benefit of Clergy, or Sanctuary: That to raise London, or the Northern Parts, was Treason; and to have Men about him, to resist those that came to apprehend him, was Felony: That to assault the Lords, and to devise their Deaths, was Felony.

1551. 5 Edw. 6.

The Lords consider the Evidence.

The Lords being withdrawn, were not satisfied with the Evidence of the Duke's Design, of raising the North, or the City, or of killing the Gendarmes: Some of the Lords also objected, that the Duke of Northumberland, the Marquis of Northampton, and the Earl of Pembroke, who were Parties in the Cause, ought not to be of the Number of the Lords Triers; because the Prisoner was principally charged with a Conspiracy against them. To which it was answered, that a Peer could not be challenged: On which Point, it seems, the Lords were pretty much divided in their Opinions; but in the End, it was agreed, they might sit in Judgment on him; and, by the Influence of the Duke of Northumberland, and the other two, a Majority found the Prisoner guilty of Felony, though they acquitted him of the Treason; and hereupon Judgment was given against him, that he should be hanged.

He is acquitted of Treason, and convicted of Felony.

He confesses a Design against the Duke of Northumberland, &c.

After the Trial, it is said, the Duke of Somerset acknowledged he had a Design against the Persons of the Duke of Northumberland, the Marquis of Northampton, and the Earl of Pembroke, and asked their Pardon; and desired the Lords would become Mediators, for him, to his Majesty; and that, if the King did not think fit to grant him his Life, he hoped he would have Compassion on his Wife and Children. But the Duke could expect to meet with but little Favour from the Court, now the King was surrounded by his mortal Enemies. Their feigned Intercessions were sure to be rejected, as they intended they should; and a Warrant was signed for the Duke's Execution on the twenty second of January.

A Warrant signed for his Execution.

His Speech, and Behaviour on the Scaffold.

The Duke being brought to the Scaffold on Tower-Hill, on the Day appointed, appeared with a composed Countenance; and having first kneeled down, and recommended himself to God, he made a Speech to the People, telling them, he was brought thither to suffer Death, though he never had offended the King, either in Word, or Deed, and had been always faithful and true to the Realm; but, as he was condemned by Law, he acquiesced in it, and thanked God, who had given him that Time of Repentance, when he might have taken him away by a sudden Death. He rejoiced that he had been instrumental in the Reformation of the Church, exhorting the People to embrace the pure Doctrines taught in it, and live accordingly; Otherwise, great Calamities would befal them. At the speaking which Words an Ear-Witness relates (says the Editor of this Trial) there was heard a terrible Noise, like that of a Storm, or Tempest; or rather 1551. 5 Edw. 6. the blowing up of a Magazine of Gun-Powder: At which the People were ſo terrified, that ſome ran away, tumbling over one another in Heaps; others fainted, and all were amazed; and before they were well recovered from their Conſternation, Sir Anthony Brown came riding haſtily towards the Scaffold: Whereupon the People, imagining he had brought a Pardon, ſhouted for Joy, ſo that the Air rung again; But this appearing to be a Miſtake, the Duke went on with his Speech, and ſaid, There is no ſuch Matter, dearly beloved Friends, as you vainly hope: It ſeems good to Almighty God, that I ſhould ſuffer Death; I deſire, therefore, you will all be quiet, and contented with it, and join your Prayers with mine, for the King's Majeſty, unto whom I have always ſhewn myſelf a moſt faithful and true Subject, and have always ſought the Welfare of the Kingdom. All the People anſwered, It was moſt true.

Then he went on, and ſaid, he wiſhed his Majeſty perpetual Health, and Felicity, and that his Counſellors might have Grace to rule the State uprightly, exhorting the People to be obedient to them; and begged Pardon of God, and of all Men, whom he might have offended. After which, he ſubmitted to the Block: But the Executioner, obſerving the Collar of his Waſtcoat to be in his Way, perſuaded him to get up again, and pull his Waſtcoat off; after which he lay down again, and his Head was ſevered from his Body at one Blow.

His Head ſevered from his Body.

His Son remained deprived of all his Titles, and Eſtate, till the firſt Year of Queen Elizabeth, when her Majeſty created him Earl of Hertford, and Baron Seymour: His Grandſon, William, was created Marquis of Hertford, in the Year 1640. and in the Year 1660. the Marquis made the following Repreſentation of his Caſe to the Houſe of Lords (viz.)

His Poſterity reſtor'd to their Honour in Part.

The Caſe of the Marquis of Hertford, preſented to the Lords, An. Dom. 1660.

Edward Earl of Hertford, (Great Grandfather of the ſaid Marquis) was by Letters Patents, bearing Date the 6th of April, 1 Ed. VI. created Duke of Somerſet; to hold to him and the Heirs Male of his Body, upon the Body of the Lady Anne, his then Wife, with Remainders over. The ſaid Duke, afterwards, in Michaelmas Term, 5 Edw. VI. was indicted of Felony, for procuring and ſtirring up others to take and impriſon John Earl of Warwick, (one of the King's Privy-Council). Which Indictment, though void in Matter and Form, was pretended to be grounded on the Statute of 3 & 4 Edw. VI. which makes it Felony to ſtir up, and procure others, to take away the Life of any of the King's Council. But this Indictment was only for ſtirring up others, to impriſon a Privy Councillor which was never reduced into Act) and the ſame, therefore, declared void by learned Judges. Yet the ſaid Duke was found guilty of Felony, and put to Death for this Fact, which was but a pretended Felony; and, if true, yet no entailed Eſtate was forfeitable thereby.

However, ſuch was the Malice of the Duke's Enemies, that in the Infancy of his Heir, who was acknowledged for Duke of Somerſet ſeveral Months after his Father's Deceaſe, they procured an Act of Parliament, in the ſaid Year (5 Edw. VI.) entitled, An Act touching the Limitation of the late Duke of Somerſet's Lands; wherein there is a Clauſe obliquely inſerted, to take away the ſaid Honours, ſo entailed as aforeſaid; which, by no Felony, how notorious ſoever, could by Law have been forfeited: It was humbly conceived, therefore, to be moſt agreeable to Juſtice, to reſtore the ſaid Marquis, who was Heir Male of the Body of the ſaid Duke, and the Lady Anne his Wife: And thereupon the ſaid Marquis of Hertford was in the Month of September, 1660. reſtored to the Dukedom of Somerſet, by a Repeal of the ſaid Act of the 5th of Edw. VI. 1551. 5 Edw. 6.

He is reſtored to the Honour of Duke, by Act of Parliament.

Remarks on the Duke of Somerſet's Trial.

Moſt of our Hiſtorians relate, (and I find the Editor of this ſecond Collection of State Trials of the ſame Opinion) that the firſt Proſecution of this Duke was before the Parliament; and I muſt confeſs, I was, for ſome Time, in the ſame Error, till I examined the Matter more cloſely; but I believe it is now very evident, from the Account I have already given of that Proceeding, that this Proſecution was either before the Council, or the Star-Chamber; and that the Duke was fined and impriſoned, by the Authority of one of thoſe Courts: To which I am aware it will be objected, that the Privy-Council have no ſuch Authority; and I will agree they have not now: But in thoſe Times they frequently aſſumed a Power equal to this; of which there are numerous Inſtances in the Council-Books: Particularly, we find, they have ordered Houſes to be pulled down, and have prohibited People building upon their own Lands, in and about the Cities of London and Weſtminſter; and done ſeveral other Things, that can now only be effected by Act of Parliament. But, beſides, had there been any Thing illegal, or irregular, in the Privy Council's taking Cognizance of this Matter, the Members of the Privy-Council were alſo Members of the Court of Star-Chamber, and might have cenſuerd him there, if he had objected to their Juriſdiction, as Privy-Councillors; and, indeed, I am in ſome doubt, whether his Fine was ſet by them, as Members of the Privy-Council, or, as Members of the Star-Chamber; but, whether by the one, or the other, I find no Footſteps, upon Record, of its being done in Parliament. But, to proceed: It is very remarkable, that the principal Article objected againſt the Protector, was, his aſſuming more Power than belonged to him; for the endeavouring of which, he had cauſed his Brother, the Admiral, to be deſtroyed by a Bill of Attainder the Year before: And, though he found the great Men then very ready to concur with him in ruining the Admiral, he found them no leſs ready to pull him down, when he had deprived his Family of that Support: Nor were they only incenſed againſt him, for his aſſuming the Regency, but for putting a Stop to the Encroachments of the Nobility, and Gentry, on the Commons; or, at leaſt, to their encloſing, and laying down their arable Lands, and converting them into Paſture; whereby the Poor were not only deprived of their Commons, but of an Opportunity of getting their Livelihoods by their Work, (Paſture Grounds not employing 1551. 5 Edw. 6. ing a fourth Part of the Hands that the arable do.) But, as this rendered him the Object of the Gentry's Hatred, he became thereby the Darling of the common People; and imagined, poſſibly, by their Aſſiſtance, he ſhould have been able to have ſupported himſelf againſt the Power of his Enemies. But the Gentry had no ſooner wheedled him out of the foreign Troops, he maintained for his Defence, and prevailed on him to diſmiſs them, but he found his Error; and that the common People, without ſtanding Forces, were, by no means, able to protect him againſt the united Influence of the Nobility and Gentry, and the Popiſh Intereſt. Finding therefore, when it was too late, that there was no ſtemming the Torrent, he endeavoured to ſave himſelf, we ſee, by a moſt abject Submiſſion; believing, probably, by yielding to the Times, he ſhould not only preſerve his Life, but one Day find an Opportunity of reſuming his Authority: Beſides, he had ſo lately ſhewn them, how eaſy it was to cut off an Enemy, by a Bill of Attainder, that he could not but expect, they would follow the Precedent he had ſet them, if he did not prevent it by a timely Submiſſion. And by this Conduct, it appears, he obtained his Liberty, had a great Part of his Eſtate reſtored him, and a Share once more allowed him in the Adminiſtration: But the Earl of Warwick (afterwards Duke of Northumberland) who had now formed a Scheme, to ingroſs the Adminiſtration of the Government into his own Hands, either finding the Protector gain ſo faſt upon the young King's Affections, that he was like to reſume his former Authority; or, at leaſt, that he would remain a perpetual Bar to his own ambitious Projects, confederated once more with the Protector's Enemies, againſt him; and never ceaſed perſecuting him, till he brought him to the Scaffold.

The Editor of the ſecond Collection of Trials, has put this Proceeding together very oddly. He firſt gives us the Record of the Conviction and Attainder of the Duke; ſentences him to be hanged, and then produces the Evidence, and his Defence, which the Bookſellers, no doubt, will ſee rectified, if ever they print another Edition.

As to the Indictment, it includes both a Charge of Treaſon and Felony, which is not uſual, if it be legal; however, the Duke, 'tis obſerved, had not Preſence of Mind to demand Counſel upon it. The Act he was indicted upon, was the Statute of the 3 & 4 Edw. VI. Cap. v. the firſt Paragraph whereof enacts, That if any Perſons, to the Number of twelve, or above, being aſſembled together, to kill, take, or impriſon any of the King's Privy-Council; or unlawfully to alter or change any Laws made or eſtabliſhed for Religion, by Authority of Parliament, or any other Laws of this Realm; the ſame Number of twelve, or above, being required by the Sheriff, or any Juſtice of Peace, by Proclamation in the King's Name, to depart to their Dwellings, and they, or any of them, notwithſtanding, ſhall continue together, by the Space of an Hour after ſuch Proclamation; or, after that, ſhall forcibly attempt to do, or put in ure, any of the Things above ſpecified, ſuch Offenders ſhall be adjudged guilty of High Treaſon. 1551. 5 Edw. 6.

And in the ſame Act there is another Clauſe, which ſays, If any Perſon, or Perſons, by open Word, or Deed, ſhall PROCURE, MOVE, OR STIR ANY OTHER Perſon, or Perſons, to ariſe, or make any traiterous or rebellious Aſſembly, to the Intent, to do, exerciſe, or put in ure, any of the Things above-mentioned; then every Perſon, ſo procuring, moving, or ſtirring up any other, ſhall be deemed and adjudged a FELON, and ſhall loſe the Benefit of his Clergy and Sanctuary.

The Indictment hereupon firſt charges the Duke with High Treaſon, in aſſembling, with other Perſons, to the Number of an hundred, to take and impriſon the Duke of Northumberland, then a Privy-Counſellor; which Charge, it ſeems, his Peers acquitted him of.

But the Indictment charging him alſo with Moving and Inciting others to take and impriſon the ſaid Duke, which is made Felony by the ſaid laſt recited Clauſe; this, it ſeems, a Majority of the Lords were of Opinion was well proved, and thereupon he was convicted and condemned.

By the Evidence of Sir Thomas Palmer, it appears, that the Duke of Somerſet had contrived and conſpired to invite the Duke of Somerſet, the Marquis of Northampton, and the Earl of Pembroke, to an Entertainment, and to have killed them there: And this Depoſition was confirmed by Crane.

This was the only Evidence, given at the Trial, the Lords could be governed by, to find the Duke of Somerſet guilty of Felony; and as the Indictment does not charge him with moving or inciting any People to kill the Duke of Northumberland; it was the Opinion of many, that this Evidence could not ſupport that Part of the Indictment, that charged the Priſoner with moving others to take and impriſon the Duke of Northumberland. The Act, indeed, makes it Felony to move others, either to kill or impriſon a Privy Councillor; but, as the Indictment does not charge the Priſoner with moving others to kill him, he could not be found guilty of that; and the Depoſition ſays not one Word of his moving others to impriſon Northumberland. But 'tis probable the Lords might think, that the Intention of killing him, comprehended a Deſign of taking him firſt, and thereupon convicted the Priſoner.

The Marquis of Hertford's Repreſentation of the Duke's Caſe.

William Marquis of Hertford, Great Grandſon to this Duke of Somerſet, in his Petition, to be reſtored to that Title at the Reſtoration, obſerves indeed, That the Statute of the 3 & 4 Edw. VI. makes it Felony to ſtir up and procure others to take away the Life of any of the Privy-Council; but that the Indictment was only for ſtirring up others to impriſon a Privy-Councillor, which being never reduced into Act, was not Felony: And, indeed, the moving and inciting others, either to kill or impriſon a Privy-Councillor, unleſs ſome Act was done, in purſuance of ſuch Motion, by the like Opinion, ought not to have been interpreted Felony; and conſequently the Duke ought to have been acquitted.

There were theſe further Hardſhips alſo in this Trial; that the Duke of Northumberland, the Marquis of Northampton, and the Earl of Pembroke, 1551. 5 Edw. 6. Pembroke, who were Parties in the Cauſe, were allowed to ſit as his Judges; and that the Witneſſes were not examined Viva Voce in Court, which might have given a different Turn to the Evidence: But the Duke could not complain of Hardſhips with a very good Grace, after he had put the greateſt Hardſhips upon his Brother, and cut him off by an Act of Attainder, without ſuffering him to be heard. 1551. 5 Edw. 6.

Give me leave to obſerve farther, that the Parliament were ſo far convinced of the Hardſhips that had been put upon the Admiral, that the Lady Mary Seymour, only Daughter and Heireſs of the Admiral, by Queen Katherine, was by Act of Parliament, in the 3d & 4th of Edw. VI. reſtored to Blood.

The Trial of Sir NICHOLAS THROCKMORTON, Knight, for High-Treaſon, before Commiſſioners of Oyer and Terminer, 17 April, 1554. 1 Mariæ. 1554. 1 Mar.

The Charge.

HE was charged with levying War againſt the Queen; being an Accomplice in Wyat's Rebellion; intending to depoſe and deſtroy her Majeſty; and, in order to it, with conſpiring to ſeize the Tower of London.

The Evidence.

The Evidence to prove theſe Treaſons, was the written Confeſſion of —— Winter, one of the Conſpirators; wherein it is ſaid, that the Priſoner was intimate with Wyat, and had declared himſelf againſt the Spaniſh Match; and that Wyat had communicated his Deſign of ſeizing the Tower to the Priſoner.

The Confeſſion of one Crofts alſo was read againſt him, importing, that the Priſoner was an Accomplice of Wyat's; that they often met, and conſulted concerning an Inſurrection; and that Sir Nicholas promiſed to go into the Weſt, and join the Earl of Devon. Sir Peter Carew, and other Malcontents there.

The Confeſſion of Cuthbert Vaughan, under Sentence of Condemnation for the ſame Treaſon, was likewiſe read, importing, that he had ſeveral Conferences with the Priſoner concerning Wyat's Rebellion, and that Sir Nicholas declared his Intention of joining the Malcontents. This Witneſs was brought into Court, and atteſted the Truth of his Confeſſion upon Oath.

Part of the Priſoner's own Confeſſion alſo was read againſt him, wherein he acknowledged that he had a Conference with Wyat, Carew, Crofts, Rogers, and Warner, concerning the Spaniſh Match, and the Alteration of Religion; and that he (the Priſoner) had ſaid he would hinder the Match with Spain as much as he could by Perſuaſion; that he had alſo ſaid, The Diſcipline of the Clergy might now rather be reſembled to the Turkiſh Tyranny than to the teaching of the Chriſtian Religion; and had diſcourſed of the French King's hindering the Spaniards coming hither.

The Depoſitions of the Duke of Suffolk, who had been executed for the ſame Treaſon, were alſo read againſt the Priſoner, importing, that the Lord Thomas Grey inform'd the Duke that Sir Nicholas Throckmorton was privy to all the Devices againſt the Spaniards, and had agreed to go down with the Earl of Devon. and join the Rebels in the Weſt; and laſtly, it was urged, that Wyat himſelf had charged the Priſoner, as an Accomplice with him in his Treaſons.

His Defence.

The Queen's Counſel having produced all their Evidence, the Priſoner entered upon his Defence; and firſt he deſired, that the Counſel would uſe him like a Fellow-Chriſtian, and not endeavour to miſlead the Jury; for he was ſenſible that by Perſuaſions, Enforcements, Preſumptions, applying, implying, inferring, conjecturing, deducing Arguments, and wreſting of Law, unlearned Men might be induced to think and judge Things that were indifferent, or at worſt but Overſights, to be Treaſons.

He inſiſts there was no Evidence of Treaſon.

That as to Winter's Confeſſion, which had been read as Evidence againſt him; if it were all true, there was no Treaſon in it. He had, indeed, converſed with Wyat, as he might with any other Man; but knew nothing of his Purpoſe. He acknowledged alſo, that he did diſlike the Queen's Match with Spain, and the coming of the Spaniards to England, and ſo did the whole Realm almoſt; but this was never yet conſtrued High-Treaſon. That as to the Confeſſion of Crofts, it ought not to affect him, unleſs he was brought Face to Face, as the Law required; and to Vaughan's Teſtimony he objected, that he was a condemned Man, and became a Witneſs againſt him to ſave his own Life. That by 6 Edw. VI. No Man could be indicted or convicted of Treaſon, but by two lawful Witneſſes, brought Face to Face; that Vaughan was but one Witneſs, and a very exceptionable one, having been reprieved from Time to Time, in order to compel him to accuſe others.

That the Confeſſion of another was no Evidence.

That a condemned Man could not be a Witneſs.

That there ought to be two Witneſſes produced, Face to Face.

He thought it hard that only Part of his own Confeſſion was ſuffer'd to be read, which would have made more for him than againſt him, if it had been read through: That the Duke of Suffolk's Depoſitions contain'd only what the Lord Grey told him concerning the Priſoner, which ought not to affect him, unleſs the Lord Grey were produc'd, and atteſted the ſame in Court: And whatever Wyat had ſaid in hopes of ſaving his Life, he had unſaid again at his Execution, acquitting the Lady Elizabeth, as well as others, with his laſt Breath; notwithſtanding he had accuſed them, in hopes of Favour.

That his whole Confeſſion ought to be read.

That what another had ſaid was no Evidence.

Then, applying himſelf to the Jury, he obſerved, that he could not be convicted of the Treaſons in this Indictment; becauſe all Treaſons were repealed, but thoſe Offences which were declared to be ſuch, by the 25th of Edward III. and deſired that the Statute of the 25th of Edward III. might be read. To which the Court anſwering, That no Books ſhould be brought there, the Priſoner replied, Do you bring me hither to try me by Law, and will you not ſhew me the Law? I have heard that her Majeſty charged you to adminiſter Juſtice indifferently; and, notwithſtanding the old Error amongſt you, which did not admit a Witneſs to ſpeak, or any Thing to be offered in Favour of the Priſoner, her Highneſs's Pleaſure is, that whatever can be brought in Favour of the Subject ſhall be admitted and heard: Therefore you ought of Right to hear the Statute read, and reject nothing that can be ſpoken in my Defence.

The Court ſtill inſiſting he ought to have no Books read there, for that the Bench were Judges of the Law, he obſerved, that they ſeemed to offer him Law, but indeed afforded him only the Form of Law; and ſince he could not have the Statute read, he would endeavour to repeat the Subſtance of it, deſiring the Aſſiſtance of the Court if he ſhould be miſtaken; and, having recited the Words, deſired the Jury to obſerve what were Treaſons at that Time, and how they were to be tried, namely, by open Deed, which the Law termed Overt-Act, and that there were no Overt-Acts that proved his being concerned in any of the Treaſons laid in the Indictment. To this the Queen's Counſel anſwered, There were ſtill divers Treaſons at Common Law, beſides thoſe enumerated in the 25 Edward III. but that there was Matter enough proved againſt him to bring him within the Danger of that Statute: This the Priſoner denied, and inſiſted again, that every Perſon, accuſed of High Treaſon, ought to be proved guilty thereof, by ſome open Deed, before People of their Condition.

The Counſel affirm, that there were ſtill Treaſons at Common Law.

The Court miſinterpret the Act.

The Court anſwered, By People of their Condition, was meant thoſe involved in the ſame Crime, diſcovering the Priſoner's Treaſons; as Wyat, already attainted, had declared him one of his Accomplices.

The Priſoner very juſtly replied, That by People of their Condition, was meant, of the State and Condition of the Inqueſt that were to try him; and that the Evidence of Wyat, or of the Rebellion he had raiſed, in which he (the Priſoner) was not concerned, could not affect him; and beſides, Wyat had acquitted him, and declared, he knew nothing of it, demanding, where was the open Deed that proved the Treaſon wherewith he was charged? He added, that he had heard Stamford and the reſt of the Queen's Counſel, declare, in the Parliament-Houſe, that it was a Maxim in Law, which ought never to be violated, That no Penal Statute ought to be extended, or wreſted, beyond the plain Words and Letter of ſuch Statute; for, conſidering the private Affections, many times, both of Princes and Miniſters, it would be very dangerous to the Subject to refer the Conſtruction of Penal Laws to any Judges Equity, which might either by fear of higher Powers be ſeduced, or through Ignorance or Folly be abuſed.

No penal Statute to be extended beyond the Letter.

The Queen's Counſel urged, that he had entered into a Conſpiracy with Wyat, to prevent the coming of the Spaniards; and promiſed to to his utmoſt againſt them, which encouraged Wyat to levy War againſt the Queen.

1554. 1 Mary.

The Priſoner anſwered, That it was no Treaſon to enter into Converſation how to prevent the coming of the Spaniards, or to declare he would endeavour to hinder it in a legal way; and there was no Evidence of his endeavouring to prevent it by Force, or his procuring any other to attempt it in that Manner.

Then the Court adjourned; and in the Afternoon the Jury brought in their Verdict NOT GUILTY. Whereupon the Attorney-General moved, that they might give 500 l. Security for their good Behaviour: But it does not appear that they were obliged to give ſuch Security; much leſs were they fined for acquitting the Priſoner, as ſome Hiſtorians have related. It is probable, they might be reprimanded and threatened; and this muſt be acknowledged illegal: But the Courts of Juſtice acted very arbitrarily in thoſe Days. They alſo remanded the Priſoner back to the Tower after he was acquitted, under pretence, the Government had other Matters againſt him; but I do not find he was proſecuted for any other Offence. This ſeems to be the ſame Gentleman that was afterwards Queen Elizabeth's Ambaſſador in Scotland.

The Priſoner acquitted.

The Jury threatened.

This is the firſt Proceeding in the State Trials that has the Appearance of a regular Trial; and though the Judges miſinterpreted the Law, and put great Hardſhips on the Priſoner, reading the Confeſſions of condemned Men againſt him, not ſuffering the Act 25 Edward III. to be read, and refuſing to examine the Witneſſes. Yet Matters appear to be much mended ſince the Time of Henry VIII. to which the Statute of the firſt of Queen Mary, which reduced all Treaſons to the Standard of 25 Edw. III. greatly contributed. Before that Statute, every Thing, almoſt, was interpreted to be Treaſon the Government was pleaſed to call ſo; and the higheſt Preſumptions and Circumſtances were made Evidence of it. But this Gentleman, having the Skill and Courage to apprize the Jury, that nothing was then Treaſon but what the 25th of Edward III. made ſo; and that all Treaſons muſt be proved by ſome Overt or Open Acts, atteſted by two Witneſſes; and meeting with a Jury of equal Honeſty and Courage, had the good Fortune to come off; though the Court did all that lay in their Power to brow-beat the Jury, and wreſt the Law to his Deſtruction. A ſcandalous Practice which both Judges and Counſel in every Reign have ſhewed themſelves too much addicted to, hunting down unfortunate Men, and, as my Lord Bacon ſays, playing Prizes for Blood at the Bar of Juſtice.

Remarks on Sir Nicholas Throckmorton's Trial.

The next is a Proceeding called, The Trial of James Earl of Bothwell, for the Murther of Henry Lord Darnley, Husband of Mary Queen of Scots, at Edinburg, April 12. 1597. But, as Bothwell was only ſummoned before the Court, in order to be acquitted, and the Proſecutor, the Earl of Lenox, durſt not appear againſt him, it does not require any further Notice ſhould be taken of it here.

The Charge against him.

THE Indictment charged the Duke with compassing and imagining the Death of the Queen, conspiring to raise a Rebellion to subvert the Government, and endeavouring a Change of the establish'd Religion: And the Overt-Acts, laid as an Evidence of these Designs, were, 1. His endeavouring, without the Consent of his Sovereign Queen Elizabeth, to be joined in Marriage with Mary late Queen of Scots, who laid claim to the present Possession of the Crown of England, and had assumed the Arms of England. 2. His corresponding with, aiding, and assisting, Thomas Earl of Northumberland and Anne his Wife, and Charles Earl of Westmoreland, &c. (in open Rebellion against her Majesty, and outlawed for the same) with divers Sums of Money. 3. His adhering to, aiding, and assisting, James Duke of Castel-le-Roy, the Earl of Huntley, and others, the Queen's Enemies. 4. His holding a traiterous Correspondence with the Pope, and the King of Spain, inviting them to invade this Realm, and promising to raise a Rebellion, and join the Enemy, in order to set the Queen of Scots at Liberty; to depose Queen Elizabeth, and join himself in Marriage with the said Queen of Scots. 5. That he had sent Letters by one Rodolph a Merchant, to the Pope, and King of Spain, desiring their Assistance, in perpetrating his said Treasons; and that he had received a Letter from Pope Pius Quintus, Bishop of Rome, promising him Aid and Assistance.

Overt-Acts.

He is denied Counsel.

The Duke desired he might have Counsel; but was answered, that was never granted in Cases of High-Treason; and having pleaded Not Guilty, the Evidence against him was produced.

The Evidence, written Depositions.

And first, the Examination of the Bishop of Rosse (formerly Ambassador from the Queen of Scots to Queen Elizabeth) taken in the Tower, the 5th of November, 1571. where that Prelate was detained Prisoner for practising against Queen Elizabeth's Government, in Behalf of the Queen of Scots, was read. In this Examination the Bishop deposes, That the Duke of Norfolk had advised the Scots Commissioners at York, to suppress the Evidence against their Queen; and had also proposed to the Deponent, and to Earl Murray, to marry the said Queen.

To prove the Treaty of Marriage.

A Letter of Earl Murray's read as Evidence.

A Letter of Earl Murray's also was read, being an Answer to another Letter, sent him by the English Ministry, to enquire what he knew concerning the Duke of Norfolk's Practises, as to the Commission at York, and the intended Marriage.

In this Letter Earl Murray says, That the Duke advised him at York, to compromise Matters; to be tender of the Honour of the Queen of Scots, and to suppress her Letters, that she might not be defamed in England; but that, the Commission being adjourned to London, he (the Earl) was obliged to lay open the whole Matter; which the Duke resenting, he was apprehensive of being murdered in his Return to Scotland; and therefore, to appease the Duke, promised to promote the Marriage, and thereby saved his Life: He therefore entreated Queen Elizabeth to have a favourable Opinion of him, having pretended to assent to the Match out of pure Necessity.

A Letter of the Bishop of Ross's, to the Queen of Scots, read.

Then a Letter from the Bishop of Rosse to the Queen of Scots was read, wherein he tells her, That he had learned from the Duke of Norfolk, that Queen Elizabeth did not design to bring her Cause to any Determination; but to hear what Earl Murray could alledge against her, in order to bring her into Contempt and Disgrace with the People of England; for that Queen Elizabeth was in some Dread of her being supported by her Uncles in France, and therefore advised the Queen of Scots to write a submissive Letter to Queen Elizabeth, referring all her Concerns to Her, and declaring, she relied more on her Friendship, than upon her Uncles, or any other Princes whatever.

Other Depositions of the Bishop of Ross's.

Part of the Bishop of Rosse's Examination, of the 6th of November, 1571. also was read, wherein he says, That Earl Murray was in fear of being murdered in his Return to Scotland: Whereupon he (the Bishop) did by the Duke of Norfolk's Direction write to the Queen of Scots, that nothing might be attempted against Murray, beceause he had yielded to favour the Duke's Designs; and further deposed, that the Murder was to have been committed near Northallerton, by the Nortons, Markenfield, and others, as the Examinant was informed, by the Queen of Scots Servants.

A Copy of the Prisoner's Letter to Murray, read.

A Copy of a Letter, written by the Duke to Earl Murray, was also read, wherein his Grace says, He perceived the Earl was well-affected to the Advancement of the Commonweal, and the uniting of the Island; and had a good Inclination towards him, which was a great Satisfaction: That he (the Duke) had so far proceeded in the Marriage with his Sister, that he could not in conscience revoke what he had done, or ever designed it while he lived; but that he could not with Honour proceed further till he had removed some Stumbling-Blocks; and when this was done, all Things should be performed to the Satisfaction of the Earl; and desires he would use all Means to defeat the Designs of their Enemies, who opposed the Match; and for the rest, referred himself to the Lord Boyd, who was empowered by the the Queen of Scots, and himſelf, to treat with the Earl.

To this the Queen's Counſel added, as from the Queen's own Mouth, that the Duke had complained to her Majeſty of the Rumour that was ſpread, of his Deſign to marry the Queen of Scots, and deſired it might be enquired into, and among other Expreſſions ſaid, To what End ſhould I marry her, being ſo wicked a Woman, ſuch a notorious Adultereſs and Murderer? I love to ſleep upon a ſafe Pillow, and account myſelf as great a Prince, at home, at Norwich, as ſhe, though ſhe were in the Middle of her Kingdom: That the Revenues of the Crown of Scotland were inferior to his own. And, ſhould he ſeek to match with her, knowing ſhe pretended a Title to the preſent Poſſeſſion of the Crown of England, her Majeſty Queen Elizabeth, might juſtly charge him with ſeeking her own Crown.

Part of the Priſoner's Examination, read.

Then part of the Duke's Examination the 6th of November 1571. was read, wherein he ſays, that, her Majeſty charging him at Titchfield with his intended Marriage with the Queen of Scots, he did acknowledge he had received Letters from her: That the Matter had been moved, but nothing concluded; and that thereupon her Majeſty commanded him on his Allegiance, not to deal any urther therein; and a Letter from the Duke, and the reſt of the Commiſſioners, to Queen Elizabeth from York was read, wherein they acquaint her Majeſty, that ſeveral Letters and Ballads had been produced, written with the Queen of Scots own Hand, diſcovering ſuch inordinate and filthy Love between her and Bothwell, ſuch loathing and abhorring of her Huſband that was murdered, and ſuch an Account of the Conſpiracy againſt his Life, as every good Man muſt deteſt and abhor: That they had encloſed a Paper with the principal Points contained in thoſe Letters, that her Majeſty might judge whether they were ſufficient to convict her of that deteſtable Crime, the Murder of her Huſband, which, in their Opinion and Conſciences, if the ſaid Letters were written with her own Hand, as they believed they were, was very hard to be avoided.

Banniſter's Examination, read.

The Confeſſion of Banniſter alſo was read, to ſhew, that the Duke had no Affection for the Queen of Scots Perſon, and was only moved by Ambition to attempt the Match.

And the Biſhop of Roſs's.

Then another Part of the Biſhop of Roſs's Confeſſion was read; wherein the Biſhop depoſes, That, when he demanded of the Duke, what he intended to do in the Matter of the Marriage, if Queen Elizabeth would not conſent to it, the Duke anſwered, he knew ſhe would, though not at firſt; becauſe moſt of the Council, and the Nobility, were againſt it: And that afterwards, when the Queen appeared offended with the Duke, he told this Examinant, he would go into his own Country, with the Earls of Arundel and Pembroke, and there they would adviſe with their Countrymen, and Friends, of the likelieſt Means to advance the Cauſe: To which the Biſhop ſaying, the Queen would fetch them out of the Country by force, the Duke anſwered, No Nobleman in England would accept that Office: He knew their Minds; eſpecially thoſe in the North, who would aſſiſt him: And, if the Queen would firſt purſue him, he ſhould find Friends enough to aſſiſt him, and the Scotiſh Queen might be in Safety; for that was the principal Mark he ſhot at: And the Biſhop further depoſed, that Liggons told him, the Duke was reſolved to go through with the Matter by Force, if the Queen would not conſent; and that, at this Time, Meſſages frequently paſſed between the Scotiſh Queen, the Duke, and them in the North.

What another ſaid, brought as Evidence againſt him.

Then the Duke's Examination, concerning his ſending Money to Scotland, was read, which he confeſſed in Court; as alſo, that a Deſign of ſeiſing the Tower, was moved to him; but, he ſaid, he did not conſent to it.

The Duke confeſſes part of the Charge.

Hickford, the Duke's Secretary's Examination, alſo, was read; wherein he ſaid, the Duke adviſed the Queen of Scots, not to deliver up her Son to Queen Elizabeth; nor certain ſtrong Places in Scotland, which the Queen of England demanded; or the Engliſh Rebels that had fled thither; and the Duke confeſſed the Truth of it in Court, except his adviſing her not to deliver up the Rebels.

His Secretary's Examination read againſt him.

Barker's Examination read.

Then the Examination of one Barker was read, importing, that the Duke was concerned in a Deſign of reſcuing the Queen of Scots.

He was alſo charged, with having made his Submiſſion to the Queen, and promiſing, on his Faith and Allegiance, not to proceed in the Marriage, or any other Matter relating to the Scotiſh Queen; and then ſending the Queen of Scots a Copy of his Submiſſion, before he ſigned it: Which the Duke confeſſed.

He confeſſes more of the Charge.

Caven-diſh's Depoſitions.

The Depoſitions of one Cavendiſh, a Dependant of the Duke's, alſo, was read, wherein he ſays, that the Duke ordered him to labour the Cauſe of his Marriage; and that he heard the Duke affirm, that he would loſe his Life before he would loſe that Marriage; adding, that nothing could undo him, but the Riſing of the Northern Lords; and he was afraid they would riſe.

Evidence of the Duke's treating with the Pope, and Spain.

The next Article the Queen's Counſel inſiſted on, was, the Duke's treating with the Pope, and the King of Spain, in Favour of the Queen of Scots: To prove which, another Part of the Biſhop of Roſs's Examination was read, and the Examination of one Barker, importing, that the Duke ſent one Rodolph, a Foreign Merchant, to the Duke of Alva, and the Pope, in the Name of the Scotiſh Queen, and himſelf, to procure Money and Forces, to invade the Realm, and maintain the Queen of Scots Title; and, that the Duke promiſed to join them, with his Friends, when they landed; and received a Letter from the Pope, approving the Enterprize.

Other Examinations read againſt him.

Evidence of his aiding the Rebels in Scotland.

The next Thing the Queen's Counſel inſiſted on, was, the Duke's aiding, and aſſiſting, the Earls of Weſtmoreland and Northumberland, who had been in Rebellion, and were fled into Scotland: To prove which, other Parts of the Biſhop of Roſs's and Barker's Examinations were read, importing, that the Rebels, being reconciled to the Church of Rome, wrote to the Pope, for his Aſſiſtance, who ſent them a Supply of Money; which was conveyed towards them by the Duke's Means, but intercepted before it reached them. The Examination of Banniſter alſo was read, who depoſed, that the Duke had conveyed a Packet of Letters from

from the French Ambaſſador, to the Duke of Chateleroy, and the Lord Herries, the Queen's Enemies in Scotland, and had alſo ſent them Money.

The Duke's Defence. That it was not Treaſon, to treat with the Scotiſh Queen.

The Duke, in his Defence, inſiſted, That it was not Treaſon to correſpond with the Scotiſh Queen, or to propoſe a Marriage with her; for, when ſhe laid claim to the Crown, and quartered the Arms of England, ſhe was married, and in the Power of her Huſband; and ſhe had made no ſuch Claim ſince ſhe was a Widow: Beſides, the Queen of England was in Amity with her, and had entered into ſeveral Treaties with that Princeſs; which ſhewed ſhe was not an Enemy to the State, and conſequently it could not be Treaſon to correſpond with her.

That the Scots were not legal Witneſſes.

He inſiſted alſo, that the Scots, who accuſed him, were not lawful Witneſſes; and that they, and the other Witneſſes, had confeſſed themſelves guilty of the Crimes they accuſed him; and gave their Evidence, to obtain Favour themſelves. But the moſt unanſwerable Part of his Defence was, that the Witneſſes were not produced Face to Face, as the Statute of the 5 & 6 of Edw. VI. requires.

That the Witneſſes did not give their Evidence Viva Voce.

That there was no Evidence of his Deſign to depoſe the Queen.

That, though it had been ſuggeſted, he propoſed this Match with the Queen of Scots, in order to depoſe the Queen of England, and uſurp her Throne; neither the Biſhop of Roſſe, or any other of the Witneſſes, could charge him with any ſuch Views; nor had he any Thoughts of altering Religion, as was ſuggeſted, being both in his Judgment and Profeſſion a Proteſtant.

That Earl Murray was prejudiced againſt him.

That Earl Murray was a prejudiced Perſon, and ſought his Life; and therefore his Teſtimony ought not to be admitted againſt him: Nor did their Miſunderſtandings ariſe from the Earl's oppoſing the Marriage, as had been ſuggeſted, but from other Cauſes. That he never heard of the Deſign of taking away Earl Murray's Life, till the Time was paſſed, when it was to have been done; and then the Biſhop of Roſſe firſt acquainted him with it.

The Queen's Counſel affirm, it was not neceſſary to produce the Witneſſes; and do not ſuffer the Priſoner to bring Witneſſes for him.

The Duke frequently, and with a great deal of Juſtice, repeated his Complaint, That the Witneſſes were not brought Face to Face: To which the Queen's Counſel anſwered, That the Law was ſo, indeed, for a Time; but, it being too hard and dangerous for the Prince, that Law was repealed. The Duke alſo complained, That he had not been permitted to ſpeak with any Body during his Confinement, or to produce his Witneſſes or Proofs, in order to his Defence; to which no Anſwer was given.

Then he obſerved again, That no manner of Proof had been brought, of any Deſign he had againſt the Queen's Perſon, or Government; of his levying War, or committing any Treaſon, ſpecified in the 25 Edw. III.

Confeſſes, he was privy to the Queen of Scot's Deſign, of ſoliciting foreign Aid.

That he had treated with the Scotiſh Queen, he acknowledged; but this did not amount to High-Treaſon; and he confeſſed, the Biſhop of Roſſe did ſend him a Letter from the Queen of Scots, wherein ſhe complained of her Subjects, and ſaid, ſhe would ſeek other means for her Relief: But he diſliked all thoſe Devices, and adviſed her, to depend only on her Majeſty, or he, and all her Friends in England, would forſake her. He acknowledged alſo, that Rodolph had been brought to him, and diſcourſed with him concerning the Scotiſh Queen; particularly he ſaid, he would endeavour to procure Money of the Duke of Alva, for Neceſſaries for her, as he had done formerly; and that he deſired the Duke's Letters to the Duke of Alva, in that Princeſs's Favour; but he put him off, and would not write; nor did he ever give Inſtructions to Rodolph, to ſolicit the King of Spain, for Men or Money: And whereas it was ſaid, that ten thouſand Men were to invade England, four thouſand whereof were to be Horſe, and to be landed in Eſſex; he had not ſo little Skill in military Affairs, as to direct four thouſand Horſe to land in that County, full of Lanes, Ditches, and Marſhes: He ſhould have choſen ſome other County, if he had been engaged in any ſuch Enterprize: And, though he was charged with an Intention to join ſuch foreign Troops, it could not be proved, he had made any Proviſion for that End; that he had conſulted any of his Friends about it; levied Men, or provided Horſes, or Arms, for that Purpoſe.

He confeſſes his treating with the Pope's Agent, to procure the Queen of Scots Money.

He inſiſts, he was unprepared for an Inſurrection.

Confeſſes his receiving a Letter from the Pope.

He confeſſed alſo, that Barker did bring him a Letter from the Pope, which begun with theſe Words, Dilecte Fili, Salutem, with which he was offended, and aſked what he had to do with him, who was an Enemy to his Religion and Country; and Barker excuſed himſelf, and ſaid, Rodolph had procured that Letter for his own Credit.

And his ſending Money to Scotland.

The Duke alſo acknowledged, his being concerned in ſending the Money that was intercepted; but ſaid, he did not know it was for the Rebel Lords; and that it could not be Treaſon to ſend Money to the Duke of Caſtelle-Roy, and the Lord Herries, Subjects of Scotland, which Kingdom was at Peace with the Queen of England. However, the Duke was found GUILTY OF HIGH TREASON, by the unanimous Opinion of his Peers.

Remarks on the Duke of Norfolk's Trial.

It is evident from the Duke's Confeſſion, that he had renewed the Treaty of Marriage with the Queen of Scots, after he had promiſed Queen Elizabeth, he would have no further Concern with her; that he had alſo treated with the proper Agent to procure Money for her from the Pope and Spain; and that he had received a Letter from the Pope, relating to that Affair; and laſtly, that he had been concerned in ſending Money to the Engliſh Rebels in Scotland; and this was interpreted both by the Queen's Counſel, and the Peers, his Judges, to be with an Intention to depoſe Queen Elizabeth, and to uſurp her Throne; which was certainly High Treaſon, if his Judges were ſatisfied that was his Intent. However, if the Duke had not confeſſed theſe Facts in Court, there was no Evidence produced againſt him ſufficient to convict him; for by the 5 & 6 of Edw. VI. two Witneſſes, at leaſt, ought to have given their Evidence, Viva Voce, in Court; though the Queen's Counſel denied there was any ſuch Law in Force. The Duke alſo had very hard Meaſure, that his Friends were not ſuffered to come near him while he was in Priſon, nor any Opportunity allowed him to prepare for his Defence; neither was he permitted to produce any Witneſſes or Proofs of his Innocence.

nocence. This ſhews, that the Court acted very arbitrarily, even in Queen Elizabeth's Reign, and that the Subject had ſcarce any Chance for his Life, where he was accuſed of High Treaſon. Even Acts of Parliament in the Priſoner's Favour were not regarded by the Court: Every Thing was to be urged in Behalf of the Crown, and nothing ſuffered to be offered in Behalf of the Priſoner.

Other Peoples Letters, and Copies of Letters, were read againſt him, in which he had no Concern; and that, without any Proof being made that thoſe Letters were written by the Perſons they were pretended to be written by. Nay, the Counſel were permitted to repeat the Queen's Converſation, and to apply it as Evidence againſt the Priſoner, without the Solemnity of an Oath; and hearſay Evidence, what the Witneſſes had heard other People ſay of the Priſoner, was admitted as Evidence; all which is held illegal at this Day; and the Law was much the ſame in that Reign as it is now: Nothing but the different Opinions of the Lawyers of thoſe Days, and ours, in interpreting the Laws and Statutes of the Realm, ſeems to make that wide Difference there appears between the Proceedings of the Courts of Juſtice, at that Time and this.

As to that Objection of the Duke's, That a Scot ought not to be admitted a Witneſs againſt an Engliſhman, or an Engliſhman againſt a Scot: It ſeems this was the Practice upon the Borders, where the two Nations were in perpetual Hoſtility, and therefore they were not deemed competent and impartial Witneſſes againſt each other there; but this Rule does not appear to have been extended to the whole Nation by either Side.

As to the Occaſion of proſecuting the Duke with this Violence; Hiſtory informs us, That the Scotiſh Queen, finding there was little Hopes of obtaining her Liberty from the Queen of England, ſent Letters to the Duke of Norfolk, the Pope, and the King of Spain, to endeavour to procure her Enlargement by Force, or otherwiſe; which Letters were copied over by Hickford, the Duke of Norfolk's Secretary, and then forwarded to Spain by Ridolph, or Rodolph, the Pope's Agent, who had continued ſeveral Years in England, under the Character of an Italian Merchant; and this Man, 'tis ſaid, had propoſed to the Duke of Norfolk, the bringing about a Revolution in England, and the procuring Money and Forces of the Pope and the King of Spain, to effect it.

The Biſhop of Roſſe, who reſided at London, as Ambaſſador of the Queen of Scots, propoſed to the Duke of Norfolk, about the ſame Time, the ſeizing of Queen Elizabeth's Perſon, and making her their Priſoner; on which he ſuggeſted, a Majority of the Nation would declare for the Queen of Scots; and, though the Duke rejected this Motion, he thought fit to conclude the Treaty of Marriage, however, with the Queen of Scots; and thereupon Rodolph was diſpatched to the Pope, and the King of Spain, to deſire their Aid, as has been related. Rodolph, arriving in Flanders, and meeting one Bayliff, a Servant of the Queen of Scots, going to England, ſent ſeveral Letters by him to the Duke of Norfolk, the Biſhop of Roſſe, and others in the Secret; and Bayliff, with his Packet, being ſeized at Dover, on his Return, the Government thereby diſcovered there was a Plot on Foot; and, apprehending the Biſhop of Roſſe, and Hickford, the Duke's Secretary, they were more fully convinced of it, by their Confeſſions, and the Copies of the Letters that had been ſent to the Pope, and the King of Spain, which the Secretary produced.

It appeared alſo, that the Duke's Secretary had been employed in tranſmitting 1500 l. to the Rebels in Scotland, which was intercepted; ſo that the Miniſtry did not want ſufficient Proof againſt the Duke. All that they are cenſured for, is the illegal Manner of proſecuting him for a Crime, which might very eaſily have been proved againſt him in a legal Way. The Duke, himſelf, did not deny his ſoliciting foreign Aid; only ſaid, in his Excuſe, he had no Deſign againſt Queen Elizabeth and the Realm; that he only intended to deliver the Queen of Scots, and reſtore her to the Throne of Scotland.

Conſpiracies to ſet the Duke at Liberty.

However, though there was little Room to doubt of the Duke's Guilt, and he had been convicted by his Peers, without one diſſenting Voice, the Queen ſeemed inclined to ſpare him, and reſpited his Execution for ſeveral Months; till ſome Conſpiracies having been diſcovered, to reſcue the Duke, and ſet him at Liberty, which were fomented by the Scotiſh Queen, her Majeſty thought fit to call a Parliament, and adviſe with them, concerning her own and the national Security; and the Houſes immediately reſolved, That the Execution of the Duke of Norfolk was now become neceſſary, and addreſſed her Majeſty accordingly: Whereupon the Duke was ordered to be beheaded, on the 2d of June, almoſt five Months after his Sentence.

The Parliament addreſs the Queen for his Execution.

He acknowledges his Guilt.

When he came to the Scaffold, he acknowledged, he had been juſtly condemned by his Peers, and that he had treated with the Queen of Scots a ſecond Time, after he had ſolemnly promiſed her Majeſty, he would not; for which, his Conſcience, he ſaid, was diſturbed; but declared, he never approved the Deſigns of the Pope, and King of Spain, or the Rebellion in the North; and was ſo far from attempting to introduce Popery, that he was never popiſhly affected, ſince he had any Taſte for Religion. Having ended his Speech, he prepared himſelf for the Block, without any Signs of Fear; and his Head was ſevered from his Body.

Dies a Proteſtant.

Soon after the Duke's Execution, her Majeſty ſent Commiſſioners to the Scotiſh Queen, to expoſtulate with her, concerning her repeated Practices againſt her Government; and, particularly, for treating of a Marriage with the Duke of Norfolk, and endeavouring to reſcue him out of Priſon.

The Queen of Scots affirms ſhe was his Wife.

To which that Princeſs anſwered, She was actually contracted to the Duke of Norfolk, and thought herſelf obliged to endeavour to obtain his Freedom, as ſhe was his Wife.

Hickford, the Duke of Norfolk's Secretary arraigned.

THE next Thing we meet with in the State Trials, is the Arraignment of Robert Hickford, the Duke of Norfolk's Secretary, on the 9th of February, 1571. 14 Eliz. for High Treaſon, in being concerned in the Treaty with the Pope, and the King of Spain, and diſpatching Rodolph to them, to demand Supplies for the Queen of Scots; and alſo for tranſmitting Money to the Rebels in Scotland: Both which Hickford confeſſed, and his Confeſſion being recorded, Judgment was pronounced againſt him as a Traitor; but, as he had been made an Evidence againſt his Lord, his Life was ſpared.

Condemned, but pardoned.

The Trial of Doctor WILLIAM PARRY.

THEN follows the Arraignment of William Parry, Doctor of Laws, for High Treaſon, the 25th of February, 1584. 26 Eliz.

The Indictment ſet forth, that the Priſoner had traiterouſly conſpired the Death of the Queen, and the Subverſion of the Government, and the true Religion; that he had begged Abſolution of the Biſhop of Rome, and received Letters from Cardinal de Como, ſignifying, that the ſaid Biſhop of Rome approved his Intentions, abſolved him from all his Sins, and encouraged him to proceed in his Enterprize; and that the Priſoner had moved Edmund Nevil, to aſſiſt him, in aſſaſſinating the Queen.

To this Indictment the Priſoner pleaded GUILTY. At which Time, alſo, his Confeſſion before the Lord Hunſdon was read, wherein he declared, that he looked upon the Reſolution he had taken, of killing the Queen, to be lawful, and even meritorious; and his Confeſſion being recorded, Judgment was pronounced againſt him as a Traitor.

Pleads Guilty.

The Priſoner, being a Member of Parliament, was executed in the Palace-Yard, in the Preſence of both Houſes.

His Execution before the two Houſes of Parliament.

His Deſign of murdering the Queen, was firſt diſcovered by Edmund Nevil, whom he deſired to aſſiſt him in the Aſſaſſination.

The Trial of ANTHONY BABINGTON, &c.

1586. 28 Eliz.

Babington, &c. arraigned for High Treaſon.

THE next Proceeding in the State Trials, is the Arraignment of Anthony Babington, Chidiock Titchburne, Thomas Saliſbury, Robert Barnwell, John Savage, Henry Donn, and John Ballard, for High Treaſon, the 13th & 14th of Sept. 1586. 28 Eliz.

The Charge againſt them.

They were charged with a Conſpiracy, to aſſaſſinate her Majeſty; with attempting to deliver the Queen of Scots out of Cuſtody, procuring foreign Enemies to invade the Realm, and inciting an Inſurrection, to join the Enemy.

They plead Guilty.

To which Indictment they all pleaded GUILTY, and Sentence was pronounced againſt them as Traitors.

More of the Conſpirators tried.

The following Day, viz. the 15th of September, 1586. 28 Eliz. their Accomplices, Edward Abington, Charles Tilney, Edward Jones, John Travers, John Charnock, Jerome Bellamy, and Robert Gage, were arraigned for the like Treaſon, viz. conſpiring the Death of the Queen, the releaſing the Queen of Scots, inviting Foreigners to invade the Realm, and inciting an Inſurrection; and were all convicted on their own Confeſſions, or the Confeſſions of their Accomplices: But we find no more than Minutes of theſe Trials, which were very imperfectly taken; only it appears they were all condemned as Traitors; and that Jones, Travers, Bellamy, and Gage, were convicted only of concealing and harbouring the Aſſaſſins, and were to have had no Share in the intended Aſſaſſination themſelves.

The Conſpirators condemned.

Since theſe Proceedings are ſo very deficient, I ſhall endeavour to ſupply, in ſome meaſure, what is wanting, in relation to the Diſcovery of this Plot, and the Trials of the Conſpirators, from Hiſtory.

1586. 28 Eliz.

Remarks on theſe Proceedings.

The Prieſts in the Engliſh Seminary at Rheims, had, we are informed, inculcated into their Pupils, that it would be a meritorious Act to aſſaſſinate an excommunicated Prince; and that thoſe, who loſt their Lives in ſuch an Attempt, ought to be deemed Martyrs; and had ſo inſpired Savage, a bold, enterprizing, young Fellow, with theſe Principles, that he vowed to kill Queen Elizabeth.

About the ſame Time, John Ballard, a Prieſt of the ſame Seminary, having viſited the Catholicks in England and Scotland, to ſee how they ſtood affected; and returning to France, propoſed to Mendoza, the Spaniſh Ambaſſador there, and to the Engliſh Exiles, the invading England with a Body of Spaniſh Troops, while the Queen's Forces were abſent in Holland; which being approved by all, Ballard was ſent to England again, to ſee what Forces the Engliſh Catholicks could raiſe, to join the Spaniards.

Ballard, on his Arrival in England, meeting with Anthony Babington, a Gentleman of Quality and Fortune, and entirely devoted to the Intereſt of the Queen of Scots, acquainted him with the intended Invaſion. To which Babington anſwered; The Invaſion would ſignify nothing, as long as Queen Elizabeth lived.

1586. 28 Eliz.

To which Ballard replied; She would not live long; for Savage had vowed to kill her: But Babington ſaid, ſo weighty a Buſineſs ought not to be truſted to Savage alone, and propoſed ſix Gentlemen, of whom Savage ſhould be one, to perform this tragical Execution, as he called it, and made ſome Improvements alſo, in the Project, for an Invaſion, and the ſetting the Queen of Scots at Liberty; and, ſoon after, wrote a Letter to that Princeſs, wherein he gave her an Account, of his Conference with Ballard, and of the ſix Gentlemen, that were pitched upon for the intended Aſſaſſination; telling her, that he, with an hundred more, would, at the ſame Time, ſet her at Liberty: and deſired the heroical Actors, in this Enterprize, or their Poſterity, if they did not ſurvive, might be well rewarded.

Six Gentlemen vow to aſſaſſinate the Queen.

Queen of Scots Letter to Babington.

To this Letter Babington received an Anſwer, from the Queen of Scots, wherein ſhe adviſes him, to uſe great Caution; and that the Aſſociation, they propoſed to enter into, ſhould be under Pretence of their Fears of the Puritans: She adviſes alſo, that there might be an Inſurrection in Ireland, at the ſame Time; that the Earls of Arundel and Northumberland ſhould be prevailed on to engage in the Affair; and, that Lord Paget, and the Exiles, ſhould come over to England; and, having propoſed ſome feaſible Ways to reſcue her from her Impriſonment, ſhe ordered Babington, to promiſe the ſix Gentlemen Rewards for their Service.

The Conſpirators betrayed by a Spy.

Babington, afterwards, drew the Lord Windſor's Brother, and ſeveral other Gentlemen of Quality, into the Conſpiracy; but among them, it ſeems, was one Polly, a Spy of Secretary Walſingham's, who is thought to have revealed their Secrets from Time to Time, and to have puſhed theſe young Gentlemen upon this deſperate Attempt. The ſix, who were ſelected for the Aſſaſſination, took an Oath, to perpetrate it; and the Conſpirators met frequently in St. Giles's Fields, and in St. Paul's Church; and ſometimes at Taverns, where they had Entertainments, encouraged each other, and gloried in the Enterprize they were about to undertake; applauding thoſe Gentlemen who had lately ſurpriſed the King of Scots at Sterling, and Gerard, the Burgundian, who had aſſaſſinated the Prince of Orange; and the Aſſaſſins had the Vanity to have their Pictures drawn, with Babington, the prime Mover of the Plot, in the Middle of them; from whence it obtained the Name of BABINGTON'S CONSPIRACY.

The Pictures of the Conſpirators drawn, and ſhewn the Queen.

Theſe Pictures, it is ſaid, being privately ſhewn the Queen, before the Painter had finiſhed them, ſhe ſaid, ſhe did not remember to have ſeen any of the Gentlemen, they were drawn for, except Barnwell, who had often attended her on a Suit of the Earl of Kildare's; and, ſeeing him afterwards, as ſhe was taking a Walk, ſhe beheld him, ſays Cambden, with an undaunted Countenance, and, turning to Hatton, Captain of her Guard, ſhe ſaid, Am not I finely guarded, that have not a Man in my Company that wears a Sword? And Barnwell, afterwards, acquainted his Accomplices, how eaſily the Queen might have been taken off, if the reſt of the Conſpirators had been there.

1586. 28 Eliz.

In the mean Time, the Government, being acquainted with every Step they took, ſet Spies, to obſerve their Motions: Which the Conſpirators, by ſome Means, diſcovered, and fled into the Country; but were ſoon after taken, and brought to Town again; and being arraigned (as has been related above) ſix of them confeſſed their Guilt, declaring, that they were perſuaded by Ballard, the Prieſt, to believe, that it was lawful to kill the Queen, becauſe ſhe ſtood excommunicated by the Pope. But, to proceed: On the 27th of September, 1586. about ten Days after Sentence pronounced againſt them, Anthony Babington, Chidiock Titchburne, Thomas Saliſbury, Robert Barnwell, John Savage, Henry Donn, and John Ballard, ſeven of the Conſpirators, were hanged on a Gallows, erected for that Purpoſe, in St. Giles's Fields; and, being cut down alive, their Bowels were taken out with unuſual Cruelty, ſays Cambden. Six of them died very penitent, and begged Pardon of God, and the Queen; but Babington endeavoured to terrify the People, by threatening them, that his Blood would ſoon be revenged on them. The next Day, Edward Abington, Charles Tilney, Edward Jones, John Travers, John Charnock, Jerome Belamy, and Robert Gage, were executed; but the Queen, having been acquainted how cruelly the former Priſoners had been uſed, gave Orders, that theſe ſhould have more Mercy ſhewed them; and, accordingly, they were all ſuffered to hang till they were dead, before they were cut down: Theſe, alſo, expreſſed their Sorrow for their Crimes, and exhorted the Roman Catholicks, not to endeavour the Reſtoration of their Religion by Force of Arms. Moſt of the Sufferers, it is obſerved, were Gentlemen of good Families.

The Conſpirators fly, and are taken.

The Trial of the Queen of Scots.

Proceedings againſt MARY Queen of Scots, for a Conſpiracy againſt Queen ELIZABETH, before the Lord Chancellor Bromley, and other Commiſſioners, appointed by her Majeſty to ſit in Judgment on the ſaid Scotiſh Queen, at Fotheringay Caſtle, in Northamptonſhire, 12 Octob. 1586. 28 Eliz.

1586. 28 Eliz.

The Occaſion of it.

THERE having been ſeveral Conſpiracies, ſet on Foot by the Roman Catholicks, againſt Queen Elizabeth, with a View of advancing the Queen of Scots to the Throne, and, thereby, reſtoring their Religion, the proved, and confirmed, by a Statute made the 27th of Eliz. Anno 1585. And it was alſo, further enacted, That, if any Invaſion, or Rebellion, ſhould happen in any Part of her Majeſty's Dominions; or any Attempt ſhould be made, to the Hurt of the Queen's Perſon, by, or for, any Perſon, that ſhould pretend a Title to the Crown, after her Majeſty's Deceaſe; or, if any Thing ſhould be compoſed, or imagined, tending to the Hurt of her Majeſty's Perſon, with the Privity of any one, that might pretend a Title to the Crown: Her Majeſty, by her Commiſſion under the Great-Seal, directed to the Lords, and others, of her Privy-Council, and to ſuch other Lords as ſhould be named by her Majeſty, amounting to twenty-four, at leaſt, might authoriſe them to examine all, and every, ſuch Offences, and to give Sentence therein, on the Evidence that ſhould be produced before them. And the Queen of Scots being ſuſpected to be at the Bottom of Babington's (Conſpiracy, already mentioned) a Commiſſion was iſſued, for the Trial of the Scotiſh Queen, by Virtue of the ſaid Act; being directed to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treaſurer, and above forty Noblemen more, to whom were added five of the Judges.

The Commiſſioners meet at Fotheringay.

The Archbiſhop did not act in this Commiſſion: But the Lord Chancellor, and thirty-ſix of the Commiſſioners, aſſembling at Fotheringay Caſtle, the 11th of October, gave notice to the Scotiſh Queen, of their Arrival, the next Day, requiring her to appear before them. To which Meſſage ſhe anſwered, She was an Independant Princeſs, and the Commiſſioners could have no Juriſdiction over her: However, having made a Proteſt, that ſhe owed no Subjection to the Crown of England, ſhe did, at length, agree to appear before them (ſhe ſaid) to manifeſt her Innocence to the World, and, that ſhe might not lie under ſo foul an Aſperſion, as the Conſpiracy to aſſaſſinate the Queen of England.

The Charge againſt the Queen of Scots, and the Proofs of it.

Then the Queen's Counſel charged her, with being privy to Babington's Conſpiracy, and, with approving and encouraging it: For Proof whereof, they produced Copies of Babington's Letters, and his Examination, wherein he declares, ſhe wrote Anſwers to them; in one of which, ſhe commended, and approved, his Deſign: A Copy of a Letter, from the Lord Charles Paget, to her, alſo was read (which Curl, one of her Secretaries, had atteſted, ſhe received) reciting a Conference between the ſaid Paget, Mendoza the Spaniſh Ambaſſador, and Ballard the Prieſt, one of the Conſpirators, importing, that an Invaſion was intended, in order to ſet the Queen of Scots at Liberty: The Examinations of her Secretaries, Naw, and Curl, alſo were read, to prove the Letters that paſſed between her and Babington, relating to the Conſpiracy.

The Depoſitions of her Secretaries, the principal Evidence.

She was charged alſo, with allowing a Penſion to Morgan, who ſent over Parry (already mentioned) to kill the Queen.

Her Letters to the Lord Charles Paget, alſo, were read, wherein ſhe declares, That the Spaniard had no other Way to reduce the Netherlands, but by ſetting a Prince on the Throne of England, that might be ſerviceable to him; and entreats Paget, to haſten the Forces that were to invade England: A Letter of Cardinal Allen's, to the Queen of Scots, alſo was read, wherein he ſtiles her, His Dread Sovereign; and acquaints her, that her Affairs were committed to the Care of the Prince of Parma.

Then ſhe was charged, with a Deſign of transferring her Right to the Succeſſion of the Crown to the Spaniard: Upon which the Queen's Counſel harangued for ſome Time; obſerving, how precarious all their Honours, Liberties, and Properties, muſt be, if ſuch a Conveyance ſhould take Place. To which the Lord Treaſurer anſwered, that the Kingdom of England could not be ſo transferred to a Foreigner; but muſt deſcend according to the Laws of Succeſſion.

The Queen of Scots Defence.

To this Charge the Scotiſh Queen anſwered, That ſhe knew not Babington, or ever wrote to, or received Letters from him; nor, had ſhe ever plotted the Deſtruction of the Queen: That they ought to produce ſomething under her own Hand, to make good the Charge: That many Letters, indeed, had been ſent to her, by People unknown, offering their Aſſiſtance; but ſhe had excited no Man to commit any Offence; and, being ſhut up in Priſon, could neither know, or prevent, what others attempted: That Babington might have confeſſed ſuch Things, to ſave himſelf: That ſhe had, indeed, done her beſt Endeavour to recover her Liberty, which Nature, itſelf, allowed; and ſolicited

Inſiſts, that they ought to have proved her Hand to the Letters.

And that the Witneſſes ought to have given their Evidence in her Preſence.

1586. 28 Eliz.

cited her Friends for that End: But that ſhe would not purchaſe the Kingdom with the Death of the meaneſt Man, much leſs of the Queen: That it was an eaſy Matter, to counterfeit the Cyphers, and Characters, of others; and, ſhe feared, this had been done by Walſingham, to deſtroy her, who had practiſed both againſt her Life, and her Son's, as ſhe was informed: Whereupon Walſingham proteſted, he had no Malice againſt her; but had acted as the Duty of his Poſt required.

Then ſhe inſiſted, that her Secretaries, Naw and Curl, ought to have been produced in Court, and given their Evidence in her Preſence; ſince the whole Streſs of the Proof ſeemed to reſt upon their Teſtimony: They might alſo, ſhe obſerved, have written what ſhe never dictated; and Letters might come to them, which ſhe never ſaw: However, were they produced, ſhe was confident, they would acquit her of all Guilt.

As to her allowing a Penſion to Morgan, who ſent over Parry to kill the Queen, ſhe ſaid, ſhe always forbad him encouraging any ſuch Attempts; though, ſhe confeſſed, ſhe had given him a Penſion, on Account of ſome Services he had done her: And, on the other Hand, ſhe obſerved, that the Queen of England made no Scruples of allowing Penſions to her Enemies in Scotland.

She laments, Queen Elizabeth would accept of no Expedients.

She lamented, that the moſt reaſonable Conditions ſhe could propoſe, to Queen Elizabeth, had always been rejected; even, when ſhe offered to deliver her own Son, and the Duke of Guiſe's Son, for Hoſtages and Pledges, that neither the Kingdom of England, or the Queen, ſhould receive any Damage from her being at Liberty. She complained, that her Honour and Reputation had been called in Queſtion, and inſulted, by Foreign Lawyers; who, by wretched Concluſions, drew every Circumſtance into a Conſequence: But, that Princes, anointed and conſecrated, were not Subject to the Laws of any particular Country, as private Perſons were.

The Lord Treaſurer's Reply.

To this the Lord Treaſurer replied, That ſhe, or the Scots, were the Occaſion, that all ſhe had propoſed to the Queen failed of Succeſs; for the Scotiſh Lords abſolutely refuſed to deliver up her Son, as an Hoſtage; and, while the laſt Treaty was negotiating, Morgan, a Dependant of her's, privately ſent over Parry to murder the Queen: And aſſerted, that the Commiſſioners had full Authority, to call her to an Account, for her Practices againſt the Queen and Kingdom.

She proceeds in her Defence.

Then the Queen of Scots proceeded in her Defence, and ſaid, That, as to Cardinal Allen, ſhe held him to be a Reverend Prelate of the Church; but in what Quality ſhe was eſteemed by the Pope, or foreign Princes, ſhe knew not; nor could ſhe prevent their ſtiling her Queen of England, in their Letters: She did not deny her treating with the Spaniards, to convey her Right in the Kingdom to him; but ſaid, all her Hopes in England being deſperate, ſhe was fully reſolved not to reject Foreign Aid; and concluded, with requiring, ſhe might be heard in full Parliment, or, ar leaſt, that ſhe might ſpeak with the Queen in Perſon; not doubting but ſhe would have ſome Regard to a Sovereign Princeſs, her near Relation.

1586. 28 Eliz.

Then the Commiſſioners adjourned to the 25th of October, to the Star-Chamber in Weſtminſter, when they pronounced the following Sentence.

Sentence pronounced againſt her.

That, after the firſt Day of June, in the 27th Year of the Queen, and before the Date of their Commiſſion, divers Matters had been compaſſed, and imagined, by Anthony Babington, with the Privity of Mary Queen of Scots, pretending a Title to the Crown of England, and tending to the Hurt, Death, and Deſtruction of the Royal Perſon of the Queen: And, that the ſaid Mary, pretending a Title to the Crown of England, had alſo, herſelf, within the Time aforeſaid, compaſſed, and imagined, divers Matters, tending to the Hurt, Death, and Deſtruction, of the Royal Perſon of the Queen, contrary to the Statute of the 27th of Eliz.

The Parliament addreſs the Queen, for the Execution of the Queen of Scots.

The Parliament, meeting the 29th of the ſame Month of October, approved the Sentence of the Commiſſioners, and addreſſed her Majeſty, that, as well in reſpect of the Continuance of the true Religion, and the Safety of her Royal Perſon, as in regard to the Preſervation and Defence of her Subjects, ſhe would be pleaſed to give her ſpeedy Orders, that the ſaid Sentence might be publiſhed by Proclamation, and Directions given, for farther Proceedings againſt the Scotiſh Queen, in Purſuance of the aforeſaid Statute; for that, upon adviſed and great Conſultation, they could not find there was any poſſible Means of providing for her Majeſty's Safety, but by the juſt and ſpeedy Execution of the ſaid Queen. And that, if the ſaid Sentence was not ſpeedily executed, they deſpaired of the Continuance of the true Religion, of her Majeſty's Life, and the Safety of her faithful Subjects.

The Queen's Anſwer.

To this Addreſs, the Queen anſwered, That, if her Life alone depended upon it, and not the Safety, and Welfare, of her People, ſhe would moſt willingly pardon her. Nay, if England might, by her Death, attain a more flouriſhing Eſtate, and a better Prince, ſhe would moſt gladly lay down her Life; for, it was only for her People's Sake, ſhe deſired to to live. They had, ſhe ſaid, by the laſt Act of Parliament, brought her to a very great Strait, that ſhe muſt give Orders for her Death, who was a Princeſs moſt nearly allied to her in Blood, and, whoſe Practices againſt her had ſo overwhelmed her with Sorrow, that ſhe had been glad to be abſent herſelf from this Parliament, leſt ſhe ſhould encreaſe her Grief by hearing it ſpoken of, and not out of Fear of Danger, as ſome thought; though it was not long ſince, ſhe had ſeen, and read, an Oath, wherein ſome had bound themſelves to kill her within a Month. However, ſhe hoped they did not expect any preſent Reſolution; for, in Matters of leſs Moment, ſhe uſed to deliberate long.

A ſecond Addreſs, for the Execution of the Queen of Scots.

About a Fortnight after, her Majeſty ſent a Meſſage to both Houſes, deſiring, they would deviſe ſome Means, that the Queen of Scots Life might be ſpared: Which, occaſioned a ſecond Addreſs; wherein they again repreſented to her, that her Majeſty's Safety could not possibly be secured, so long as the Scotish Queen lived; and, therefore, renewed their Instances for her speedy Execution.

The Sentence against the Queen of Scots, proclaimed all over England.

Still the Publication of the Sentence was deferred, on the Intercession of the French Ambassador: But, at length, on the Instance of some Courtiers, it was proclaimed in London, and in all the Counties of England; and the Lord Buckhurst, and Beal, one of the Clerks of the Council, were sent to the Queen of Scots, to acquaint her with it, and persuade her to acknowledge her Offences, and expiate them before her Death by Repentance: They let her know, at the same Time, that, as long as she lived, the established Religion in England must be precarious; at which she triumphed, and gave God Thanks, that she was esteemed capable of restoring the true Religion in this Island.

The Queen, Camden observes, was extremely perplexed, how to act in this Affair, News being brought her, daily, of intended Invasions, Assassinations, or Insurrections: Whereupon she thought fit to give orders to Davison, one of her Secretaries of State, to draw a Warrant for the Queen of Scots Execution, and have it passed under the Broad-Seal, to lie in Readiness, in case of any further Attempts against her Life, or the Peace of the Kingdom. But the Queen, it is said, altering her Mind the next Day, told Davison, she would not have the Warrant drawn. To which he answered, it was already drawn; and had passed the Great-Seal, in pursuance of her Commands; at which she seemed surprised, and checked him for making so much Haste, ordering him, not to communicate the Warrant to any one: But Davison, a great Zealot in Religion, imagining the Fate of the Kingdom depended on the Execution of the Queen of Scots, acquainted the rest of the Council, that the Warrant for her Execution had passed the Great-Seal, without informing them, that her Majesty had since altered her Mind: Whereupon, the Lords, to whom the Warrant was directed, were ordered by the Council, to repair to Fotheringay, and see it executed: And the Queen of Scots was accordingly executed in the Hall of the Castle of Fotheringay, on the 8th of February, $158\frac{6}{7}$. in the 46th Year of her Age; when she expressed a great Contempt of Death, and even looked upon it as her great Happiness, that she was brought to suffer for her Steadiness to Religion; still denying she had ever practised any Thing against the Life of the Queen.

The Privy-Council order the Execution of the Queen of Scots, without the Knowledge of of Queen Elizabeth.

They are banished her Presence.

When her Majesty heard of the Execution of the Queen of Scots, she appeared to be in a great Consternation; but, having, after some Time, recovered herself, she reprimanded the Council severely, and commanded them out of her Sight. Even the Lord Treasurer Burleigh, was banished the Court; as appears by several Letters in Strype's Collections, wherein he begs to be readmitted to Favour: And Davison, the Secretary, was tried in the Star-Chamber, for a Misdemeanour, before the two Archbishops; the Earls of Worcester and Cumberland; the Lord Grey; the two Chief Justices; the Chief Baron, and several other Commissioners, who sentenced him to pay a Fine of ten thousand Marks, and to be imprisoned during the Queen's Pleasure.

Remarks on the Trial, and Execution, of the Queen of Scots.

As to the Justice, or Equity, of these Proceedings, against the Queen of Scots, it seems generally admitted, that, as she was a Foreigner, a Sovereign Princess, and fled to Queen Elizabeth for Protection, she was unjustly imprisoned, and more unjustly tried and condemned, by the Laws of England, to which she could not be subject, owing neither a natural, or local Allegiance to this Crown, but detained Prisoner here against her Will: And, that it was lawful, after this Violence to her Person, to endeavour by all Means, to free herself from her Imprisonment: Nor is there any doubt, but she endeavoured to obtain her Freedom, by inviting Foreign Powers to invade the Realm, and inciting Insurrections against Queen Elizabeth; which must have ended in the Destruction of the Queen, and the Protestant Religion, if they had succeeded. The Nation, therefore, purely for Self-Preservation, without considering, whether the Fact was strictly just, seem to have been almost unanimous, in taking away the Life of this Princess, to prevent their own unavoidable Ruin, in case she survived Queen Elizabeth.

Neither was it agreeable to the Laws of England, by which the Court pretended to try the Queen of Scots, to convict her upon the Depositions of Witnesses, without producing them to her Face, that she might have cross-examined them: However, this seems to have been the Practice in other Trials: Neither Throckmorton, or the Duke of Norfolk, had the Witnesses brought into Court to give their Testimony, but were condemned upon Depositions; though the 5th and 6th of Edw. VI. expressly requires, that there should be two Witnesses examined, Viva Voce, in Court, in the Prisoner's Presence, where they are charged with Conspiracies against the Government.

As to the executing the Queen of Scots, without Queen Elizabeth's Knowledge, I am apt to think the Privy-Council were content to take the Odium of it from the Queen, and bear it themselves; and, knowing Davison to be zealous for the Execution, put him into that Post, on purpose to serve their Turn, conscious that he would not use all those Precautions a Wise Man ought, on so critical an Occasion. And though, I believe, the Queen did not care to to give Orders, directly, for the Execution of the Queen of Scots, yet, she was not displeased in her Heart, perhaps, that the Privy-Council had caused her to be executed without her Knowledge: Nor, is there any doubt, but the Privy-Council knew her Majesty's Mind, and did not despair of recovering her Favour; though it was but decent for her Majesty to reprimand them, and banish them her Presence, for a Time, for their officious Haste in a Matter of that Moment.

The Trial of WILLIAM DAVISON, Esq; late one of her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, for a Misprision, and Contempt, in the Star-Chamber, before Sir Christopher Wraye Knight, Lord Chief Justice of England, the President; the Archbishops of Canterbury and York; the Earls of Worcester, Cumberland, and Lincoln; the Lords Grey and Lumley; Sir James Croft Comptroller; Sir Gilbert Gerrard Master of the Rolls; Sir Edmund Anderson Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas; Sir Roger Manwood Lord Chief Baron; and Sir Walter Mildmay Chancellor of the Exchequer, 28 March, 1587. 30 Eliz. 1587. 30 Eliz.

Defective. THE Editor of this Trial has not given us Part of the Bill, or Articles, that were preferred against Mr. Davison, in the Star-Chamber, or his Answer; but barely some Minutes of the Speeches of the Attorney-General, and the rest of the Queen's Counsel, against him, on the Day of Trial; with a Summary of his Defence in Court.

The Charge. The Queen's Counsel, he tells us, charged Mr. Davison, with communicating the Warrant, for the Execution of the Queen of Scots, to the Privy-Council, contrary to her Majesty's Directions; and, with informing them, that it was her Majesty's Intention, it should be speedily executed; when he was conscious, the Queen had no Intention she should be executed; at least, till further Orders: That her Majesty particularly sent Mr. Killegrew to him, commanding him, if the Warrant was not already sealed, that it should not be sealed; and that, when he informed her, it was sealed, she checked him for his Haste; and yet, he contemptuously caused a Warrant to be sent down, for the Execution of the Queen of Scots, without her Majesty's Privity.

The Evidence. The Evidence to prove this Charge was, Part of Davison's Confession, at his Examination, and the Lord Treasurer's Testimony.

At his Examination he had acknowledged, that, when her Majesty charged him to be Secret, he answered, he would be as careful, and as secret, as was necessary: He confessed also, that Mr. Killegrew came to him, and told him, if the Warrant were not sealed already, it should not be sealed; and that, after it was sealed her Majesty said, What haste? and, that he did not make her Majesty privy to the sending down the said Warrant.

The Testimony the Lord Treasurer gave, was, that he asked Mr. Davison, on his communicating the Warrant to him, if he knew what her Majesty's Mind was, as to the Execution, and he answered, she would have it go forward; and, that he told the rest of the Council the same Thing, and thereby procured a Warrant to be sent down, for the immediate Execution of the Queen of Scots.

Davison's Defence. Davison said, in his Defence, that he had ever been faithful to her Majesty, and never wittingly or willingly offended her: That the whole Realm had addressed her Majesty, for the Execution of the Queen of Scots: That he considered the Danger her Majesty was in, while she lived: That the Instrument was complete, and had passed the Great-Seal, by her Majesty's Directions; and, when she delivered it to him, she said, Now you have it, let me be troubled no more with it; which, he thought, was a sufficient Intimation of her Meaning; and, there being no direct Countermand, he thought the Instrument irrevocable: As to the Charge of Secrecy, he conceived her Majesty's Meaning to be, that it should be kept from the common and publick Knowledge, in Regard of the violent Attempts that might be made by the Queen of Scots Adherents, at such a Time, if they knew the Warrant was signed for her Execution: He could not think she designed to conceal it from the Council, when she had ordered him to communicate it to Sir Francis Walsingham; and when she had, herself, made the Lord Admiral privy to it.

And, as to his sending down the Warrant, he did it not without the Opinion of the Council: Besides, in his own Judgment, the Times were very dangerous; and he should have been severely censured; at least, if her Majesty had come to any Misfortune, while he had concealed the Warrant: It was reported, that Forces were landed in Ireland and Wales; and, that there were Insurrections in several Parts of the Kingdom: That Fotheringay Castle was broke open, and the Prisoners escaped: That London was fired, and her Majesty assassinated; and, while the People were in the greatest Consternation at these Reports, her Majesty might in reality have been murdered; and he should have been held the principal Occasion of it, if he had not communicated the Warrant for executing the Queen of Scots to the Council.

Besides, as her Majesty had signified her Royal Assent, that she should be executed, it was not usual to trouble the Queen about the Time and Place, and other Circumstances:

1587. 30 Eliz.

These Matters were always left to the Council, and ought to be ſo, more eſpecially in this Caſe, becauſe ſhe had ſaid expreſly, She would be troubled no more with it.

The Opinion of the Court in this Caſe.

The Court, in delivering their Opinions, generally agreed, that Daviſon had acted ſincerely, and according to the beſt of his Underſtanding; but ſtill held, that he had been guilty of a great Miſpriſion and Contempt, in communicating the Warrant to the Council, and cauſing the Queen of Scots to be executed, without her Majeſty's Privity. The Lord Grey ſeemed to excuſe his Conduct, and, in ſome meaſure, juſtified him. Had her Majeſty miſcarried, this Lord obſerved, and the Warrant been afterwards found ſigned and ſealed in Mr. Daviſon's Hands, they ſhould have looked on him as a Traitor, and have torn him to Pieces; adding, that he ſhould then have thought him more worthy of ten thouſand Deaths, than now of the leaſt Puniſhment; and yet he agreed with the reſt in their Sentence, viz. That Mr. Daviſon ſhould be fined ten thouſand Marks, and be impriſoned during her Majeſty's Pleaſure.

The Sentence.

The Paper called Daviſon's Apology.

The Editors of this Trial have added a Paper to it, which they tranſcribed from Camden, and is uſually called Daviſon's Apology; but, whether it be genuine, or the Allegations in it deſerve to be credited, Camden does not inform us.

In this Apology Daviſon makes the Queen ſay, That the Reaſon of her deferring the Execution ſo long, was, leſt ſhe might ſeem to have been violently, or maliciouſly, drawn thereto, though ſhe was not ignorant, how neceſſary it was; and that ſhe blamed Pawlet and Drury, the Queen of Scots Keepers, that they had not eaſed her of that Care; and wiſhed, that Walſingham would feel their Pulſes, touching that Matter; telling him, that, in the Judgment of ſome wiſe men, another Courſe might be taken; to which he (Daviſon) replied, that That Courſe was always beſt and ſafeſt, which was moſt juſt; but fearing ſhe would lay the Fault upon him (as ſhe had laid the putting of the Duke of Norfolk to Death upon the Lord Burleigh) he acquainted Hatton with the Matter; proteſting, that he would not plunge himſelf any deeper in ſo great a Buſineſs: That Hatton imparted it to the Lord Burleigh, and Lord Burleigh to the reſt of the Council, who all conſented to have the Execution haſtened; and every one vowed to bear an equal Share in the Blame, and ſent Beal (Clerk of the Council) down with the Warrant and Letters: That the third Day after, when her Majeſty, by a Dream, which ſhe told, of the Queen of Scots Death, ſeemed to waver in her Reſolution, he (Daviſon) aſked her Majeſty, if ſhe had altered her Mind; to which ſhe anſwered, No; but another Courſe might have been deviſed; and demanded, at the ſame Time, whether he (Daviſon) had received an Anſwer from Pawlet; and that, having ſhewn her Majeſty Pawlet's Letter, wherein he flatly refuſed to undertake that which ſtood not with Honour and Juſtice, ſhe waxed angry, accuſing him, and others (who had bound themſelves by the Aſſociation) of Perjury, and Breach of their Vows, as having promiſed great Matters for their Princes Safety, and would perform nothing: Yet, ſaid ſhe, there are, that will do it, for my Sake; that he (Daviſon) thereupon ſhewed her Majeſty, how diſhonourable and unjuſt a Thing this would be, and into how great Danger ſhe would bring Pawlet and Drury by it: For, if ſhe approved the Fact, ſhe would draw upon herſelf, both Danger and Diſhonour, not without Cenſure of Injuſtice; and, if ſhe diſallowed it, ſhe would undo Men of great Deſert, and their whole Poſterity: And afterwards ſhe gave him a light Check, the ſame Day that the Queen of Scots was executed, becauſe ſhe was not yet put to Death.

The Editors obſerve farther, that Freebairn, in his Life of Mary Queen of Scots, p. 269. ſays, Queen Elizabeth ſent Orders to Pawlet, on whoſe Obedience ſhe could reckon with Certainty, for committing of any Act of Barbarity, to make away with his Priſoner; and p. 270, 271, 272. inſerts a Letter from Walſingham and Daviſon, her two Secretaries, to Sir Amias Pawlet and Drury, with their Anſwer, which were found, as 'tis ſaid, among Sir Amias Pawlet's Papers; Copies of which, tranſcribed from the Originals, were ſent to Doctor Mackenzie, by Mr. John Urry of Chriſt's-Church-College, Oxford, as it is ſaid.

Freebairn's Account of this Matter.

The Letter to Pawlet aud Drury.

Letters ſaid to be found among Pawlet's Papers.

" AFTER our hearty Commendations; we find, by a Speech lately made by her Majeſty, that ſhe doth note in you both, a Lack of that Care and Zeal for her Service, that ſhe looketh for at your Hands, in that you have not, in all this Time (of yourſelves, without other Provocation) found out ſome Way, to ſhorten the Life of the Scots Queen, conſidering the great Peril ſhe is hourly ſubject to, ſo long as the ſaid Queen ſhould live; wherein, beſides a kind of Lack of Love towards her, ſhe wonders greatly, that you have not that Care of your own particular Safeties; or, rather, the Preſervation of Religion, and the publick Good, and Proſperity of your Countries, that Reaſon and Policy commandeth; eſpecially, having ſo good a Warrant and Ground for the Satisfaction of your Conſciences towards God, and the Diſcharge of your Credit and Reputation towards the World, as the Oath of Aſſociation, which you have ſolemnly taken, and vowed; eſpecially the Matter, wherewith ſhe ſtandeth charged, being ſo clearly and manifeſtly proved againſt her: And therefore ſhe taketh it moſt unkindly, that Men profeſſing that Love towards her, that you do, ſhould in a kind of ſort, for Lack of the Diſcharge of your Duties, caſt the Burthen upon her; knowing, as you do, her Indiſpoſition to ſhed Blood, eſpecially of one of that Sex, and Quality, and ſo near to her in Blood, as that Queen is. Theſe Reſpects, we find, do greatly trouble her Majeſty, who, we aſſure you, hath ſundry Times proteſted, that if the Regard of the Danger of her good Subjects, and faithful Servants, did not more move her, than her own Peril, ſhe would never be drawn to aſſent to the ſhed-

FRA. WALSINGHAM, WILL. DAVISON.

In two other Letters, we are told, Mr. Davison desires Pawlet, to burn his Letters, and complains, it was not already done. Then they give us the following Letter, from Pawlet and Drury, to the Secretaries, Walsingham and Davison, as an Answer to the former.

SIR,

" YOUR Letters of Yesterday coming " to my Hands, this present Day, at " 5 p. m. I would not fail, according to your " Directions, to return my Answer with all " possible Speed; which I shall deliver unto " you with great Grief and Bitterness of Mind, " in that I am so unhappy, as living to see " this unhappy Day, in which I am required, " by Direction from my most gracious Sove- " reign, to do an Act, which God and the " Law forbiddeth. My Goods, and Life, are at " her Majesty's Disposition, and I am ready " to lose the next Morrow, if it shall please " her; acknowledging, that I do hold them, " as of her meer and most gracious Favour, " and do not design to enjoy them, but with " her Highness's good liking. But God for- " bid I should make so foul a Shipwreck of " my Conscience, or leave so great a Blot to " my poor Posterity, and shed Blood with- " out Law, or Warrant; trusting, that her " Majesty, out of her accustom'd Clemency, " and the rather, by your good Mediation, " will take this my Answer in good Part, " as proceeding from one, who never will be " inferior to any Christian Subject, living in " Honour, Love, and Obedience, towards his " Sovereign; and thus I commit you to the " Mercy of the Almighty."

Your most assured poor Friend,

Fotheringay, Feb. 2. 1586.

A. PAWLET.

" P. S. Your Letters, coming in the plural " Number, seem to be meant to Sir Drew " Drury, as well as to myself; and yet, because " he is not named in them, neither the Letter " directed unto him, he forbeareth to make any " particular Answer, but subscribeth in Heart " to my Opinion."

Remarks on Davison's Trial.

The Reader, no doubt, observes, that most of these old Trials are extremely defective. Every one knows, that the Method of proceeding in the Star-Chamber, was by Bill and Answer; and here the Editor gives us neither the one, or the other; or so much as an Abstract of them. All that we have is, only some short Notes, taken by one of the Audience in Court, at the Time of the Trial; or, perhaps, what he depended purely on his Memory for: At best, we meet with nothing more than an ordinary Memory might have retained; and what Alterations, or Omissions, there may be, I won't be answerable for: However, it is observed, if we cannot have the Trial as perfect as we would, it is better to have these Minutes, than none at all. Something may be learnt from them, imperfect as they are: But 'tis well, if some of them do not give us a wrong Bias, and furnish us with unreasonable and unwarrantable Prejudices.

Here we find a great Monarch, perhaps the best that ever reigned, either in this or any other Kingdom, if we consider the Wealth and Happiness of her Subjects, during so long an Administration, basely reviled and calumniated, and charged with the most detested Crimes, upon such slender Evidence, as would not be admitted against a common Person.

Davison is made to insinuate, in his Defence, that every Tittle of the Charge against him was false; though he had not the ill Manners to contradict, either the Queen, or the Lord Treasurer, directly, he said. Nay, he goes so far, as to endeavour to make his Readers believe, that her Majesty shewed no Reluctance at putting the Queen of Scots to Death; and that she would have had her privately assassinated and murdered; which cannot be credited by impartial Men, on many Accounts; for, first, there was no manner of Necessity for such a private Assassination, when that Queen lay under Sentence of Death, and the whole Nation pressed her Majesty continually to let her be executed, in pursuance thereof. Queen Elizabeth had nothing to do, but to suffer the Sentence to be executed, if she wanted to have the Queen of Scots out of the Way. To what End, or Purpose, therefore, should she endeavour to have her murdered in secret, unless she was fond of having her Memory traduced. Besides, we meet with several Contradictions in the Accounts, Davison is made to give of this Matter. In some Places he insinuates, that the Queen did command the Execution, wondered it was not done, and incited him to hasten it; and in others, he evidently shews, that she did not know of it; particularly when she told her Dream, and spoke of the Queen of Scots, as living, after she was dead.

It will be observed further, that the Letters, at the End of the Trial, if they were genuine, make Walsingham and Davison, the two Secretaries of State, the principal Instruments, to procure the Assassination of the Queen of Scots; whereas Davison, and his Friends, declare their Detestation of it, and pretend, that Davison represented to the Queen, the Foulness of the Fact, and would have no Concern in it; so that Davison's Representation of the Matter, and these Letters, cannot both be true; and if the Letters are to be credited, which were said to be found among Pawlet's Papers, both Walsingham's and Davison's Reputations must be given up, as well as the Queen's. But is it equitable to blast the Fame of so great a Queen, and her Ministers, upon two Letters, found, no Body knows where, or how; and without any Pretence of proving the Hands that wrote either of them? As Biſhop Burnet obſerves, a Lie, or Calumny, recorded in Hiſtory, is much worſe than a Lie in common Diſcourſe; as it is like to be more generally diffuſed, and of a longer Duration: The Slander is continued down to Poſterity. We act as if it was of no Moment, whether ſovereign Princes, and great Men, ſuffered in their Characters, or not: But ſhall we rob a great and good Queen of her Fame, on ſuch Evidence, as a Jury would reject, in the Caſe of a common Perſon; a Queen who revived and eſtabliſhed the Reformation; a Queen, who governed her People with the greateſt Equity and Goodneſs; and during whoſe Reign, the Nation flouriſhed, and made a greater Figure, than in any Reign, recorded in Hiſtory? Shall we, lightly, and upon incompetent Evidence, entertain an ill Opinion of ſuch a Princeſs? eſpecially, if we conſider from what Quarters the Slander probably came, viz. either from the Papiſts, or Puritans, both of them her inveterate Enemies; and that too, upon account of her eſtabliſhing the Church of England on ſuch a Foundation, that it has been able to bear up to this Day againſt the open Attacks, and ſecret Malice of both.

It ſhall ever be a Rule with me, to judge, both of Princes and private Men, according to the general Tenor of their Actions, and not from ſome ſingle Event; eſpecially where there is ſufficient Room to doubt, that even That has not been fairly repreſented: But, I don't know how it comes to paſs, People are ready to arraign their Superiors upon every ſlight Surmiſe, and ſwallow greedily, whatever is ſuggeſted to their Prejudice; when they cannot but acknowledge the Iniquity of ſuch a Proceeding, in a private Caſe. For my Part, I find fewer Blemiſhes in the long Reign of Queen Elizabeth, and more Advantages accruing to her Subjects, than in any Reign of the like Duration; and muſt have better Proof, therefore, than I have ever yet met with, before I give any Countenance to the Tales that have been framed, concerning her, in relation to the Execution of the Queen of Scots.

Give me leave to obſerve further on the Letter, ſaid to be ſent from the Secretaries of State, to Pawlet and Drury, to murder the Queen of Scots: That they firſt tell thoſe Gentlemen, that the Queen abhorred the Thoughts of ſhedding Blood, eſpecially the Blood of ſo near a Relation, or to that Effect; and then, uſe all the Arguments they could think of, to incite them to aſſaſſinate the Queen of Scots, ſuggeſting, that nothing could give her Majeſty greater Satisfaction: Thus making her, they repreſent ſo extremely tender in Caſes of Blood, as thirſting to ſhed that of the Queen of Scots: And, methinks, Pawlet and Drury's ſubſcribing themſelves, your moſt aſſured Friends, in their Letter, to the two principal Secretaries of State, is hardly reconcileable to good Manners. If there were no other Marks of Forgery, this alone would induce me to believe, that Letter was not genuine.

Trial of Knightly, &c.

The Trial of Sir RICHARD KNIGHTLY, Mr. HALES, Mr. WICKSTONE, and his Wife, for Countenancing and Promoting, the Printing and Publiſhing certain ſeditious Libels, before the Court of Star-Chamber, the 13th of February, 1588. 31 Eliz.

1588. 31 Eliz.

Bill and Anſwers wanting.

THE Editor of this Proceeding has given us, neither Bill, Articles, or Anſwers, in this Cauſe; but only ſome Scraps of Speeches of the Queen's Counſel, at the Trial, and of the Evidence; with ſuch a ſhort Abſtract of the Priſoner's Defence, that it ſcarce deſerves a Place in the State Trials: However, ſuch as it is, I ſhall endeavour to give ſome Account of it.

Charge by the Queen's Counſel.

The Attorney-General Popham, it ſeems, opened the Charge; wherein he obſerved, the Happineſs of the Queen's Subjects, under her Adminiſtration, which the Papiſts and ſeditious Sectaries endeavoured to diſturb: Firſt, the Preſbyterians, then the Browniſts, and now a third ſort of Diſſenters; who were for ſubverting all Eccleſiaſtical Government, and for eſtabliſhing ſeparate and independant Congregations, in every Pariſh. Nor were they content with railing at the Church; but attacked the Court and the civil Powers, preaching againſt the Laws, and confounding all Property. That theſe Sectaries were, generally, compoſed of the Refuſe and Scum of the People, who endeavoured to reduce all to Confuſion, that they might give Law to their Governors: The evil Tendency of whoſe Deſigns appearing in Swarms of ſeditious Pamphlets and Libels, her Majeſty had wiſely iſſued ſeveral Proclamations, for ſuppreſſing and burning ſuch Books and Papers; requiring, that no Printing ſhould be uſed, but in London, Oxford, or Cambridge: Whereupon they fell to Printing in Corners, and obſcure Places; in which they were aſſiſted and countenanced by the Priſoners at the Bar: Particularly, Sir Richard Knightly cauſed a Printing-Preſs to be brought into one of his Houſes, and ſuffered a ſeditious Pamphlet of Penry's * to be printed there: And, when he was told the Danger of it, by the Parſon of the Pariſh, he ſtill concealed it, and read the Book, though he ordered the Preſs to be removed: That Walgrave, the Printer, was recommended by Sir Richard, to Mr. Hales, who gave him Entertainment;

tainment; and there the Libel, entitled, A Supplication to the Parliament, was printed, and afterwards publiſhed by Sir Richard's Man, as well as another Book, entitled, Have you any Work for the Cooper: That this Preſs was afterwards conveyed to Mr. Wickſtone's Houſe, where Martin Senior, and Martin Junior, were both printed; wherein they declare, their Reſolution to eſtabliſh their Sect; and that all Laws that were oppoſite to their Diſcipline, ought not to be obeyed; ſuggeſting, that this was the proper Time to attack and diſtreſs the Government, while the Nation was threatened with an Invaſion from Spain (as it was this very Year, 1588.) and that Wickſtone, by the Influence of his Wife, harboured and aſſiſted the Printers of theſe Libels, with Money and Proviſions.

The Defence of Knightly.

Sir Richard Knightly ſaid, in his Defence, that Matters were greatly aggravated againſt him; that he was no Sectary, but of the Religion of the reſt of her Majeſty's Subjects; and deſired his Judges to intercede for him to her Majeſty, againſt whom, he ſaid, he had committed no Offence, nor againſt the State. He denied he had any Knowledge of the Books above mentioned, or any Acquaintance with the Writers of them: That, indeed, there was a Book of Penry's, that had been printed before at Oxford, and never called in, which he ſuffered to be printed at his Houſe, on Penry's Requeſt, in reſpect of the Want of Learning, he knew, to be in the Miniſtry; and for that, he thought, there were forty bad Men to one good Man, among the Clergy; yea, ſo bad, that he thought them not worthy to ſweep a Church; and he allowed, therefore, of this Book, for the Furtherance of God's Glory: That, however, the Preſs was not in his own Houſe, but in another, at the further End of the Town: That Walgrave afterwards deſired, he might remove his Preſs; and told him, that Cartwright had wrote a Book againſt the Jeſuits, which he was to print; concluding, that he hoped her Majeſty would forgive him, as ſhe had forgiven greater Offences.

Hales's Defence.

Mr. Hales acknowledged the Happineſs of the Nation, under her Majeſty's Adminiſtration; and diſclaimed his Knowledge of the Books, or the Authors: He ſaid, it was true, he had, at the Requeſt of his Uncle, Sir Richard, lent his Houſe to a poor Man; but knew not the Man, or his Intentions: That, indeed, he met Penry at Coventry, who gave him the Supplication to the Parliament, and told him, he would print Mr. Cartwright's Book againſt the Romiſh Teſtament: That he was privy there was a Preſs in the Houſe, but to nothing elſe.

Wickſtone's Defence, and his Wife's.

Wickſtone confeſſed, that at his Wife's Deſire, he had permitted the Printers to reſide at his Houſe; and Mrs. Wickſtone acknowledged, that her Zeal for the Reformation of the Church, cauſed her to entertain them, not thinking it could be hurtful, or dangerous, to the State; and whatever her Offence was, ſhe deſired her Huſband might not be puniſhed for it; ſince what he had done, was at her Requeſt.

The Queen's Counſel reply.

Then the Queen's Counſel replied, and ordered ſeveral Paſſages out of the above-mentioned printed Libels to be read; obſerving, that they tended no leſs to the Subverſion of the State, than the Eccleſiaſtical Government; and, indeed, of all Laws whatever, whether Eccleſiaſtical or Civil.

1588. 31 Eliz.

Paſſages cited out of the Libels.

Particularly that Paſſage, where Penry ſays, They would never give over, though the Spaniards were overthrown and diſcomfited by Famine and Hunger; yet the Lord would raiſe them up again, and make a week and feeble Generation to overthrow us.

In another Paſſage it is ſaid, That No Truth is to be found in our Parliaments, or Councils: That if the Government of the Sectaries was not received, thoſe of the Parliament-Houſe, or their Seed, ſhould never proſper, or bear Rule in England. And I (Penry) will never leave, till either this be performed; or that the Lord, in Vengeance and Blood, do plague and puniſh us.

In the Book, entitled, Have you any Work for the Cooper, it is affirmed, That Our Church Government is utterly unlawful; and although this Form of theirs might be inconvenient, in many Points, yet every Chriſtian was bound to receive their Paſtors, Doctors, Elders, and Deacons.

In Martin Junior, it is declared, to be unlawful to have any other Government, but theirs: That all human Laws, maintaining any other Forms, were ungodly, and not to be obeyed: That the Warrant that Biſhops have to maintain their Authority, is no better than that which did maintain the Stews: That Antichriſt was the Head of their Doctrine, and they Part of his Body.

In Martin Senior, They ſpeak reproachfully of the Common Prayer: Declare, that a hundred thouſand Hands would ſign to their Poſitions, and the Government they ſeek: That they are the Strength of the Land; and that it were no Policy to reject their Suit at ſuch a Time, when the Land was invaded.

The Books cenſured.

The Lords, having taken the Matter into their Conſideration, all agreed, That the Books were moſt leud, dangerous, ſeditious, and pernicious to the State; moſt ſcandalous, in reſpect to our Adverſaries the Papiſts, who took occaſion to ſerve their Intereſt by our Diſſentions. Mr. Vicechamberlain added, that they were ſlanderous to her Mejeſty; accuſing her of not ſupporting Religion, though ſhe had, in Defence of Religion, bravely defeated, both the Enemies of our Religion, and of the State, when the Sword of War was drawn againſt her.

And the Principles of the Sectaries.

That theſe Sectaries took away her Majeſty's Regal Power; diſinherited the Nobility and Gentry; took away all Property, and aboliſhed the reverend Eſtate, and Calling, of Biſhops, which were one of the three antient Eſtates of the Land; and thus they intended to pick out one Stone after another, till they pulled the whole Houſe upon their Heads.

Cenſure of the Priſoners.

That Sir Richard, who countenanced and encouraged theſe Libels, had been greatly favoured by the Queen, which aggravated his Crime: That ſome of the reſt pretended Ignorance; but Ignorance was no Excuſe, where it was wilful and malicious, and only affected, to avoid the Puniſhment of the Law: That it was ſtill a ſillier Anſwer of Mr. Wickſtone, to ſay, his Wife deſired him: A great Folly, to be ruled by her; and, not agreeable to the Modeſty of her Sex, for her to pretend to govern her Huſband.

1588. 31 Eliz.

The Lord Chancellor obſerved, that indeed the Priſoners were not the Deviſers, or Makers of theſe Books; for, if they had, they would have been proſecuted in another Place (capitally.) That the County of Northampton then ſwarmed with Sectaries; and in one Place a Preſbytery was planted among them, till one of the Brethren offending, whom they would have puniſhed, he fled to a Juſtice of Peace for Protection, whereby their Deſign of erecting Tribunals was diſcovered, and a Period put to their Dominion; and that they appeared to be ſo divided among themſelves, in ſome Places, that they were ready to riſe in Arms againſt each other, to the Diſturbance of the Government.

Sentenced to be fined, and impriſoned.

After which, all the Lords agreed in the following Sentence, viz. that Sir Richard ſhould be fined Two thouſand Pounds; Mr. Hales One thouſand Marks; Mr. Wickſtone, for obeying his Wife, and not diſcovering the Preſs, Five hundred Marks; Mrs. Wickſtone, One thouſand Pounds; and that all of them ſhould be impriſoned during her Majeſty's Pleaſure.

Remarks on the Trial of Knightly, &c.

Here we diſcover the Affection of the Puritans and Sectaries, for the Church of England, ſo early as the Reign of Queen Elizabeth. They were then conſpiring the Ruin of our Eccleſiaſtical Eſtabliſhment, and even the Deſtruction of the Queen and State, becauſe ſhe ſupported it, and would not ſubmit to their Plan of Government: And, notwithſtanding their Cries againſt Popery, were ready to join even the Spaniſh Armada againſt their Country; though they knew the avowed Deſign of the Spaniards, in the Year 1588. when they fitted out that prodigious Fleet, was to deſtroy the Proteſtant Religion, and re-eſtabliſh Popery; nay, to deſtroy entirely our civil Conſtitution, and make us Vaſſals to the Pope, or their own bigotted Monarch: Yet were the Puritans ready to join thoſe Enemies of our Nation and Religion, and actually endeavoured to foment Inſurrections, when their Fleet was upon the Coaſt, in order to favour their Deſcent; and all this, in hopes of eradicating the Church of England, and introducing their own wild Whimſies, and impracticable Schemes, in the room of it: And will the Church of England ever be ſuch Dupes, to admit their Succeſſors in Iniquity, Men of the ſame Principles, who have not only thus declared their Good-will, to the Eſtabliſhment, but have actually ſubverted both Monarchy and Epiſcopacy, when it was in their Power? Shall we, I ſay, ever admit ſuch Men into Power, and give them an Opportunity to inſult and ruin the State, as well as the Church again? Shall we make thoſe the Guardians of our Religion and Liberties, whoſe Intereſt it is to deſtroy both? Shall we, becauſe they have the Aſſurance to demand a Share in the Government, as their natural Right, be ſuch Fools and Naturals, to give them another Opportunity to deprive us of all our Rights and Properties? Can any one believe, after what we have ſeen, that they will even tolerate the Church of England, if they had the Power in their Hands? No: Nothing can be expected from the admitting the Diſſenters into the Adminiſtration, but the total Subverſion both of Church and State? We are now too well appriſed, what they mean by that terrible Word Perſecution. They declare, they ſhall always look upon themſelves to be in a perſecuted State, till we compliment them with the Power to extirpate our Antichriſtian Hierarchy, as they ſtile it; and that all Laws are impious, null, and void, that tend to keep the Saints out of the Adminiſtration. As to their ſtale Pretence, of being Friends to the preſent Royal Family, Infidels and Hereticks pretend the ſame. No doubt but they would be glad of any Aſſiſtance, to exalt them to the Dominion they aim at: But when this was once accompliſhed, they would tell us, all Things muſt ſubmit to their adored Idol, Preſbytery: And if the King would not obey their Dictates, he muſt expect to be anathematized, and depoſed, if not arraigned, and condemned, for High Treaſon, againſt theſe his ſovereign Subjects, as one of the beſt of his Predeceſſors was in the laſt Century.

1588. 31 Eliz.

I ſhall conclude theſe Remarks, with a Paſſage out of Camden, who relates, that, while the Nation was then ſtruggling with the Power of Spain, and defending itſelf from the formidable Attacks of the Papiſts, it was diſturbed by thoſe domeſtick Enemies, the Schiſmaticks, who loved to fiſh in troubled Waters. Never was there a Time, ſays that celebrated Hiſtorian, when the Diſcipline of the Church was run down, with that ſaucy Pertneſs; and the Authority of her Officers ſo rudely and baſely inſulted, on the Queen's refuſing to liſten to any Changes in Religion, or to encourage theſe new Modellers, who endeavoured to eſtabliſh their Geneva Platform, by loudly railing at the Engliſh Forms and Rites, rendring the Names of Biſhop and Prelate, as odious as they could to the common People: To which End, they daily publiſhed ſcurrilous Pamphlets againſt the Church, among which ſeveral went by the Name of Martin Mar-Prelate. The Authors whereof appeared rather to have learned their Language at Billingſgate, than to ſpeak the Senſe of any Chriſtian Community; for which, ſome of them were fined in the Star-Chamber, though, at the Interceſſion of the Archbiſhop, their Fines were remitted, and they were ſet at Liberty.

Camden's Account of theſe Puritanical Libellers.

They are pardoned.

In another Place, he ſays, Cartwright, and ſome of their Chiefs, were called before their Superiors; but with what a ſtrange Petulancy, and ſullen Haughtineſs, theſe Congregational Teachers managed themſelves, maugre all the Tenderneſs and prudent Forbearance of the Archbiſhop, I leave, ſays that Hiſtorian, to the Obſervation of Eccleſiaſtical Writers.

The Trial of the Earl of Arundel.

The Trial of PHILIP HOWARD Earl of Arundel, for High Treaſon, before the Earl of Derby Lord High Steward, and three and twenty other Peers, the 18th of April, 1589. 31 Eliz.

1589. 31 Eliz.

The Charge againſt him.

HE was charged with holding a Correſpondence with Cardinal Allen, an arch Traitor, that had ſolicited the Pope, and King of Spain, to invade the Realm. He was alſo charged with ſuggeſting, the Queen was an Heretick, and not fit to govern; and procuring one William Bennet, a ſeminary Prieſt, to ſay Maſs, for the Succeſs of the Spaniſh Armada, at which the Priſoner aſſiſted: That he had been reconciled to the Church of Rome, contrary to the Statute, which made it High Treaſon; and endeavoured to make his Eſcape over beyond Sea, in order to ſerve under the the Prince of Parma, againſt his Country; and that he was a Procurer of the late Bull againſt the Queen.

The Evidence.

To prove his praying for the Succeſs of the Spaniſh Fleet, the Depoſitions of Sir Thomas Gerrard, —— Shelley, and Bennet, the Prieſt, were read, who alſo confirmed their Evidence in Court. Walton alſo depoſed, that one Hill, a Dependant of the Priſoner's, brought over Letters to Rheims, in France, importing, that the Earl was to have been General of the Catholicks; and that the Tower was to have been ſeized.

His Defence.

To which the Earl anſwered, he had been a Priſoner in the Tower, four Years, and upwards, and ſick moſt Part of the Time: That he had been confeſſed by a Prieſt, but not reconciled to the Church of Rome: That there was no Proof of great Part of the Charge; and that the reſt was endeavoured to be proved by Perſons attainted, or Priſoners, who had confeſſed Crimes that rendered them incompetent Witneſſes.

He is convicted.

The Peers being withdrawn for an Hour, returned, and unanimouſly declared the Priſoner GUILTY: Whereupon the Lord High Steward pronounced Judgment of High Treaſon againſt him; but, after ſeveral Reprieves, he died a natural Death, in the Tower, Oct. 19. 1595. having been Priſoner there ten Years and ſix Months.

Condemned. Reprieved.

Remarks on the Earl of Arundel's Trial.

This Trial, alſo, is very imperfectly taken: However, from what we have, there does not ſeem to have been any formed Deſign againſt the State proved againſt this Lord: And there is ſcarce any Inſtance of the Queen's ſuffering any Perſon to be put to Death, purely on Account of Religion, or being reconciled to the Church of Rome; though this was High Treaſon by the Statute; and thus much was ſufficiently proved againſt the Priſoner.

Udall's Trial, for Felony. Refuſes to be examined by the Council.

1590. 31 Eliz.

IN January, 15$\frac{89}{90}$. Udall was examined before a Committee of Council, concerning a ſeditious Libel, entitled, The Demonſtration of Diſcipline, which Chriſt had preſcribed in his Word, for the Government of the Church; of which he was ſuppoſed to be the Author: But he would give no other Anſwer to the Queſtions propoſed, than that he was not obliged by Law to accuſe himſelf: Whereupon he was committed to the Gate-Houſe, till the following Summer Aſſizes, held at Croydon, for the County of Surrey, where he was indicted on the 23d of Eliz. Cap. 2. which made it Felony to write, or publiſh, any Book, or Writing, containing falſe, ſeditious, and ſcandalous Matter, to the Defamation of the Queen's Majeſty, or to the encouraging, ſtirring, or moving, any Inſurrection, or Rebellion; as this Book of the Priſoners was held to do, by reviling the Biſhops and Clergy, and inciting the People to promote the Subverſion of the eſtabliſhed Church, which was a Part of the Conſtitution; eſpecially as they were exhorted to bring this about by Force, if they could not otherwiſe accompliſh it.

Counſel denied. The Court refuſe to adviſe him.

The Priſoner being brought to the Bar, deſired he might have Counſel, which was denied him. Then he deſired the Court to inform him, how many of the Jury he might challenge by Law: To which it was anſwered, they ſate there to judge, and not to give him Counſel.

The Charge opened, and enforced.

The Queen's Counſel, in opening the Indictment, charged the Priſoner with Blaſphemy; and obſerved, that he, and his Sect, aſſumed an Authority, even over her Majeſty; and that he was an intimate Acquaintance of Penry, a ſeditious Puritan Preacher, Author of a Libel, entitled, Martin Mar-Prelate: And it was urged againſt him, that her Majeſty, being the ſupreme Governor of all Perſons, and Cauſes, and having eſtabliſhed that Government by Biſhops, which the Priſoner arraigned; his ſtirring up the People againſt the Epiſcopal Government, was ſtirring them up againſt her Majeſty, by whoſe Authority they exerciſed their Juriſdiction; obſerving, that he, who pretended to be a Preacher of Peace, ſhould have learned not to have railed on the Rulers of the People, and threatened them with Force and Violence, which all the Judges had reſolved was Felony by the ſaid Statute of the 23d of Eliz.

Depoſitions produced as Evidence.

Then the Evidence was produced; and firſt, the Depoſition of Stephen Chatfield was read; importing, that he ſaw certain Papers in the Priſoner's Study, at Kingſton, of the like Tenor with the Priſoner's Book; and that, talking with Udall of his being ſilenced, he ſaid, he would give the Biſhops ſuch a Blow, as they never had.

His Examination read.

The Priſoner's Examination alſo was read: Wherein he ſaid, that if the Biſhops put him to Silence, they would give him Occaſion and Leiſure to be employed in writing againſt them. The Depoſition of Nicholas Tompkins alſo was read, who teſtified, that the Priſoner told him, he was the Author of the Book, called, The Demonſtration; and that he had ſeen it in the Catalogue of his Books.

An Offer made, if he would deny his being the Author, he ſhould be acquitted.

Then the Court offered him, if he would take his Oath, that he did not make the Book, he ſhould be acquitted: Nay, if he would ſay, upon his Honeſty, he did not make it, they would believe him; which the Priſoner refuſing, it was urged as a full Proof, that he was the Author of it: And the Jury were told by the Court, they were not to enquire, whether the Priſoner was guilty of Felony, but whether he was the Author of the Book: For all the Judges had already reſolved, that whoever was the Author of the Book, was guilty of Felony, by the Statute.

Directions to the Jury.

His Defence.

The Priſoner entering on his Defence, ſaid, as to the Witneſſes Teſtimony, that they had ſeen Papers of the ſame Tenor in his Study; This was no Evidence againſt him, unleſs they had recited the Words. He alſo objected, that Depoſitions ought not to be read againſt him, in a Capital Caſe, but the Witneſſes produced to his Face; much leſs ought the Evidence of what another had ſaid, be admitted: And the Priſoner offered to bring Witneſſes, to ſhew that the Witneſſes againſt him had contradicted themſelves: But he was not ſuffered to produce any Witneſſes in his Behalf, againſt the Crown.

Depoſitions no Evidence.

Not ſuffered to call his Witneſſes.

Then he inſiſted, that the Statute of the 23d of Eliz. was made againſt Papiſts, who ſlandered the Queen as an Heretick, and not againſt the Puritans; and urged, that the writing his Book, could not be Felony, unleſs it had been written with a malicious Intent: And that they taught the People to yield Obedience to her Majeſty, and the Religion received in her Dominions. The moſt the Author could be charged with, he ſaid, was too much Vehemency againſt Abuſes. To bring him within the Danger of that Statute alſo, the Matter muſt be falſe: But this Book, he affirmed, was written in Behalf of a moſt true Cauſe: And, laſtly, that the End muſt be, the defaming her Majeſty, or ſtirring up Rebellion; neither of which could be proved againſt this Author, or his Party; appealing to the Court, if it was their Opinion, that the Statute was made againſt Puritans.

Juſtifies the Book.

The Court tell him, the reſiſting the Eccleſiaſtical Government, was reſiſting the Queen.

It was anſwered; that the Intent of the Statute was againſt all Offenders; and he could not deny his having written it, with a malicious Intent, againſt the Biſhops, and the Eccleſiaſtical Government, which was eſtabliſhed by the Laws and Statutes of the Realm, as well as the Civil Government; and that the Biſhops exerciſing their Juriſdiction by the Queen's Authority, who was ſupreme in all Cauſes, Eccleſiaſtical and Civil, in oppoſing their Government, he oppoſed the Queen; and that when he wrote againſt them, he wrote againſt the State: And where he ſaid, it was more eaſy to live in England a Papiſt, an Anabaptiſt, or of the Family of Love, than a Puritan, what did he but revile the Queen's Adminiſtration, who was the ſupreme Governor of the Realm?

He inſiſts, that oppoſing the Biſhops, was not oppoſing the Queen.

To which Udall replied, this was not ſpoken by the Author, in reſpect of her Majeſty's Government and Laws; but in reſpect of the Biſhops, whom their Lordſhips knew to be wholly employed in finding them out, and puniſhing them, not regarding, in a manner, the puniſhing of any Thing elſe. The Book touched only the Corruptions of the Biſhops, and not the Perſon of her Majeſty.

To which it was again anſwered; that, her Majeſty being the ſupreme Governor of all Perſons and Cauſes, and having eſtabliſhed that Government by Biſhops, which he and his Party oppoſed, they oppoſed her Majeſty, rather than the Biſhops, who could not alter the Eccleſiaſtical Laws the Queen had made for them to act by.

Then the Priſoner proceeded in his Defence, and ſaid, that they held it unlawful for a Miniſter to be a Civil Magiſtrate: And, if the Queen made them ſo, they ought not to accept ſuch Employments.

Paſſages in his Book cited againſt him.

The Court obſerved to him hereupon, that there was a Paſſage in his Book, where he ſays, This Saying will not ſerve their Turn, the Queen and Council will have it ſo: Which could be levelled only againſt the Queen and State. Another Paſſage alſo was cited, wherein it is ſaid, They are not ſafe, though they have human Authority on their Side: For he that is on our Side, is mightier than they: Which the Court interpreted, a reviling her Majeſty, and threatening her with Force and Violence.

To this Udall replied; it was true, whoever did unjuſtly, was not ſafe, though all the Powers in the World defended him in it: But they had no Thoughts of uſing Force or Violence.

He is convicted.

Then the Court adjourning, the Jury, in the Afternoon, brought the Priſoner in Guilty of Felony.

Sentence reſpited on his Submiſſion.

The next Day, being the 25th of July, the Priſoner was called to Judgment; when the Court informed him, that, if he would acknowledge his Offence, they would endeavour to obtain his Pardon. To which he anſwered, he would ſubmit himſelf to her Majeſty; but could not forſake the Cauſe, which he held to be the undoubted Truth of God.

The Judge replied, I hold your Doctrine to be an undoubted Falſhood: And if the Preſbytery, you ſeek for, were once eſtabliſhed, it would overturn the Government: And you tell us in your Book, if you cannot have your Diſcipline with her Majeſty's Conſent, you will have it, though you make our Hearts ake: You will bring the Queen and the Crown under your Girdles. Some of you have gone ſo far as to ſay, we have no Church, no Sacraments, no Miniſters, nor any Worſhip o God among us. What Confuſion muſt this create, if not looked to in Time?

He relapſes. Sentence paſſed.

At length Udall promiſed, he would ſubmit himſelf to her Majeſty: Whereupon Sentence was deferred, and he petitioned the Queen for a Pardon: But relapſing into his former Obſtinacy, Sentence was pronounced againſt him the next Lent Aſſizes. While he lay under Sentence of Death, he petitioned her Majeſty again; and King James, of Scotland, was pleaſed to intercede in his Behalf: And the Queen referring the Matter to Archbiſhop Whitgift, his Grace conſented to his Enlargement, on Condition he would leave the Kingdom.

He is ſet at Liberty.

Remarks on Udal's Trial.

It ſeems a little hard upon the Priſoner, that, when the Court denied him Counſel, they would not inform him, how many of the Jury he might challenge. The reading the Depoſitions of Witneſſes againſt him, and the denying to examine his own Witneſſes, were ſtill greater Hardſhips: But in this he had the ſame Uſage as other Priſoners in thoſe Days had. The Duke of Norfolk had no better Treatment: Nothing was permitted to be offered that made for the Priſoner, and againſt the Crown, as they termed it; which was certainly very high Injuſtice, notwithſtanding it was then the general Practice: And the ſucceeding Age ſeemed to be aſhamed of it; though it was not till after the Revolution, that the Priſoner's Witneſſes were allowed to be ſworn, and conſequently very little Credit was given to them.

Now, indeed, the Priſoner, has all the fair Play he can deſire: No Depoſitions are read againſt him in Capital Caſes, where the Witneſs can be produced; and he may have the Proceſs of the Court, to bring in his Witneſſes; though ſtill no Counſel is allowed in Felony: And, if the Proof be ſufficient to ſatisfy the Jury, two Witneſſes are not required, to convict a Perſon of Felony.

As to the Charge the Court gave the Jury, to find the Priſoner Author of the Book, and leave the Law to them: This was no more than ordering them to give a ſpecial Verdict, which is ſometimes done to this Day: But the Jury may, if they think fit, take the Law, as well as the Fact, upon themſelves, and find, generally, Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Some are apt to think, the Law was ſtretched; and that the Priſoner had hard Uſage, in being indicted on the 23d of Eliz. which made it Felony to revile the Queen, and incite the People to Rebellion; inſinuating, that the abuſing the Biſhops, the oppoſing the Eccleſiaſtical Laws, and threatening, by Force, to ſubvert the Church, did not bring him within the Danger of that Statute: But, as it appears to have been reſolved by all the Judges of England, that theſe Things were Felony by that Statute; and that the inciting the People, to deſtroy the Eccleſiaſtical Government, which was a Part of the Conſtitution, was as criminal, as if he had incited them to oppoſe her Majeſty's Civil Government, ſhe being ſupreme in all Cauſes, Eccleſiaſtical and Civil, the Law does not ſeem to have been much ſtrained in this Caſe. Was a Party of Men, in Scotland, to preach againſt the Kirk, and incite the People to deſtroy the Preſbyterian Diſcipline there, at this Day, I queſtion whether it would not be deemed Treaſon againſt their Conſtitution. They would inſiſt, that their Kirk was Part of the Eſtabliſhment; and that it was no leſs Penal to deſtroy their Eccleſiaſtical than Civil Government. However, notwithſtanding the Miniſtry thought fit to proſecute this turbulent Preacher, for his ſeditious Diſcourſes and Writings, to deter others from the like Attempts, we find he was very mercifully dealt with at laſt, and ſuffered no other Puniſhment, than a few Months Impriſonment.

Perrot's Trial.

The Trial of Sir JOHN PERROT, late Lord Deputy of Ireland, for High Treaſon, before Commiſſioners of Oyer and Terminer, at Weſtminſter, the 27th of April, 1592. 34 Eliz.

1592. 34 Eliz.

Two Indictments for the ſame Species of Treaſon.

THERE were two Indictments preferred againſt him: The firſt Indictment charged him with High Treaſon, in compaſſing and imagining the Death and Deſtruction of the Queen: And to that End, with correſponding with the King of Spain, and ſeveral Traitors there, to procure an Invaſion of the Kingdoms of England and Ireland; and with inciting and encouraging ſeveral Traitors and Rebels at Home, to raiſe an Inſurrection in Ireland.

The ſecond Indictment alſo charged him with High Treaſon, in compaſſing the Death of the Queen; and to that End, correſponding with the Duke of Parma, and adviſing with Sir William Stanley, a Rebel to the Queen, concerning his traiterous Purpoſes.

The Evidence.

The firſt Part of the Evidence charged Sir John, with ſeveral diſreſpectful Speeches of her Majeſty; from whence the Queen's Counſel inferred the Treaſon of his Heart: Particularly, it was teſtified, that, when the Queen ſent him Orders to Dublin, he ſaid in Council, Stick not ſo much upon the Queen's Letters of Command, for ſhe may command what ſhe will, but we will do what we liſt: That the Queen ſending him her Orders, to make Mr. Errington a Clerk of the Exchequer, he ſaid, This fidling Woman troubles me out of Meaſure; God's Wounds, he ſhall not have the Office, I will give it to Sir Thomas Williams: That the Queen adviſing him, in her Letters, to look well to his Charge, at the Time of the Spaniſh Invaſion, he ſaid, Ah, ſilly Woman! Now ſhe ſhall not curb me: She ſhall not rule me. Now, God's Lady dear, I ſhall be her white Boy now again. Doth ſhe think to rule me now? That John Garland bringing him a Letter from the Queen, that vexed him, he ſaid, God's Wounds, this it is to ſerve a baſe Baſtard, piſs-kitchin Woman. If I had

1592. 34 Eliz. ſerved any Prince in Chriſtendom, I had not been ſo dealt withal.

To ſhew that he had been guilty of direct Treaſon, Witneſs were brought, to prove that he had harboured and protected Traitors. The principal Witneſſes whereof was one Dennis, an Iriſh Prieſt. Dennis alſo depoſed, that Sir John gave him Letters to the King of Spain, to invite him to invade the Kingdoms of England and Ireland; ſtipulating for himſelf, that if his Catholick Majeſty ſucceeded, he (Sir John) might be made Sovereign of Wales; and that Sir John gave the Deponent fifty Pounds.

Other Witneſſes teſtified, that Sir John correſponded with the Duke of Parma; and with Sir William Stanley, when he was in actual Rebellion.

Sir John's Defence.

Sir John's Defence conſiſted chiefly in Proteſtations of his Innocence, and Declarations of his Loyalty; or of Exceptions to the Witneſſes, who were either his Enemies, he obſerved, or perjured Iriſh Villains, of no Conſcience, or Character; particularly Dennis, the Prieſt, he ſaid, had changed his Religion five Times in ſix Years; had counterfeited his Hand ſeveral Times; was a common Drunkard, and a Liar; and had been perjured a thouſand Times. Sir John acknowledged, indeed, that he was paſſionate, and might have been guilty of haſty Speeches; but that he ſerved her Majeſty faithfully; particularly in that Year of Danger, 1588. And it was not likely, afterwards, he ſhould promote Invaſions and Inſurrections in her Kingdoms. However, there being ſeveral Miniſters of State upon the Bench, particularly, the Lord Chamberlain, the Lord Buckhurſt, and Sir Robert Cecil, who laboured to get him convicted, the Jury found him GUILTY; and he was condemned as a Traitor. But he was reprieved from Time to Time, and died, at length, a natural Death in the Tower; when the Queen, as it is ſaid, was about to have granted him a full Pardon.

He is convicted.

Remarks on Perrot's Trial.

Here we have an Inſtance of the Danger of being too free with the Characters of Princes; and, how eaſy is it, where a Court gives any Encouragement to the Suggeſtions of a Great Man's Enemies, to get him condemned, as guilty of the moſt heinous Offences. There is little Room to doubt, but that Sir John Perrot had, in the main, been true to his Truſt. It is not to be ſuppoſed, the Queen would have made him Governor of Ireland, in the moſt dangerous Times, if ſhe had ſuſpected his Integrity; and there muſt have appeared a great deal more againſt him, at his Trial, if he had been in a Conſpiracy to bring in the Spaniard.

Probably, when he found himſelf at a Diſtance from the Court of England, he might be guilty of ſome Indiſcretions, and aſſume a more arbitrary Power than his Commiſſion would juſtify; and, by his own Confeſſion, he ſeems to have been guilty of ſome raſh and diſreſpectful Speeches of the Queen; for which, we ſee, ſhe found an Opportunity to humble him: But, probably, never deſigned to take his Life; eſpecially, if it be conſidered, that ſhe reſtored his Eſtate, which was a great one, to his Son, after his Death.

What could be the Reaſon of preferring two Indictments againſt Sir John, for the ſame Species of Treaſon, is not eaſy to be conceived, unleſs it was to add the greater Terror to the Proſecution; and, at laſt, I do not perceive, that the Jury gave more than one Verdict, or took any Notice, there was more than one Indictment. But in theſe old Trials, which ſeem to be taken at random, by People of very little Judgment, we muſt be content with ſuch Lights as they could give us. When we come nearer our own Times, we meet with them more perfect.

1600. Earl Gowrie's Attainder.

The Attainder, in the Parliament of Scotland, of JOHN late Earl of Gowrie; ALEXANDER RUTHUEN his Brother; HENRY RUTHUEN, HUGH MONCREIF, and PETER EVIOT, their Accomplices, for High-Treaſon, the 15th of November, 1600.

1600.

THE Subſtance of the Depoſitions of the Witneſſes, examined before the Lords of the Articles, (a Committee that prepares Matters for the Parliament) is as follows:

Depoſitions of the Witneſſes.

The Duke of Lenox depoſed, that he attended his Majeſty to the Chaſe, on the fifth Day of Auguſt then laſt paſt, together with Alexander Ruthuen, Brother to Earl Gowrie, and others: And that, having killed a Buck, Alexander invited his Majeſty to dine with his Brother, the ſaid Earl, at Perth (or St. John's Town); and, to induce his Majeſty to go thither, acquainted him, that a certain Perſon there, had found a Pitcher full of Gold, of various Coins; but deſired, he would take none of his Attendants with him; which creating ſome Suſpicion in his Majeſty, he deſired the Duke to follow him wherever he went with the ſaid Alexander, and not to leave him.

That, when they came near Perth, Earl Gowrie, accompanied by divers Perſons, met his Majeſty on Foot, and conducted the King to his Houſe; and, that the Earl of Mar, Sir Thomas Ereſkin, and ſeveral other Noblemen and Gentlemen, followed his Majeſty into Earl Gowrie's Hall: That, the King going to Dinner in another Room, the Deponent (the Duke) and the reſt of the Court, afterwards ſet down to Dinner in the Hall; and Earl Gowrie came to them, and ſaid, his Majeſty deſired they would drink his Health; and, as ſoon as they had drank, he (the Duke) got up, and went to find

1600. out his Majeſty; but the Earl told the Company, the King was gone to repoſe himſelf; and led them into the Garden, where Mr. Thomas Cranſtoun came to them, and ſaid, the King was on Horſeback: Whereupon Earl Gowrie called, to Horſe, and they came to the Fore-gate, and the Porter telling them, his Majeſty was not paſſed that Way, Earl Gowrie aſſured them, he was gone out at the Back-Gate: Whereupon the Company paſſed through the Foregate; and, while they were ſtanding before it, debating which Way the King was gone, he (the Duke) heard a Voice, and ſaid to the Earl of Mar, This is the King's Voice that cries, be where it will; and ſo they all looked up to the Lodging, and ſaw his Majeſty look forth of the Window without his Hat; his Face red, and a Hand griping his Cheek and Mouth; and the King cried out, Murder! Treaſon! my Lord Mar, help, help! And immediately the Lord Mar and the Company, ran up the Stairs of the Gallery-Chamber, where his Majeſty was, to relieve him, but found the Door faſt; and, notwithſtanding they got large Hammers to break it open, they did not enter the Chamber, till Earl Gowrie and his Brother were both ſlain.

The Earl of Mar's Depoſition was of the ſame Tenor as that of the Duke of Lenox's.

Andrew Henderſon, Chamberlain of Schoon, depoſed, that on Monday Night, the 4th of Auguſt then laſt paſt, being in Company with Earl Gowrie and Mr. Alexander Ruthuen, within the Earl's own Chamber, the Earl ordered the Deponent to ride with his Brother Alexander to Falkland, at four the next Morning, and take Andrew Ruthuen with him; and, that he (the Deponent) ſhould haſten back with his Brother's Orders, leaving Andrew Ruthuen with them; and, that they all went to Falkland together, where they met with his Majeſty: That Mr. Alexander thereupon ordered the Deponent to ride back to Perth, to his Brother the Earl, and acquaint him, that his Majeſty would be there with a few People, and that a Dinner ſhould be prepared for him: That, when he arrived at Perth, the Earl enquired, privately, of the Deponent, how his Brother was received by the King, and what Number of People his Majeſty brought with him: And bid him (the Deponent) put on his Secret (his Armour under his Cloaths) for he had a Highland Man to take; and that he accordingly did put on his Secret: That the Earl alſo ordered him to ſend for his (the Earl's) Steel Bonnet and Gantlet; and that afterwards, his Majeſty, the Duke of Lenox, and the Earl of Mar, with ſeveral other Noblemen and Gentlemen, came to Earl Gowrie's Houſe in Perth: That the Earl, Alexander Ruthuen, and the Deponent, being in the outer Chamber, where the King dined, Earl Gowrie ſpoke to him (the Deponent) privately, and bid him do what his Brother ordered him; and then locked him in the Room; where he had not remained above half an Hour, when Alexander Ruthuen opened the Door, and entered the Room, dragging in the King by the Arm: That then he put his Hat on his Head, and and drawing out the Deponent's Sword, ſaid to his Majeſty, Sir, you muſt be my Priſoner: Remember on my Father's Death: And, as he held the Sword to the King's Breaſt, his Majeſty being about to ſpeak, Alexander ſaid, Hold your Tongue, Sir, or, by Chriſt, you ſhall die; and his Majeſty anſwered, Mr. Alexander, ye and I were very great together; and as touching your Father's Death, Man, I was a Minor: My Council might have done any Thing they pleaſed. And farther, Man, albeit ye bereave me of my Life, ye will not be King of Scotland; for I have both Sons and Daughters; and there are Men in this Town, and Friends, that will not leave it unrevenged: That, while Alxander Ruthuen held the Sword at the King's Breaſt, the Deponent wrenched it out of his Hand; and Alexander ſaid, It was not his Life, or his Blood, that he craved; and the King anſwering, What is it you crave Man, if you crave not my Life? Alexander replied, It is but a Promiſe; and my Lord my Brother will tell you: Then the King ſaid, fetch your Brother; which Alexander ſaid he would, provided the King would not cry out, or open the Window, till he came again; and the King promiſed he would not: Then Alexander went out, and locked the Door after him: Whereupon the King ſaid to the Deponent, How came you here, Man? and he anſwered, As God lives, I am ſhut in here like a Dog. Then the King ſaid, Will my Lord Gowrie do me any Evil, Man? and the Deponent anſwered, I vow to God I will die firſt; and the King bidding the Deponent open the Window, Alexander Ruthuen came in again, and ſaid to his Majeſty, By God there is no Remedy, endeavouring to bind his Hands with a Garter: Whereupon the King ſaid, I am a free Prince, Man, I will not be bound, and thereupon he got his Hand away; and the Deponent took the Garter from Alexander, who then threw his Left Arm about the King's Neck, and thruſt his Right Fiſt to his Mouth: Whereupon, the Deponent having opened the Window, his Majeſty cried out Treaſon, Treaſon! and Alexander ſaid to the Deponent, Am I to have no Help from thee? Thou Villain! we all die; and laying his Hand on his Sword, the King ſtayed his Hands, and prevented his drawing of it; and, in the mean Time, the Deponent opened the Door, and let the King's Servants in; and John Ramſay, entering firſt, laid about him with his Sword; but the Deponent made his Eſcape into the Yard, where he ſaw Earl Gowrie with his Head-piece on, and his two drawn Swords in his Hands, accompanied by ſeveral Perſons; but the Deponent went home to his own Houſe, and told his Wife, if he had not been at the Earl's, the King had been ſtabbed twice that that Night. 1600.

The Abbot of Inchechaffrey depoſed, that, on the 5th of Auguſt laſt, ſtanding before Earl Gowrie's Gate, in Perth, with the Duke of Lenox, and the reſt of the Company above-mentioned, they heard a Voice, and ſaw his Majeſty looking out of a Window, without his Hat, his Face red, and crying, Fy, Help, my Lord Mar! Treaſon! Treaſon! I am murder'd! That, in an Inſtant, they perceived, he was pulled by Force from the Window; and that they thereupon ran up into the Gallery, to reſcue his Majeſty, as the Duke of Lenox and the Earl of Mar had depoſed.

1600. The Abbot of Lindores confirmed the Duke of Lenox's Depoſition; and depoſed further, That, after Dinner, it being given out, that his Majeſty was departed towards Falkland, and they were come down to the Gate, the Porter aſſured them, his Majeſty was not paſſed forth; and Earl Gowrie affirming, he was gone out at the Back-gate, the Porter ſaid, That cannot be, my Lord, for I have the Key of the Back-gate; and his Majeſty crying out of the Window, Treaſon! Treaſon! &c. ſoon after, this Deponent ſaw James Ereſkin, and Sir Thomas Ereſkin, lay Hands upon Earl Gowrie, ſaying, Traytor! this is thy Deed, and thou ſhalt die: But Earl Gowrie's Men reſcued him from them; and the Earl with two drawn Swords, and accompanied by thirty Perſons, ran into the Houſe where his Majeſty was.

Sir Thomas Ereſkin confirmed Lindores's Depoſition; and added, That, Sir John Ramſay calling upon them, to come up and aſſiſt his Majeſty, they ran up; and, meeting Alexander Ruthuen, all bloody, they ſaid, This is the Traitor, and fell upon him, and killed him; and, that they afterwards entered the Chamber, where they ſaw only the King, and Sir John Ramſay; but that, ſoon after, Thomas Cranſtoun, followed by the Lord Gowrie, and ſeveral more, entered the Room, with their Swords drawn, and fought with the King's Friends, till Sir John Ramſay gave Earl Gowrie a mortal Wound; and, upon his falling, Cranſtoun, and the reſt of Gowrie's Party, fled.

Sir John Ramſay depoſed, That, hearing his Majeſty cry out, he run up to the Chamber, burſt open one of the Doors, and ſaw the King, and Alexander Ruthuen, ſtruggling together: He thought his Majeſty had Alexander's Head under his Arm; and that Alexander, who was almoſt down on his Knees, had his Hand upon his Majeſty's Mouth: That his Majeſty, ſeeing the Deponent, cried, Fy! ſtrike him, he has Armour on; and the Deponent, thereupon, ſtriking Alexander with his Sword, the King ſhoved him out of the Door, down the Stairs; after which, the Deponent called out of the Window to Sir Thomas Ereſkin, and the reſt of the King's Servants, who came up: The reſt of his Depoſition confirmed that of Sir Thomas Ereſkin.

John Graham confirmed the Depoſition of the Duke of Lenox, and the Earl of Mar; adding, That, as he was at Dinner in the Hall, with the reſt of the Company, he ſaw the King, and Alexander Ruthuen, paſs through the Hall towards the Gallery; and as this Deponent, John Hamilton, and others, were following, Alexander cried back, Gentlemen, ſtay, for ſo is his Highneſs's Will.

Andrew Roy, one of the Baillies of Perth, depoſed, That he dined with the Company in Earl Gowrie's Hall, the 5th of Auguſt; and that, ſtanding with the reſt before the Gate afterwards, and hearing the King cry out Murder, Treaſon, &c. he raiſed the Town, to reſcue his Majeſty, and the Multitude aſſembled about Earl Gowrie's Houſe; but, the Encounter being over, his Majeſty ordered them to diſperſe: However, it was ſome time before the People would be pacified, their Provoſt, Earl Gowrie, being killed.

Robert Chriſtie, Porter to the late Earl Gowrie, depoſed, That on the 5th of Auguſt, the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Mar, and his Maſter, coming after Dinner to the Gate, my Lord Duke aſked, if his Majeſty had paſſed the Cloſe; to which the Deponent anſwering, He had not, Earl Gowrie was angry, and ſaid, he lied, he was gone out at the Backgate; to which the Deponent anſwered, That cannot be, my Lord, for I have the Key; and afterwards he ſaw his Majeſty looking out of the Window, and heard him cry Treaſon! Treaſon! Help, Lord Mar! Whereupon the Duke, the Earl of Mar, and the reſt, ran up Stairs to the Gallery; and that Earl Gowrie coming from the Street, with a Steel Helmet on his Head, and two naked Swords in his Hands, accompanied by Alexander and Harry Ruthuen, Patrick Eviot, Hugh Moncrief, and Thomas Cranſtoun, all with drawn Swords, ran into the Houſe alſo; but what was done there, he knew not. 1600.

Alexander Blair depoſed, That on the ſaid 5th of Auguſt, he ſaw Alexander and Harry Ruthuen, and Hugh Moncrief, come down the little Stair-Caſe, where they and Lord Gowrie went up with naked Swords in their Hands.

William Reynd depoſed, That on the ſaid 5th of Auguſt, he ſaw, within Earl Gowrie's Cloſe, after the Fray, Patrick Eviot, and Hugh Moncrief, both bloody, with their naked Swords in their Hands.

Thomas Burrell, Burgeſs of Perth, depoſed, That on the ſaid 5th of Auguſt, at the Time of the Fray, entering Earl Gowrie's Cloſe, he ſaw there, with drawn Swords, Alexander and Harry Ruthuen, and Hugh Moncrief bloody in his Face; that, at the ſame Time, he ſaw Thomas Cranſtoun come down the Back-Stairs, and took his Sword out of his Hand; and he heard Alexander Ruthuen cry out, for Fire and Powder.

Robert Brown, one of his Majeſty's Servants, confirmed the Depoſitions of the Duke of Lenox; and the Earl of Mar, adding, that he followed them to the Room where his Majeſty was, up the Stair-Caſe; and at his firſt Entry he ſaw Earl Gowrie lie dead; and there were at that Time with his Majeſty, Sir John Ereſkin, Sir Hugh Herries, Sir John Ramſay, and George Wilſon.

Theſe Depoſitions were confirmed by ſeveral more of the like Tenor.

Sentence, to forfeit their Lands and Honours, as Traitors.

The Parliament, thereupon, decreed and declared, that the ſaid Earl Gowrie, and Alexander Ruthuen his Brother, were guilty of open and manifeſt Treaſon; and thereupon adjudged, that their Lands, Eſtates, and Honours, ſhould be forfeited.

The like Sentence paſſed againſt Alexander and Harry Ruthuen, Sons of the late Alexander Ruthuen, Hugh Moncrief, Brother to William Moncrief, and Patrick Eviot, Brother to Colin Eviot of Balhouſie.

Several Acts paſſed againſt the Ruthuens.

An Act alſo was made, to diſinherit the Brethren, and all the Poſterity of Earl Gowrie, from enjoying any Heritage, Place, or Office, in Scotland; and forbidding all Perſons to move or interceed for them, upon High P ins.

By another Act, the Surname of Ruthuen was extinguiſhed; and ſuch of them as were innocent of this Treaſon, were ordered to take other Names.

By

1600. By a third Act, the 5th of Auguſt was appointed to be kept as a Thankſgiving annually, for the King's Deliverance: And by a 4th Act, the Lands and Eſtate of Ruthuen were annexed to the Crown; and by ſeveral other Acts Sir Thomas Ereskin, afterwards Earl of Kelly, Sir John Ramſay, Sir Hugh Herris, and the reſt, who were more immediately concerned in the King's Preſervation, had Rewards conferred upon them by Parliament.

Remarks on Gowrie's Conſpiracy.

The Reaſon of Compiling theſe Proceedings with the State Trials, I preſume, was, to acquaint us with the Loyalty of the Scotch Preſbyterians, who made it a common Practice, at the Time of the Reformation, to impriſon their Princes, and threaten to depoſe and put them to Death, whenever they refuſed to ſubmit to their Dictates: Thus they treated both James VI. and his Mother, Queen Mary; and none were more active and zealous, in theſe treaſonable Attempts and Uſurpations, than the Family of the Ruthuen's, deemed the Chiefs of the Fanatick Faction.

In the Year 1582. William Ruthuen, whom King James VI. had lately created Earl Gowrie, with the Earls of Mar, and Lindſay, and ſeveral other Lords of the Faction, ſeized on his Majeſty's Perſon, then about ſixteen Years of Age; made the Earl of Arran, his prime Miniſter, Priſoner, and compelled the Duke of Lenox, the Regent, to fly the Kingdom: After which they ſummoned and packed an Aſſembly of the States; where they compelled the Minor King to approve their Proceedings. Of which, Camden relates, that even Buchanan declared his Abhorence.

The King having diſengaged himſelf, and got out of the Power of the diſaffected Lords, offered them a Pardon; which they were ſo far from accepting, that they entered into another Conſpiracy, to ſeize his Perſon: Whereupon they were commanded to depart the Realm; and ſeveral of them went to Ireland, the Low-Countries, and France; but Earl Gowrie endeavoured to conceal himſelf in the Country. And now, the King having aſſembled a free Convention, the ſeizing of his Perſon was declared to be a treaſonable Act; while the Preſbyterian Clergy, on the other Hand, being convocated, by their own Authority, decreed the ſeizing of the King to be juſt; and declared, that thoſe, who did not approve of it, deſerved to be excommunicated.

In the mean Time, the exiled Lords, having concerted Meaſures with Earl Gowrie, returned on a ſudden to Scotland, in the Beginning of the Year 1584. and ſuprized the Town and Caſtle of Sterling: But the Miniſtry having ſome Intimation of the Plot, and making Earl Gowrie Priſoner, the reſt of the diſaffected Lords were defeated, and forced to fly their Country again; and Earl Gowrie, being brought to his Trial, for this third Conſpiracy againſt the King and Government, for making War on his Majeſty, and ſeizing the Fortreſſes of Sterling and Perth, was convicted, condemned, and beheaded, the ſame Day; for the Miniſtry were ſo well apprized of his Majeſty's merciful Diſpoſition, that they knew he would pardon the Earl again, if they did not diſpatch him, before the King had notice of his Condemnation; though his repeated Conſpiracy againſt the Government, made his Death in a Manner neceſſary. 1600.

His Majeſty did not only expreſs his Diſlike, of this haſty Execution, afterwards; but reſtored John, the late Earl's eldeſt Son, to his Honours and Eſtate; made his Brother Alexander one of the Gentlemen of his Bedchamber; and their Siſter was a Maid of Honour to the Queen. But the Fathers of the Preſbyterian Faction had ſo inſpired them with a Spirit of Revenge, that no Careſſes, or kind Uſage, could make any Impreſſion on the two Brothers. Their Father, indeed, was executed in the King's Minority, and, evidently, without his Conſent: Yet, as it was tranſacted in his Reign, they were taught, that it argued an ignoble and puſillanimous Spirit, not to revenge it on the King; and, thus, fourteen Years after their Father's Death, we find, they conſpired to ſeize, and murder his Majeſty, in the Manner above-related; and, as Rapin, himſelf, obſerves, Vol. 9. p. 195. of the Octavo Tranſlation, his Eſcape was, in a Manner, miraculous: But let us ſee, how the Preſbyterian Clergy behaved themſelves on this Diſappointment.

The Behaviour of the Preſbyterian Clergy on this Conſpiracy.

Archbiſhop Spotſwood relates, that the News of this laſt Attempt on the King's Perſon, at Perth, being brought to Edinburgh, the Privy-Council ordered the Miniſters of the Town, to call their Pariſhioners to Church, and return God Thanks for his Majeſty's Deliverance; but they endeavoured to excuſe themſelves, as not being acquainted with the Particulars of what had happened. To take off which Pretence, it was anſwered, An exact Information of every Circumſtance was not neceſſary: Their Buſineſs was only to ſignify, the King had eſcaped a great Danger, and exhort the People, to thank God for ſo merciful a Providence. To which they replyed, That nothing ought to be delivered from the Pulpit, without preciſe Certainty of the Truth; and, that every Thing mentioned in that Place, ſhould be ſpoken in Faith. And, when no Arguments could move them to do their Duty, the Council went in Proceſſion to the Market-Croſs; where the Biſhop of Roſs gave a Narrative of the Conſpiracy, and cloſed his Diſcourſe with a Thankſgiving. The next Week, when the King came to Edinburgh, there was a Sermon, on the Occaſion, preached by Mr. Patrick Galloway; and in November following, when the Parliament met, the Act above-mentioned was made, for obſerving the 5th of Auguſt, annually, as a Day of Thankſgiving; and thoſe Miniſters, who refuſed to ſolemnize it in Edinburgh, were ordered to depart the Town within eight-and-forty Hours, and not to preach, under Pain of Death, in his Majeſty's Dominions: Whereupon three of their Number, viz. Balcanqual, Watſon, and Hall, thought fit to reconcile themſelves to the Government, and declare, They were fully convinced of the Truth of Gowrie's Conſpiracy: But, before they returned to Edinburgh, they were obliged, publickly, (in the Churches aſſigned them) to declare their Belief of the treaſonable Attempts at Perth; and aſk God and the King's Pardon, for queſtioning the Matter of Fact.

Rapin, Vol. 9. p. 195. of the Octavo Tranſlation, gives this ſhort Account of the Matter, (viz.) 1610.

1600. (viz.) Some found out a Way more ready, and effectual, to prevent the King of Scots aſcending the Throne of England. The Ruthuens, Sons to Earl Gowrie, beheaded in 1584. conſpired againſt him; and, inviting him to their Houſe, on one Pretence or other, deſigned to murder him; but he eſcaped by a ſort of Miracle: The two Ruthuens were killed in the Attempt, and their Accomplices condemed to Death.

The ſame Rapin, indeed, p. 250. of the ſame Volume, relates, that, in the Year 1604. the 5th of Auguſt was ordered, by Proclamation, to be obſerved annually, in England, as a Day of Thankſgiving, for the King's miraculous Deliverance from the Conſpiracy of the Ruthuens; but then, he ſneers upon us, and ſays, There were People in Scotland, and England, who had the Malice to affirm, It was only a Fiction of the King's, to cover a real Conſpiracy of his againſt the Ruthuens, who were killed on this Occaſion.

And this Practice is very frequent in Rapin, and other Fanatick Writers, when they find a Fact, which bears hard upon their Party, proved inconteſtably, they will own it in very ſtrong Terms; but then you will find them, afterwards, inſinuating, that there is not one Word of Truth in all they have admitted before; knowing, that their Party will give much more Credit to ſuch Suggeſtions, than to what they have affirmed, on the other Side, never ſo poſitively. 1600.

I ſhall only obſerve, on this Occaſion, That, as there are Preſbyterians, and Fanaticks, who, notwithſtanding the fulleſt Evidence of the Fact, ſtill doubt of the Gowrie's Conſpiracy againſt King James; ſo there are Roman Catholicks, who deny the Reality of the Gunpowder-Plot, againſt the ſame Prince: But I preſume theſe wilfully-incredulous and prejudiced Mortals, will both be treated with the Contempt they deſerve.

1600. 43 Eliz.

The Charge. THE Priſoners were indicted for High-Treaſon, in compaſſing, and imagining, the Death of the Queen, and the ſubverſion of the Government, and raiſing an Inſurrection and Rebellion, for that End; particularly, they were charged with conſpiring, to ſurprize her Majeſty in her Palace; with impriſoning ſeveral Members of the Privy-Council; inciting the Citizens of London, to Sedition and Rebellion; aſſaulting the Queen's Forces in the Streets; and, holding out Eſſex-Houſe againſt her Majeſty.

The Evidence. The Evidence, produced againſt the Priſoners, was, firſt, Henry Witherington, who depoſed, That the Priſoners defended Eſſex-Houſe, and impriſoned the Privy-Councillors.

Sir Walter Raleigh depoſed, That he met Sir Ferdinando Gorges, upon the Thames, who told him, that the Earl of Eſſex had a ſtrong Guard in his Houſe, and it was like to be a bloody Day's Work.

Sir Ferdinando Gorges Examination alſo was read, who depoſed, That the Earl of Eſſex ſent for him up to Town; complained of his Diſgrace at Court, which he could not endure; ſaid, that great Numbers of Noblemen, and Perſons of Quality, were diſcontented, and would join him; and deſired the Deponent's Aſſiſtance: That they had ſeveral Conſultations, concerning ſurprizing the Court, ſeizing the Tower, and making an Inſurrection in the City: That the Deponent diſuaded the Inſurrection; and the Earl of Southampton ſaid, It was three Months ſince the Plot began, and ſhould they reſolve on nothing?

The Examination of Sir Charles Danvers alſo was read, who depoſed, That the Priſoners conſulted to ſurpriſe the Court, and ſeize the Tower: That the Guards alſo, were to be ſecured, in order to get Acceſs to the Queen: And, that afterwards, the Earl of Eſſex reſolved to call a Parliament to redreſs Grievances: And Sir John Davies gave the like Evidence.

Sir Chriſtopher Blunt confirmed the Evidence of the two laſt Witneſſes; and added, that the Earl intended to have altered the Government.

The Earl of Rutland depoſed, he heard the Earl of Eſſex cry out in the Streets, England is bought and ſold to the Spaniards; and, that the Earl of Southampton was a Malcontent, and confederated with Eſſex.

The Lord Sands depoſed, That the Earl of Eſſex, being repulſed at Ludgate, ordered his Followers to Charge: And there were other Witneſſes produced, that confirmed the Evidence already given.

The Earl of Eſſex's Defence. To this, the Earl of Eſſex anſwered, That what he had done, was, in order to his own Defence, without any diſloyal Intentions to her Majeſty: He only deſigned to preſent himſelf before her, with eight or nine Perſons, to entreat her to remove ſome evil Counſellors, who had abuſed her with falſe Informations; particularly, Cobham, Cecil, and Ralegh; concluding with Proteſtations of his Innocence, and, that he had never any Deſign upon the Crown of England, as the Attorney-General (Coke) had affirmed: And ſaid, he was no Favourer either of Papiſts or Sectaries.

The Earl of Southampton's Defence.

The Earl of Southampton acknowledged, their going through the City was a fooliſh Action; and, that their Deſign of going through the City with an armed Force, to Court, was only, that their Enemies might not hinder their Paſſage to the Queen; before whom they intended to proſtrate themſelves, and ſubmit to her Mercy: And, that he never heard the Proclamation, ſaid to be made by the Lord Burleigh.

They are both convicted.

Then the Lords, withdrawing for about half an Hour, returned, and brought in both the Priſoners GUILTY of High-Treaſon; and Sentence was pronounced againſt them accordingly.

Earl of Eſſex beheaded, Southampton reprieved.

On the 25th of the ſame Month, the Earl of Eſſex was beheaded, on a Scaffold within the Tower: He acknowledged, when he came to die, that his Puniſhment was juſt; and ſeemed moſt concerned, that he had drawn ſo many of his Friends into the ſame Guilt! As to the Earl of Southampton, he was ſuffered to live; but remained a Priſoner for ſome Time.

Remarks on the Trial and Execution of the Earl of Eſſex.

There appears to have been abundant Evidence againſt thoſe two noble Priſoners; and, indeed, the Facts were ſo notorious, that there was no denying them: Therefore, the Evidence that was given by their Accomplices, and the Depoſitions read againſt them, which were, certainly, not legal Evidence, were altogether unneceſſary: But, much more, the Teſtimony Sir Walter Raleigh gave, That he heard another ſay, that the Earl of Eſſex had got a ſtrong Guard, to defend his Houſe; and, there would be bloody Work. Sir Walter was thought to be too forward in giving his Voice, againſt an Enemy, when there was no Occaſion for it; and his being at being at the Execution of this Lord, was cenſured alſo, as an Indecency; it looking like a Triumph over an unfortunate Nobleman, with whom he had been at Variance.

1600. 43 Eliz.

As to the Story, of the Queen's heſitating on the Execution of this Lord, and varying her Orders frequently, which has been the Foundation of ſo many Plays and Romances; if it be conſidered, that her Majeſty was in the Decline of Life, before Eſſex came upon the Stage, and near ſeventy, at the Time of the Conſpiracy, ſhe will, ſurely, be acquitted of any amorous Paſſion for him: Though it may be very innocently ſuppoſed, ſhe had a great Regard for this Nobleman, and would, gladly, have pardoned him, if he had not declared, it was inconſiſtent with her Safety: For he had been bred up in her Court from his Infancy; and was General in that popular Expedition, when Cadiz was taken by Storm, and ſo much Treaſure brought to England, as rendered him the Darling of the Court, as well as of the People. It was, therefore, with the utmoſt Regret, that the Queen found herſelf under a Neceſſity, to take away his Life; which ought to be remembered to her Honour, rather than made an Argument of a Criminal Paſſion.

Lea's Trial.

1600. 43 Eliz.

The Charge.

THE Indictment charged him with High-Treaſon, in compaſſing, and imagining, the Death of the Queen: The Overt Acts, laid in the Indictment, were, his applying himſelf to Sir Robert Croſts, on the 12th of the ſame Month of February, and endeavouring to perſuade him, to aſſiſt, in forcing the Queen to Releaſe the Earl of Eſſex, then a Priſoner in the Tower; and, his repairing to the Queen's Palace the ſame Evening, in order to have executed his traiterous Purpoſes.

The Court refuſes his Challenges.

The Jurors being called over, the Priſoner challenged one of them peremptorily; but, the Court told him, they would not allow of ſuch Challenges: Whereupon, finding he was denied this Piece of Juſtice, he bid them proceed as they would; and twelve being ſworn, the Attorney-General opened the Indictment, and the Evidence; and, among other Things, obſerved, that the Priſoner had offered his Service to the Lord Admiral, and Mr. Secretary, to kill the Earl of Eſſex; and, they refuſing to be concerned in ſuch a Deſign, he would have made the ſame Offer to the Queen; but the Attorney inſinuated, that this was in order to get an Opportunity of attempting ſomething againſt her Majeſty. To which Lea anſwered, he would have been the firſt Man to have gone againſt Eſſex, while he thought him a Traitor; and would have ventured his Life againſt any Man, in Defence of the Queen.

Then Sir Robert Croſts, being ſworn, depoſed, That on Thurſday, about four in the Evening, Captain Lea, the Priſoner, came to him, as he was going abroad, and told him, he ſhould not go out; he muſt needs ſpeak with him; and, taking the Deponent aſide, ſaid, it would be a brave Act, to ſet the Lords Eſſex and Southampton at Liberty: That Sir Walter Raleigh might gain himſelf eternal Honour, and Love, if he would procure her Majeſty's Warrant, to free them, which he might compaſs by undertaking her Perſon; and the Deponent anſwering, You may be ſure he will not do it, Captain Lea replied, If half a dozen reſolute Men, ſuch as might have Acceſs to the Preſence, would ſtep unto the Queen, and kneel before her, and never riſe till ſhe had ſigned a Warrant, and until the Earls of Eſſex and Southampton were brought into the Queen's Preſence, they might do it; and named Sir Henry Nevil, Sir Jervis Clifton, Sir George Gifford, Sir Richard Weſton, and themſelves. And the Deponent objecting, that ſome might come upon them, and remove them from her Majeſty, he anſwered, We might keep them out, by ſhuting the Door, and telling them that offered to come in, that, if any harm came to the Queen, if ſhe ſhould do other-

1600. 43 Eliz. wiſe than well, be it at their Peril. To which the Deponent anſwered, he would ſleep upon it.

Then the Depoſition of William Poynes was read, who depoſed, that he ſaw Captain Lea, the Priſoner, preſs towards the Privy-Chamber Door; and, miſtruſting the worſt, drew towards him, and obſerved he looked pale, his Countenance ſtern, and great Drops of Sweat ſtanding on his Face; and, leaning hard on the Deponent, the Captain ſaid, it was one of the Wonders of God, he was not in this Action with the Earl of Eſſex, he was ſo well acquainted with him; and aſked the Deponent, whether the Queen was at Supper. To which he anſwered, No: But ſaid, if the Captain was ſo well acquainted with the Earl, he might do good Service; for it was likely he knew ſomewhat of the Plot; and that Captain Lea anſwered, Not I; but you ſhall hear of more Villanies and Knaveries yet.

Then a Letter was read, from the Earl of Eſſex, to the Deputy of Ireland, recommending Captain Lea to the Deputy for Preferment.

Part of the Priſoner's Confeſſion alſo was read, wherein he ſaid, he loved and honoured the Earl of Eſſex, as much as any Man in England, ſave Sir Henry Lea: That Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, being Marſhal of the Army in Ireland, ſent him (the Priſoner) to Tyr-Oen, the General of the Rebels; and that he found him peremptory, uſing inſolent Speeches, and condemning the Engliſh Nation, as a baſe People; adding, the Earl of Eſſex was ſent to kill him, but he ſhould not compaſs it: That any of his Slaves might eaſily kill the Earl, but he would not take the Life of any: And further, that if the Earl would follow his (Tyr-Oen) Plot, he would make him the greateſt Man in England.

Then the Priſoner inſiſted, that his whole Examination might be read; but the Attorney-General would not admit of it, but ſtill recited theſe Words: That they would go to her, (the Queen) and never leave her, till ſhe had done it: So that they intended, he ſaid, to have put a Force upon the Queen, by his own Confeſſion: And this was High-Treaſon, in which the whole Court agreed. Mr. Attorney alſo urged, as an Aggravation of his Crime, that he had been once before pardoned by her Majeſty.

Lea's Defence. Captain Lea, the Priſoner, ſaid, in his Defence, that he never intended to be an Actor in the Enterprize himſelf; neither did he perſuade any Man to undertake it, but only ſpoke conditionally, If ſuch a Thing could be done. He acknowledged alſo, that he was at the Privy-Chamber Door, and ſpoke the Words ſpecified in Poynes's Depoſition: But obſerved, that he had no Company with him, or ſo much as a Dagger, or any Thing about him, that could ſhew he meant to do the Queen any Harm; and ſaid, he had been there five hundred Times before, without any Notice being taken of it: That he had no Reaſon to venture any Thing in the Earl of Eſſex's Service; but had ſpent his Blood in her Majeſty's, and was ready to do it again: And declared, he was not privy to the Earl of Eſſex's Inſurrection.

The Jury, after a ſhort Receſs, bringing in the Priſoner GUILTY, Mr. Attorney ſaid, he would do well to confeſs the Matter now, and who ſet him on: But he anſwered, I am not a Fool, to be ſet on, like a Boy upon a Bear: No Body ſet me on; for I endeavoured nothing. 1600. 43 Eliz. He is convicted.

Judgment being pronounced on him as a Traitor, he deſired my Lord of London, that one might be ſent him, fit for a Man in his Condition. My Lord aſked, if he would have a Jeſuit, or a Prieſt; but the Captain anſwered, No, I am a Proteſtant: I never liked thoſe Pater-Noſter Fellows: I deſire a Miniſter, and to receive the Sacrament; and that my Son may have the little I have got together: He may do his Country good Service one Day. And Condemned.

He was executed the Day after his Trial, as a Traitor, at Tyburn, proteſting to the Miniſter, to whom he freely confeſſed the reſt of his Sins, that he never intended any ſuch Thing againſt the Queen, as was laid to his Charge. He is executed. Profeſſes his Innocence.

Mr. Camden, in his Hiſtory of Queen Elizabeth, Anno 1600. relates, that this Thomas Lea (a Kinſman of Sir Henry Lea's) came to Sir Robert Crofts, Captain of a Man of War, and told him, it would be a glorious Enterprize, for ſix brave mettled Fellows, to go to the Queen, and compel her to diſcharge Eſſex, Southampton, and the reſt, that were in Priſon. (He was a Man himſelf, of great Aſſurance, and Reſolution; had commanded a Company in Ireland, was very intimate with Tyr-Oen, and an abſolute Creature of the Earl of Eſſex's.) This did Crofts immediately diſcover to the Council; inſomuch, that Lea was ſought for, and found in the Duſk of the Evening, about the Door of the Queen's Privy-Chamber. He ſeemed very thoughtful, was extreme pale, and in a great Sweat; and frequently aſked, Whether her Majeſty was ready to go to Supper? and Whether the Council would be there? In this Poſture he was ſeized, and examined; the next Day had his Trial, and by Croft's Evidence, and his own Confeſſion, convicted; and thereupon condemned, which Mr. Camden obſerves, appeared a very ſeaſonable Piece of Rigour, as the Times then were. Mr. Camden's Account of Lea.

The Courts of Law, it appears, ſtill acted very arbitrarily, at the Trials of State Priſoners: For here, we ſee the Judges denying the Priſoner the Benefit of his Challenges, which was his undoubted Right. We find alſo Peynes's Depoſition read againſt him; whereas, by Act of Parliament, the Witneſſes ought to have been produced in Court, Face to Face; and, without two ſuch Witneſſes, a Man could not legally have been convicted of High Treaſon. As for his own Examination, out of Court, that could not have ſupplied the Place of another Witneſs; unleſs he had confirmed it, by a Confeſſion at his Trial. So that, though there was little Room to doubt his Guilt, yet we may ſay, he was not legally condemned. As to his profeſſing his Innocence to the laſt; all that he could mean by it was, that there was no formed Deſign: He only propoſed ſuch a Thing, as feaſible: But it has always been held, That he, who propoſes the putting a Force upon his Sovereign, is guilty of High Treaſon, though he never attempt it. And what he meant, by endeavouring to force his Way into the Privy-Chamber, Remarks on Lea's Trial.

1600. 43 Eliz. ber, without a Weapon, or any one to ſecond him, is not eaſy to be conceived. I am apt to think, the Man was a little diſordered in his Senſes. Certain it is, he was very little afraid of Death, by his Behaviour, both at his Trial, and Execution. 1600. 43 Eliz.

Trial of Blunt, &c.

The Trial of Sir CHRISTOPHER BLUNT, Sir CHARLES DAVERS, or DANVERS, Sir JOHN DAVIS, Sir GILLY MERRICK, and HENRY CUFFE, as Accomplices in the Earl of Eſſex's Treaſon, before Commiſſioners of Oyer and Terminer, the 15th of March, 1600. 43 Eliz.

1600. 43 Eliz.

Very defective.

THIS alſo ſcarce deſerves the Name of a Trial, the Indictment, and moſt of the Evidence being wanting: But it is to be preſumed, the Indictment charged them, with compaſſing the Death of the Queen, levying War, &c. as the Indictments againſt the Earls of Eſſex and Northampton, had done.

The Charge.

Of which Charge, it ſeems, the Priſoners deſired they might confeſs Part, and plead guilty to the reſt: But, being informed, they muſt plead Guilty, or Not Guilty, to the whole, they all pleaded Not Guilty: After which, Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, Sir Charles Davers, and Sir John Davis, confeſſed their Deſign was, to come to the Queen, with ſuch a Force, as could not be reſiſted; and to require of her certain Conditions and Alterations of Government: But that they intended no perſonal Hurt to the Queen herſelf; and that was the Reaſon they could not confeſs the whole Indictment, which charged them with compaſſing the Death and Deſtruction of the Queen.

Some of the Priſoners confeſs the Charge.

The putting a Force upon the King, conſtrued a Deſign upon his Crown and Life.

The Court replied, that a Conſpiracy to put a Force upon the Queen, was Treaſon: That the Law conſtrued ſuch an Attempt to be a Deſign upon the Prince's Life and Crown: That, when a Subject took upon him to give Law to the King, he took the Sword out of his Hand, and the Crown off his Head; and this always ended in the Death and Deſtruction of the King, as was evident from Examples, both at Home and Abroad; and therefore it was highly reaſonable, that the Law ſhould conſtrue the putting a Force upon the King, to be an Attempt againſt his Life.

Whereupon Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, Sir Charles Davers, and Sir John Davis, ſaid, Since they had better conſidered the Matter, they were ſorry they had given the Court ſo much Trouble, and had not confeſſed the Indictment, at firſt.

The Evidence againſt Cuffe.

Then the Queen's Counſel produced their Evidence againſt Henry Cuffe; and particularly the Examination of the Earl of Eſſex, who had confeſſed, that Cuffe principally incited him to commit theſe Treaſons, with which he was charged. Depoſitions alſo were read, to prove Cuffe at the Conſultations with the Earl of Eſſex, at Drury Houſe, and his defending Eſſex-Houſe againſt the Queen's Forces. To which Cuffe anſwered, that he was ſhut up in Eſſex-Houſe, againſt his Will.

Againſt Merrick.

The Evidence againſt Sir Gilly Merrick, (though the Editor does not tell us, what that Evidence was) it is proved, that he commanded the Garriſon in Eſſex-Houſe, fortified it, and appeared the moſt active of any of the Earl of Eſſex's Adherents, againſt the Queen's Forces; and that, the Day before that Rebellion, he cauſed the Play of the depoſing King Richard II. to be acted.

They are all convicted, and condemned. Two hanged, and two beheaded.

Then the Jury being withdrawn, in a little Time returned, and brought in all the five Priſoners GUILTY: And Sentence being pronounced on them as Traitors, Cuffe and Merrick were thereupon drawn to Tyburn, and executed there, the 13th of March: But Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, and Sir Charles Davers, had the Honour of being beheaded on Tower-Hill, the 18th of the ſame Month; and Sir John Davis was pardoned.

Blunt's Speech on the Scaffold.

Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, in his Speech on the Scaffold, declared that, when the Earl of Eſſex was in Ireland, he told him, he reſolved to ſend over his beſt Troops from thence to England, and to land them at Milford-Haven: And after he had aſſembled the reſt of his Forces, he intended to have marched with them, directly to London; but that he (Blunt) diſſuaded Eſſex from it, as being a deſperate Attempt: He acknowledged, indeed, that he had adviſed the Earl, to get the Court into his Power, and to make Conditions for himſelf: But, in all their Debates, they fully reſolved not to touch her Majeſty's Perſon; though, had they failed to attain their Ends, he would not ſay, but it might have coſt her Majeſty her Life: He declared, he died a Catholick; and, when a Proteſtant Miniſter came to tender his Service to him, in his laſt Moments, he deſired he might not be diſturbed; and, contenting himſelf with ſome pious Ejaculations of his own, he died, ſays my Author, with great Reſolution.

Cuffe's Declaration.

Cuffe declared alſo, at his Execution, that they had an Intention to force their Way into the Queen's Preſence; but ſaid, he never perſuaded any Man to take up Arms againſt her Majeſty: And as to Sir Charles Davers, and Sir Gilly Merrick, I do not find they made any Speeches at their reſpective Executions.

Remarks on the Trial of Blunt, &c.

Theſe Trials, I have already obſerved, are very deficient, both as to the Charge, and the Evidence; and no leſs ſo, as to the Priſoners Defence. There is no doubt, indeed, to be made of the Priſoners Guilt, where ſo many thouſands were Witneſſes of the Facts they were charged with. However, the Teſtimony produced againſt them, was certainly not legal Evidence, 1600. 43 Eliz. Evidence, conſiſting of the Depoſitions of abſent Witneſſes, and ſome of it the Confeſſions of the Earl of Eſſex, and his Accomplices, who ſtood convicted and attainted of the ſame Treaſons. The Law, 'tis true, was much the ſame then, as it is now: But the Court then acted very arbitrarily, and frequently cauſed Men to be convicted on ſuch Evidence, as the Judges themſelves knew was not legal; and which, at this Day, would not be admitted to be given in Caſes of this Nature. 1600. 43 Eliz.

The moſt defective of any of them.

THIS has the leaſt Appearance of a Trial, of any Thing we have ſeen yet, containing little more than an Abſtract of the Charge, without the Evidence, and very little of the Defence.

The Charge. The Indictment charged, that the Priſoners conſulted with the Lord Gray, and others, traiterouſly to ſurprize the King, and the young Prince, at Greenwich, and to carry them to the Tower; to ſeize the Treaſure and Jewels there, to effect their Purpoſes; and agreed, that the Lord Chancellor, Treaſurer Cecil, and the Chief Juſtice, ſhould be removed, and cut off: That, if their Project of carrying the King to the Tower failed, then they ſhould convey him to Dover; and either there, or in the Tower, the King was to have been kept three Months: That they would, in the mean Time, have required of his Majeſty, 1. A general Pardon; 2. A Toleration of Religion; and that the Papiſts ſhould be admitted to the Council-Board, and to Poſts in the Government, as well as Proteſtants; and, 3. That the King ſhould remove, and cut off, the aforeſaid Counſellors, and others, who ſhould be thought to hinder their Enterprize. Watſon particularly was charged with deviſing an Oath to be taken by the Conſpirators, for the Preſervation of the King's Perſon, the Advancement of the Catholick Religion, and for concealing their Secrets: And it was agreed, That every Thing ſhould be tranſacted in the King's Name (as it was afterwards in the Year 41.) and particularly, that the Lord-Mayor, and Aldermen, ſhould be ſent for, in his Majeſty's Name, and kept in ſafe Cuſtody till they gave Hoſtages, not to oppoſe their Deſigns, and promiſed, to furniſh them with ſuch Proviſions and Neceſſaries, as the Conſpirators ſhould require of them.

There is no Account of the Evidence that was given at theſe Trials, as hath been obſerved already: And, as to the Defence, the Editor of this Piece only tells us, that Brooke pretended, he had a Letter from his Majeſty, authorizing him to ſound the Deſigns of the Conſpirators: But he could produce no ſuch Letter; and the King declared, he never wrote any ſuch Letter.

What appears of their Defence.

Markham ſaid, he had been miſled by Watſon, the Prieſt, who aſſured him, That the King, before his Coronation, was not an actual, but a political King; and therefore no Treaſon could be committed againſt him: And Brookeſby declared, he was drawn into this Plot by Watſon, the Prieſt.

Sir Edward Parham acknowledged alſo, that he was dealt with by Watſon, to take the aboveſaid Oath, and to concur in the Enterprize, for the Advancement of the Catholick Religion.

They are convicted, and condemned. The Jury found all the Priſoners GUILTY, and Judgment of High Treaſon paſſed againſt them; but only George Brooke, Brother to the Lord Cobham, with the two Prieſts, Watſon and Clark, were executed. The Editor of theſe Trials concludes his Narrative, with his Majeſty's Warrant to the Sheriff of Hampſhire, to ſuſpend the Execution of the Lord Cobham, the Lord Gray, and Sir Griffin Markham; with which theſe Priſoners were not acquainted, till they had mounted the Scaffold, performed their Devotions, and prepared themſelves for the Block. The Lord Gray died in the Tower, not long after: The Lord Cobham obtained his Liberty; but, his Eſtate being confiſcated, lived a great while very miſerably. Sir Griffin Markham alſo was releaſed at length, and went beyond Sea; but, having loſt his Eſtate, was reduced to great Diſtreſs. Parham, Brookeſby, and Copley, alſo were reprieved; but it does not appear what become of them. Brook, and the two Prieſts only executed.

The Warrant for ſuperſeding the Execution of the two Lords, and Markham, being written in the King's own Hand, and eſteemed a Curioſity, I ſhall give it the Reader Verbatim.

Remarks on the Trial of Markham &c.

As to the Trial of the two Lords, Cobham and Gray (before their Peers) I meet with no manner of Account of it; and the Trials of the Commoners are very imperfect, as has been obſerved already: But, from what we have, there ſeems to have been two Plots: The one, to have ſeized the King's Perſon, and the Prince, and to have compelled his Majeſty, to have changed his Miniſtry, and granted a general Liberty of Conſcience, which was the Charge againſt the Priſoners mentioned in the preſent Trial: The other, a Plot to depoſe King James, and place the Lady Arabella Stuart upon the Throne; with which the Lord Cobham and Sir Walter Ralegh were charged. Poſſibly the Prieſts let ſome into one Deſign, and ſome into the other. So they could bring about a Change in Religion, they were not very ſolicitous by what means it was effected: But I am apt to think, neither of theſe Plots was brought to any Maturity.

1603. 1 Jac. I.

Treaſon may be committed againſt a King out of Poſſeſſion.

The moſt remarkable Thing in theſe Trials was, that the Priſoners were indicted for a Conſpiracy againſt the King, before he was crowned, and before he ſet his Foot upon Engliſh Ground. Watſon and Clarke, the two Prieſts, it ſeems, had taught their Accomplices, that no Treaſon could be committed againſt a King, out of Poſſeſſion of the Government: And we find the Regicides afterwards copying after them, and making that a Part of their Defence, that King Charles I. was depoſed, and out of the Exerciſe of the Government, and therefore their murdering him could not be Treaſon: And Sir Harry Vane alſo made the like Defence, when he was indicted for making War againſt King Charles II. and keeping him out of the Poſſeſſion of his Throne: But the Judges cited this Precedent of Watſon and Clark, to ſhew them, that Treaſon might be committed againſt a King, before he was crowned, or had entered on the Adminiſtration of the Government; for that the King is King, to all Intents and Purpoſes, immediately upon the Demiſe of his Predeceſſor: This was the unanimous Opinion of the Judges at the Reſtoration.

The Trial of Sir Walter Ralegh, for High Treaſon.

The Trial of Sir WALTER RALEGH Knight, for High Treaſon, before Henry Howard Earl of Suffolk, the two Chief Juſtices Popham and Anderſon, and other Commiſſioners of Oyer and Terminer, at Wincheſter, the 17th of Novemb. 1603. 1 Jac. I.

The Charge.

THE Indictment charges the Priſoner with High Treaſon, in compaſſing and imagining to depoſe and deſtroy the King; and particularly that he met and conſulted with the Lord Cobham, how to advance the Lady Arabella Stuart to the Throne; and that, in order to it, the Lord Cobham was to go over to the Archduke, the King of Spain, and the Duke of Savoy, to procure their Aſſiſtance, and carry Letters from the Lady Arabella, with him, promiſing ſhe would procure a Peace between England and Spain, tolerate Popery, and be directed by them in her Marriage; and that Cobham, at the Inſtance of Sir Walter, did write to Aremberg, the Archduke's Ambaſſador, to obtain 600,000 Crowns, for carrying on theſe Deſigns; which Sum the Ambaſſador promiſed to pay: That Cobham promiſed Sir Walter 8000 Crowns of the Money, which he agreed to accept; and that Sir Walter alſo had publiſhed a Book againſt the King's Title.

The Evidence. Depoſitions of Lord Cobham.

Sir Edward Coke, the Attorney-General, having opened the Indictment, and given Sir Walter Ralegh a great deal of ſcurrilous Language, proceeded to produce the Evidence: And firſt, the Examination of the Lord Cobham was read, wherein he confeſſes his going over to Flanders, to the Archduke, and getting a Paſs, to go to Spain, to ſolicit that King for 600,000 Crowns; and that he was to return home by Jerſey, and conſult Sir Walter

1603. 1 Jac. I.

Ralegh there, concerning the Diſtribution of the Money among the Diſaffected in England: And further depoſed, that he had not entered into theſe Courſes, but by the Inſtigation of Sir Walter, curſing him, and calling him Villain and Traitor for ſeducing him. A Letter alſo of the Lord Cobham's was read, of the ſame Tenor.

Of Lawrency.

The Examination of one Lawrency alſo was read, who depoſed, that Sir Walter ſupped with Cobham that Evening Cobham went to Aremberg, the Archduke's Ambaſſador.

The Priſoner's Examination read.

Then Sir Walter's own Examination was read, wherein he ſays, Cobham offered him 8000 Crowns, if he would promote a Peace between England and Spain: To which the Deponent replied, when I ſee the Money, I will tell you more: For he thought it one of Lord Cobham's idle Conceits, and therefore made no Account of it.

Cobham's Depoſition alſo, concerning the Book, was read, wherein he depoſed, that he had a Book from Ralegh, written againſt the King's Title; and Ralegh ſaid, it was fooliſhly written.

Hearſay.

The only living Witneſs produced againſt the Priſoner, was one Dyer, who depoſed, that he heard a Gentleman ſay, at Liſbon, the King would never be crowned; for Don Ralegh, and Don Cobham, would cut his Throat, ere that Day came.

Letter of Cobham's.

Then a Letter of the Lord Cobham's was produced, where he ſays, that Ralegh ſent to him in the Tower, to retract his Evidence; and that Ralegh was to have had 1500 l. per annum of the Spaniard, to give Intelligence when any Thing was deſigned againſt the Spaniſh Territories.

Sir Walter's Defence.

To this Sir Walter Ralegh anſwered, that he knew nothing of the Lord Cobham's Practices with Aremberg, and proteſted, he had never heard of the Name of the Lady Arabella Stuart: That it was very unlikely he ſhould ſend Lord Cobham to Spain; and more unlikely, that Spain ſhould attempt another Enterprize againſt England, which had met with ſo many Repulſes, and their Royal Navy now deſtroyed, and ſunk to nothing; and that the Crown of Spain was too much impoveriſhed at this Day, to lend 600,000 Crowns on ſo precarious a Project: That it was very unlikely alſo, he ſhould promote a Peace with Spain, who had written a Book expreſly againſt a Peace, which he intended to preſent to his Majeſty: That it was not enough to accuſe a Man generally; but the Lord Cobham ought to give ſome Account of the Reaſon of the Undertaking: Some other Proof ought to be produced, beſides the Depoſition of one who acknowledged his Guilt: There ought to be two credible Witneſſes, brought Face to Face, in Caſes of Treaſon; and here had not one Witneſs appeared: And as to the Book he was charged with, he had it in the late Lord Treaſurer's Study, who had written in it, This is the Book of Robert Snaggs. That he never read it, commended it, or communicated it to any Man; and the Book had been burnt long ago.

Inſiſts on two Witneſſes.

Then he returned to ſpeak to the firſt Part of the Charge, and ſaid, it was not likely, that he, who had ſpent 40,000 Crowns againſt the Spaniard, ſhould now become ſo affected to him, as to accept a Penſion from that Crown: And in Anſwer to the Depoſition of the Lord Cobham, he produced a Letter from the ſame Lord, written after his Examination, when he was ſick, and like to die; wherein he ſays, Seeing myſelf ſo near my End, for the Diſcharge of my Conſcience, and freeing myſelf from your Blood, which elſe will cry Vengeance againſt me, I proteſt, upon my Salvation, I never practiſed with Spain by your Procurement. God ſo comfort me in this my Affliction, as you are a true Subject, for any Thing I know. I will ſay as Pilate, Purus ſum a ſanguine hujus: So God have Mercy upon my Soul, as I know no Treaſon by you.

1603. 1 Jac. I.

Reply to the Defence.

To this Defence the Attorney-General replied, chiefly with Invectives and ill Language, telling Sir Walter, he was the moſt notorious Traitor that ever came to the Bar; and that when he had taken off the King, he would have altered Religion: That he was a Monſter, a Viper, had an Engliſh Face, but a Spaniſh Heart; and that the Witneſſes need not be brought Face to Face: And the Lord Chief Juſtice added, that the Statute, which required this, was repealed; in which the reſt of the Court concurred.

The Attorney-General alſo ſaid, that the Crown could never ſtand a Year upon the King's Head, if a Traitor might not be condemned by Circumſtances: That it did not conſiſt with the King's Safety, that the Priſoner ſhould be acquitted; proteſting before God, that he never knew a clearer Treaſon, and that Sir Walter was the moſt vile and execrable Traitor that ever lived; after which followed this inimitable Dialogue.

A Dialogue between Coke, the Attorney-General, and Sir Walter.

Ralegh. You ſpeak indiſcreetly, and barbarouſly.

Att. Gen. I want Words to expreſs thy viperous Treaſons.

Ralegh. I think you want Words, indeed; for you have ſpoken one Thing half a dozen Times.

Att. Gen. Thou art an odious Fellow; thy Name is hateful to all England for thy Pride.

Ralegh. It will go near to prove a meaſuring Caſt, between you and me, Mr. Attorney.

Other Evidence produced.

Then Mr. Attorney produced Lord Cobham's Letter, wherein he ſays, Ralegh ſent to him in the Tower, to retract what he had ſaid. To which Ralegh anſwered, he confeſſed he did ſend a poor Fellow, to throw a Letter into his Window, with theſe Words, viz. You know you have undone me: Now write three Lines to juſtify me.

The Lord Chief Juſtice then demanded of the Priſoner, what he ſaid to his being promiſed a Penſion of 1500 l. per Annum.

To which he anſwered, Cobham was a baſe, diſhonourable, poor Soul: And the Chief Juſtice replied, I perceive you are not ſo clear a Man as you have proteſted all this while.

The Lady Arabella profeſſes her Innocence.

During the Trial, the Lord Admiral Nottingham, being in Court with the Lady Arabella, ſtood up, and declared, that the Lady proteſted, upon her Salvation, that ſhe never dealt in any of thoſe Things, and ſo deſired him to inform the Court: She acknowledged, indeed, ſhe received a Letter from the Lord Cobham, to prepare pare her; but ſhe laught at it, and immediately ſent the Letter to the King.

The whole Evidence being given, and ſummed up, the Jury withdrew, and within a Quarter of an Hour, brought the Priſoner in GUILTY; and Judgment paſſed on him, as a Traitor.

Remarks on the Trial.

Never was Man convicted on ſo ſlender an Evidence. There was nothing, but the Depoſition of the Lord Cobham, that affected him; and that he had ſolemnly retracted: And, even this Witneſs was not produced in Court, the Judges declaring it was not neceſſary; and, that the Statute of the 5th and 6th Edw. VI. (which requires that two Witneſſes ſhould give their Evidence, viva voce, in Caſes of Treaſon) was repealed. But it is remarkable, that in this, and the former Trials, where the Court declared, that Statute was not in Force, they never ſpecified by what Act it was repealed. And, indeed, there is no ſuch Act in the Statute-Book: So that, whether Sir Walter was guilty or not, both he and many more were unjuſtly convicted, in that Age, for want of two Witneſſes produced perſonally againſt them, as the Law required. It is obſervable, that ſome Judges uſed only to affirm, that the Law was inconvenient, and the Crown could not have Juſtice done, if that Opinion prevailed. And Sir Edward Coke, the Attorney-General, at this Trial, ſays, That the Crown cannot ſtand a Year upon the King his Maſter's Head, if a Traitor could not be condemned by Circumſtances; and, therefore, ſeems to argue, there was a Neceſſity that Statute ſhould be ſuſpended, in Favour of the Crown: But this great Lawyer does not attempt to ſhew, by what Act the 5th and 6th of Edw. VI. cap. 11. was repealed. He appears alſo, in his Crown-Law, to have been of another Opinion. But the moſt trifling Evidence that ever was given, was the Teſtimony of Dyer at this Trial, who, in order to influence the Jury, declared, he heard a Gentleman ſay at Liſbon, Don Raleigh, and Don Cobham, would cut the King's Throat before he was crowned.

Remarks on Sir Edward Coke's Conduct.

Give me leave to obſerve further, that nothing could leſſen Sir Edw. Coke's Character more, than his Conduct at this Trial. To ſee the Inſolence, the Violence, and ſcurrilous Language, he uſed, to run down a Man of Quality and Honour, who had been ſo eminent in the Service of his Country: To ſee him wreſting and perverting the Law, contrary to his own Opinion, and Conſcience, to come at the Blood of an innocent Man; and this, either to make his Court to the new King, or out of Malice to the Priſoner; muſt give every Man a very mean Opinion of this Lawyer. And whoever have attended the Trials of State Priſoners, may have obſerved much of the like Practice in this Age. We have ſeen Gentlemen of the Long Robe, Men of conſiderable Fortunes, whoſe Neceſſities could not prompt them to take away any Man's Life, one would think, for a little ſordid Pelf, labouring with all their Might, and uſing all their Skill and Oratory, to hunt down Men marked out for Deſtruction; and this, perhaps, with no Malice to the Parties, or, with any other View, than that of being advanced from the Bar to the Bench; obſerving, that the Cutting of Throats, or ruining a Man by Colour of Law, when ſome vile Miniſter required it, was the ready Road to Preferment. But, whatever Reward thoſe Time-ſervers may expect in this World, they, ſurely, never think of a Day of Retribution in the next.

Sir Walter's Voyage to Guiana.

Sir Walter Ralegh, having remained fourteen Years in the Tower, was ſet at Liberty; and, finding the Government in great Diſtreſs for Money at that Time, propoſed an Expedition to Guiana, on the Continent of America, in order to poſſeſs himſelf of a Gold Mine, he had formerly diſcovered: Which the Miniſtry liſtened to with a great deal of Pleaſure; and ſome Gentlemen of Quality and Fortune, with ſeveral conſiderable Merchants, contributed to the Expedition. But Sir Walter arriving with ten Ships at the Mouth of the River Oronoque, and detatching five Companies of Soldiers, under the Command of his Son Captain Ralegh and Captain Kemiſh, to ſail up and down the River, in Search of the Mine; they found the Avenues to it ſo well fortified by the Spaniards, that after a fruitleſs Attack, in which Captain Raleigh loſt his Life, Kemiſh returned with the Boats to the Fleet.

His Son killed.

His Friend Kemiſh, kills himſelf.

Sir Walter, deeply afflicted with his Son's Death, and the Miſcarriage of the Attempt, it is ſaid, reproached Kemiſh, telling him, he had ruined him, by putting him upon ſo impracticable an Enterprize: Which Captain Kemiſh laid ſo much to Heart, that he retired to his Cabbin, and ſhot himſelf; and, finding the Shot had not reached his Vitals, afterwards ſtabbed himſelf with a Knife in ſeveral Places, of which Wounds he died.

In Doubt, if he ſhould return home.

But I am apt to think, that Sir Walter rather reprimanded Kemiſh, for attacking the Spaniards, than for adviſing him to undertake this Expedition; for this it was, that rendered him obnoxious to the Government: We were, then, in full Peace with Spain; and, it was very natural to ſuppoſe, that the Spaniards would demand Satisfaction, for falling upon their Settlements; which Sir Walter's Commiſſion never authorized him to do. It is highly probable, that the Spaniards were not poſſeſſed of thoſe Mines, when Sir Walter firſt diſcovered them; and, even when he undertook this Enterprize, neither the Miniſtry, or he, knew the Spaniards had fortified them; or we ſhould never have attempted to have ſettled there, and diſobliged an Ally the King was then ſo fond of, and actually engaged with in a Treaty of Marriage, between his Son, Prince Charles, and the Infanta: Therefore it appears, when Captain Kemiſh had committed Hoſtilities againſt the Spaniards, Sir Walter and all that were with him gave themſelves over for loſt, and propoſed ſailing for France, or Italy, as ſome of his Ships actually did: Only Sir Walter and four Ships, returned to Ireland; where he propoſed to remain till he had made his Peace. But, being encouraged, to venture home, by ſome falſe or indiſcreet Friends, he no ſooner landed but he was taken, and committed to the Tower, from whence he made his Eſcape; but, being re-taken, was ordered to be executed, by Vertue of a Sentence that had paſſed on him fifteen Years before, to give the Spaniards Satisfaction: Though the Treaſon, he had been con-condemned for, was, his being a Penſioner to Spain, and inviting the Spaniard to invade the Kingdom. An Offence, which, if he had been guilty of it, all the World looked upon as pardoned; Sir Walter being not only ſet at Liberty, but conſtituted General and Admiral, by a a Commiſſion that gave him Power of Life and Death, and even of pardoning capital Offences in others; which could not have been executed by a Perſon attainted of High-Treaſon, unleſs he had been, at leaſt (virtually) pardoned by the King: However, the Lawyers, it ſeems, gave it as their Opinion, that nothing but expreſs Words could amount to a Pardon of Treaſon; and he was thereupon beheaded, the 29th of Octob. 1618. in the 66th Year of his Age.

Taken, and eſcapes again.

Re-taken, and beheaded.

Goodwin's Caſe.

1603-4. 1 Jac. I.

A Knight returned, and rejected, by the Clerk of the Crown, becauſe he was outlawed.

ON Thurſday, the 22d of March, Sir William Fleetwood, Knight of the Shire for the County of Bucks, moved the Houſe, on the Behalf of Sir Francis Goodwin, who had been returned one of the Knights of the Shire for the ſaid County, and refuſed by the Clerk of the Crown, becauſe he was outlawed, (and thereupon a ſecond Writ iſſued, and Sir John Forteſcue returned;) that this Return might be examined, and Sir Francis Goodwin received a Member of the Houſe.

Whereupon it was ordered, that Notice ſhould be given to the Clerk of the Crown, to appear at the Bar the next Morning, and bring with him all the Writs of Summons, Indentures, and Returns of Elections, for the County of Bucks, this laſt Parliament; and that Notice ſhould be given to Sir Francis Goodwin, to attend in Perſon, and repreſent the State of his Caſe, Ore tenus.

Received by the Houſe, notwithſtanding.

The Clerk of the Crown attended accordingly, the next Day, with the Writs, &c. and Sir Francis Goodwin, having made a Repreſentation of his Caſe, was ordered to withdraw; and, after a long Debate, the Queſtion being put, Whether Sir Francis Goodwin was lawfully elected, and returned, one of the Knights for Bucks, and ought to be admitted and received as a Member of that Houſe? It was reſolved in the Affirmative; and thereupon the Clerk of the Crown was commanded to file the firſt Indenture of Return: And it was Ordered, that Sir Francis ſhould immediately take the Oaths, and his Place in the Houſe; which he did accordingly. On Tueſday, the 27th of March, 1604. Sir Francis Bacon, reporting a Conference with the Lords, on another Subject, ſaid, the Lords touched on the Caſe of Sir Francis Goodwin, and deſired to be more particularly informed, concerning it, by that Houſe: But Anſwer was made (by the Committee of the Commons) that they had no Warrant from the Houſe to ſpeak to it.

The Lords enquire into the Reaſon of it.

The ſame Day a Meſſage came from the Lords, deſiring, that the Committee of the Commons might, at the next Conference, be authoriſed to treat, concerning the Caſe of Sir Francis Goodwin, Knight of the Shire for Bucks.

The Commons refuſe a Conference on that Subject.

Which Meſſage being debated, it was urged by ſome Members, that they ought not to give an Account to the Lords of their Proceedings in the Houſe: But that the Speaker ſhould repreſent to his Majeſty, that, as the Judgment of Sir Francis Goodwin's Caſe had paſſed the Houſe, it ought not to be reverſed by them: And a Precedent of the 27th of Eliz. was cited; where a Bill, brought down from the Lords, being rejected, on the firſt Reading, and the Lords ſending to demand a Reaſon of their Judgment, it was denied to yield any Reaſon.

And the Queſtion being put, Whether they ſhould confer with the Lords, on the Caſe of Sir Francis Goodwin? It paſſed in the Negative: And the Commons ſent a Meſſage to the Lords, that they conceived, it did not ſtand with the Honour and Order of the Houſe, to give an Account of their Proceedings.

His Majeſty interpoſes.

This produced another Meſſage from the Lords, importing, that their Lordſhips taking notice of the Return of the Sheriff of Bucks to the King, his Majeſty conceived himſelf engaged, and touched in Honour, that there ſhould be a Conference between the Houſes on that Subject.

The Commons offer his Majeſty the Reaſons of their Judgment.

Whereupon the Commons moved, to have Acceſs to his Majeſty; and Eight the next Morning being appointed for their attending him, a Committee was appointed to attend his Majeſty, with the Speaker, and relate the Reaſons of their Proceedings, in the Caſe of Sir Francis Goodwin; which the Committee did accordingly.

On Thurſday, the 29th of March, 1604. Mr. Speaker related what he had delivered to the King, by Warrant from the Houſe the Day before, and his Majeſty's Anſwer.

He ſaid, he delivered, 1. The Manner and Matter. 2. Such Precedents as had been vouched and ſtood upon; and, 3. He opened the Law of Elections.

The Election duely made.

1. The Writ of Summons, dated the laſt of January, was duely iſſued. The Liberty was free, by that Writ, to chuſe in pleno comitatu. The Election was made, according to that Writ, and the Indenture duely returned; and therefore it was adjudged by the Houſe, that this firſt Election being good, the ſecond was conſequently void.

2. As to the Outlawry againſt Sir Francis Goodwin, there was one proſecuted againſt him, at the Suit of Johnſon, 31 Eliz. for 60 l. laid in the Huſtings, London. Another at the Suit of one Hacker, for 16 l. 39 Eliz. That Sir Francis had been ſince choſen, admitted, and ſerved as a Member of this Houſe, in ſeveral Parliaments holden, 39 & 43 Eliz.

That the Outlawry remained in the Huſtings, ſo as the Law could take no notice of it; neither was it pleadable.

Precedents of Outlaws ſerving in Parliament.

1 Eliz. One Smith was found outlawed, and privileged by the Houſe.

23 Eliz. One Vaughan outlawed, and, on a Diviſion, voted to be privileged: Carried by ſix Voices.

Mr. John Killegrew, having fifty two Outlawries returned againſt him, was admitted to ſerve in the Houſe.

Sir William Harecourt, eighteen Times outlawed, was admitted to ſerve.

The Outlawry irregular,

The ſuppoſed Outlawry againſt Sir Francis, 31 Eliz. was no Outlawry at all; no Proclamations being made in the County where he dwelt.

General Pardons ſince.

The general Pardons of the 39 & 43 Eliz. were good in Outlawries againſt all, but the Parties, at whoſe Suit they were proſecuted.

The Sheriff no Judge of the Outlawry.

That the Sheriff was no Judge of the Outlawry, nor could take notice it was the ſame Man, and therefore could not properly return him outlawed.

The King's Anſwer.

To which his Majeſty anſwered, He was indifferent which of the two was choſen: Nor had he any Deſign to impeach their Privilege; but, ſince they derived all their Privileges from him, and by his Grant, he expected they ſhould not be turned againſt him: That there was no Precedent ſuited this Caſe fully: Either they were in the Times of Minors, of Tyrants, of Women, or of ſimple Kings.

All their Privileges derived from the Crown.

That the Chancery ought to judge of Returns.

By Law, that Houſe ought not to meddle with Returns, being all made into Chancery; and ought to be corrected, or reformed, in that Court only, into which they were returned.

That Outlaws ought not to ſit in the Houſe.

And that it was the Opinion of all the Judges, that Matter of Outlawry was a ſufficient Cauſe of Diſmiſſion, of any Member out of the Houſe; and that Sir Francis Goodwin was outlawed, according to the Laws of the Land.

The King orders them to debate the Matter again, confer with the Judges, &c.

It was, therefore, his Majeſty's ſpecial Charge, 1. That the Courſe already taken, ſhould be truly reported. 2. That they ſhould debate the Matter, and reſolve among themſelves. 3. That they ſhould admit of a Conference with the Judges; and, 4. That they ſhould make a Report of all their Proceedings to the Council.

The Commons diſpute theſe Points among themſelves.

In the Debate upon this Report, it was ſaid, that now the Caſe of Sir John Forteſcue, and Sir Francis Goodwin, was become the Caſe of the whole Kingdom: That old Lawyers forget, and commonly interpret the Law, according to the Time.

Reſolve to maintain their Privileges.

That, by this Courſe, the free Election of the County was taken away; and none could be choſen, but ſuch as pleaſed the King and Council; and that they ought, therefore, with Fortitude, to maintain their Privilege; which could not be conſtrued a Contempt, but merely a Maintenance of their common Right, which their Anceſtors had left them: And it was juſt and fit they ſhould transfer them to Poſterity.

At length, it was reſolved, to preſent his Majeſty, in Writing, with the Reaſons of their Reſolutions, in Sir Francis Goodwin's Caſe, which were of the following Tenor.

1603-4. 1 Jac. I.

But offer his Majeſty further Reaſons.

To the King's Moſt Excellent Majeſty, the humble Anſwer of the Commons Houſe of Parliament, to his Majeſty's Objections in Sir Francis Goodwin's Caſe:

1. AS to that Objection, that they aſſumed a Power of examining Elections and Returns, which belonged to the Court of Chancery,

They anſwer, That, until the 7th of Hen. IV. all Parliament Writs were returnable into the Parliament, and conſequently examinable there: But in that Year, a Statute was made, that thenceforth every Parliament Writ ſhould be returnable in Chancery, however the Power of the Parliament to examine and determine Elections remained; for ſo the Statute had been always expounded ſince: And for that Purpoſe, the Clerk of the Crown uſed to attend, all Parliament Time, upon the Commons Houſe, with the Writs and Returns: And the Parliament always appointed Committees, for examining Controverſies, concerning Elections and Returns. During which Time, the Writs and Indentures remain with the Clerk of the Crown; and after the Parliament ended, and not before, are delivered to the Clerk of the Petty Bag in Chancery, to be kept there.

They ſhew the Commons always determined Returns.

Precedents of it.

As to Precedents: In the 29th of Eliz. after one Writ awarded into Norfolk, for Choice of Knights, and Election, made and returned, a ſecond was, before the Parliament Day, awarded by the Lord Chancellor, and thereupon another Election and Return made: And the Commons being attended, with both Writs and Returns, by the Clerk of the Crown, allowed the firſt, and rejected the ſecond. So in the 23d of Eliz. a Burgeſs was returned dead, and a new one choſen, and returned by a new Writ. For the Party, that was returned dead, appearing, the Commons, notwithſtanding the Sheriff's Return, admitted the firſt choſen, and rejected the ſecond. The ſame 23d Year, a Burgeſs, choſen for Hull, was returned Lunatick, and a new one choſen, upon a ſecond Writ: And the Commons, finding the Return of Lunacy to be true, refuſed the firſt: But if it had been falſe, they would have received him. In the 43 Eliz. the Sheriff of Rutlandſhire returned himſelf elected: The Commons, finding he was not eligible by Law, ſent a Warrant to the Chancery, to chuſe a-new. The ſame 43d Year, a Burgeſs was choſen for two Boroughs. The Commons, after he had made his Election which he would ſerve for, ſent a Warrant to the Chancery, for a Writ, to chuſe a-new, for the other Borough: All which proves the Chancery to be a Place appointed to receive the Returns, and keep them for the Parliament; but not to judge of them. The Inconvenience would be great, if the Chancery might, upon Suggeſtions, or Sheriffs Returns, ſend Writs for new Elections, and theſe not ſubject to Examinations in Parliament; for ſo, when fit Men were choſen, the Lord Chancellor, or Sheriffs, might diſplace them, and ſend out new Writs, till ſome were choſen to their Liking.

The Court would chuſe the Houſe of Commons, if the Chancery, or Sheriffs, were Judges of Returns.

1603-4. 1 Jac. I.

2. As to that Objection, that they had proceeded with too much Precipitation; and being but half a Body, and no Court of Record alone, they had refuſed a Conference with the Lords, the other half; they anſwered, that they debated this Caſe with as much Deliberation, as others, of the like Nature, uſed to be debated in Parliament, calling the Clerk of the Crown before them, and viewing both the Writs and Returns; and finding the latter Writ was awarded, and ſealed, before the Chancery was repoſſeſſed of the former, they held it clearly to be a Fault in Law, and proceeded to Sentence, with the leſs Regard to the latter Election: And as to their refuſing a Conference with the Lords, there was none deſired, till they had given their Judgment; and then it could not be revoked. However, they proceeded with all Diligence, to lay the Matter before his Majeſty: And though they were but Part of a Body, as to the making of new Laws; yet, for any Matter of Privilege of their own Houſe, they were, and ever had been, a Court of themſelves, of ſufficient Power to diſcern and determine, without their Lordſhips, as their Lordſhips have uſed always to do for theirs, without them.

The laſt Writ null, the firſt not being returned at the Time of awarding the ſecond.

The Lords deſired no Conference, till the Thing was determined.

And had nothing to do with their Privileges.

3. As to the third Objection, that they had, by their Sentence of receiving Goodwin, admitted, that Outlaws might be Law-Makers, which was contrary to all Laws,

They ſhew the Outlawry to be irregular.

They anſwered, that notwithſtanding the Precedents they had exhibited, of Outlaws in perſonal Actions being admitted into the Houſe, they were ready to paſs an Act, for the excluding all Outlaws for the future: But that, indeed, Goodwin was not legally outlawed, at the Time of his Election. For whereas the Party outlawed, ought to be five Times proclaimed, to appear in the Sheriff's County Court; and then, not appearing, ought to be adjudged outlawed by the Coroners of the County; there appeared no Record made in the Huſtings of London, that Goodwin was five Times proclaimed, or that the Coroners had given Judgment of Outlawry againſt him, at the Time of the Election: But a Clerk, lately come to that Office, had now, ſeveral Years after Goodwin's Election, made Entries, interlined in a new Hand, that he was outlawed: To which new Entries they could give no Credit; becauſe the Parties, at whoſe Suit Goodwin was ſued, had teſtified, by their Releaſe in Writing, that they never proceeded further, than to take out the Writ of Exigent, for an Outlawry; and being then paid their Money, deſiſted in their Suit; ſo that Goodwin was not five Times proclaimed, or adjudged, outlawed: And it was uſual to ſpare that Proclamation, and Judgment, if the Party called not for it. 2. The Writ of Exigent, by which the Sheriff was commanded to proclaim him five Times, was not legally returned, or certified, by Certiorari; without which, Goodwin could not be diſabled, as an Outlaw: And beſides, the two Parliament Pardons had cleared the Outlawry, if there had been any: And they could not but obſerve, the extraordinary Steps that had been taken, to make Goodwin an Outlaw, ſince his Election, viz. by procuring the Outlawry to be returned, in the Name of the Sheriffs, that ſerved ſeven Years before, and had been long dead, and now a Return made of the old Exigent; which could be for no other End, than to diſable him to ſit in the Houſe, the Party being long ſince ſatisfied his Debt.

1603-4. 1 Jac. I.

Theſe Reaſons were delivered in Writing to a Committee of the Houſe of Lords, by Sir Francis Bacon, and ſeveral Members of the Commons, appointed for that Purpoſe: And the Committee of the Commons, at the ſame Time, by the Order of their Houſe, deſired their Lordſhips, that ſince they had nearer Acceſs to his Majeſty, they would co-operate with them, for the King's Satisfaction.

The King's Reply.

Theſe Reaſons being communicated to his Majeſty by the Lords, his Majeſty ſent for the Speaker of the Commons, and told him, he had received a Parchment from the Houſe: Whether it were an abſolute Reſolution, or Reaſons, to give him Satisfaction, he knew not; but proteſted, he had as great a Deſire to maintain their Privileges, as ever Prince had, or they themſelves. He had conſidered the Matter, and heard his Judges and Council, and was now diſtracted in Judgment. Therefore, for his further Satisfaction, he deſired, and commanded, as an abſolute King, that there might be a Conference between the Houſe and the Judges; and that his Council might be preſent; not as Umpires to determine, but to report, indifferently, on both Sides.

He inſiſts on a Conference with the Judges, before the Privy Council.

The Commons agree to it.

Whereupon, the Queſtion being put, Whether to confer with the Judges, in the Preſence of the King's Council? It was reſolved in the Affirmative, and a ſelect Committee appointed for the Conference: And it was further reſolved, upon the Motion of Mr. Lawrence Hyde, that the ſaid Committee ſhould inſiſt upon the Fortification and explaining of the Reaſons and Anſwers, delivered to his Majeſty; and not proceed to any other Argument, or Anſwer, what Occaſion ſoever moved in the Time of the Debate.

The Conference reported.

On Wedneſday, the 11th of April, Sir Francis Bacon was called upon by the Houſe, to make a Report of the late Conference with the Judges, in the Preſence of his Majeſty, and the Lords of the Council: But he excuſed himſelf, ſaying, he was not warranted to make any Report: However, upon the Queſtion being over-ruled, to make a Report, he ſaid, the King declared, he would be Preſident himſelf.

That this Attendance renewed the Remembrance of the laſt, when they departed with ſuch Admiration. It was the Voice of God in Man; the good Spirit of God in the Mouth of Man. I do not (ſays Sir Francis) ſay, the Voice of God, and not of Man. I am not one of Herod's Flatterers. A Curſe fell upon him that ſaid it: A Curſe on him that ſuffered it. We might ſay, as was ſaid to Solomon, We are glad, O King, that we give Account to you, becauſe you diſcern what is ſpoken. But he obſerved, THEY DID MORE NOW TO KING JAMES, THAN EVER WAS DONE, SINCE THE CONQUEST, IN GIVING ACCOUNT OF THEIR JUDGMENTS.

Sir Francis Bacon's Flights.

This

1604. 1 Jac. I.

This was ſpoken by Way of Preamble. How to report his Majeſty's Speeches: He knew the Eloquence of a King was inimitable.

His Majeſty ſaid, The Cauſe of this Meeting was, to draw to an End the Difference in Sir Francis Goodwin's Caſe: —— If they required his Abſence, he was ready; becauſe he feared he might be thought intereſted, and ſo breed an Inequality on their Part: —— He ſaid, he would not hold his Prerogative, or Honour, or receive any Thing of his Subjects: —That he would confirm and ratify all juſt Privileges: —— One Point was, whether they were a Court of Record, and had Power to judge of Returns. As their Court had Power, ſo had the Chancery: And the Court that firſt had paſſed their Judgment, ſhould not be controlled. The Chancery was a Confidentiary Court to the Uſe of the Parliament, during the Time: — Whatever the Sheriff inſerted beyond the Authority of his Mandate, was a Nugation. The Parliament of England were not bound by a Sheriff's Return: That their Privileges were not in Queſtion. It was private Jealouſies, without any Kernel or Subſtance. He granted, It was a Court of Record, and a Judge of Returns: And, in Concluſion, moved, that neither Sir John Forteſcue, or Sir Francis Goodwin, might have Place: With which the Committee agreed.

The King admits them a Court of Record, and Judges of Returns.

Moved for a new Election.

Upon this Report, it was ſaid, that the Committee had Authority, only to fortify what was agreed on by the Houſe; they had no Authority to conſent.

Which the Commons agree to.

But the general Voice of the Houſe being, They had done their Duty, it was reſolved, that Sir John Forteſcue, and Sir Francis Goodwin, ſhould both be ſecluded, and a Writ ſhould iſſue for a new Choice; and a Warrant, from the Speaker, was directed accordingly, for a new Writ.

But the Conſent of Sir Francis Goodwin, for a new Election, was firſt ſignified to the Speaker, in Writing, before they would come to this Reſolution.

And return his Majeſty Thanks.

A Committee was, afterwards, appointed, to return his Majeſty Thanks, for his gracious Preſence, and Direction, in Sir Francis Goodwin's Caſe. To whom, his Majeſty anſwered, That this Queſtion was unhappily caſt upon him: He carried as great a Reſpect to their Privileges as ever Prince did; their Privileges were his Strength: He thought the Ground of their Proceeding was, their not underſtanding, he had intermeddled before they decided: That, he thought alſo, they had no wilful Purpoſe to derogate any Thing from him; for their Anſwer was grave, dutiful, and obedient: But, as the Devil had unhappily caſt that Queſtion between them, ſo, he ſaw, God had turned it to two great Purpoſes; 1. that he knew, and had approved, their Loyalty; and 2. that he had ſo good an Occaſion, to give a Teſtimony o his Bounty and Grace; and, as they came to give him Thanks, ſo he redoubled his Thanks to them: That he had rather be a King of his Subjects, than a King of many Kingdoms.

The King gives them double Thanks.

The Warrant for a new Election.

The Warrant for the new Election, was of the following Tenor, (viz.) Whereas the Right Honourable Sir John Forteſcue Knight, Chancellor of his Majeſty's Dutchy of Lancaſter, and Sir Francis Goodwin Knight, have been ſeverally elected, and returned, Knights of the Shire, for the County of Bucks, to ſerve in this preſent Parliament: Upon deliberate Conſultation, and for ſome ſpecial Cauſes moving the Commons Houſe of Parliament, It is this Day ordered, and required by the ſaid Houſe, That a Writ be forthwith awarded, for a new Election of another Knight of the ſaid Shire; and this ſhall be your Warrant. 1604. 1 Jac. I.

Directed, To my very loving Friend, Sir George Coppin Knight, Clerk of the Crown, in his Majeſty's High Court of Chancery.

Remarks on Goodwin's Caſe.

King James appears to have been miſinformed, both as to the Circumſtances of the Caſe, and the Privilege of the Commons. He took it for granted, that Sir Francis Goodwin was legally outlawed; and, that the Chancery, in that Caſe, might iſſue a new Writ, for another Election: But, upon the Commons ſhewing him, that the Outlawry was irregular, and that the Houſe were Judges of the Returns of their own Members, he ſeems to have given up both thoſe Points: And, as the Commons would admit of no Conference with the Houſe of Peers, on this Head, after they had given their Judgment, we ſee them repreſenting to his Majeſty, that this was the firſt Time that they ever condeſcended to give a Reaſon of their Judgment to the Crown.

As to their Precedents of Outlaws actually ſitting in the Houſe; I believe, it will be admitted, that no Precedents, how numerous ſoever, could juſtify ſuch a Practice, either in Law or Reaſon: That a Man, who has loſt all the Benefits of the Law, and of an Engliſh Subject, ſhould commence a Lawgiver, and have the Diſpoſal of other Mens Lives, and Fortunes: This ſeems very abſurd; and the Commons were ſo ſenſible of it, that they offered to bring in a Bill, for excluding all Outlaws for the future: But I do not perceive, this would have mended the Matter much, if they would ſuffer No-body to judge who was an Outlaw, but themſelves. By the ſame Rule, that the Sheriff cannot avoid returning a Candidate regularly outlawed, one would think, he could not refuſe returning one, convicted of Treaſon, and Rebellion; or, if he pretended to apprehend ſuch a one, after his Election, he might be called to an Account, perhaps, for invading the Privileges of the Houſe; which, alone, can determine, according to this Opinion, the Qualifications of the Perſons elected.

But, in ſome Caſes, it is evident, that the Sheriff is made Judge of the Qualifications of the Electors, as well as the Elected, even by Act of Parliament; particularly, by the 7th and 8th of Will. III. c. 7. it is enacted, That if any Return-Officer, ſhall return a Member, to ſerve in Parliament, for any County or Place, contrary to the laſt Determination of the Houſe of Commons of the Right of Election in ſuch County or Place, ſuch Return, ſhall be adjudged a Falſe Return. Here the Sheriff is made Judge of what was the laſt Determination of the Commons, and, conſequently, of the Return; and, it would be very hard, if he

he was not; becauſe he forfeits an hundred Pounds, for making a Falſe Return, by a preceding Act: Indeed, the Commons, by their unlimited Privileges, may exclude the Perſon the Sheriff has returned; but he ſhall ſit, and vote in the Houſe, till ſuch Excluſion.

By 6 Annæ, c. 7. alſo, the Candidate for a County, is obliged to make Oath, at the Election, that he is poſſeſſed of a clear Eſtate of 600 l. per Annum; which, if he refuſes to do, there is little doubt to be made, but the Sheriff may lawfully refuſe the returning of him; and, conſequently, he is, in this Caſe, Judge of his Qualifications (whatever the Houſe may determine afterwards;) and, poſſibly, would be liable to the Penalty of 100 l. for making a Falſe Return, if he ſhould return a Candidate that refuſed to take the ſaid Oath; and, if he may refuſe to return a Perſon, evidently diſqualified to ſit in the Houſe, in one Inſtance, why not in another? If he may judge, whether a Perſon is convicted of Treaſon, and Rebellion, why may he not take Cognizance that a Perſon is outlawed? they are both Matters of Record. Indeed, in this Caſe, the Outlawry was not recorded, and, therefore, could be no Bar to the Election; but where it is, and the Sheriff duly appriſed of it, ſurely, the Houſe could never cenſure him, for refuſing to return ſuch an Outlaw; or ſuffer ſuch a one, to ſit, and vote, in the Houſe. All the Queſtion is, If the Commons ſhould inſiſt on Outlaws being Members of their Houſe, whether the Crown, and the Houſe of Peers, may not juſtly refuſe the paſſing any Bills, till they ſhould be excluded? It ſeems to have been the Opinion, both of the King and Lords, at that Time, that they had a Right to demand a Reaſon, why the Commons admitted an Outlaw into their Body? And had the Party been regularly outlawed, poſſibly few People, at this Day, will think them much in the Wrong; for, by the ſame Rule one Outlaw is admitted into the Houſe, a Majority of Outlaws may be admitted; and it would be very hard upon the Kingdom in general, as well as upon the Crown, and the Houſe of Peers, if the Lives and Fortunes of the Subjects, ſhould lie at the Mercy of outlawed Men: To ſay, we may depend upon it, the Commons would never admit ſuch Members, is no Anſwer; for, do we not ſee this very Houſe of Commons, inſiſt upon their Right, of admitting Outlaws, and producing numerous Precedents, of Outlaws ſitting in their Houſe? and, particularly, of one Killegrew, who had two and fifty Outlawries returned againſt him, and yet was admitted to to ſerve in the Houſe; and, of Sir Wm. Harecourt, that was outlawed eighteen Terms, and yet admitted to ſerve.

We cannot wonder, after ſuch a Juſtification, that both the Crown, and the Houſe of Peers, were a little alarmed, and deſired a Conference on this Subject: Some, indeed, have charged the King, with exerting an arbitrary, and abſolute Power, on this Occaſion; becauſe he ſaid, He deſired, and commanded, as an abſolute King, there might be a Conference, between the Houſe and the Judges, on this Subject, before the Privy-Council. And, it muſt be acknowledged, that the Words, An Abſolute King, have a very ill Sound in England; but, if it be conſidered, that they were ſpoken ex tempore, and attended with ſuch qualifying Sentences, before and after, that the King could never mean, he thought himſelf veſted with a deſpotic and incontroulable Power, to which, all their Lives, and Privileges muſt ſubmit, as ſome People would interpret them, there will appear nothing very ſhocking in them: For, in the firſt Place, he proteſts, he had as great a Deſire to maintain their Privileges, as ever Prince had; and only required, there might be a Conference, for his Satisfaction; declaring, that his Council ſhould not be preſent, as Umpires, to determine, but to report the Matter, indifferently, on both Sides. This is not the Language of one, who looks upon himſelf to be poſſeſſed of abſolute Power; and, all that can in reality be made of it, is no more than if he had ſaid, I am informed, that you have admitted an Outlaw into your Body; and, as I am your King, I require a Conference, between you and the Judges, that I may be informed, whether the Party be really outlawed, or not; and, if he be, whether, according to the Laws of England, ſuch a one can ſit in the Legiſlature. This, ſurely, he might reaſonably require, as King of England: There was no Manner of Neceſſity of his uſing the Word Abſolute; nay, the Word was very improper, when he declared, he would be governed by the Laws, and the Privileges of the Houſe, in the Matter. The moſt that can be ſaid, is, that it was an improper, and unguarded, Expreſſion; it could never be meant in a bad Senſe, becauſe the whole Tenor of his Diſcourſe looked another Way: It could not be an unreaſonable Thing, in a King of Englnnd, eſpecially as he came from a foreign Kingdom, and could not be ſuppoſed perfectly acquainted with our Laws, to deſire to hear the Legality of the Matter debated between the Commons and the Judges: This, ſurely, he might have done, without reſorting to an abſolute, and unlimited Power.

1604. 1 Jac. 1.

And laſtly, It may be obſerved, that his Majeſty was ſo far from exerting an abſolute Power upon the Occaſion, that he compromiſed the Matter with the Commons, and both Sides agreed to a new Election: His Actions, therefore, were very far from being arbitrary, however his Words might be interpreted. And it is obſervable, how very cautious the Commons were, that they might not appear to be biaſſed, or influenced, by the King, or any other, in their Determination; for, in their Warrant for a new Election, they do not ſo much as mention, that his Majeſty, or the Houſe of Peers, had interpoſed: They only ſay, That for ſome ſpecial Cauſes moving the Commons Houſe, they award a Writ for a new Election. They make it entirely their own Act; and the King was ſo far from exerciſing an abſolute Power, to compel them to this, that he, nor any Body, but their own Houſe, appear in the Warrant to have any Hand in it.

The Charge.

THE Indictment charges the Priſoners, with compaſſing, and imagining, the Death of the King, Queen, &c. and the Subverſion of the eſtabliſhed Religion and Government; and, particularly, with conſulting and agreeing, to blow up, and tear in Pieces, the King and Queen, Prince Henry, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and the Judges, and Commons aſſembled in Parliament: And that, they did not only conſpire, and conclude, to deſtroy the King's Iſſue Male, but to ſurprize his Daughters, the two Princeſſes, Elizabeth and Mary, and to proclaim the ſaid Elizabeth Queen: And that they took their Oaths, and received the Sacrament, to conceal the ſaid Treaſons, and never deſiſt, till they had accompliſhed the ſame: That they, afterwards, dug a Mine in the Foundation of the Walls of the Parliament-Houſe, being three Yards thick; and, being diſcouraged by the Difficulty of that Work, they hired a Cellar, under the Parliament Houſe, in which they placed twenty Barrels of Gun-Powder; and, fearing the ſaid Powder was become damp, bought in ten Barrels and four Hogſheads, more, of Gun-Powder; covering the Whole with Iron Bars, Stones, Billets, and Faggots: And that, the ſaid Guy Fawkes had procured Touchwood and Match, and was prepared to ſet Fire to the ſame, at the Time prefixed: That the ſaid Traitors had alſo provided Horſes, Armour, Ammunition, and other Implements of War; and publiſhed divers falſe Reports, as if the Papiſts were to have been maſſacred; whereby divers Papiſts were incited to appear in Arms, and were in open and actual Rebellion, againſt the King, in ſeveral Parts of England.

Their Confeſſion.

To which Indictment, the Priſoners, ſeverally, pleaded, Not guilty: But their Examinations, wherein they had confeſſed theſe Treaſons, being ſhewn them, they acknowledged the ſame to be true in Court; and, thereupon, without any further Trial, their Confeſſions were recorded.

Sir Everard Digby pleads Guilty.

Sir Everard Digby alſo was arraigned for the ſame Treaſons, and pleaded GUILTY: Whereupon Judgment of High-Treaſon was pronounced on Sir Everard Digby, Robert Winter, John Grant, Thomas Bates, Thomas Winter, Ambroſe Rookwood, Robert Keys, and Guy Fawkes; and the four firſt were executed at the Weſt-End of St. Paul's; and the reſt in the Old Palace-Yard, Weſtminſter.

The Trial of HENRY GARNET.

Garnet, Superior of the Jeſuits tried. Evidence againſt him.

HENRY GARNET, Superior of the Jeſuits, was arraigned, for the ſame Treaſons, the 28th of March, 1606. 3 Jac. 1.

The firſt Evidence, produced againſt him, was his own Confeſſion: Then two Witneſſes were examined againſt him, Viva Voce, (viz.) Lockerſon, and Fauſet; who depoſed, they heard Garnet ſay, They will charge me with my Prayer, for the good Succeſs of the great Action in the Beginning of the Parliament; but I will tell them, that I meant it in Reſpect of ſome ſharper Laws, which, I feared, they would then make againſt Catholicks.

Confeſſes the Treaſon.

Garnet ſaid, he was, indeed, acquainted with a Negotiation, in Spain, for Money to be beſtowed on poor Catholicks; but ever diſliked the Moving for an Army to be ſent hither: That he was alſo acquainted with the late Plot; but it was by Way of Confeſſion, which he was obliged not to diſcover: And, that he had actually written to Rome, to procure a Counter-mand of all Conſpiracies; and, he could never ſleep quietly, after he was acquainted with it.

To which, it was replied, That Meſſage to Rome was ſent ſo late, that the Blow muſt have been given, before the Meſſenger could have returned: And that, in his Confeſſion, he had ſaid, he the offered Sacrifice to God, for Stay of of that Plot, Unleſs it were for the Good of the Catholick Cauſe; and in no other Manner was the State obliged to him for his Maſſes and Oblations. And the Attorney-General obſerved, That the Priſoner did not come to the Knowledge of the Powder-Plot, by Confeſſion; but that he was conſulted upon it: And, though he had concealed the Perſons, he ought to have diſcovered the Miſchief intended, for the Preſervation of the State: That he was, indeed, the Author, and Procurer of theſe Treaſons, as appeared by his own Confeſſions, and by his reſolving Cateſby, concerning the Lawfulneſs and Merit, of them; as alſo, by his praying for their Succeſs.

He is convicted.

The Jury, being withdrawn a quarter of an Hour, returned with a Verdict that the Priſoner was GUILTY; and Sentence of Death paſſed on him as a Traitor.

And executed.

Garnet was executed, at the Weſt-End of St. Paul's, the 3d of May: When he acknowleged his Offence; begged Pardon; and exhorted the Papiſts, never to make the like Attempt; for God, he ſaid, would never proſper ſuch Treaſons againſt the King and State.

Some killed.

There were no more put to Death, in a judicial Way, for this Plot: Cateſby, Percy, and ſome others, indeed, were killed, in defending themſelves againſt the Troops that were ſent to apprehend them in the Country, whither they had fled. And the Lords, Mordaunt and Sturton, being ſuſpected of their having ſome Knowledge of the Plot, by not appearing at this Parliament, were fined; Mordaunt ten thouſand Pounds, and the other ſix thouſand, by the Star-Chamber. And the Duke of Northumberland, Captain of the Band of Penſioners, was fined forty thouſand Pounds, and condemned to loſe all his Places, and to be impriſoned during the King's Pleaſure, for admitting his Couſin Percy, one of the Conſpirators, a Gentleman of that Band, without tendering him the Oath of Supremacy, though he knew him to be a Popiſh Recuſant: And an Act paſſed in this Parliament, for ſolemnizing the 5th of November (the Day appointed for the blowing up the Parliament) annually, as a Thankſgiving. 1603. 3 Jac. I.

Lords fined.

Remarks on the Powder-Plot.

There is very little Room for Remarks on theſe Proceedings; ſince all the Priſoners confeſſed themſelves guilty of High-Treaſon, and ſcarce made any Defence. All that ſeems ſtrange to me, is, that a great many People, at this Day pretend to doubt, whether there was any ſuch Plot, when the Conſpirators all died confeſſing it.

As to the fining the Lords in the Star-Chamber, on a bare Suſpicion of their Knowledge of the Plot, without any Manner of Evidence againſt them, This ſeems to be a Stretch of Power; and, it may be ſaid, of this Judgment, as in the late Biſhop of Rocheſter's Caſe, it was either too mild, or too ſevere: If there was ſufficient Proof of High Treaſon againſt them, they ought to have ſuffered as Traitors; and, if there was no legal Proof, they ought to have been acquitted; for the Crime was Treaſon, or nothing.

Sprot's Trial.

The Charge.

THE Indictment charged, That whereas John, late Earl of Gowrie, had in July, 1600. treaſonably conſpired to murder his Majeſty, and imparted his deviliſh Purpoſe to Robart Logane, of Reſtalrig, who undertook to be an Accomplice in the ſaid Treaſon; the ſame coming to the Knowledge of the Panel, (or Priſoner) he treaſonably concealed the ſame.

The Priſoner confeſſes it.

Why this is called a Trial, I cannot conceive; It had been more properly ſtiled an Arraignment, and Confeſſion: For the Priſoner confeſſing the Indictment, both at the Examination, and in open Court, was thereupon condemned to be hanged and executed; in Purſuance of his Sentence: Which may be looked upon, as a Confirmation of the Truth of Gowrie's Conſpiracy; and might be the principal Inducement for binding it up with the ſecond Collection of Trials.

Logan's pretended Trial, after he was dead.

THE Trial of Robert Logan of Reſtalrig, for High Treaſon, in conſpiring with John Earl Gowrie, to murder King James I. June, 1609. 1 Jac. 1.

This, which is called the Trial of Robert Logan, is nothing more than a Summons, for him, or his Heirs, to appear in Parliament after he was dead; and, on their not appearing, Judgment given for the forfeiting their Eſtates and Honours, as in Caſes of High Treaſon.

The Evidence.

The Evidence againſt Logan conſiſted of five Letters, written by him to Earl Gowrie, containing ſome dark Expreſſions concerning a Plot; and his Hand was proved by the Depoſitions of ſeveral Witneſſes: But the principal Evidence of Logan's being concerned in Earl Gowrie's Conſpiracy, was the Confeſſion of the aforeſaid George Sprot, both at his Arraignment and Execution.

Remarks on theſe Pieces.

All the Remarks I ſhall make on theſe Proceedings, are, that they ſeem to be inſerted, to prove the Reality of the Conſpiracy of Gowrie's, which was ſufficiently evident before: That there is nothing in them that can denominate them Trials; and that there has been a great Expence of Paper and Print, to very little Purpoſe.

The Trial of JOHN Lord Balmerino, for High-Treaſon, in Scotland, the 10th of March, 1609. 7 Jac. I.

1609. 7 Jac. I.

Balmerino's Trial. An Arraignment only.

THIS alſo, which is denominated a Trial, by the Editor, is no more than an Arraignment and Confeſſion.

The Charge. The Indictment (of which there are but very ſhort Minutes) ſeems to have charged the Priſoner with High-Treaſon, in correſponding with the Pope, in the King's Name, and againſt his particular Directions; and charges him alſo, with Negotiations with foreign States, Enemies to the Goſpel, in order to ſubvert the eſtabliſhed Religion.

Confeſſed. The Lord Balmerino, being arraigned, confeſſed his Offence in writing a Letter clandeſtinely to the Pope, and acknowledged it would admit of no Excuſe; adding, that his Majeſty knew nothing of the Letter: That the King had declared againſt having any Correſpondence with the Pope; but that he, the Priſoner, thinking it might be for his Majeſty's Intereſt, to have a good Underſtanding with the Court of Rome, had ſurreptitiouſly procured his Majeſty's Hand, to a Letter to his Holineſs, among other Papers, he brought him to ſign: But ſaid, he (the Priſoner) had no View to the Alteration of Religion, or procuring a Toleration for Catholicks, or to his own private Advantage.

The King's Letter to the Lord Advocate. His Majeſty's Letter to the Lord Advocate alſo was read; wherein he declared, he refuſed to liſten to the Priſoner's Motion, of writing to the Pope.

The Priſoner convicted, but pardoned. Whereupon the Priſoner was convicted; but Execution ſuſpended, till his Majeſty's Pleaſure was known.

And his Eſtate reſtored. He was detained, for ſome Time, a cloſe Priſoner: Afterwards he was a Priſoner at large; and at length the King reſtored him, both to his Honour, and Eſtate.

Remarks on this Proceeding. Biſhop Burnet, who could never afford King James a good Word, tells us, That his Majeſty, obſerving the Popiſh Intereſt was conſiderable in England, and might poſſibly obſtruct his aſcending that Throne, endeavoured to gain the Engliſh Papiſts, by aſſuring them, he would connive at the Exerciſe of their Religion; and that he actually wrote that Letter to the Pope, with which the Lord Balmerino, his Secretary, was charged: But that, it being afterwards publiſhed by Cardinal Bellarmine, upon his Majeſty's putting the Laws in Execution againſt the Engliſh Papiſts, the King, to alloy the Jealouſies the Kirk of Scotland had entertained, of his favouting Popery, cauſed the Lord Balmerino to be tried and condemned for it. Thus the Biſhop inſinuates, that it was all a State Trick: That this Lord was aſſured of his Pardon, before he made his Confeſſion; and conſented to abuſe the World, by undergoing a mock Trial.

In anſwer to which, it may be obſerved, There is no other Proof, of this Contrivance between the King and the Lord Balmerino, than the Suggeſtions of Biſhop Burnet, and his Friends of the Kirk of Scotland, the King's moſt inveterate Enemies: To balance which, we have not only the Lord Balmerino's Confeſſion, both before and after his Arraignment; wherein he declares, the King had no Knowledge of the Letter; and the King's own Letter, expreſly denying that he was acquainted with the Contents of it: But it appears, that the Lord Balmerino was ſo far from having any real Affection for King James, after his Arraignment, that, though his Majeſty granted him his Pardon, and reſtored him to his Honour and Eſtate, neither he, nor his Family, could ever forgive the Proſecution. His Son and Heir was remarkable for his Malice and Antipathy to his Succeſſor. We actually find him the Subject of another Trial, for High-Treaſon, in libelling his Adminiſtration.

1612. 10 Jac. I.

Lord Sanquire's Arraignment.

The Charge. THE Indictment charged him, as Acceſſary, before the Fact, to the Murder of John Turner, Fencing-Maſter.

The Caſe. The Caſe was this: Robert Creighton, Baron of Sanquire, or Sanchar, in Scotland, playing at Foils with John Turner (about five Years before the Murder) Turner thruſt out one of the Baron's Eyes, with his Foil: Whereupon the Baron, reſolving to be revenged, tampered with ſeveral Aſſaſſins, to murder Turner: But he had not an Opportunity of effecting it, till the preſent Year, 1612. when he prevailed on Gilbert Gray, one of his Servants, and Robert Carliel, a Dependant, both Scotſmen, to undertake it: But Gray afterwards declining the Attempt, Robert Carliel aſſociated himſelf with one James Irweng, another Scotſman; and theſe two, on the 11th of May, 1612. about ſeven in the Evening, went to a publick Houſe in the Friars, which Turner uſed to frequent, as he came from his School; and finding Turner there, they ſaluted him, and fell into Diſcourſe with him; when Carliel, on a ſudden, fired a Piſtol at Turner, and ſhot him in the Breaſt; and he immediately dropped down dead, ſaying only, Lord have Mercy upon me, I am killed: After which, Carliel fled to Scotland. The Lord Sanquire abſconded; Irweng and Gray were taken, endeavouring to make their Eſcapes; and Gray was afterwards made an Evidence againſt the reſt. At length, the Lord Sanquire ſurrendering himſelf, and Carliel, the principal Aſſaſſin,

The Principals convicted and executed.

Lord Sanquire convicted and executed as Acceſſary.

Aſſaſſin, being brought back from Scotland, Carliel and Irweng were tried at the Old-Bailey, London; and being convicted of the Murder, were executed in Fleet-ſtreet, near the Friars; and the Lord Sanquire being afterwards arraigned at the King's-Bench Bar, as Acceſſary before the Fact, confeſſed the Indictment; and was thereupon condemned, and executed in Palace-Yard, when he profeſſed himſelf a Roman Catholick.

Some Points of Law reſolved, before his Arraignment.

Before the Arraignment of Lord Sanquire, ſeveral Points of Law were reſolved by the Judges, particularly, That the Acceſſary could not be tried till the Principals were attainted; That a Peer of Scotland could have no Advantage of his Peerage here, but muſt be tried as an Engliſh Commoner. That the Indictment of the Acceſſary ought to be in the County of Middleſex, where he incited the Murderers to commit the Fact; and that the Indictment ought to recite, That the Principals committed the Murder in London, as the Truth was. That the King's-Bench was the proper Court to try the Acceſſary in, as it ſat in the County of Middleſex, and was ſuperior to all other Courts of Oyer and Terminer; which could not ſit in Term-Time, while that Court ſat: And that there need not be fifteen Days for the Return of the Venire facias, becauſe the Offence was committed in Middleſex, where the Court ſat; but, if the Indictment had been found in another County, and removed thither, there ought to have been fifteen Days between the Teſte and Return. That if the Principal was erroneouſly attainted, either for Error in the Proceſs, or becauſe the Principal, being out of the Realm, was outlawed, &c. yet the Acceſſary might be attainted; but then, on the Reverſal of the Attainder of the Principal for Error, the Attainder of the Acceſſary was reverſed of Courſe.

Proceedings in the Divorce between the Lady FRANCES HOWARD and ROBERT Earl of Eſſex, before George Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury, John Lord Biſhop of London, and other Commiſſioners, 1613. 11 Jac. I.

The Allegations of the Lady, to obtain a Divorce.

THE Lady Frances, Wife of Robert Earl of Eſſex, under Pretence of her Huſband's Impotency, exhibited Allegations againſt him, of the following Tenour, viz. That ſhe, being about thirteen Years of Age, was married to Robert Earl of Eſſex, in January, 1603. That the ſaid Robert was then about fourteen Years of Age, and now about twenty-three; and had, during all that Time, been in good Health; no way hindered, by Ague or Sickneſs but he might have performed the Duties of the Marriage-Bed.

That, ſince the ſaid pretended Marriage, at leaſt by the Space of three Years, ſince the ſaid Robert attained the Age of eighteen; as Time and Place ſerved, after the Faſhion of other married Folks, ſhe, the ſaid Frances Howard, in Hopes of lawful Iſſue, and deſirous to be made a Mother, lived with the ſaid Robert at Bed and Board, and they both lay naked in the ſame Bed, as married Folks uſe; and from Time to Time, again and again, ſhe yielded herſelf to his Power, and, as much as lay in her, offered herſelf and her Body to be known; and earneſtly deſired his Embraces: That the ſaid Earl very often, again and again, tried to lie with her, as his lawful Wife; which ſhe refuſed not, but uſed the beſt Means ſhe could: Notwithſtanding which, the ſaid Earl never could know her, or enjoy her, as the Marriage-Bed alloweth; though, both before and after the ſaid Time, he hath known other Women, and ſuggeſts that he was hindered by a perpetual and natural Impediment from knowing her, the Lady Frances, and could never enjoy her.

That the ſaid Lady Frances was, and ſtill is, fit for conjugal Embraces, and able to enjoy any Man; and is ſenſible of no Impediment in herſelf, and yet remains a Virgin; and was, at the Time of the pretended Marriage, unacquainted with the Earl's want of Ability, and Impediment, already mentioned.

That the ſaid Earl had very often declared, that, although he had done his beſt Endeavour, he never could once enjoy the ſaid Lady Frances. And, laſtly, That ſhe had never publiſhed his Infirmity, if ſhe had not been forced to it by falſe Rumours of her Diſobedience to the Earl: And deſires, that, ſince this pretended Marriage was but of Fact, and not of Right, it might be adjudged as none; and ſhe might be releaſed from all Knots and Bonds of the ſame, by the Sentence of the Court.

The Earl's Anſwer to the Allegations.

In anſwer to this, the Earl acknowledged, That he was about the Age in the Allegations mentioned, nor had he had above two or three Months Sickneſs ſince his Marriage. That one Year, ſince he was Eighteen, he attempted divers Times to enjoy her: That the two following Years, when he was willing, ſhe ſhewed herſelf at ſometimes willing, but at others refuſed: That he lay in Bed moſt commonly with her, and felt no Motions or Provocations; and that he could never penetrate, or enjoy her; though he found no Defect in himſelf, and both before and after the Marriage, was capable of enjoying any other Woman. As to perpetual and natural Impediments, he knew not what they meant; but he had lain, the two laſt Years, by the Lady Frances, and had no Motion to know her, and believed he never ſhould; for he thought the Lady Frances was not fit for conjugal Embraces; and admits it to be true, that he had ſaid, He often endeavoured to enjoy her, but that he had not, nor could not.

A Jury of Matrons, inſpect the Lady.

The Archbiſhop, and the reſt of the reverend Judges, obſerving from the Allegations, that both the Earl and the Counteſs were very deſirous to be divorced, ordered a Jury of Matrons to be impanelled, to inſpect the Counteſs, and

ſee if ſhe was ſtill a Virgin, as was pretended on both Sides; and whether ſhe was capable of performing the Duties of the Marriage-Bed. Whereupon ſhe was ſearched, and the Jury found that the Lady was fit for matrimonial Embraces, and capable of bearing Children; but that ſhe was ſtill a Virgin. And three Ladies, that attended the Jury, alſo depoſed, that they were preſent when the Jury made the Inſpection; and, that they gave good Reaſons for the Judgment they made.

The Archbiſhop's Reaſon's againſt the Divorce.

The King argues for it.

However, the Archbiſhop was ſtill diſſatisfied; and obſerved, that there were no good Precedents for divorcing Man and Wife, for an Impotency, or Impediment, towards a particular Woman, when the Man was capable of enjoying others: But the King, who was zealous for the Divorce, urged, that there did not want Precedents of it: To which his Grace replied, that there was none, till the Pope aſſumed a Liberty of departing from the Primitive Rules; and inſiſted, that ſome Reaſon ought to be given, for this partial Impotency, or Impediment, that was pretended: With which, when the King was preſſed, and not able to aſſign any Cauſe for it, he ſuggeſted, that the Man might be bewitched: However, ſuch was the Royal Influence, that a Majority of the Commiſſioners were for a Divorce; and the Parties were accordingly ſeparated; the Bond of Matrimony diſſolved; and it was declared lawful for either of them to marry elſewhere.

Suggeſts, the Earl was bewitched.

Sentence of Divorce.

Commiſſioners for the Divorce.

The Biſhops, who were for the Divorce, were Winchester, Ely, Rocheſter, Lichfield and Coventry; and the Doctors, Sir Julius Cæſar, Sir Thomas Parry, and Sir Daniel Donne.

Commiſſioners againſt it.

The Commiſſioners, who diſſented, were the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Biſhop of London; and the Doctors, Sir John Bennet, Francis James, and Thomas Edwards.

Both the King and the Delegates, it is ſaid, were egregiouſly impoſed upon in this Proceeding, by the Arts of the Lady Frances and her Gallant, the Lord Rocheſter: They had conſulted one Foreman, a pretended Phyſician, and a Dealer in the Black-Art, it is ſaid, who furniſhed them with Drugs, to render the Earl of Eſſex impotent, which was the Reaſon of his lying ſo quietly by the Counteſs the two laſt Years: They procured Sir Thomas Overbury to be murdered, becauſe he ſhould not defeat the Intrigue between them, or divulge their Secrets. And, when the Counteſs was to be inſpected, under Pretence of an extraordinary Modeſty, ſhe obtained Leave to be covered with a Veil, by which Means ſhe introduced a young Virgin in her Room, and deceived the Jury of Matrons, and the Court: But their Practices will be more amply diſcovered, in the ſucceeding Trials, for the Murder of Sir Thomas Overbury.

The King's being able to give no other Reaſon, for this partial Impotency towards a particular Woman, than the Earl's being bewitched, occaſioned ſome merry Reflections, when the Artifices, to prevent the Conſummation of the Lady Eſſex's Marriage, were diſcovered: And ſuch pretended Impediments have been laughed at ever ſince: But, however foul theſe Practices might appear afterwards, Things had not, certainly, ſo ill an Aſpect at the Time of the Divorce; for we find, immediately after, Rocheſter and the Lady ſolemnized their Marriage; he was made Earl of Somerſet; and, not only the Court, but the City of London, congratulated them on the Occaſion; and they were ſplendidly entertained, by the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, in the City.

The Charge.

THE Indictment charges, That the ſaid Richard Weſton, contriving, not only to bring upon the Body of Sir Thomas Overbury great Sickneſs and Diſeaſes, but to deprive him of his Life, did, in the Tower of London, procure a certain Poiſon, mingle it in Broth, and give it the ſaid Sir Thomas to eat: That he mingled Poiſon alſo, in Tarts and Jellies, and gave him; and, that the Priſoner, with an Apothecary, his Confederate, then unknown, mixed Poiſon alſo in a Clyſter, and adminiſtered it to the ſaid Sir Thomas; whereupon he fell into Diſeaſes and Diſtempers; and upon the 15th Day of September, 1613. died, being ſo poiſoned and murdered by the ſaid Richard Weſton.

The Priſoner ſtands mute.

The Priſoner, being practiſed upon by a certain Great Man, ſtood mute, and refuſed to plead the firſt Day; but being threatened with the Puniſhment, called Peine fort & dure, that is, to be preſſed to Death, and brought to his Trial again, the 23d of November, he thought fit to plead Not guilty.

Pleads Not guilty.

Whereupon the Lord Chief Juſtice informed the Jury, that, though the Poiſons mentioned in the Indictment, were Roſalgar, White Arſenick, and Mercury Sublimate, yet, they were not to expect preciſe Proof of the ſeveral Kinds of Poiſon: So, where a Man was indicted for murdering another with a Dagger, it was not material what the Weapon was, ſo as the Jury found the Murder. Then the Proofs were produced: And firſt, the Examination of Lawrence Davis, Servant to Sir Thomas Overbury, was read, who depoſed, That his Maſter was a very healthful Man, and had no Sores, or Bliſters, on his Body, before his Impriſonment: That Sir Thomas would have undertaken his

1615. 13 Jac. I.

Embaſſy, bnt the Earl of Somerſet diſſuaded him from it, and promiſed to bear him out; and, that Sir Thomas complained, he had not been a Priſoner, but for Somerſet; and, if he died, his Blood would be required at his Hands; and, that Somerſet told this Deponent at New-Market, He would be even with Sir Thomas. He further depoſed, That his Maſter wrote Somerſet a Letter, telling him, he would never conſent to his marrying the Lady Eſſex: That Somerſet ſent Overbury a Letter in the Tower, with a Powder in it, and perſuaded him to eat it; bidding him not fear, if it made him ſick; for that would be a Means of procuring his Enlargement.

Henry Payton, another Servant of Overbury's, confirmed the Teſtimony of the former; and depoſed, that his Maſter and Somerſet, had a Quarrel in the Gallery at White-Hall, about that Lord's keeping Company with the Counteſs.

Sir Dudley Diggs depoſed, that Sir Thomas was perſuaded by Somerſet, to withdraw himſelf from Court, and depended on his Protection.

The Priſoner's Examination read.

Then the Priſoner's Examination was read, wherein he declared, That before Somerſet's Marriage, or the Impriſonment of Sir Thomas, he carried ſeveral Letters between Somerſet and the Counteſs: That they met thereupon at a Farmer's Houſe in the Country; and, at Night in Town, at Mrs. Turner's in Pater-noſter-row. He depoſed alſo, that he ſhewed the Phial, the Counteſs ſent him in the Tower, to the Lieutenant, who perſuaded him not to give it Sir Thomas: But that he did however give it him; as alſo ſeveral Tarts, and other Things, that were poiſoned, together with the poiſoned Clyſter, by the Direction of the Counteſs, and Mrs. Turner, who promiſed him a Reward; and that the Clyſter gave Overbury ſixty Stools and a Vomit: That the Counteſs ſent him, by Mrs. Turner, an hundred and eighty Pounds, at two Payments: And, that he was preferred to the Keeping Sir Thomas Overbury, in the Tower, by the Counteſs and Mrs. Turner's Means, who prevailed on Sir Thomas Monſon, to uſe his Intereſt with the Lieutenant to give him that Place.

1615. 13 Jac. I.

Sir Thomas Monſon alſo depoſed, that he recommended the Priſoner to the Lieutenant of the Tower, to be Sir Thomas Overbury's Keeper, at the Requeſt of the Counteſs.

The Examination of Sir Jervis Elvis, Governor of the Tower, alſo was read, who confeſſed the Priſoner was recommended to him by Sir Thomas Monſon; who gave him Direction alſo, that he ſhould not ſuffer any Letter, Tokens, or other Things, to be delivered to Overbury. He alſo confeſſed, he was Privy to the ſending the Poiſon to Weſton, for Overbury to take; but ſaid, he diſſuaded him from adminiſtring them.

Simon Marſon, a Muſician, depoſed, that he was Servant to Sir Thomas Monſon; and that he received Tarts and Jellies from the Counteſs of Eſſex, and carried them to Sir Thomas Overbury, in the Tower.

Paul de la Belle depoſed, That he ſaw Overbury's Body, after he was dead; and that it was full of Bliſters, and ſo conſumed as he had never ſeen the like.

George Rawlins, a Kinſman of Overbury's, depoſed, that he came often to the Tower to ſee him; but was not ſuffered to ſee him even at the Window; and Weſton ſaid, that was the Order of the Council, and of the Lieutenant.

Sir David Wood depoſed, that the Lady Eſſex offered him a thouſand Pounds, and her Protection, if he would murder Sir Thomas Overbury.

The Priſoner makes ſcarce any Defence.

The Priſoner denied the whole Charge upon his Trial, though he had confeſſed it before; but, being able to alledge very little to prove himſelf innocent, the Jury found him GUILTY of poiſoning and murdering Sir Thomas Overbury; and he was thereupon condemned, and executed.

He is convicted, and condemned.

Anne Turner's Trial, for Overbury's Murder. The Charge.

THE Indictment charged her, as Acceſſary before the Fact, and with aiding and aſſiſting the aforeſaid Richard Weſton, to poiſon Sir Thomas Overbury.

The Evidence.

And a Letter from the Counteſs of Eſſex, to Mrs. Turner, was read in Evidence; wherein the Counteſs tells Turner, her Huſband complained he had not lain with her; and, that her Father, her Mother, and Brother, told her, ſhe muſt obey him, and were very angry with her; but ſhe had rather die a thouſand Times, for then ſhe ſhould loſe the other's (Somerſet's) Love; deſires Turner, therefore, to do what ſhe could for her, and ſhe ſhould have as much Money as ſhe could deſire.

A Letter from the Counteſs, to Foreman the Quack and Conjurer, alſo was read, wherein ſhe bids him remember the Galls; for ſhe ſaid, ſhe was afraid, though all Things remained well as yet; deſired he would ſend her ſome good Fortune, and keep the Lord ſtill true to her; and wiſhed, if ſhe was ungrateful, all Miſchief might befall her: Told him, her Lord was luſty, and drank with his Men; and all the Content he gave her, was to abuſe her, and to uſe her doggedly, as formerly; and ſaid, ſhe ſhould never be happy in this World, becauſe he hindered her Good; and begged, for God's Sake, Foreman would get her from that vile Place: Subſcribing herſelf his affectionate Daughter, Frances Eſſex. Then

Then ſeveral Pictures, and Paper Charms, were produced in Court, which were found in the Cuſtody of Mrs. Turner; at which Time, the Scaffolding in the Hall giving a Crack, the People were in a great Conſternation, believing the Devil was coming for them.

Mrs. Foreman, the Doctor's Widow, alſo brought into Court ſeveral Pictures and Charms, that were uſed to provoke the Lord Somerſet to love the Counteſs; and in ſome Scraps of Parchment, ſome Devils were invoked by Name, to torment the Lord Somerſet and Sir Arthur Manwaring, if they proved falſe to the Counteſs, and Mrs. Turner.

Turner, the Priſoner, alſo confeſſed, that they had applied to Dr. Savory, another Conjurer, after Foreman's Death; and had practiſed ſeveral Sorceries againſt the Earl of Eſſex's Perſon. 1615. 13 Jac. I.

Then the ſame Examinations were read, againſt the Priſoner, as were read in the former Trial of Weſton; whereby ſhe appeared to be the Counteſs of Eſſex's Agent, in conveying the Poiſons to Weſton for Sir Thomas Overbury: And, ſaying very little in her Defence, the Jury found her GUILTY of the Murder; and, Sentence being pronounced upon her, ſhe was executed a few Days afterwards.

She making ſcarce any Defence, is convicted, and executed.

Elvis tried for Overbury's Murder.

The Charge.

THE Indictment charges him as Acceſſary, before the Fact, to the ſaid Murder; and with abetting, aiding, and aſſiſting, Weſton in it.

The Evidence.

The ſame Evidence was given, of his being Privy to the ſending the Poiſons to Weſton, as in Weſton's Trial. Three Letters, from the Earl of Northampton to Somerſet, alſo were read; in the firſt of which, Northampton tells Somerſet, that he had ſpent two Hours, the Day before, in prompting the Lieutenant with Cautions, and Conſiderations, how to act his Part in the Adventure: In the ſecond, he tells him of the Care the Lieutenant took of his Charge; and, in the third, that Overbury's Body being viewed, there were found twelve Tumours on his Belly, ready to break: That the Corpſe was a diſmal Spectacle, and ſtunk ſo intolerably, that they were forced to caſt it into a Coffin, with a looſe Sheet over it; and concluded, that God was gracious in cutting off all the Inſtruments of the factious Crew.

A Letter, from Sir Jervis Elvis to the Earl of Northampton, alſo was read, wherein he undertakes to keep Sir Thomas Overbury according to his Inſtructions; ſays, he adviſed Sir Thomas to give way to the Match between Somerſet, (then Rocheſter) and the Counteſs; and, that Sir Thomas grew warm againſt the Lord Northampton and the Counteſs of Suffolk, telling him, if he were the Counteſs of Suffolk's Priſoner, as he thought he was, the Lieutenant might let her know, that he cared as little to die, as ſhe did to be cruel; adding, Of Rocheſter's Part I ſhall greatly fear, until I ſee the Event.

Franklin's Examination read.

Then the Examination of James Franklin, the Apothecary, was read, who depoſed, that Mrs. Turner came to him from the Counteſs of Eſſex, and deſired him to get the ſtrongeſt Poiſons he could for Overbury; and he, thereupon, bought ſeven Sorts, and ſent them to Overbury at ſeveral Times; and, that the Lieutenant knew of them, as appeared by ſeveral Letters he wrote to the Counteſs, which this Deponent had ſeen; in one of which was this Expreſſion; Madam, The Scab is like the Fox; the more he is curſed, the better he fareth: And further, that Overbury ſcarce ever eat any Thing, but there was Poiſon mixed with it; and for theſe Poiſons the Counteſs ſent him Rewards: That ſhe ſtill ſent for more Poiſons; and the Deponent beſought her, on his Knees, not to uſe him any more in this Matter; but ſhe would not deſiſt; and ſaid, ſhe would poiſon him, becauſe he would pry into her Suit: Concluding, that the Day the Counteſs was married, ſhe ſent the Deponent twenty Pounds, by Mrs. Turner; and he was to have had two hundred Pounds per annum, for Life.

The Priſoner's Defence.

To this Charge, and Evidence, Sir Jervis made a very poor Defence: He acknowledged indeed, he ſuſpected, there was a Deſign to poiſon his Priſoner, Overbury; but that he was no ways Acceſſary to it, or aiding and aſſiſting in it; and, thereupon, put the following Caſe to the Judges: If one knows not of a Plot to poiſon another, but only ſuſpects it, and is no Actor, or Contriver, Whether ſuch a one be Acceſſary to the Murder? If the Court thought ſuch a concealing, without Malice, was an Abetting, then he would acknowledge himſelf Guilty: But the Court thought his Guilt too manifeſt, to favour him with a Reſolution of this Caſe; and obſerved, that Franklin's Confeſſion left him without Excuſe: The Jury being withdrawn, ſoon after returned with a Verdict, that the Priſoner was GUILTY; whereupon Sentence of Death paſſed upon him; and he was hanged at Tower-Hill, to deter future Governors of that Fortreſs from conſenting to ſuch Practices againſt the King's Priſoners.

He puts a Caſe of Law to the Judges.

He is convicted, and executed.

1615. 13 Jac. I.

Franklin's Trial, for the Murder of Overbury.

The Charge.

THE Indictment charges the Priſoner, as Acceſſary, before the Fact, to the Murder of Sir Thomas Overbury, by preparing ſeveral Sorts of Poiſon, for him to take.

The Evidence.

The Evidence againſt the Priſoner was, his own Examination and Confeſſion, which differs, in ſome Particulars, from his Examination that was read againſt Sir Jervis Elvis; and, probably, was taken at another Time.

His own Confeſſion.

In this Confeſſion the Priſoner ſays, That Mrs. Turner deſired him, to provide a Poiſon that would not kill a Man preſently, but lie in his Body a certain Time, wherewith he might languiſh, by little and little; and, that ſhe gave him four Angels, with which he bought Aqua fortis; and ſhe tried it upon a Cat, that languiſhed, and cried pitifully, two Days, and then died: Then Mrs. Turner brought him to the Counteſs, who told him, Aqua fortis was too ſtrong, and propoſed Arſenick, which the Priſoner ſaid was too violent: Then ſhe propoſed Powder of Diamonds, which, he ſaid, he did not know the Nature of: And ſhe anſwered, he was a Fool; and, giving him ſome Gold, bid him buy that Powder for her; and, enquiring, why ſhe would poiſon Sir Thomas, ſhe ſaid, he would pry ſo far into their Concerns, that he would undo them all: That, a little before Overbury's Death, the Counteſs ſent for him, and ſhewed him a Letter from the Lord Rocheſter (Somerſet) wherein he read theſe Words, I marvel at theſe Delays, that the Buſineſs is not yet diſpatched: By which the Deponent believed, he meant the poiſoning of Overbury: And that the ſaid Rocheſter ſaid, in another Letter, Sir Thomas was to come out of the Tower within two Days, and they ſhould be all undone: And, thereupon, the Counteſs ſent for Weſton, and was very angry with him, that he had not diſpatched Sir Thomas: And Weſton anſwered, he had given him a Thing, that would have killed twenty Men.

That, about a Fortnight after Weſton was taken up, the Counteſs ſent for the Deponent, and told him, Weſton had confeſſed, and they ſhould all be hanged; adding, On your Life, do not confeſs, you brought me, or Mrs. Turner, any Poiſon; for, if you do, you ſhall be hanged; I will not hang for you.

That Weſton came to his (the Deponent Franklin's) Houſe, and told him, Now the Counteſs's Turn was ſerved, ſhe uſed him unkindly; and that two Perſons were employed to poiſon them both.

The Priſoner acknowledged in Court, that he did buy the Poiſons mentioned in his Confeſſion; but proteſted, at his Trial, that he was ignorant what they intended to do with them: Which the Jury not regarding, found him GUILTY; and he was condemned, and executed.

Franklin convicted, and executed.

1616. 14 Jac. I.

The Counteſs of Somerſet's Arraignment, for Overbury's Murder.

The Charge.

THE Indictment being read, in which ſhe was charged, as Acceſſary, before the Fact, to the poiſoning and murdering Sir Thomas Overbury, a Certificate was produced, ſigned by the Judges of the King's Bench, to prove that Weſton had been convicted, as Principal, for the ſaid Murder.

Proof that the Principal was convicted. She pleads guilty.

To which Indictment the Priſoner pleaded GUILTY. However, Sir Francis Bacon, the Attorney-General, thought fit to give an Account how the Murder was diſcovered, and what had been done upon it. He ſaid, Overbury died by Poiſon, in the Tower of London, the 15th of September, 1613. and immediately, upon his Death, there was a Rumour, that he came ſtrangely by his End. On the contrary, there was another Report, that he died of a very foul Diſeaſe: And although it was above two Years ſince he was murdered, God had ſo infatuated the two great Procurers, and their Inſtruments, that the former took no Care about it, and the others fled not: That the Diſcovery of the Murder was in a Manner miraculous, and came out in a Compliment: The Lord Shrewſbury recommending Sir Jervis Elvis to a Miniſter of State, whom Sir Jervis deſired to be made known to, that Miniſter anſwered, he took it as a Favour from his Lordſhip; but added, there lay an heavy Imputation on Sir Jervis, about Overbury's Death, and wiſhed he would clear himſelf in that Point; which the Lord Shrewſbury reporting to Sir Jervis, he appeared in ſome Conſternation, and ſaid, ſome Attempts, indeed, had been made againſt Sir Thomas Overbury, but they came to nothing, having been checked by him.

How the Diſcovery was made.

The King being acquainted with what Elvis ſaid, ordered him to write down what he knew of it, which he did; but took care to be very favourable in what related to himſelf: And the Matter being referred to a Committee of Council, Weſton was ſent for, who made a further Diſ-

Diſcovery; and the Offenders were ordered to be proſecuted: Whereupon, no Practices were left untried, to ſtifle the Truth. Weſton was prevailed on to ſtand mute, for ſome Time; but at length, a full Diſcovery was made, and the under Actors in this Tragedy having been convicted and executed, this Lady, one of the Authors and Contrivers of it, was brought to Trial, and convicted alſo, by her own Confeſſion: He deſired therefore, her Confeſſion might be recorded, and Judgment given againſt her.

1616. 14 Jac. I.

She deſires the Interceſſion of the Lords.

And it being thereupon demanded of the Counteſs, what ſhe had to ſay, why Judgment of Death ſhould not be pronounced, ſhe anſwered, She could ſay much to aggravate, but nothing to extenuate, her Fault; only deſired the Lords would intercede for her to the King, for Mercy: Whereupon the Lord High Steward paſſed Sentence on the Priſoner, but ſaid, ſince the Lords had obſerved, with what Humility and Grief ſhe had confeſſed the Fact, he did not doubt but they would become Mediators for her to the King.

Sentence pronounced.

The Trial of ROBERT CARR, Earl of Somerſet, for the Murder of Sir Thomas Overbury, before the Peers appointed to try him, the 25th of May, 1616. 14 Jac. I.

1616. 14 Jac. I.

The Charge.

THE Indictment charges him as Acceſſary, before the Fact, to the poiſoning and murdering Sir Thomas Overbury; to which he pleaded NOT GUILTY.

Sufficient, to prove the Subſtance of the Indictment.

Mr. Serjeant Montague opened the Indictment, and obſerved, that the only Thing to be enquired of was, whether the Lord Somerſet had procured, or cauſed, the poiſoning Sir Thomas Overbury; the Form and Circumſtances mentioned in the Indictment were not to be regarded; to which the Lord High Steward, Sir Edward Coke, and the reſt of the Judges, aſſented.

Sir Francis Bacon opens the Evidence.

Then the Attorney-General, Sir Francis Bacon, ſaid, That the King had given them in command, not to expatiate or make Invectives, but materially to purſue the Evidence, as it conduced to the determining the Point in queſtion; and this they ſhould have done of themſelves, if they had not had ſo good a Warrant; for far be it from us (ſays he) by any Strains of Wit, or Art, to ſeek to play Prizes, or blazon our Names in Blood; but obſerved, however, that next to High-Treaſon, the Offence the Priſoner ſtood charged with, was the greateſt and fouleſt Felony; it was Murder by Poiſon; Murder committed on the King's Priſoner; and Murder under a Colour of Friendſhip: That what rendered the Crime of poiſoning ſo deteſtable was, that a Man was taken off in full Peace, thinking no Harm, and while he was comforting and refreſhing Nature with his Food; and was the more to be dreaded, becauſe it was ſo eaſily committed, and ſo hard to be prevented or diſcovered; other Murders were committed cum ſonitu. There were ſome Acts that might diſcover or trace the Offenders; but this came upon a Man, when he thought himſelf in perfect Security, and every Day he was within the Gates of Death: Nor did it concern only the Man againſt whom the Malice was intended, but it was often prepared for one, and taken by another; as in the Reign of Hen. VIII. where the Intent was to poiſon one; and the Poiſon being put into the Broth, ſixteen of the Biſhop of Rocheſter's Servants were poiſoned; and it went even to the Alms-Baſket, and the Poor at the Gate were poiſoned with it; which occaſioned a Statute, that made poiſoning High-Treaſon; for it tended to diſſolve human Society; and whatever Offence did ſo, was of the Nature of High-Treaſon; and obſerved, that Sir Thomas was the firſt Man that had been murdered in the Tower, except the two young Princes, who were deſtroyed by Richard III.

Shews the Heinouſneſs of the Crime.

Unlawful Love the Source of this Miſchief.

He ſhews, that the Source of all this Miſchief was, unlawful Love, between the Earl of Somerſet and the Counteſs of Eſſex, which Overbury oppoſing, they both determined to deſtroy him: Not that Overbury oppoſed it out of any Scruple of Conſcience (for there was a Time, when he boaſted he had won him the Love of this very Lady, by his Letters and Induſtry) but out of Hatred to the Family of the Howards: And this had drawn the Earl of Northampton into the Plot againſt him, who knowing Overbury's Malice to himſelf, and his Houſe, thought it neceſſary he ſhould be removed, and cut off; and thus it was certainly reſolved and decreed amongſt them, that Overbury muſt die.

The Evidence.

Then the Witneſſes were produced, and firſt Henry Payton, a Servant of Sir Thomas Overbury's, who depoſed, that he heard high Words between the Earl of Somerſet and his Maſter, concerning the Earl's viſiting the Counteſs in the Gallery of Whitehall, as he had depoſed in the Trial of Weſton. He depoſed further, that he ſaw a Letter from his Maſter to the Priſoner, the Lord Somerſet, wherein were theſe Words: If I die, my Blood be upon you; and in that, or another, My Lord, you are now as good as your Word, you have kept your Vow to me: That when his Maſter was in the Tower, Weſton ordered the Deponent, to tell the Lord Somerſet, that the Powder, his Lordſhip had ſent Sir Thomas, had given him ſixty Stools, beſides Vomits; and that when he delivered the Meſſage to Lord Somerſet, he cried, Piſh, and turned away.

Two Letters from Overbury to Somerſet.

Two Letters from Sir Thomas Overbury, to the Earl of Somerſet, alſo were read in Evidence, in one of which he ſays, "Is this the "Fruit of my Care and Love to you? Are "theſe the Fruits of common Secrets, common "Dangers?

1616. 14 Jac. 1.

" Dangers? You cannot ſuffer me to lie in this " Miſery. All I entreat of you is, to free " me from this Place, and that we may part " Friends. Drive me not to Extremities, leſt " I ſhould ſay ſomething that you and I both " repent."

In the other Letter he ſays, " You told my " Brother Lidcote, that my irreverent Stile " made you neglect me. With what Face " could you do this, when you know you owe " me all the Fortune, Wit, and Underſtand- " ing, that you have? You ſacrifice me to " your Woman, ſtill holding Friendſhip with " them that brought me hither. You bad my " Brother Lidcote keep my Deſire of Liberty " ſecret: But this ſhall not ſerve your Turn; " you and I, ere long, will come to a Trial " of another Nature. I am upon the Rack, " and you are at Eaſe, and yet I muſt ſay no- " thing! When I heard, notwithſtanding my " Miſery, you went to your Woman, curled " your Hair, preferred Gibbe to the Bed Cham- " ber; and, in the mean time, ſend me nine- " teen Projects, how I ſhould caſt about for " my Liberty; give me a long Account of " the Pains you have taken, and then go out " of Town, while I have neither Friend, or " Servant, ſuffered to come at me. Well, I " have written the Story betwixt you and me, " how I have loſt my Friends, for your Sake; " what Hazards I have run; what Secrets have " paſſed between us; how, when you had won " that Woman by my Letters, you concealed " all After-Proceedings from me, which occa- " ſioned thoſe Breaches between us; of the " Vow you made to be even with me, and " ſending for me twice that Day I was caught " in the Trap; perſuaded me it was a Plot of " my Enemies, to ſend me beyond Sea; and " urged me not to accept it (the Embaſſy) aſ- " ſuring me you would free me from any long " Trouble. On Friday I ſent this Narrative " to a Friend, under eight Seals; and, if you " perſiſt to uſe me thus, aſſure yourſelf, it ſhall " be publiſhed. Whether I live or die, your " Shame ſhall never die, but remain to the " World's End, to make you the moſt odious " Man living."

Then Simcock's Examination was read, who depoſed, that when Sir Thomas was in the Tower, Weſton often told him, the Lord Somerſet ordered him to look well to Overbury; for, if he came out, one of them muſt die.

Another Examination of L. Davis alſo was read, who depoſed, that ſeveral ſealed Packets, directed to the King, were given to Sir Thomas by the Lord Somerſet; and that Sir Thomas opened them, took ſhort Notes out of them, and then ſealed them up, and returned them to the Lord Somerſet again.

Overbury's Father's Evidence.

The Depoſitions of Franklin, and the reſt of the Witneſſes, alſo were read, which were given in Evidence at the former Trials; and Mr. Overbury, Father of Sir Thomas, depoſed, that, hearing his Son was very ſick in the Tower, he petitioned the King, that ſome Phyſicians might have Acceſs to him; and the King ſaid, his own Phyſician ſhould go to him: Whereupon he addreſſed himſelf to the Lord Somerſet, who ſaid, his Son ſhould be ſpeedily delivered; but bad him prefer no more Petitions. However, not finding any Steps taken towards releaſing him, he preferred another Petition, and the King ſaid, he ſhould have an immediate Anſwer; and the Lord Somerſet told him, he ſhould ſuddenly be relieved: but adviſed, that neither the Petitioner, or his Wife, ſhould preſs to ſee him, becauſe it might protract his Delivery; nor deliver any more Petitions to the King, for that might ſtir up his Enemies againſt him.

1616. 14 Jac. 1.

Somerſet's Letter to Mrs. Overbury.

The following Letter from the Lord Somerſet, to Mrs. Overbury, alſo was read, viz. " Your Stay in Town can avail nothing to- " wards your Son's Delivery. I would ad- " viſe you to retire into the Country; and " doubt not, before your coming home, you " will hear he is a free Man."

Another to Mr. Overbury.

Then a Letter that the Lord Somerſet wrote to Mr. Overbury, after his Son's Death, was read, wherein he ſays,

" Your Son's Love to me got him the Ma- " lice of many; and they caſt thoſe Knots on " his Fortune, that coſt him his Life; ſo, in " a kind, there is none guilty of his Death " but I; and you cannot have more Cauſe to " commiſerate the Death of a Son, than I of " a Friend: But, though he be dead, you ſhall " find me as ready as ever I was, to do all the " Courteſies that poſſibly I can, to you and " your Wife, or your Children. In the mean " Time, I deſire Pardon from you, and your " Wife, for your loſt Son, though I eſteem " my Loſs the greater: And for his Brother, " that is in France, I deſire his Return, that " he may ſucceed his Brother in my Love."

Depoſition, not upon Oath.

Several Examinations were read, ſhewing, that Overbury was detained, and kept cloſe Priſoner, by Somerſet's Order, though he was committed only for Contempt, and the great Apprehenſions he and his Lady were under, leſt Overbury ſhould get out: But ſome of theſe Examinations were not upon Oath.

The Letters concerning the Lord Northampton's Practices with Sir Jervis Elvis alſo were read, in one of which he tells Somerſet, the Lieutenant had undertaken, that either Overbury ſhould do him good Offices with the Lord Suffolk, or elſe he ſhould never recover, which he thought the moſt ſure and happy Change: Which Letters the Priſoner acknowledged he had received.

Then Proof was made of Somerſet's ſending Overbury Arſenick in a Letter; and the ſending the poiſoned Tarts and Jellies, as in the other Trials; and Franklin's Depoſition was read, wherein he ſays, he was ſent for by the Lady Somerſet, and made to take an Oath of Secrecy, in order to ſuppreſs the Diſcovery.

And Sir Robert Cotton depoſed, that a little before the laſt Michaelmas, Somerſet gave him a Draught of the largeſt Pardon that had been granted, wherein, among other Offences, both Murder and Treaſon were pardoned; by which he was ordered to draw one for the Priſoner.

The Earl of Somerſet's Defence.

The Earl of Somerſet, in his Defence, ſaid, that the Powder he ſent Overbury, was to make him ſick, that he might have the better Handle to ſpeak to the King for him; and that it was at Overbury's Deſire he ſent it: That though he had conſented to his Impriſonment, that was only to prevent his being an Impediment to his his Marriage; and he had, however, given Orders he ſhould have the moſt airy Lodgings, and might ſpeak with whom he would. That, though Breach of Friendſhip had been urged as an Aggravation againſt him, it was no wonder for Friends to fall out; and he thought Overbury never had a Friend to whom he had not given Offence.

He confeſſed there had been a Communication of Secrets between them; and, knowing Overbury's Abilities, he had employed him to take Abſtracts out of Ambaſſador's Letters, and that by the King's Order. That he was ſo far from diſſuading Overbury not to undertake the Embaſſy, that he would gladly have had him gone, that he might have been out of the way at that Time, as well on Account of his Marriage, as Overbury's Inſolence, and therefore could not be ſuppoſed to have prevented his going. That as to the poiſoned Tarts, his Wife had confeſſed the ſending them; but thoſe the Priſoner ſent ought to be preſumed wholſome, till it was proved otherwiſe.

That the Lord Northampton's Letters proved no more, than that the Lieutenant would endeavour to make Overbury a good Inſtrument between him and Suffolk; and though Elvis, in his Letter, ſays, Death is the beſt way, the Anſwer to thoſe Letters, would juſtify him, if he had them to produce. He had endeavoured, indeed, to get a Pardon, as he might have been guilty of ſome Overſights, in the Beginning of his Adminiſtration, when he was unacquainted with Affairs of State: but the general Words in it were put in, by the Lawyers, without his Privity: And then, having recommended his Caſe to the Conſideration of his Peers, he withdrew; but, it ſeems, they were unanimous in their Opinion, that the Priſoner was GUILTY; and he was adjudged to be hanged. Whereupon, he deſired the Interceſſion of the Lord High Steward, and the reſt of the Peers, to his Majeſty, for Mercy; and they interceded ſo effectually, both in Behalf of the Earl, and the Counteſs, that they obtained their Pardon, with this Limitation, that they ſhould remain impriſoned, during his Majeſty's Pleaſure.

He is convicted.

The Earl and Counteſs pardoned as to their Lives. Remain Priſoners in the Tower till the Year 1622.

Both of them having continued Priſoners in the Tower (the Scene of their Villany) till the 18th of January, 1622. they obtained an Order of Council, for their Releaſe from thence: But the Earl and the Counteſs, were required, to repair, either to Grays, or Cowſham, the Lord Wallingford's Houſes, in the County of Oxon, and remain confined in one of the ſaid Houſes, and within three Miles Compaſs of either of them, until further Orders from his Majeſty; and, it appears, that the King permitted the Earl to enjoy the greateſt Part of his Eſtate, notwithſtanding his Attainder.

Afterwards confined in Oxfordſhire.

Remarks on the Trials of Overbury's Murderers.

It is obſervable, in theſe Trials, that the Court reſolved, it was not neceſſary to find the Circumſtances laid in the Indictment, ſo as the Subſtance, namely, the poiſoning, was found.

We find Examinations ſtill read againſt the Priſoners here, as in former Trials: It was not, yet, cuſtomary, to produce the Witneſſes, to give their Evidence, viva voce; though this was ſometimes done: But, it was ſtill more irregular, and, indeed, illegal, to read the Examinations of Perſons convicted, and even executed, for the ſame Crime; and ſeveral of them not upon Oath. It is true, there was abundant Evidence, beſides, of the Priſoners Guilt; but this would not juſtify the bringing Evidence againſt them that was not legal: But Courts of Juſtice did what they pleaſed with Priſoners, in thoſe Days, as is manifeſt by theſe and the former Trials.

1616. 14 Jac. I.

Sir Francis Bacon very rightly obſerved, in theſe Trials, That all this Miſchief proceeded from an unlawful Amour, in which, perhaps, the Parties, at firſt, thought there was very little hurt. Had they foreſeen that Train of Evils that ſucceeded; that Injuſtice, Treachery, and Ingratitude; the barbarous Murder they muſt commit, to conceal the firſt Crime; the many Perſons there would be a Neceſſity of drawing into the ſame Guilt; the Lives that muſt be loſt, and the eternal Infamy that muſt ſucceed; they would, ſurely, never have engaged in ſuch an Attempt: Which ought for ever to caution others, how they deviate from the Paths of Virtue: We are, inſenſibly, led from one Step to another, till we find ourſelves involved in Crimes, which we could not at firſt have reflected on without Horror.

And thus we ſee, how Changes are frequently brought about, unexpectedly, in Courts and Kingdoms: One is diſgraced, another preferred, and the whole World, ſometimes, put in Confuſion, by a little Piece of Gallantry, as ſome term it: And a Miſtreſs ſhall put a Prime Miniſter upon perpetrating the vileſt Actions, to gratify her Revenge, or Luſt. I queſtion, whether there is to be met with in Hiſtory, a Man more univerſally deteſted, than Somerſet, who, to enjoy a faithleſs, laſcivious Woman, ſacrificed his Friend, and made him undergo the moſt cruel Tortures; and, after he had killed him, endeavoured to murder his Memory, by giving out, he died of an infamous Diſtemper. This may ſerve alſo, as a Specimen of the Friendſhips among the Great; and ſhews us, at the ſame Time, how dreadful a Thing it is, to fall into the Hands of a Prime Miniſter. Here we ſee one inciting his Friend to offend his Prince, and then, putting his Prince upon puniſhing him a thouſand Times more than the Offence could ever deſerve; or, rather, he makes uſe of his Sovereign's Name, to rack and torture his Friend to Death: And, how eaſy is it for a Miniſter, at this Day, thus to exerciſe his Malice againſt any Man he does not like? Let him charge the Party, firſt, with ſome notorious Crime; and this gives him a Colour to impriſon him in a Dungeon, to load him with Irons, exclude all his Friends from him, and murder him, almoſt, with repeated Hardſhips, and the Noiſomneſs of the Place; and this, before a Man appears guilty of any Crime whatever: Which ſeems a very great Defect in the Laws of a Country, which are ſaid to be ſo well adapted to the Preſervation of Liberty and Property.

Every Man is ſuppoſed to be innocent, and ought to be dealt with as ſuch, till he is convicted. But here a Man often ſuffers more before he is brought to his Trial, than he can do for the Offence afterwards, if he appears guilty of it: And this, perhaps, to make him an Evidence againſt a Perſon, ſome Great Man 1616. 14 Jac. I. Man has a Mind to deſtroy: Priſons may be made as ſtrong, and ſecure, as can be deſired; but, why People ſhould be tortured, and their Friends debarred from ſeeing, and relieving them, till it appears they are guilty, is not eaſy to conceive. This, ſurely, can be with no other View, than to gratify the Malice of his Enemies; or, to make ſuch unfortunate People Tools, to ſerve the Turn of an abandoned Miniſtry.

How King James came to ſpare the Principal Actors in this Tragedy, and execute only their under Agents, is very unaccountable, and muſt be allowed to reflect no ſmall Diſhonour on his Memory: It would not only have been the moſt juſt, but the moſt popular Thing he could have done, to have left theſe great, but infamous Offenders, to the Puniſhment their Crimes deſerved. 1616. 14 Jac. The Trial of JOHN OGILVIE Jeſuit, for High-Treaſon, at Glaſcow in Scotland, the 28th of February, 1615. 13 Jac. I.

The Charge. THE Indictment recites, That whereas God, the Author of all righteous Government, had eſtabliſhed Kings and Magiſtrates, his Lieutenants upon Earth; and had particularly bleſſed that Country with a more ancient, juſt, and permanent Deſcent of lawful Kings, than any other Nation in the World, and extended their Felicity beyond the Happineſs of their Anceſtors, by the Juſtice, Wiſdom, and Clemency, of his Majeſty's proſperous Reign, honouring, and ſtrengthening him, with the Acceſſion of the moſt mighty and flouriſhing Kingdoms of England, France, and Ireland: Which viſible Favours, proceeding directly from God's bountiful Hand, moved the whole Eſtates of that Kingdom, in the Parliament aſſembled at Perth, the 9th of July, 1606. to acknowledge his Majeſty's Sovereign Authority, Royal Prerogative, Power, and Privilege, of his Crown, over all Eſtates, Perſons, and Cauſes, whatſoever, within that Kingdom; and promiſe to maintain, defend, and advance, the Honour, Dignity, Sovereign Authority, and Prerogatives of his ſacred Majeſty, againſt all Perſons, Powers, and Eſtates, who ſhould impugn or impair the ſame. And whereas, by an Act made in the Parliament holden at Edinburgh, the 22d of May, 1584. his Majeſty's Royal Power and Authority, over all Eſtates Spiritual and Temporal, was ratified and confirmed: And it was enacted, that none ſhould preſume to decline the Judgment of his Highneſs, his Heirs, or Succeſſors, on Pain of High Treaſon. And by divers other Parliaments, it was enacted, That all the King's Leiges ſhould be governed by his Majeſty's Laws, and by no Laws of other Countries, or Realms, on Pain of Treaſon: Notwithſtanding all which, the Priſoner had renounced his natural Allegiance and Duty to his native King; caſt of all Reverence for his Sovereign Authority, and Laws, and dedicated his Mind and Actions to the unlawful Obedience of Foreign Powers, Adverſaries to his Majeſty, and, reſolving to ſeduce his Subjects from their Faith and Allegiance, repaired to Scotland, in the Month of June then laſt paſſed, and by Conferences, Inticements, Maſs-ſaying, and other ſubtil and crafty Means, endeavoured to corrupt many of his Majeſty's Lieges in Religion, and pervert them from their dutiful Obedience to his Majeſty, until he was detected and apprehended by the Archbiſhop of Glaſcow, who, with others of his Majeſty's Council, uſed all charitable Means, to bring him to a Senſe of his heinous Offences, by his Majeſty's Directions: That the Priſoner proved hardned and deaf, to all their Advice; and, at his Examination, had aſſerted and defended, ſeveral treaſonable Poſitions (mentioned in the Indictment, and recited in the Courſe of the Trial) plainly diſcovering, that he approved the Means, and wiſhed the Overthrow of his Majeſty's Eſtate; the Deſtruction of his Perſon; the Seduction of his Subjects from their Allegiance; and thereby, and by every one of his ſaid Anſwers, had committed moſt heinous, deteſtable, and unpardonable Treaſon.

Acts in Scotland acknowledging the King's Supremacy.

The King's Counſel open the Charge.

The King's Counſel, in opening the Indictment, obſerved, That the Priſoner was not indicted purely for ſaying Maſs, and propagating Popery; but for declining his Majeſty's Authority, and maintaining treaſonable Opinions: That the Statutes mentioned in the Indictment, made it Treaſon, not to anſwer the King, or his Council, when a Priſoner was under Examination for High Treaſon: But, that he being examined by the Lord Archbiſhop of Glaſcow, and other honourable Perſons, of his Majeſty's Special Commiſſion, refuſed to anſwer divers Interrogatories, and profeſſedly avowed the Pope of Rome's Juriſdiction. ——That it being demanded of him, 1. Whether the Pope had Power to depoſe the King? 2. Whether it was lawful to ſlay his Majeſty, being depoſed by the Pope? 3. Whether the Pope had Power to abſolve his Majeſty's Subjects from their Allegiance? he refuſed to anſwer theſe Points, unleſs he was required ſo to do by the Pope, or others authoriſed by him; not acknowledging, that his Majeſty's Crown and Authority, was held immediately of God, the Author of all Government; and had voluntarily declared, that the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy were unlawful.

Then was read the Acts of Parliament, on which the Indictment was founded, and the Priſoner's Examination before the Council, ſubſcribed by himſelf, which was the principal Evidence produced againſt him.

The Priſoner juſtifies his Treaſons.

The Priſoner, inſtead of making a regular Defence, or excuſing his Crimes, proteſted againſt

1615. 13 Jac. I.

gainſt the Juriſdiction of the Court; denied the Facts laid in the Indictment were Treaſon; and even diſputed the Authority of thoſe Parliaments that declared thoſe Facts to be Treaſon: He ſaid, thoſe Parliaments were compoſed of a Number of partial Men, and thoſe Acts made, without the Conſent of the chief Men of the Kingdom: That they medled with Matters not ſubject to their Cognizance; and, in ſhort, that he did not care a Fig for them.

He added, That he knew no other Authority the King had, than what he received from his Predeceſſors, who acknowledged the Pope of Rome's Juriſdiction: If the King would be to him, as his Predeceſſors were to his, he would obey and acknowledge him for King; but, if he did otherwiſe, and played the Runnagate from God, as he and all of them did, he would not acknowledge him more than his old Hat. The Jury being called, he made one general Exception to them all: He ſaid, they were either Enemies to his Cauſe, or Friends; If they were Enemies, they ought not to be admitted to try him; and, if they were his Friends, they muſt ſtand Priſoners at the Bar, as he did.

After the Jurors were ſworn, he ſaid, he wiſhed they would conſider what they did; for he could not be tried, or judged, by them: Whatever he ſuffered, it muſt be by way of Injury, and not of Judgment: He was accuſed of Treaſon; but he had committed no Offence, nor would he beg Mercy.

To which the Archbiſhop anſwered, It was ſtrange he had not offended, when he came into the Kingdom, to pervert his Majeſty's Subjects, contrary to the Laws.

Ogilvie replied, I came by Commandment; and, if I was now out of the Kingdom, I would return: I repent of nothing, but that I have not been ſo buſy as I ſhould, in that which you call perverting: I hope to come to Glaſcow again, and do more good: If all the Hairs of my Head were Prieſts, they ſhould all come into the Kingdom: And, it being anſwered, The King might, ſurely, diſcharge the Country of thoſe that had offended the Laws, he ſaid, I am as free as the King; he cannot diſcharge me, if I be not an Offender, which I am not. But he ſeemed to allow, that for Theft, or Murder, the King's Courts might baniſh a Prieſt.

He objects, the Kirk denied the King's Authority in Spirituals, as well as he.

He declared, that he declined the King's Authority, and ſhould do it ſtill, in Matters of Religion; for, in ſuch Matters, he ſaid, the King had nothing to do: Obſerving, that the Kirk, in like Manner, rejected the King's Authority, in Spiritual Matters, as well as he: The Archbiſhop anſwered, that he was miſtaken in the Fact; there was no more in it than this: Eight Miniſters, in the General Aſſembly at Aberdeeen, did, indeed, contend, that the Aſſembly could not be diſcharged by his Majeſty's Commiſſioner; but the whole Clergy ought not to be ſlandered for the Offence of a few: Beſides, ſome of them were puniſhed for it, and others confeſſed their Error, and were pardoned: That their Religion taught them, to acknowledge his Majeſty their ſupreme Judge in all Cauſes: That his Lord, the Pope, indeed, did not only deny the Authority that God had given to Kings, but uſurped it himſelf; aſſuming a Power of depoſing and killing them, when he was diſpleaſed with them: Nor did this reſt in Opinion only; they had actually put their Principles in Practice, and cut the Throats of the two laſt Henry's, Kings of France; but they could not lay ſuch Imputations on the Church of Scotland: And then the Archbiſhop demanded of the Priſoner again, Whether he thought the Pope had Power to depoſe the King? or if it was not Murder to kill the King being depoſed by the Pope?

1615. 13 Jac. I.

Ogilvie thereupon ſaid, he refuſed to anſwer ſuch Queſtions, becauſe he ſhould thereby acknowlege them Judges in Controverſies of Religion, which he did not. He would not caſt holy Things to Dogs: Adding, That if the King offended againſt the Catholick Church, the Pope might puniſh him, as well as a Shepherd, or the pooreſt Man in the Country. That in abrogating the Pope's Authority, the Eſtates of Parliament had gone beyond their Limits; and the King, in uſurping the Pope's Right, had loſt his own. That the Oath of Allegiance was a damnable Oath, againſt God and his Truth, and it was Treaſon to ſwear it; for ſince that Kingdom was Chriſtian, the Pope's ſupreme Power was always acknowledged; that this being caſt off by Act of Parliament, againſt all Reaſon and Conſcience, and the Subject forced to ſwear to a Matter ſo unlawful, it was no wonder that ſuch Attempts and dangerous Courſes were taken againſt his Majeſty. Would the King ceaſe to uſurp on the Pope, he might live without Fear, as well as the King of Spain, or any other Chriſtian Prince.

The Priſoner again denies the Juriſdiction of the Court.

Maintains the King was ſubject to the Pope.

The King's denying the Pope's Supremacy the Occaſion of the Plots againſt him.

Thus the Priſoner avowing and maintaining the Treaſons for which he was indicted in Court, the Jury unanimouſly found him GUILTY, and he was condemned to die the Death of a Traitor. Whereupon he cried out, God have Mercy upon me; if there be any hidden Catholicks let them pray for me, but the Prayers of Hereticks I will not have.

The Priſoner convicted and condemned.

He was executed, according to the Cuſtom of Scotland, the ſame Day Sentence paſſed on him: But it was obſerved he did not behave himſelf with the ſame Aſſurance and Reſolution at his Execution, as he had done at his Trial; on the contrary, 'tis ſaid, he trembled and ſhook when he came to the Foot of the Ladder, and ſaid he ſhould fall; and it was with ſome Difficulty the Hangman got him up: His laſt Words were, O Maria, mater gratiæ, ora pro me! omnes Angeli, orate pro me! omnes Sancti, Sanctæque, orate pro me! but theſe were ſpoken in ſo low a Voice, that few of the Audience could hear them.

His Execution.

This Jeſuit Ogilvie, ſeems to have been fond of dying a Martyr to the Pope's Supremacy: He evidently looked upon all the Princes in the World as Vaſſals to his Holineſs, and that they might be depoſed and aſſaſſinated whenever they oppoſed him. As to the Diſtinction of Spirituals and Temporals, there ſeems to be very little in it. For if the Pope declared that any temporal or ſecular Action was oppoſite to the ſpiritual Intereſt of the Church, (in his Opinion) any Sovereign Prince might be excommunicated for it, and even depoſed and murdered by his Subjects, and his Dominions transferred by his Holineſs to another Family. A Doctrine (however ſhocking it may appear to Proteſtants in general) that has been exactly copied and practiſed by the Scots Preſbyterians; with this Difference

Remarks on Ogilvie's Trial.

1615. 13 Jac. I. only, that inſtead of Kings being ſubject to the Pope, they make them ſubject to their Preſbyteries, Synods, or general Aſſemblies: And though at that Time, when the Church of Scotland was Epiſcopal, as the Archbiſhop obſerved, there were but eight of her Clergy that diſputed the King's Supremacy; and ſome of theſe renounced the deteſted Error: Yet, when that Church was deſtroyed, and Preſbytery rode triumphant, no Jeſuits ever carried the Pope's Supremacy higher, than thoſe Saints did the Authority of their general Aſſemblies: And, even at this Day, they will ſcarce ſuffer their Prince to moderate in their Aſſemblies, or to appoint a Faſt, or a Thankſgiving; and abſolutely refuſe to take the Oath of Supremacy, enjoined to be taken by the Members of the Church of England.

To return to the Trial: King James ſcarce ever put any Jeſuit, or Prieſt, to Death, purely for exerciſing his Function, if he ſubmitted himſelf, and promiſed to deſiſt; though it was Treaſon in them to come into, or remain in Scotland. He contented himſelf, either with their Impriſonment, or Baniſhment: But this Jeſuit ſo daringly challenged, and defied the civil Powers, that there appeared a Neceſſity of taking him off. He might probably be employed by his Superiors, to let King James know, in this publick Manner, that his Majeſty would never be out of Danger of Plots and Aſſaſſinations, if he did not ceaſe to proſecute them. This unhappy Criminal might be perſuaded by them, he ſhould purchaſe a Seat in Paradiſe, by thus braving a Proteſtant Prince in his own Dominions: But, if we may credit thoſe who give an Account of his Execution, his Heart failed him at laſt. He does not appear to have met Death with that Joy that Saints and Martyrs uſually do. 1615. 13 Jac. I.

There is another Obſervation I cannot avoid making on the Laws of Scotland; and that is, that a Man's Silence was, by ſeveral Acts, made treaſonable there. If a Perſon was examined before the Council, concerning a treaſonable Conſpiracy, and refuſed to anſwer; this Refuſal was looked upon as a renouncing the King's Authority, and interpreted High-Treaſon: Whereas no Man is bound to anſwer in a criminal Caſe, by the Laws of England, eſpecially where the Anſwer tends to accuſe himſelf.

1618. 16 Jac. I. Wraynham's Trial.

The Trial of -------- WRAYNHAM, or WRENHAM, for Slandering the Lord Chancellor Bacon, before the Court of Star-Chamber, Paſch. 1618. 16 Jac. I.

1618. 16 Jac. I.

The Caſe. THE Caſe, in ſhort, was this: The Lord Chancellor Bacon, at his coming to the Great Seal, found a Cauſe in that Court, between Wraynham and Fiſher, concerning the Value of a Leaſe, in which the former Lord Chancellor had made ſeveral Orders and Decrees: Theſe the Lord Bacon thought fit to reverſe, or alter, to the Advantage of Fiſher: Whereupon Wraynham complained of his Lordſhip to his Majeſty, and at length wrote a Quarto Book, and dedicated it to the King, wherein he ſet forth his Caſe at large, charging the Lord Chancellor Bacon, with Injuſtice and Oppreſſion.

The moſt obnoxious Paſſages in this Book, or Libel, as it was ſtiled, were thoſe that follow, viz.

That he (Wraynham) had two Decrees in the firſt Lord Chancellor's Time, both under the Great Seal; and yet both altered, ſince his Death, and cancelled by this Lord Chancellor, in a prepoſterous Manner, without Cauſe, without new Matter, without any legal Proceedings, without Precedent, upon the Party's bare Suggeſtion, and without calling him (Wraynham) to anſwer: And this he had done, to reward Fiſher's Fraud and Perjuries, to palliate his unjuſt Proceedings, to rack Things out of Joint, and to confound his (Wraynham's) Eſtate; adding, that Injuſtice was worſe than Murder; and that his Lordſhip had devoured him and his Family; and having heard that his Lordſhip had ſatisfied his Majeſty in the Matter, the Book ſays, He that had done it unjuſtly, muſt, to maintain it, ſpeak untruly, adding Falſhood to Injuſtice; and, in another Place, the Book ſays, It is given out, my Lord hath begged Wraynham's Pardon (begged his Majeſty to forgive Wraynham) which, though it be the Shew of a gentle Heart, argues a guilty Conſcience, and is but my Lord's Cunning, to avoid the Hearing of the Cauſe; telling his Lordſhip, he had palliated Oppreſſion with Greatneſs, Wit with Eloquence; and that the Height of Authority made Men preſume: That his Lordſhip uſed ſecret Means, that the Unſoundneſs of his Actions might not be ſeen: That, He had raiſed a Report from Hell, of the late Maſter of the Rolls, which was confuted before his Face, and damned before his Death: That, the late Maſter of the Rolls grounded that Report, upon Witneſſes that ſwore Impoſſibilities, groſs Abſurdities, and apparent Untruths.

The Evidence. The Evidence againſt Wraynham was the Book, or Libel, itſelf, out of which theſe Paſſages were extracted.

Wraynham's Defence. Wraynham, in his Defence, ſaid, that his Book conſiſted of three Parts: 1. An Epiſtle to his Majeſty. 2. The Body of the Book, which related the Truth of all the Proceedings; and, 3. a concluſive Speech, in the Nature of an Epilogue.

As to his Complaint againſt the Lord Chancellor, he ſaid, he muſt fly for Succour and Protection to the King, who had been pleaſed to declare, that, if any were wronged in Point of Juſtice, they might come to him for Redreſs: That, if they diſcovered Bribery or Corruption, they ſhould come boldly; but, beware of the Juſtneſs of their Cauſe.

From

1618. 16 Jac. 1. From whence he inferred, 1. That, in his Majeſty's Opinion, a Man might be wronged in a Court of Juſtice; and 2. That he was willing to receive the Complaint, and reform what was amiſs: He hoped, therefore, their Lordſhips would not conceive, that barely to complain was a Fault; eſpecially when his Majeſty had ſaid, Why do you ſpare to complain?

Then he obſerved, that the Attorney-General had taken the general Expreſſions in his Book, and applied them to my Lord Chancellor, which, he ſuggeſted, he never intended as Reflections on that Lord; declaring, he had no ſuch Meaning, as the King's Council would fix upon them. He obſerved, that the Word Injuſtice was what he was principally charged with, that all the other obnoxious Expreſſions he had uſed might be comprehended in this; and ſaid, If a Man proved the Juſtice of his Cauſe, he proved the Judgment given againſt him to be Injuſtice: That he was neceſſitated to uſe this Word: 1. Becauſe, unleſs he had particularly accuſed his Lordſhip of Injuſtice, he had no Hopes of obtaining a Hearing of his Majeſty; and 2. His Miſeries forced him to it.

That, underſtanding the Lord Chancellor had endeavoured to ſatisfy his Majeſty of the Juſtice of his Decrees, by producing the Report of Philips, late Maſter of the Rolls (to whom the Matter had been referred by the late Lord Chancellor) which Report, he confeſſed, might not only ſatisfy the Lord Chancellor, but the King himſelf; he ſaw there was no other Courſe, but to anſwer the Report by writing the Book, with which he was charged; in the making whereof, he had muſtered together his Miſeries. He ſaw his Lands taken away, which had been before eſtabliſhed to him; and after ſix and forty Orders, and twelve Reports, made in this Cauſe; nay, after Motions, Hearings, and Rehearings, fourſcore in Number, he beheld all overthrown in a Moment; and that without a new Bill preferred. He ſaw a Priſon gaping for him, in which he muſt from thenceforth ſpend all the Days of his Life; for, in this Suit, he had ſpent almoſt three thouſand Pounds. Many of his Friends were engaged for him; ſome damnified, others undone; and this accompanied with many terrible Miſeries, like to befal his Wife, and four Children, the eldeſt of which was but five Years old; ſo that they, who formerly gave Bread to others, muſt now beg Bread of others, or elſe ſtarve; and there being no means to move his Majeſty to hear the Cauſe, but to accuſe his Lordſhip of Injuſtice, (his Majeſty declaring he would not be troubled with hearing ſuch Cauſes, unleſs he could charge the Judge with Injuſtice, or Bribery): This, and all theſe, moved him to be ſharp and bitter; and to uſe Words, though dangerous in themſelves, yet he hoped pardonable in ſuch Extremities; and, if this would not acquit him, deſired their Honours would move the King to pardon him.

The Court will not let him enter into the Merits of the Cauſe.

Then Mr. Wraynham was proceeding to open the Merits of the Cauſe in Chancery; but the Lord Treaſurer ſaid, that was contrary to all Rules: They could not enter into the Merits: And the Attorney-General, Yelverton, put him upon inſtancing in one ſingle Point, wherein the Lord Chancellor had done him Injuſtice. Inſtead of which, Wraynham ſaid, had he thought his Majeſty would not have heard his Cauſe, he would have ſat down in Silence, and devoured his Sorrow. He ſubmitted himſelf in all Things to their honourable and clement Cenſure, beſeeching their Pardon, and craving their Compaſſion. 1618. 16 Jac. 1.

The Reply. Mr. Serjeant Crew, in his Reply to Wraynham, ſaid, he obſerved the Priſoner at the Bar had made that Submiſſion at laſt, which he ought to have begun with: That the Flux of foul Mouths muſt be ſtopped, otherwiſe the greateſt Magiſtrates, and even Majeſty itſelf, would be ſlandered, and traduced: That the Lord Chancellor, that was dead, had given Judgment according to his Conſcience; and the preſent Lord had judged according to his Conſcience, and the Integrity of his Heart. The Cauſe might appear to them in different Lights; and each of them had delivered his own Senſe, without any binding Decree.

That the Lord which was dead, when he was alive, was one of the Oracles of Wiſdom of his Time; and the preſent Lord was enriched with great Ornaments of Nature. No Man, no Magiſtrate, heard with more Attention, Juſtice, Underſtanding, and Patience; and Wraynham thus to traduce him, was a foul Offence. He could not charge him with Corruption; for he always deſpiſed Riches, and ſet Honour and Juſtice before his Eyes, and therefore demanded their Lordſhips Cenſure of Wraynham.

Wraynham cenſured. The celebrated Sir Edward Coke was the firſt of the Court of Star-Chamber that delivered his Opinion in this Cauſe. He ſaid, a Complaint to his Majeſty, or a Petition, by any Man that thought himſelf wronged, he held to be no Offence; yet upon the Statute of Weſtminſter, and at Common Law, he could ſhew, that where Petitions were made to the King, in an unfit Manner, they had been ſeverely puniſhed. He was ſorry, he ſaid, that Mr. Wraynham, a Man of excellent Parts, ſhould write ſuch a ſcandalous Book, which in reality was no Petition: He himſelf had entitled it, A Review, or Revivor, of the Report of the Maſter of the Rolls Philips, and the Decree of the Lord Chancellor: In which he dealt not like a Petitioner, but a Cenſurer, cenſuring every Man that had been concerned in the Cauſe. He charged the Lord Chancellor with Injuſtice; not complaining of any Particular to be referred to Examination, but ſaid in general, He had done unjuſtly, was worſe than a Murderer; and that he had informed the King falſly: That the Height of Authority made Men preſume; citing that Paſſage in Scripture, Woe be to them that write wicked Decrees: And in another Place ſays, That Oppreſſion is palliated with Wit and Eloquence.

That he had not ſpared the Dead. The Maſter of the Rolls, an excellent Chancery-Man, of great Dexterity and Diligence, and never charged with Corruption, he had accuſed of ſo high a Degree of Injuſtice, as to omit ſome of the material Proofs; to ſhift off others; to wreſt the Equity of the Cauſe, with making an unjuſt and corrupt Gloſs upon a falſe Text; declaring, that his Report came from Hell. Their Lordſhips remembered, that ſlandering the Dead was puniſhable in that Court: Lewis Pickering particularly, in his Time, was cenſured ſured, for ſlandering an Archbiſhop that was dead; for ſuch Slanders might wrong thoſe that were related to the Deceaſed.

One puniſhed for ſlandering a dead Archbiſhop.

Then Sir Edward cited ſome Precedents of Perſons, that had been puniſhed for reflecting on the Judges; particularly Thomas Wilbraham, Mich. 18 Edw. III, who petitioned the King againſt the Juſtices of the King's-Bench, for that they had not done according to Law and Reaſon: For which Wilbraham was indicted, convicted, and fined, by the King's-Bench: And Humphrey Hunney, who complained to King Edw. III. that Sir William Scot, Chief Juſtice, had awarded an Aſſize contrary to Law, was fined and impriſoned by the Judges to whom the King referred it.

That one Judge might differ from another in his Opinion, and yet both be ſincere upright Judges. The famous Dyer gave Judgment in the Common-Pleas, which was reverſed in the King's-Bench; and yet Dyer diſcharged his Conſcience: Though the Judgment was afterwards reverſed, he was not thought guilty of Injuſtice. If the Lord Chancellor, that was living, differed from the Lord Chancellor that was dead; this was not ſtrange: It had ever been, and would be; but if a Judge's Conſcience was oiled and moiſtened with Corruption, all was naught: And concluded, that he agreed in all Things with the Sentence given in Foorth's Caſe, 2 Jac. And in this Judgment all the Lords of the Court of Star-Chamber agreed.

Remarks on the Trial of Wraynham.

From the Speeches made by Sir Edward Coke, and the reſt of the Lords of the Star-Chamber, at the Cenſure of Wraynham, it appears, that he was not only a Man of Quality and Figure in the World, but a Gentleman of excellent Parts: However, he was ruined, it ſeems, by a tedious and expenſive Suit in Chancery, and the Injuſtice and Oppreſſion of his Judges: And with his Fortune, this unhappy Gentleman appears to have loſt his Friends. The whole Court ſeem to have been in a Confederacy to complete his Deſtruction: Such was the Character of the celebrated Lord Bacon, that no Suggeſtions could be heard againſt him, how reaſonable ſoever. It could not enter into the Heart of Man, that a Nobleman, of his fine Senſe, and philoſophical Turn of Mind, who perfectly underſtood the Rules of Morality, and appeared generous and benevolent, even to Profuſion, could be touched with the ſordid Vices of Avarice, Extortion, and Oppreſſion: And though Bribery and Corruption appear to have been at the greateſt Height in the Court of Chancery, at this Time, and practiſed ſo openly, that when a Suitor came to ſee his Counſel, the firſt Queſtion aſked him was, What Friends he had at York-Houſe, (the Lord Chancellor's)? And his Servants were known to take one Side, or other, in almoſt every Cauſe: Yet did the mighty Lord Bacon's Reputation blind the Eyes of all Mankind, and render the moſt palpable Corruptions doubtful.

The unfortunate Wraynham knew he had great Injuſtice done him, and violently ſuſpected Bribery in the Caſe; but durſt not charge the Chancellor with it, for Fear of an Action of Scandalum Magnatum. On the other Hand, he found his Eſtate was gone, his Family undone, and he had nothing to expect, but a Goal, as he informs us in his Caſe, unleſs he could find ſome Redreſs. In this Diſtreſs he applied himſelf to his Majeſty, petitioning to be heard before the King and Council: But was told, the Council could not trouble themſelves with every Cauſe, where the Parties were diſſatisfied with the Chancellor's Decrees; they muſt attend no other Buſineſs, if they did: But, if the Petitioner could charge the Lord Chancellor with Injuſtice, or with Bribery, or Corruption, the King would hear him: Whereupon Wraynham wrote the Book abovementioned, and dedicated it to his Majeſty; wherein he charged the Chancellor with Injuſtice and Oppreſſion, believing, if his Majeſty would hear his Cauſe, he ſhould be able to demonſtrate, there had been foul Play. For, ſays he, in his Defence, if I can ſhew my Cauſe was juſt, and the Lord Chancellor has decreed it againſt me, by conſequence I ſhall prove his Injuſtice: But neither the King, nor the Court of Star-Chamber, would enter into the Merits of the Cauſe; declaring, his Book was a Libel, becauſe he had charged the Chancellor with Injuſtice and Oppreſſion, which he could not prove: Whereupon Wraynham deſpaired of Succeſs, and ſubmitted himſelf to the Mercy of his Judges; who, not conſidering he had already loſt all he had, in purſuing this unlucky Cauſe, thought fit to finiſh his Ruin, by fining and impriſoning him; though it appeared, within the Space of two Years, that his Adverſary, Sir Edward Fiſher, carried his Cauſe, by Dint of Bribery, having given the Lord Chancellor an hundred Pounds, and upwards, at one Time; beſides what he might have preſented him with at other Times, and diſtributed among that Lord's Servants, who were known to take a Part in every Cauſe that came before his Lordſhip, as has been related already.

But, ſuppoſing there had been no Bribery in the Caſe, what a monſtrous Thing is it, in a Country that boaſts of the Equity of her Laws, that a Suitor ſhould be kept ſeven, perhaps two ſeven, Years in Suſpence, and the Charges of the Suit frequently exceed the Matter in Diſpute; and this in an ordinary Caſe, like that before us, where only the Value of a Leaſe was to be determined?

Wraynham, in his Defence, ſays, that in this trifling Cauſe, there had been ſix and forty Orders, and twelve Reports, made; and no leſs than fourſcore Hearings, Rehearings, and Motions; and, after all theſe, he ſaw his Lands taken away, which had been decreed him by the former Lord Chancellor; and he muſt expect to end his Days in a Goal, having ſpent three thouſand Pounds in the Cauſe, and ruined ſeveral of his Friends, who ſtood engaged for him. Were it not better to live in a Country where there are no Laws, than where Laws are thus adminiſtred? Where it is manifeſt, in a thouſand other Caſes as well as this, that the longeſt Purſe ſeldom fails of Succeſs, let the Cauſe be never ſo unjuſt. If there be no Bribery in the Caſe, the very Expence and Delays of a Chancery Suit undo the Suitor; and he is obliged to give up his Right, for Want of Money to defend it: And what renders theſe

Pro-

1618. 16 Jac. I. ceedings ſtill more inſupportable now, than they were in the Lord Bacon's Days, is, the extravagant Riſe of Counſel's Fees, and the Stamps, with which all the Proceſs in Chancery, and other Courts, are loaded at this Day. We ſeem to block up the Way to Juſtice, as though it were a Crime, for a Man to attempt the Recovery of his Right. 1618. 16 Jac. I.

Proceedings in Parliament, againſt the Right Honourable FRANCIS Lord Verulam, Viſcount St. Albans, and Lord Chancellor of England, for Bribery and Corruption, the 19th, &c. of March, 1620. 18 and 19 Jac. I.

A Motion in the Houſe of Commons, charging him with Bribery.

ON Thurſday, the 15th of March, 1620. Sir Robert Phillips, from the Committee of the Commons, appointed to enquire into Abuſes in the Courts of Juſtice, reported to the Houſe, that they had received two Petitions, charging the Lord Chancellor with Corruption, in his Office.

In Awbrey's Caſe.

That the firſt Petition was from Awbrey, which ſhewed, that he, having a Cauſe depending before the Lord Chancellor, and being tired with Delays, was adviſed, by ſome near my Lord, to quicken him, by making his Lordſhip a Preſent of 100 l. That he, thereupon, with ſome Difficulty, procured the ſaid Sum of an Uſurer, and went with Sir George Haſtings, and Mr. Jenkins, to the Lord Chancellor's Houſe, in Gray's-Inn; and thoſe two Gentlemen carried in the Money to his Lordſhip; and, when they came out, ſaid, my Lord was thankful, and aſſured him of Succeſs in his Buſineſs.

That, Sir George Haſtings, a Member of the Houſe, had acknowledged the giving Awbrey that Advice, and carrying in the Money to my Lord; but ſaid, he preſented it as from himſelf, and not from Awbrey: Nor had it the Effect that the Petitioner expected. This Charge was confirmed by ſeveral Letters.

In Egerton's Caſe.

The ſecond Petition was from Edward Egerton, who ſhewed, that he was perſuaded by Sir George Haſtings, and Sir Richard Young, to preſent his Lordſhip with a Sum of Money; but that he had before given my Lord a Piece of Plate, of the Value of 52 l. as a Teſtimony of his Love; and now he procured 400 l. and ſent it to his Lordſhip by Sir George Haſtings and Sir Richard Young, as a Gratuity, for what my Lord had done for him, when he was Attorney-General: That theſe Gentlemen told the Petitioner, my Lord ſcrupled the taking it at firſt, and ſaid, it was too much; but was at length perſuaded to take it, as for Favours paſſed, and returned him Thanks, ſaying, he did not only enrich him, but laid a Tie on him, to aſſiſt him in his lawful Buſineſs: That Sir George Haſtings and Sir Richard Young, Members of the Houſe, acknowledged the Delivery of the Purſe; but ſaid, they knew not what was in it.

The Report alſo took notice, that Doctor Field, now Biſhop of Landaff, had undertaken to procure Mr. Egerton Succeſs in his Cauſe, on condition of his entring into a Recognizance of 10000 Marks; with Condition, that if my Lord Chancellor decreed it for him, 6000 Marks ſhould be diſtributed among thoſe honourable Perſons that ſolicited his Cauſe for him.

This Matter being ordered to be further conſidered by the Committee, Sir Robert Phillips reported on the 17th of March, that it appeared plainly in Awbrey's Caſe, there was a Suit depending at the Time the Money was preſented: And that Sir George Haſtings had at length acknowledged, when he gave the Lord Chancellor the 100 l. he ſaid, that it was to help Awbrey in his Cauſe. However, not long after, a very prejudicial and murdering Order was made againſt Awbrey: Whereupon, Sir George moved, it might be rectified; and my Lord promiſed to do it; but did not: And that there were Letters produced, from Awbrey to the Lord Chancellor, about this Buſineſs.

And, in Egerton's Caſe, when the 400 l. was preſented to the Lord Chancellor, there was a Suit depending in the Star-Chamber; and Sir Rowland Egerton, about the ſame Time, preferred a Petition to the King, for a Reference of the Matter to the Lord Chancellor: Whereupon, his Lordſhip cauſed Mr. Edward Egerton to enter into a Bond of 6000 Marks, to ſtand to his Award: And an Award being afterwards made, and refuſed by Edward, a Suit was, by the Lord Chancellor's Direction, commenced againſt him, and the Bond of 6000 Marks aſſigned over to Sir Rowland Egerton: And then it was, that Doctor Field adviſed Mr. Edward Egerton to apply himſelf to Mr. Damport, and Sir John Butler, to ſolicit his Cauſe for him, and drew Mr. Edward into a Bond of 10000 Marks, for the Payment of 6000, as related already: And it being demanded of Damport, how much he and Doctor Field were to have of the Money, he anſwered, he did not remember the certain Sum; but it was more than any Cauſe could deſerve, in any Court of Juſtice.

That, in Awbrey's Caſe, it appeared, that Sir George Haſtings, being at Hackney, where he dwelt, was ſent for by the Lord Chancellor: And when Sir George came, the Lord Chancellor ordered every Body elſe out of the Room; and ſaid, Sir George, I am ſure you love me; and, I know, that you are not willing, that any Thing, done by you, ſhould reflect Diſhonour upon me. I hear, that one Awbrey intends to petition againſt me: He is a Man, that you have ſome Intereſt in; you may take him off, if you pleaſe: And that Sir George afterwards deſired Awbrey, to let him ſee his Petition; and he ſhewed it to my Lord; and his Lordſhip promiſed, to do him Juſtice: But he could have no Remedy, and ſo the Petition went on.

1620. 19 Jac. I. That, ſome Time after, Sir George, diſcourſing with the Lord Chancellor, told him, He muſt lay it (the Buſineſs of Awbrey) upon his Lordſhip; to which my Lord replied, If you do, George, I muſt deny it, upon my Honour.

Upon this Report, it was moved, that Sir George Haſtings, and Sir Richard Young, might be ſequeſtred from Parliament: But they were permitted to keep their Seats; and it was ordered, that the Complaint of Awbrey and Egerton, againſt the Lord Chancellor, and the Biſhop for Corruption, ſhould be drawn up by Sir Robert Phillips, Sir Edward Coke, Mr. Noy, and Sir Dudley Diggs; and that the ſame ſhould be related to the Lords, without Prejudice or Opinion, at a Conference.

A Committee of both Houſes examine the Matter.

The ſame Day, the Commons received a Meſſage from his Majeſty, in which he ſaid, he was ſorry to hear of the Complaints againſt the Lord Chancellor: It had always been his Care, to advance the beſt Men to Places; though no Man could prevent ſuch Accidents: But his Comfort was, the Houſe was careful to preſerve his Honour; and propoſed a Committee, of ſix of the Upper Houſe, and twelve of the Lower Houſe, to examine the Matter.

In anſwer to which, the Commons deſired, the like Meſſage might be ſent to the Lords, that they might have a Conference with them about it.

The Commons prefer only a verbal Charge againſt the Lord Chancellor.

On the 20th of March, Sir Robert Phillips reported from the Conference, that the Lords demanded, if they would not reduce their Complaint into Writing: And it was reſolved, that they would not; it only conſiſting of two or three Points, clear and plain.

Two Members allowed to give Evidence before the Lords.

A Meſſage came from the Lords, the ſame Day, ſignifying, that they had taken into Conſideration, the laſt Conference, and ſhould need the Teſtimony of two Members of that Houſe; deſiring, they might attend voluntarily, without Order, as private Perſons, and give their Teſtimony upon Oath: And it was anſwered, that they would attend as private Gentlemen, and be examined.

Bribery, in Lady Wharton's Caſe.

Sir Robert Phillips reported further, that the Committee of the Commons had examined Churchill, one of the Regiſters in Chancery; and it appeared that, the Lady Wharton having a Cauſe depending there, an Order was made, for the Diſmiſſion of her Bill, by Conſent of the Counſel on both Sides; which the Lady diſliking, took Churchill into her Coach, and carried him to the Lord Chancellor's; and ſo managed the Matter, that the Regiſter was commanded, not to enter the laſt Order; and my Lady being left at Liberty, thereby, to proſecute her Suit, brought it to a Hearing, and obtained a Decree.

That —— Keeling being examined, declared, that about the Time of paſſing the ſaid Decree, my Lady took an hundred Pounds, and carried it to York-Houſe, to the Lord Chancellor, in a Purſe; and, my Lord aſking her, What ſhe had in her Hand? ſhe anſwered, a Purſe of her own making, and preſented it to him; who took it, and ſaid, What Lord could refuſe a Purſe of ſo fair a Lady's Working? That, afterwards, my Lord decreed for her; but the Decree was not perfected, till 200 l. more was given, in the Preſence of one Gardiner.

1620. 19 Jac. I. Gardiner, Keeling's Man, confirmed the Payment of the 300 l. for the Decree, viz. 100 l. firſt, and 200 l. afterwards: And this purchaſed Decree, being lately damned by the Lord Chancellor, occaſioned the Lady's Complaint.

Keeling added, that Sir John Trevor preſented the Lord Chancellor with 100 l. by the Hands of Sir Richard Young, for a final End of this Cauſe: And Sir Richard Young declared, that, when he attended the Lord Chancellor, Sir John Trevor's Man brought a Cabinet, and a Letter, to my Lord, and entreated him to deliver it, which he did, openly.

Other Complaints of Bribery made to the Commons.

On the 21ſt of March, 1620. Sir Robert Phillips reported, that they were informed of ſeveral other Corruptions, by Keeling and Churchill; particularly, that his Lordſhip had taken great Sums in the Cauſes of Hull and Holman, Wroth and Manwaring, Peacock and Reynell, Barker and Bill, Smithwick and Welch: That, in this, and other Cauſes, my Lord would decree Part; and, when he wanted more Money, he would ſend for more, and then decree, another Part: And in moſt Caſes my Lord's Servants had undertaken one Side or another; inſomuch that it was uſual for Counſel, when their Clients came to them, to aſk, what Friend they had at York-Houſe?

Decrees made by Parcels, to extort Money.

My Lord's Servants bribed in every Cauſe.

It being ordered that a Meſſage be ſent to the Lords, by Sir Robert Phillips, to relate the Caſe of the Lady Wharton, and the Informations of Churchill; Sir Robert reported from the Lords, That they acknowledged the great Care of the Commons, returned them Thanks for their Correſpondence, and aſſured the like on their Part for ever.

The Commons communicate theſe Complaints to the Lords.

The Lords examine the Matter.

The Caſe of the Lord Chancellor coming under Debate in the Houſe of Peers, the 19th of March, the Lord Admiral * preſented a Letter to that Houſe, the ſame Day, from his Lordſhip, deſiring them to excuſe his Abſence, becauſe he was ſo very ill, that he thought he had but a little Time to live; however, underſtanding there were ſome Complaints of baſe Bribery coming before their Lordſhips againſt him, he would be glad to preſerve his Honour and Fame, and therefore requeſted, 1. That they would preſerve a good Opinion of him, till his Cauſe was heard; 2. That they would give him Time to adviſe with Counſel, and put in his Anſwer: 3. That he might be allowed to except againſt the Witneſſes, to croſs examine them, and produce his own Witneſſes; and, Laſtly, That their Lordſhips would not be prejudiced againſt him from the Number of Complaints that ſhould be exhibited, conſidering he did not make leſs than two thouſand Orders and Decrees within the Space of a Year, and the Courſes that were taken to hunt out Complaints againſt him; but that he might anſwer them ſeparately, according to the Rules of Juſtice.

* Duke of Buckingham.

Lord Chancellor excuſes his Abſence.

He is ordered to prepare his Defence.

To this Letter their Lordſhips anſwered, That they intended to proceed in his Cauſe according to the right Rules of Juſtice; and ſhould be glad if his Lordſhip ſhould clear his Honour therein: To which End they deſired his Lordſhip to prepare for his juſt Defence.

Then the Lords proceeded to examine the ſeveral Complaints of the Suitors, and reduced them to the following Particulars, viz.

And laſtly, that he had given way to great Exactions by his Servants, in reſpect of private Seals, and ſealing Injunctions.

The Lord Chancellor makes a general Submiſſion and Confeſſion.

On the Twenty-fourth of April, the Prince ſignified to their Lordſhips, that the Lord Chancellor had ſent a Submiſſion, which was read in the Houſe; wherein he tells their Lordſhips, That having underſtood the Particulars of the Charge, not formally from the Houſe, but enough to inform his Conſcience and Memory, he found Matter ſufficient and full, both to move him to deſert his Defence, and to move their Lordſhips to condemn and cenſure him.

Neither would he trouble their Lordſhips with ſingling out thoſe Particulars which might be moſt eaſily anſwered, or prompt their Lordſhips to obſerve upon the Proofs, where they came not home; or with Scruples touching the Credit of the Witneſſes; nor would he obſerve how far a Defence, in divers Things, might extenuate the Offence, in reſpect of the Time or Manner of the Gift, but leave thoſe Things to their own Obſervations on the Evidence; and ſubmitted himſelf wholly to their Pity and Grace.

He made it his humble Suit to their Lordſhips, that his penitent Submiſſion might be his Sentence, and the Loſs of the Seal his Puniſhment: That their Lotdſhips would ſpare any farther Sentence, and recommend him to his Majeſty's Grace and Pardon for all that was paſt. 1620. 19 Jac. I

The Lords having conſidered this Submiſſion, and heard the Particulars of the Corruptions charged on the Lord Chancellor, with the Proofs; they ſent a Copy of them, without the Proofs, to the Lord Chancellor, and the following Meſſage, viz.

That his Lordſhip's Confeſſion, in the ſaid Submiſſion, was not full, for three Cauſes. A Particular of his Charge ſent him.

1. His Lordſhip confeſſed not any particular Bribe, or Corruption.

2. Nor ſhewed how he heard the Charge thereof.

3. The Confeſſion was afterwards extenuated, and therefore the Lords had ſent him a Particular of the Charge, and expected his Anſwer to the ſame with all convenient Expedition. To which the Lords require his Anſwer.

To this Meſſage, the Lord Chancellor anſwered, he would return the Lords an Anſwer with ſpeed.

On the Twenty-fifth of April, the Lords ſent the Lord Chancellor another Meſſage, by Mr. Baron Denham and Mr. Attorney General, (viz.) That they had received a doubtful Anſwer to their Meſſage, ſent him the Day before; and therefore deſired to know, directly and preſently, whether he would make his Confeſſion, or ſtand upon his Defence.

To which the Lord Chancellor anſwered, by the ſame Meſſengers, That he would make no manner of Defence, but acknowledge Corruption, and make a particular Confeſſion to every Point, and after that an humble Submiſſion; but begged Leave, where the Charge was more full than the Truth of the Fact was, he might declare the Truth in ſuch Particulars. And the Lords allowing him Time, till Monday the Thirtieth of April, to ſend his Confeſſion and Submiſſion, the Lord Chancellor then ſent it accordingly. He abandons his Defence,

It was directed, To the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in the High Court of Parliament aſſembled; and ſtiled, The humble Confeſſion and Submiſſion of me, the Lord Chancellor. And makes a particular Confeſſion, and Submiſſion.

1. To the firſt Article he confeſſed, that upon a Reference from his Majeſty, of all Suits between Sir Rowland Egerton and Edward Egerton, both Parties ſubmitted to his Award, by reciprocal Recognizances in ten thouſand Marks a-piece: That, after divers Hearings, he made his Award, with the Advice of Lord Hobart; and ſome Days after, the 300 l. mentioned in the Charge, were delivered to him from Sir Rowland. That Mr. Edward Egerton flying off from the Award, a Suit was begun in Chancery by Sir Rowland Egerton, to have the Award confirmed; and a Decree was made thereupon.

2. To the ſecond Article, he confeſſed, that ſoon after his coming to the Seal, when many preſented him, he received the 400 l. mentioned in this Article, of Mr. Edward Egerton; but, as he remembered, it was for Favours paſt.

3. That in the Cauſe between Hody and Hody, about a Fortnight after the Cauſe was ended, ed, there were Gold Buttons, about the Value of 50*l.* preſented him.

4. That in the Cauſe between the Lady Wharton, and the Coheirs of Sir Francis Willoughby, he received of the Lady Wharton 200*l.* in Gold, and at another Time an hundred Pieces, while the Cauſe was depending.

5. That he received of Sir Thomas Monk one hundred Pieces, but it was long after his Suit was ended.

6. That he received of Sir John Trevor, as a New-Year's-Gift, 100*l.* but he confeſſed it was while his Cauſe was depending.

7. In the Cauſe between Holman and Young, he received of Young an 100*l.* but it was long after the Cauſe was ended.

Bribery proved in Wraynham's Caſe.

8. That while the Cauſe was depending between Fiſher and Wrenham, (or Wraynham) he did receive of Sir Edward Fiſher a Suit of Hangings, of the Value of about an 160*l.* towards furniſhing his Houſe; and was at the ſame Time preſented by others, who were no Suitors, with Furniture for his Houſe.

9. As to the Charge of his receiving a Cabinet, of the Value of 800*l.* of Sir John Kennedy; a Cabinet was indeed ſent to his Houſe by Sir John, but not of half that Value; but he refuſed to accept it, and was determined to ſend it back again: That one Pinkney, who ſtood engaged for the Money to pay for the Cabinet, deſired he might have it; and thereupon Sir John entreated his Lordſhip, that he would not diſgrace him by returning the Gift, much leſs put it into a wrong Hand; and that he was ready to return it to whom their Lordſhips ſhould appoint.

10. He confeſſed he had borrowed 2000*l.* of Vanlore; but looked upon it as a Debt, and was obliged to repay it.

11. He acknowledged his receiving 200*l.* of Mr. Scott, about a Fortnight after the Decree paſſed for him.

12. That he received 100*l.* of Sir John Lenthall, about a Month after the Decree paſſed.

13. That the Cauſe between Wroth and Manwaring was ended by his Arbitrement, by Conſent of Parties, and he received of Mr. Wroth 100*l.* about a Month after the Cauſe was ended.

14. That he received of Sir Ralph Hanſbye, while his Cauſe was depending, 500*l.*

15. That he did borrow the 500*l.* mentioned in this Article, of Compton; but looked upon it as a Debt which he was obliged to repay.

16. In the Cauſe between Sir William Brounker and Axebrey, he did acknowledge his receiving 100*l.* of Axebrey.

17. He confeſſed, he received Money of the Lord Montague, while his Suit was depending, to the Amount of 6 or 700*l.*

18. He confeſſed his receiving 200*l.* of Mr. Dunch; but thought it was ſome Time after the Decree.

19. He confeſſed his receiving 200*l.* of Sir George Reynell, his near Relation, at his firſt coming to the Seal, to be beſtowed in Furniture; but thinks this was before any Suit began: And as to the Diamond Ring, he received of him, while his Cauſe was depending, charged to be worth 5 or 600*l.* it was not of near that Value; though he confeſſed, it was too much for a New-Year's-Gift.

1620. 19 Jac. 1.

20. He confeſſed his receiving of 100*l.* of Mr. Peacock, at his coming to the Seal, as a Preſent; and that he afterwards borrowed 1000*l.* of him, at twice; for which, he ſaid, he would take no Security or Intereſt, and gave him his own Time for repaying it.

21. He confeſſed his Servant Hunt did receive 200*l.* of Smithwick; but that he ordered it to be repaid.

22. That he did receive of Sir Henry Ruſwell 3 or 400*l.* about a Month after the Cauſe was decreed; in which Decree he was aſſiſted by two of the Judges.

23. He confeſſed he received of Mr. Barker the 700*l.* mentioned in this Article, ſome Time after the Decree paſſed.

As to the 24th, 25th, and 26th Articles, he confeſſed he received the ſeveral Sums therein mentioned, (viz.) Of the Grocers 200*l.* of the Apothecaries, that ſtood with the Grocers, a Taſter of Gold, worth 4 or 500*l.* and a Preſent of Ambergreaſe, and of a new Company of Apothecaries that ſtood againſt the Grocers, 100*l.* But this was no judicial Buſineſs, he obſerved, only a Compoſition between the Parties; and he thought, as they all received Benefit by it, and were all three Common Purſes, there was no great Matter in receiving what they voluntarily preſented.

As to the 27th Article, in which he is charged with taking of the French Merchants 1000*l.* to conſtrain the Company of Vintners to take 1500 Tuns of their Wine, with threatning and impriſoning the Vintners becauſe they would not take their Wines at higher Prices than they were vendible; he confeſſed, Sir Thomas Smith did deal with him in Behalf of the French Company; informing him, that the Vintners, by Combination, refuſed to take their Wines at any reaſonable Prices; and that this would deſtroy their Trade, which the State was concerned in; and that the Company would gratify him with 1000*l.* for the Trouble he ſhould take in it. He did, he confeſſed, thereupon endeavour to compromiſe Matters between them, and prevent a Suit, propounding ſuch a Price as the Vintners might gain 6*l.* a Tun: And the King afterwards recommending the Buſineſs to him, as a Matter that concerned his Cuſtoms, he dealt the more peremptorily in it, and did, for a Day or two, reſtrain ſome of thoſe that were the moſt ſtiff in a Meſſenger's Hands; and afterwards the Merchants preſented him with 1000*l.*

To the 28th Article, That he had given way to the Exactions of his Servants, in reſpect of private Seals and Injunctions, he confeſſed it to be a great Fault, that he had looked no better to his Servants.

He confeſſes a great deal of Corruption.

And now he again confeſſed, That in the Points charged upon him, though they ſhould be taken as he had repreſented them, there was a great deal of Corruption and Neglect, for which he was heartily ſorry, and ſubmitted himſelf to the Mercy of the Court.

He deſired that their Lordſhips would look with Compaſſion on his Perſon and Eſtate, and conſider he was never eſteemed an avaricious Man: That there were few or none of theſe Particulars that were of leſs than two Years ſtanding; ſtanding; from whence he inſinuated, that he had reformed theſe Practices, inſtead of increaſing his Corruptions; and his Eſtate was ſo inconſiderable, that his chief Care was, how he ſhould be able to pay his Debts.

1620. 19 Jac. I.

Concluding with his humble Suit, that their Sentence might be mixed with Mercy; and that they would be Interceſſors for him to his Majeſty for his Grace and Favour.

Signs his Confeſſion. Signed, Your Lordſhips
Humble Servant and Supplicant, Franc. St. Albans, Canc.

A Committee of Lords was hereupon ſent to the Lord Chancellor, to acquaint him that they conceived this to be an ingenuous and full Confeſſion, and to demand, Whether that was his Hand to it, and if he would abide by it. To whom the Lord Chancellor anſwered, My Lords, It is my Act, my Hand, my Heart: I beſeech your Lordſhips to be merciful to a broken Reed.

The Seal taken from him. Which Anſwer being reported to the Houſe, they moved his Majeſty to ſequeſter the Seal; and the King thereupon gave it to the Lord Chief Juſtice Sir Robert Hutton, on the firſt of May.

He is ſummon'd to appear. The next Day the Lords commanded the Gentleman-Uſher, and Serjeant at Arms, of that Houſe, to ſummon the late Lord Chancellor to appear in Perſon before their Lordſhips by Nine the next Morning; and that the Serjeant ſhould ſhew his Mace to his Lordſhip at the Time of the Summons; which was done accordingly: But they found him ſick in Bed; Pleads Sickneſs. and he proteſted his Illneſs was not feigned, and that if he had been well, he would willingly have come.

On Thurſday, the third of May, the Lords ſent a Meſſage to the Commons, importing, that they were ready to give Judgment againſt the Lord Viſcount St. Albans: Whereupon the Commons came up, and their Speaker ſaid, The Commons demand Judgment againſt him. "The Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes of "the Commons Houſe having made Com- "plaint to your Lordſhips of many exorbitant "Offences of Bribery and Corruption commit- "ted by the late Lord Chancellor, in their "Name I do humbly pray and demand Judg- "ment againſt him, as the Nature of his Of- "fence and Demerits do require."

The Lord Chief Juſtice (to whom the Cuſtody of the Seal was now committed) anſwered, That that High Court had found the Lord Viſcount St. Albans guilty of the Crimes and Corruptions complained of by the Commons, and of ſundry other Crimes and Corruptions of the like Nature; and that, he having excuſed his Attendance on account of Sickneſs, they did nevertheleſs proceed to Judgment; and that His Sentence. High Court did adjudge, That the Lord Viſcount St. Albans, late Lord Chancellor of England, ſhould pay a Fine of forty thouſand Pounds; be impriſoned in the Tower during the King's Pleaſure, and be for ever incapable of any Office, Place, or Employment, in the Eſtate or Commonwealth; and that he ſhould never ſit in Parliament, or come within the Verge of the Court.

He is ſet at Liberty, and allow'd a Penſion. The King ſome Time after releaſed his Lordſhip out of the Tower, and ſettled a ſmall Penſion on him; and he reſided, for the moſt part, at his Chambers in Gray's-Inn. His Death. He died the ſixth of April, 1626, in the ſixty-ſixth Year of his Age, at the Lord Arundel's Houſe at Highgate, near London; where he had been about a Week upon a Viſit. His Diſtemper was a ſlow Fever, attended by a violent Cold, and a Defluxion of Rheum upon his Breaſt, which was ſo great that it ſuffocated him.

1620. 19 Jac. I.

Buried at St. Albans. He was buried at St. Michael's Church in St. Albans, in purſuance of his Will, and had a Monument of white Marble erected there, by Sir Thomas Meautys, once his Lordſhip's Secretary; the Inſcription being compoſed by the celebrated Sir Henry Wotton. He left neither Wife or Child, and conſequently his Titles, of Lord Verulam, and Viſcount of St. Albans, expired with him.

Remarks on Lord Bacon's Trial. Theſe Proceedings againſt the Lord Chancellor Bacon may not be thought perfectly regular at this Day perhaps; for here the Commons exhibit only a verbal general Charge againſt him, for Bribery and Corruption; giving two or three Inſtances of it, and leaving the Lords to ſpecify the reſt. No particular Articles were exhibited in Writing, or indeed any thing in Writing, by the Commons; and for ought appears, that Charge (ſuch as it was) was delivered at a Conference between the two Houſes, and not at the Bar of the Houſe of Lords: Nor was it ſo much as ſtiled An Impeachment, though the Editor of this ſecond Collection of Trials calls it ſo.

The Lords, we find, drew up the Charge in Writing themſelves, and added abundance of Inſtances of Bribery that the Commons never mentioned; and gave Judgment on the Whole, though regularly, Judges can take Notice of no more than what the Criminal is charged with by the Proſecutor. Where a Perſon is impeached, or indicted, for two or three Miſdemeanors, and his Judges know of twenty more, they are not to try and ſentence him for more than the Proſecutors charged him with. But here the Lords ſeem to have taken upon them to be both Proſecutors, and Judges in a great meaſure, which is not exactly agreeable to the Rules of Juſtice. However, as the Commons acquieſced, or rather concurred in this Method of Proceeding, it was in vain to complain, for they could ſoon have converted their Charge into a formal Impeachment, where there appeared ſuch abundant Evidence againſt his Lordſhip. Whether it be conformable to the Rules of Juſtice alſo, to condemn a Perſon in his Abſence, if that Abſence be really occaſioned by Sickneſs, is another Point that deſerves Conſideration: But perhaps the two Houſes might not imagine, they were tied up by ſuch Rules as other Courts are indiſpenſibly obliged to obſerve: And it muſt be admitted, when they act in their Legiſlative Capacity, they are not. But whether, in other Caſes, the Laws of the Kingdom ought not to be obſerved by the Houſe of Peers, as well as by inferior Courts, I perceive ſome are apt to queſtion.

But, notwithſtanding theſe numerous Inſtances of Bribery and Extortion, I find there are ſome Gentlemen, at this Day, that cannot bring themſelves to believe, that a Perſon of my Lord Bacon's fine Sentiments could be guilty of theſe ſordid Crimes. They aſcribe all to his Servants, and to the Malice of his Enemies, who fixed the Faults of his Dependants upon him. But, when 1620. 19 Jac I. we ſee his Lordſhip firſt making a general Confeſſion of the Charge, and then acknowledging his Guilt in many particular Inſtances, what Room is there to ſuppoſe him innocent?

My Lord endeavours to extenuate his Guilt, by obſerving, that he was never eſteemed a covetous Man, nor had acquired a great Eſtate: And perhaps his principal Errors were a bad Œconomy, and a Generoſity that bordered on Profuſeneſs, which brought him under Difficulties; and then poſſibly he liſtened to his Servants and Dependants, who were already retained in almoſt every Cauſe, and repreſented to their Maſter, no doubt, how eaſily he might extricate himſelf, by accepting Preſents from the Suitors; and when they had once prevailed on their Lord to pay his Debts, and trafick with Orders and Decrees, they continued their own Extortions without Reſtraint. They had him now in their Power, and he was under a Neceſſity of conniving at whatever they did; and perhaps he frequently perverted Juſtice for fear of provoking theſe inſatiable Wretches to make a Diſcovery. What he gained himſelf might be a Trifle to what they pillaged the unhappy Suitors of.

It has been frequently obſerved of great Wits, that, though they give excellent Rules to others, their own Œconomy is the worſt in the World. They ſeem to think it beneath them to attend to the Parts of low Life; to deſpiſe the keeping Accounts, and calculating whether their Revenues will ſupport their Expences. They cannot ſee an Object of Compaſſion perhaps without relieving him, or deny a Share in their Purſe to a Perſon that pretends to be in Diſtreſs; not conſidering, that the beſt Fortune muſt ſoon be exhauſted, where they have not Reſolution enough to reſiſt the Importunities of every idle neceſſitous Supplicant.

They do not reflect, that when they have brought Difficulties upon themſelves, by ſquandring away their Fortunes, with a laviſh undiſtinguiſhing Hand, what a Teſt their Virtue may be put to, to ſupply their Neceſſities: That, when hungry Creditors ſtand ready to expoſe and devour them, it will be difficult to reſiſt any Opportunities of furniſhing themſelves with Money, how infamous ſoever.

That Species of Covetouſneſs which induces a Man to wrong others, in order to hoard up Treaſure, with which he might do a great deal of Good in the World, ought certainly to be deteſted; but I queſtion if, he who is guilty of Extortion and Oppreſſion, to ſupply his own Extravagancies, or the Defects of his Œconomy, be not the more to be dreaded of the Two. For the Miſer, as we ſtile him, is generally timerous and cautious how he expoſes himſelf to be called to an Account; while the vain, luxurious Prodigal is frequently obliged to venture upon any Meaſures, how criminal or deſperate ſoever, to preſerve him from preſent Deſtruction. Nothing, therefore, is more to be dreaded, than the filling our Courts of Juſtice with indigent and extravagant Men, who are under a kind Neceſſity of ſelling and making Merchandize of the Suitors, in order to ſupport their own profuſe Way of Living.

It was an excellent Obſervation, That a Man ought to be juſt, before he is generous. He ought not to beſtow that Part of his Fortune upon others, that ſhould be applied to the Payment of his Debts; much leſs ſhould he accept Bribes to pervert Juſtice, and ruin Families, to enable him to be generous to others. Such Sort of Generoſity is worſe than Robbery; for it does not only bring Deſtruction on innocent Men, under a Colour of doing them Juſtice, but, for a trifling Sum the Judge takes, probably the Suitor loſes ten times as much; whereas a Highwayman only takes what a Man has about him; we expect no Juſtice or Compaſſion from him, and he deprives us of no more than what he himſelf makes uſe of. 1620. 19 Jac. I.

But what makes an unjuſt Judge ſtill to be more dreaded than a Robber, is, that after he has ruined a Family, he ſometimes finds himſelf under a Neceſſity of perſecuting and torturing the injured Suitor, in order to conceal his own Wickedneſs, as in the preceding Caſe of Wraynham; where this very Lord Chancellor took a Bribe of 100*l.* of his Adverſary Fiſher, to give the Cauſe againſt him; whereby Wraynham and his Family were not only ruined, but when he complained of the Injuſtice, the Injury was doubled by a Proſecution in the Star-Chamber, where his Lordſhip was Preſident, and procured him to be fined and impriſoned, inſtead of relieving him; and we ſee the unfortunate Wraynham crying out, in the Anguiſh of his Soul, when he found he was like to be cenſured by that Court, My Lands are taken away, which were decreed me by a former Lord Chancellor; I ſee a Priſon gaping for me, in which I muſt from henceforth ſpend all the Days of my Life; for I have laid out three thouſand Pounds in this Suit: My Wife and Children muſt ſtarve, and my Friends, that ſtand engaged for me, are undone. And all theſe Misfortunes brought upon him by a Bribe of 100*l.* or a very little more, for ought appeared; and now he was to be puniſhed, by the Influence of his Oppreſſor, for complaining of the Injuſtice that had been done him. In his own Words, Oppreſſion was palliated and defended by Greatneſs, Wit, and Eloquence: He that had done him this Injury, was forced to add Falſhood and Cruelty to it, to prevent the Diſcovery, which was worſe than Murder, for his Lordſhip had devoured him and his Family. Such was the curſed Effects of his Lordſhip's taking one ſingle Bribe in this Cauſe, and very probably the Conſequences were as deſtructive in many more; and yet with what extreme Tenderneſs did the Parliament proceed againſt this illuſtrious Oppreſſor; it was long, very long, before they would give any Attention to the unfortunate injured Suitors; and, as has been already obſerved, ſome were puniſhed but for complaining of him, when his Corruption was ſo manifeſt, that his Servants were known to eſpouſe one Side or other, in almoſt every Cauſe.

Such were the fine Talents, the inimitable Accompliſhments of the Lord Bacon, that all the World ſeem to have been prejudiced in his Favour; and it has been looked upon as a memorable Inſtance of the Humanity of the Engliſh, that they expreſſed ſo much Compaſſion towards him in his Fall: The Commons, though his Oppreſſions cried ſo loud that they could not avoid proſecuting him, would not impeach impeach him formally, or draw up any Articles againſt him; but left the ungrateful Taſk entirely to the Lords.

His Peers, to deliver him from that Confuſion that muſt naturally have attended his Appearance before them, were pleaſed to diſpenſe with it, and gently cenſured him, in his Abſence. His Sentence muſt be acknowledged exceeding mild, if we reflect on his complicated Crimes. The Brightneſs of his Parts, and his exalted Station, were certainly ſo far from extenuating his Guilt, that they were in reality a very great Aggravation of it: This Backwardneſs, therefore, of the Commons, in proſecuting, and the Lords in puniſhing, this unrighteous Judge, muſt ſurely be looked upon, rather as the Effect of Weakneſs, than an Inſtance of the Virtue, of the Engliſh Nation.

Sir Thomas Darnel's Caſe.

Proceedings on the Writs of Habeas Corpus, brought by Sir THOMAS DARNEL, Sir JOHN CORBET, Sir WALTER EARL, Sir JOHN HEVENINGHAM, and Sir EDMUND HAMPDEN, Nov. 1627. 3 Car. I.

1627. 3 Car. I.

HIS Majeſty being engaged in War, both with France and Spain, and having been refuſed Supplies, by his two firſt Parliaments, aſſembled in the Years 1625, and 1626. had Recourſe to that extraordinary Way, of raiſing Money by way of Loan: And Letters were ſent to the Lords Lieutenants of the reſpective Counties, to return the Names of ſuch Perſons as were of Ability, and what Sums they might be ſuppoſed to ſpare: After which, Letters were iſſued, under the Privy Seal, requiring the Loan of ſuch Sums, as had been ſpecified in the Return of the Lords Lieutenants. Of ſome were demanded ten, of others fifteen Pounds; and ſcarce more than twenty Pounds, of any one Perſon. Collectors were employed to receive the reſpective Sums, or procure Subſcriptions for them; and thoſe who refuſed, either to pay, or ſubſcribe, what they were aſſeſſed at, were bound by Recognizance to appear at the Council Board. If they were Gentlemen of Fortune, and in caſe of their perſiſting to refuſe the Loan before the Council, they were committed to Priſon: Among theſe were Sir Thomas Darnel, and the other four Gentlemen above named; who ſeverally ſued out Writs of Habeas Corpus, to be admitted to Bail; and, firſt, Sir Thomas Darnel, who was impriſoned in the Fleet, brought his Writ of Habeas Corpus, returnable the 8th of November, and afterwards an Alias Habeas Corpus, returnable the 15th of November: By virtue whereof, the Warden of the Fleet brought Sir Thomas Darnel into the Court of King's-Bench, and made the following Return:

A Loan required of the Subject.

Sir Thomas committed by the Council, for refuſing to lend.

Brings his Writ of Habeas Corpus.

Return of the Habeas Corpus.

Executio iſtius brevis patet in quadam ſchedula annexat' huic brevi:

Ego, Henricus Liloe, Miles, Gardianus Priſone Domini Regis de le Fleet, ſereniſſimo Domino Regi certifico, quod dict' Thomas Darnel Baronet' detentus eſt in priſona predict' ſub cuſtodia mea virtute cujuſdam Warranti duorum de privato Conſilio mihi directi cujus tenor ſequitur in hiis verbis, viz.

Whereas heretofore the Body of Sir Thomas Darnel hath been committed to your Cuſtody, theſe are to require you, ſtill to continue him; and to let you know, that he was, and is, committed by the ſpecial Command of his Majeſty. Et hæc eſt cauſa detentionis predict' Thomæ Darnel.

The Caſe of Sir John Corbet Baronet, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Heveningham, and Sir Edmund Hampden Knights, was exactly the ſame with that of Sir Thomas Darnel: And they alſo were brought into Court, on their ſeveral Writs of Habeas Corpus, on Thurſday, the 22d of November.

The Caſe of the other four Priſoners, the ſame.

Serjeant Bramſton, on the Behalf of Sir John Heveningham, moved, that he might be bailed, taking Exceptions, as well to the Matter and Subſtance of the Return, as to the Manner and legal Form thereof.

Bramſton's Argument for Sir John Heveningham.

The Exceptions he took to the Matter, were, That, the Return was too general, there being no ſufficient Cauſe ſhewn, of the Commitment of the Priſoner: And, as it was inſufficient for the Cauſe, ſo alſo in the Time of the firſt Impriſonment; for though there appeared a Time, upon the ſecond Warrant from the Lords of the Council, to detain him ſtill in Priſon; yet, by the Return, no Time appeared when he was firſt impriſoned, which was neceſſary to be ſhewn; and if that Time appeared not, there was no Cauſe to remand him, and conſequently he was to be delivered.

Exceptions to the Return.

And as to the Cauſe of his Impriſonment, which was ſaid to be per ſpeciale mandatum Domini Regis, this was too general, and uncertain; for that it was not manifeſt, what kind of Command that was.

Nor was the Form of the Return, as it ought to be, fully and poſitively the Return of the Keeper himſelf only, but came in with a ſignificavit, or prout, that, he was committed per ſpeciale mandatum Domini Regis.

That it was not good in Subſtance; becauſe there was no Cauſe of the Impriſonment ſhewn. The Writ of Habeas Corpus was the only Means the Subject had to obtain his Liberty; and the End of the Writ was, to return the Cauſe of the Impriſonment, that it might be examined in that Court, whether the Parties ought to be diſcharged, or not. In this Return there was no Cauſe at all appeared of the firſt Commitment, and therefore there could be no Cauſe for the Court to remand him: But there was Cauſe to deliver him, ſince the Writ required the Keeper to bring the Body, and the Cauſe of his Impriſonment, before the Court.

This

1627. 3 Car. I.

This was the End of the Writ: And this could not appear to the Court, unleſs the Time of the firſt Impriſonment was expreſſed in the Return. By a latter Warrant from the Lords of the Council indeed, for continuing him in Priſon, there is a Time expreſſed: But if this was a good Cauſe, to remand theſe Gentlemen to Priſon, they might be perpetually impriſoned; for if they ſued out Writs of Habeas Corpus, it was but making a new Warrant, and they ſhould be remanded, and never have the Advantage of the Laws, which were the beſt Inheritance of the Subject.

Here the Serjeant cited ſeveral Precedents, where Priſoners had been bailed, that were committed per mandatum Domini Regis, without Cauſe of their Impriſonment ſhewn.

After citing theſe Precedents, the Serjeant concluded, that, ſince there was no ſufficient Cauſe of the Impriſonment expreſſed in the Return, his humble Suit was, that his Client, Sir John Heveningham, who had petitioned his Majeſty, that he might have the Benefit of the Law, (and his Majeſty had ſignified it to be his Pleaſure, that Juſtice, according to Law, ſhould be adminiſtred to all, and eſpecially to theſe Gentlemen) might be delivered from his Impriſonment.

Mr Noy's Argument for bailing Sir Walter Earl.

Mr. Noy being aſſigned Counſel for Sir Walter Earl, before he entered upon his Argument, for a Foundation of his Diſcourſe, read the Writ of Habeas Corpus, which runs thus:

Carolus, Dei Gratia, &c. Johanni Liloe Milit' Gardian' Priſon' noſtræ de le Fleet ſalut' Præcipimus tibi quod corpus Walteri Earl Milit' in priſona noſtra ſub cuſtodia tua detent' ut dicit' una cum cauſa detentionis ſuæ quocumque nomine predict' Walter' cenſeat in eadem Habeas Corpus ad ſubjiciendum & recipiendum ea quæ Curia noſtra de eo ad tunc & ibidem ordin' conting' in hac parte.

Et hæc nullatenus omit' periculo incumbend' & habeas ibi hoc breve. Teſte Hyde, apud Weſtm. quarto die Novembris, Anno, &c.

He alſo read the Return; but this being of the ſame Tenor as the former Return, there is no Neceſſity of repeating it.

Then Mr. Noye obſerved, that the Writ of Habeas Corpus contained a Command to the Warden of the Fleet, quod Habeas Corpus Walteri Earl coram nobis ad Subjiciend' & recipiend' ea quæ Curia noſtra de eo, &c. Ordin' & Conting' And the Warden having made the like Return as was made on the Return of Sir Thomas Darnel's Habeas Corpus, he deſired he might be bailed, if there was no other Cauſe of his Impriſonment; for if there had been a Cauſe certified, and that Cauſe had not been ſufficient to detain him ſtill in Priſon, the Court would have bailed him; and if a Man ſhould be in a worſe Caſe, when there was no Cauſe certified, it would be very hard.

He conceived, that though there was a Signification of the King's Pleaſure to have this Gentleman impriſoned, yet when the King afterwards granted this Writ of Habeas Corpus, to bring the Priſoner hither, ad ſubjiciendum, to ſubmit himſelf to Puniſhment if he had deſerved it, or, ad recipiendum, to receive his Enlargement and be delivered, if there was no Cauſe of his Impriſonment; ſince there appeared no Cauſe of his Impriſonment upon the Return, he ought to be diſcharged.

1627. 5 Car. I.

He made the ſame Objection to the Return alſo that the Serjeant had made, (viz.) That the Warden could not certify what was done by another: He muſt inform the Court of the immediate Act done, and not that ſuch Things were told him, or were ſignified to him, as he had done in this Caſe, which rendered the Return inſufficient in the Form.

That, whereas the Statute of Magna Charta 29. ſays, Nullus liber homo capietur vel impriſonetur, &c. nec ſuper eum mittimus, niſi per legale judicium parium ſuorum vel per legem terræ, the Words in carcerem are omitted out of the printed Books, it ſhould have been nec eum in carcerem mittimus; that the Words legem terræ are underſtood in ſeveral ſubſequent Acts of Parliament, to ſignify the Proceſs of Law, ſometimes by Writ, ſometimes by Attachment of the Perſon, and not ſpeciale mandatum Domini Regis, as appeared by two Petitions of the Commons, and the King's Anſwer, in 36 Edw. III. N°. 9. and N°. 20.

In the firſt of them the Commons complained, That the Great Charter, the Charter of the Foreſt, and other Statutes, were broken, and deſire his Highneſs, for the Good of himſelf and his People, they might be kept, and put in execution, and that they might not be infringed, by making an Arreſt by ſpecial Command, or otherwiſe: And the Anſwer was, That the ſaid Charter and other Statutes ſhould be put in execution according to the Petition; that is, without any Diſturbance by Arreſt by ſpecial Command, or otherwiſe. In the ſame Year they complained again, that Men were impriſoned by ſpecial Command, and without Indictment, or other legal Courſe; and deſired that Men might not be arreſted by ſpecial Command, againſt the Great Charter. To which the King anſwered, that he was well pleaſed therewith; and afterwards, that if any Man was grieved, he ſhould complain, and Right ſhould be done to him. And by the 37th of Edw. III. cap. 18. which was a Commentary upon Magna Charta, it was enacted, that Men ſhould not be committed upon Suggeſtion made to the King, without due Proceſs of Law; and ſo it was enacted twice in one Year.

Huſſey, Chief Juſtice, ſaith, that Sir John Markham told King Edward IV. that he could not arreſt a Man upon Suſpicion of Felony or Treaſon, as any of his Subjects might; becauſe if he ſhould wrong a Man by ſuch Arreſt, the Parties could have no Remedy againſt him.

The Statute of Weſtm. 1. indeed, ſays, That Men ſhould not be repleviſable in theſe four Caſes, viz. where they are committed for the Death of a Man; or by the Commandment of the King, or of his Juſtices, or of the Foreſt. This Statute, he held, regarded only the Writ de homine replegiando, and the Sheriffs, and inferior Officers, and not the ſuperior Courts; for it appeared by the Books, that where a Man was brought into the Court of King's-Bench, by Habeas Corpus, as in the 21 Edw. 4. 7. Winckfield was bailed here: And if the Statute was expounded otherwiſe, there could could be no bailing of Men outlawed, or Breakers of Priſons; for they were not within this Statute; and yet this Court bailed them at Pleaſure. It was evident, from the Preamble and whole Tenor of that Act, That it extended only to Sheriffs, Goalers, and other Keepers of Priſons, to direct them in what Caſes they ſhould let Men to Bail, and in what Caſes not; but did not extend to the Judges of the ſuperior Courts. He concluded, that theſe Gentlemen were brought into Court by Writ ad ſubjiciendum, if they were charged; and ad recipiendum if they were not charged: Therefore, in regard there was no Charge againſt them, whereupon they could be detained in Priſon any longer, he deſired his Client might be bailed, or diſcharged with the reſt.

Mr. Selden's Argument for Sir Edmund Hampden.

Mr. Selden, being aſſigned Counſel for Sir Edmund Hampden, moved alſo, that his Client might be bailed, there appearing no Cauſe, in the Return of the Habeas Corpus, why he ſhould be reſtrained of his Liberty: And, beſides the Arguments uſed by the former Counſel, he urged, That the Return was contradictory; for one Part of it ſaid, that his Client was detained by the ſpecial Command of the King, and the other, that the Lords of the Council willed and required the Warden ſtill to detain this Gentleman, and that this Contradiction made the Return void.

And as to the Matter, he conceived no Man could be impriſoned, either by the King or the Privy-Council, without Cauſe expreſſed: That by the Words, per legem terræ, in Magna Charta, muſt be intended a due Courſe of Law, either by Preſentment or Indictment; for if the Words per ſpeciale Mandatum, &c. were within the Meaning of thoſe Words per legem terræ, (or according to Law) then the Statute had done nothing: That the Words, per legem terræ, muſt be interpreted here, as in 42 Eliz. where a Bill was brought in, reciting, that divers Perſons, without any Writ or Preſentment, were caſt into Priſon; and deſiring it might be enacted, That it ſhould not be ſo done hereafter. The Anſwer was, that this was an Article of the Great Charter, and ſhould be granted: So that it appeared, that Statute was not taken to be an Explanation of Magna Charta, but the very Words of the Statute of Magna Charta. He concluded, that ſince there were ſo many Reaſons, ſo many Precedents, and ſo many Statutes, which declare, that no Freeman ought to be impriſoned, but according to the Laws of the Land, and that the Liberty of the Subject was the higheſt Inheritance he had, his Client might be bailed.

Mr. Calthrop's Argument for Sir John Corbet.

Mr. Calthrop, who was aſſigned Counſel for Sir John Corbet, moved alſo that his Client might be bailed, becauſe the Return of the Habeas Corpus was inſufficient, both in the Matter and the Manner of the Return. As to the Manner, he obſerved, as the reſt of the Counſel had done, That it was ſaid in the Return, that Sir John Corbet was detained in Priſon by the ſpecial Command of the King, ſignified by the Warrant of the Lords of the Council; which was not a direct Affirmation that he was detained by the ſpecial Command of the King; but that the Lords of the Council had ſignified by their Warrant, that he was committed, and ſtill detained, by the ſpecial Command of the King: Therefore, as a Return ought to be certain, punctual, and affirmative, and not by way of Information out of another Man's Mouth, this Return could not be good.

1627. 3 Car. I.

As to the Matter of the Return, he obſerved, it reſted on theſe three Points: 1. Whether the Return, that he was detained in Priſon by the ſpecial Command of the King, was good, or not, without ſhewing the Nature of the Command, or the Cauſe whereupon the Commitment was grounded? 2. Whether the Time of the firſt Commitment by the Command of the King, not appearing to the Court, was ſufficient to detain him? 3. Whether the Impriſonment of the Subject, without Cauſe ſhew'd, but only by the Command of the King, was warrantable?

That the Commands of the King were of ſeveral Natures: As to the verbal Command of the King, he held it was not ſufficient, either to impriſon a Man, or to continue him in Priſon: That it had been reſolved by the whole Court, that if the King commanded one Man to arreſt another, and the Party commanded did arreſt the other, an Action of Treſpaſs or falſe Impriſonment was maintainable againſt the Party that arreſted him, although it were done in the King's Preſence, 16 Hen. VI. Monſtrans de droit.

37 Hen. VI. 10. If the King give me a Thing, and I take it, by his Command by Word of Mouth, it is not juſtified by Law. Nothing paſſes from the Crown without Matter of Record, 10 Hen. VII. 7, & 17, 18. Juſtices may command one to arreſt another intheir View or Preſence, but not one out of their View.

2. There is a Command of the King, by his Commiſſion; but it was reſolved in 42 Aſſ. pl. 5. that a Commiſſion to take a Man's Goods, or impriſon his Body, without Indictment or Suit of the Party, or other due Proceſs, was againſt Law.

3. There is a Command of the King, grounded on a Suggeſtion made to the King or his Council; but if a Man is committed to Priſon on ſuch Suggeſtion, by Command of the King, it is unlawful. 25 Edw. III. cap. 4. it is eſtabliſhed, that from thenceforth none ſhall be taken by Petition, or Suggeſtion, made to the King, or his Council; or otherwiſe, than by Preſentment or Indictment, or by Proceſs made by Writ original at the Common Law: And to the ſame Effect is the 37 Edw. III. cap. 10.

4. There is a Command of the King, under his Hand by his Signet; and it appears that this is not ſufficient to ſet a Man at Liberty; and much leſs to impriſon him.

5. There is a Command of the King, by Writ under the Great Seal, or the Seal of the Court out of which it iſſueth, which is legal and warrantable; and yet even here the Party is bailable. And in the Regiſter he obſerved, this Writ was expounded to be ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis: Therefore when the Return is made, that he is impriſoned, and detained in Priſon by the ſpecial Command of the King, how could the Court adjudge, upon this Return, whether he ought to be kept in Priſon, and not be bailed; when the Nature of the ſpecial Command is not ſet forth in the Return, whereby it might appear to the Court, whether he was bailable?

As to the general Return of ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, without ſhewing Cauſe; the Command of the Habeas Corpus being to ſhew the Cauſe of his detaining in Priſon, as well as to bring his Body into Court, the Keeper did not give a full Anſwer to the Writ, unleſs the Cauſe of the Detainment in Priſon was returned. The Court could not know how to give their Judgment upon him, either for his Impriſonment, or for his Diſcharge, according to the Purport of the Writ, when there was not any Cauſe returned.

As the Court of King's-Bench, and Judges, ought not to deny an Habeas Corpus, to any Priſoner that demands it, by whomſoever committed; ſo ought the Cauſe of his Impriſonment to be ſhewn on the Return, that the Court may adjudge of the Cauſe, whether it be lawful or not.

Then he proceeded to cite Precedents, where the Parties were committed by the Command of the King, or the Privy-Council; admitting that ſuch Acts as were done by the Privy-Council might properly be ſaid to be done by the King himſelf; and in all theſe Caſes he ſaid it would appear, there was a Cauſe returned, as well as a ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, &c. or mandatum Privati Concilii domini Regis. And after the reciting of the ſaid Precedents, he concluded, That the Return, that Sir John Corbet was committed and detained in Priſon, per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, without ſhewing the Nature of the Command, and the Cauſe upon which the Command of the King was grounded, was not good; and therefore deſired his Client Sir John Corbet might be diſcharged.

Whereupon the Chief Juſtice demanded, if Mr. Attorney would take another Day to anſwer their Arguments; and the Attorney deſiring that Monday, the 26th of November, might be appointed for hearing him, the Council for the Priſoners were ordered to attend the Judges and Mr. Attorney, with the Precedents and unprinted Statutes they had mentioned, in the mean time.

Mr. Attorney's Anſwer to the preceding Arguments.

On Monday the 26th of November, 1627, Sir John Corbet, and the reſt of the Priſoners, being brought into Court again, Mr. Attorney obſerved, that their Council had divided their Objections into two main Points; the one the Form, the other the Matter; and to the Form, had objected four ſeveral Things.

1. That the Return was not poſitive, but referred to the Signification made by another, as the Lords of the Council. 2. That the Keepers of the Priſons had not returned the Cauſe of the Commitment, but the Cauſe of the Cauſe, which was not good. 3. That the Return was imperfect; for that it ſhew'd only the Cauſe of the detaining in Priſon, and not the Cauſe of the firſt Commitment. 4. And laſtly, That the Return was contradictory; for that in the firſt Part there was a Certification that the detaining theſe Gentlemen in Priſon was per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis; and when the Warrant of the Lords of the Council was ſhewed, it appeared that the Commitment was by the Lords of the Council.

1627. 3 Car. I.

As to the firſt Objection, Mr. Attorney ſaid, he did agree, that if the Return was not poſitive, it was not good. But it appeared that the firſt Words of the Return were poſitive and affirmative: The Words were, Quod detentus eſt ſub cuſtodia mea per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis. The Words mihi ſignificavit followed, and were not Part of the Affirmation made before it. There was a poſitive Return, that the Detaining was by the Command of the King; and the reſt of the Return was only for the Satisfaction of the Court.

To the ſecond Objection, that the Warden had returned the Cauſe of the Cauſe, and not the Cauſe itſelf, in which alſo they were miſtaken; for the Return was affirmative, Ego Johannes Liloe certifico, &c. the other was but the Council's Warrant for him that made the Return.

3. To the third Objection, that the Return ſhewed only the Cauſe of detaining in Priſon, and not the Cauſe of the firſt Commitment, he anſwered, that it was ſufficient for the Officer to anſwer the Point commanded, and the Writ mentioned only the Cauſe of the Detaining.

4. As to the fourth Objection, that the Return was contradictory, for that in the firſt Part it is ſaid they were detained per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, and afterwards that they were detained by the Lords of the Council; To this he anſwered, that it appeared that the Lords of the Council ſpake not their own Words or Command in that Warrant, but ſay, you are to take notice of it as the Words and Command of the King. They ſay it was his Majeſty's Pleaſure he ſhould know, that the firſt Commitment, and the preſent detaining him in Priſon, was by his Majeſty's ſpecial Command; from whence he concluded, that the Form of the Return was ſufficient.

As to the Matter of the Return: The great and mighty Reaſon the Council for the Priſoners inſiſted upon was, the Inconveniences that might come to the Subjects in their Liberties, if this Return ſhould be good: And he did acknowledge, that the Liberty of the Subject was juſt, and that it was the Inheritance of the Subject; but yet it was their Inheritance ſecundum legem terræ.

He obſerved, the Council had cited many Caſes to enforce what they advanced; as 1 & 2 Eliz. Dyer, fo. 175. That the Continuance of a Capias ſhall be from Term to Term, without a Term betwixt; becauſe otherwiſe the Defendant may be kept too long in Priſon; and 38 Aſſ. pl. f. 22. Broke, tit. Impriſonment, 100. that Impriſonment is but to detain the Party till he have made Fine to the King; and therefore the King cannot juſtly detain him in Priſon after the Fine tendered: And 16 Hen. VI. Monſtrans de droit, If the King command me to arreſt a Man, and thereupon I do arreſt him, he may have an Action of falſe Impriſonment, or of Treſpaſs, againſt me, though it be done in the King's Preſence: And 1 Hen. VII. 4. where Huſſey is made to ſay, that Sir John Markham declared to King Edward IV. that he might not arreſt any of his Subjects for Treaſon or Felony; becauſe he might wrong his Subjects by ſuch Arreſts, and they could not have a Remedy againſt him.

To

1627. 3 Car. I.

To the two firſt Caſes, he anſwered, that the Reſtraint in theſe, and moſt of the other Caſes cited, appeared to be in the ordinary Courſe of Judicature, fit for Weſtminſter-Hall, and not for the Council-Table, and therefore not applicable to this Caſe: And for the other two Caſes, the Law preſumed the active Part of them not proper for the Majeſty of a King, who ever did thoſe Things by his ſubordinate Officers. The King might commit any Man at his Pleaſure: But the Queſtion here was, Whether, when the King had committed any one, he muſt render a Cauſe of that Commitment?

That the King could not command his Lordſhip, or any other Court of Juſtice, to proceed otherwiſe than according to the Laws of the Kingdom: But there was a great deal of Difference between thoſe legal Commands, and that abſolute poteſtas, that a Sovereign has, by which a King commands. He did not mean, he ſaid, by abſoluta poteſtas, that it was ſuch a Power, that the King might do what he pleaſed; for he had Rules to govern himſelf by, as well as his Lordſhip, who was a ſubordinate Judge, under him: The Difference was, the King was the Head of the ſame Fountain of Juſtice, which his Lordſhip adminiſtred to all his Subjects. All Juſtice was derived from him; and what he did, he did not as a private Perſon, but as Head of the Commonwealth, as Juſticiarius Regni. The very Eſſence of Juſtice, under God, upon Earth, was in him: And ſhould they not ſubmit to his Commands, but make Enquiries, whether they were lawful, and ſay, that the King could not do this or that, in the Courſe of Juſtice? Who ſhould call in queſtion, the Actions, or the Juſtice, of the King, who was not to give any Account for them? as in this Caſe, where he had committed a Subject, and ſhewed no Cauſe for it.

The King often commits, and ſhews no Cauſe: If he does expreſs the Cauſe, indeed, to be either for Suſpicion of Felony, Coining, or the like, the Court might deliver the Priſoner, though it was per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, becauſe there is no Secret in theſe Caſes; for with the Warrant, he ſends the Cauſe of the Commitment: But if there was no Cauſe expreſſed, that Court always remanded them. It was to be intended, there was Matter of State, and that it was not ripe, or Time for it to appear.

By Magna Charta indeed (the Foundation of our Liberties) None ſhall be impriſoned, but by lawful Judgment of his Peers, or by the Law of the Land. But did it follow from thence, that no Man could be committed, but he muſt be firſt indicted, or preſented? Every Juſtice of Peace, or Conſtable, might commit before Indictment, or Preſentment; therefore a Commitment could not be meant by the Words, per legem terræ, much leſs a Commitment by the King, who was not anſwerable to the Party, or to any Court of Juſtice, for his Commitments, but to the high Court of Heaven.

Then Mr. Attorney cauſed the Statutes to be read, on which the Counſel on the other Side inſiſted, affirming, that they were not to be underſtood of the firſt Arreſt; but that no Man ſhould be tried, or condemned, but by the Law of the Land: And that, if they were to be underſtood otherwiſe, it was contrary to all Practice, both then, and now in Uſe: That their Buſineſs was to find out the true Meaning of Magna Charta, that being the Foundation of their Caſe: All that had been ſaid beſides, was not to the Purpoſe; there was not a Word, either of the Commitment of the King, or Council, in all the Statutes and Records they had cited.

1627. 3 Car. I.

The Queſtion was not, Whether the King, or Council, could commit a Man, and ſhew no Cauſe of his Commitment; but, Whether the ordinary Courts of Juſtice had Power to bail him, or not? And he inſiſted, that the Statute of Weſtm. 1. was a Direction, in what Caſes Men impriſoned ſhould be bailed. This Statute declared, that in four Caſes Men were not repleviſable, viz. thoſe that were impriſoned for the Death of a Man, by the Command of the King, or of his Juſtices, or of the Foreſt. This Statute was made ſoon after that of Magna Charta, and was an Expoſition of it; and the Council, on the other Side, had not ſhewn one Law, printed or unprinted, that repealed or altered this; or ſhewed that ſuch Men were repleviſable: And as the Law, ſo the conſtant Courſe of Precedents, which were the beſt Expoſitions of the Law, were againſt them. They, on the other Side, could not cite one Book, Statute, or other Thing, to prove, that they that have been committed per ſpeciale mandatum domini Regis, were bailable.

Then Mr. Attorney cited ſeveral Precedents, to ſhew, that Perſons committed by the ſpecial Command of the King, or the Council, were not bailable; and, among the reſt, a Reſolution of the Judges, in Queen Elizabeth's Reign, that a Man committed by the Queen, or the Privy Council, without Cauſe expreſſed, could not be bailed.

He ſaid, there were Arcana Imperii, which Subjects were not to pry into. If the King committed a Subject, and expreſſed no Cauſe, it was not to be inferred from thence, there was no Cauſe for his Commitment: The Courſe had always been, to ſay there was no Cauſe expreſſed, and therefore the Matter was not ripe; and thereupon the Courts of Juſtice have always reſted ſatisfied, and would not ſearch into it.

In this Caſe, the King was to be truſted: It was not to be preſumed, he would do any thing, that was not for the Good of the Kingdom. In coining Money, his Power was abſolute: If he would coin Braſs, or Leather, inſtead of Silver, there was no Remedy: The Cinque Ports were free to carry on their Trade; but the King, foreſeeing Danger, might ſhut up the Ports: The King might pardon all Traitors and Felons, and exempt ſo many from Offices and Juries, that there might not be Men enough left to ſerve: But it was not to be ſuppoſed, he would do theſe Things: However, he was intruſted with the Power of doing them; and the Inconvenience would be as great to the Subject, if he did any of them, as his committing Men, without ſhewing Cauſe, might might be; and therefore the Arguments drawn from the Inconvenience that might attend ſuch Commitments, were of no Weight.

Then he proceeded to anſwer their Precedents, and inſiſted, that thoſe they had produced, made more againſt the Priſoners, than for them; but complained, that though they mentioned but eight Precedents in Court, they had ſince brought him ſixteen.

He ſhewed that, in moſt of the Precedents cited by the Council, the Cauſe of the Commitment was expreſſed; or the Parties were committed by the ordinary Courts; or the King ſignified his Pleaſure to the Court, that the Priſoners ſhould be diſcharged, or bailed, before the Court did either. He cited alſo many other Precedents, to ſhew, that this was the general Practice; and prayed, that theſe Gentlemen might be remanded, and left to go the right Way for their Delivery, namely, by Petition to the King. Whether it was a Petition of Right, or of Grace, he knew not; but he was ſure it muſt be to the King, from whom he perſonally underſtood, that theſe Gentlemen had never yet preſented any Petition to him.

The Judges having appointed the 28th of November, to deliver their Opinions in this Matter, the Lord Chief Juſtice Hyde ſaid, they had ſeriouſly conſidered what had been offered on either Side; and being come to a Reſolution, the reſt of the Judges had deſired him to deliver the Opinion of the whole Court.

He ſaid, the Statutes of Magna Charta, the 25 Edw. III. the 36 Edw. III. the Statute of Weſtm. 1. and the reſt of the Statutes mentioned, were very good Laws, and ſtill in Force; but it was not their Buſineſs, to interpret them now: What was now to be adjudged of by them, was, Whether one that was committed by the King's Authority, and no Cauſe declared of his Commitment, ought to be delivered by Bail, or remanded back?

The Exceptions which had been taken, he ſaid, were either to the Form, or to the Subſtance. As to the Form, it was pretended, the Return was not poſitive; but they conceived, it was a poſitive and abſolute Return. The Warden of the Fleet had firſt returned poſitively, that it was done by the King's Direction; and the Words that followed, were ſurpluſage, as to that Objection, that the Return did not take Notice, why they were taken: It was ſufficient for the Officer to anſwer the Point in Queſtion; and the Writ did not demand the Reaſon why they were taken, but the Cauſe of the Detention, which was ſufficiently anſwered; and therefore they reſolved, that the Form of the Return was good.

As to the Subſtance, or Matter of the Return, the Warden certified, that they were detained in Priſon by the ſpecial Command of the King; and the Queſtion was, Whether this Return was good in Law?

They had produced Precedents indeed, to prove that where Men were committed by the King, or the Lords of the Council, and no Cauſe expreſſed, they were delivered; but theſe Precedents proved the direct contrary: Where the Cauſe of the Commitment hath been expreſſed; there the Party hath been delivered by the Court, if the Caſe ſo required: But where there hath been no Cauſe expreſſed, they have ever been remanded; or, if they have been delivered, it was by the Direction of the King, or of the Lords of the Council. After which the Chief Juſtice went through all the Caſes that had been cited, and declared that the whole Court were of Opinion, the Precedents made againſt the Priſoners; but ſeemed to rely on none more than the Reſolution of all the Judges of England in 34 Eliz. That if a Man was committed by the Commandment of the King, he was not to be delivered by a Habeas Corpus in that Court, for they knew not the Cauſe of his Impriſonment.

This had been the Practice in the Times of all preceding Kings, as appeared from the Records they had cited; and they muſt walk in the Steps of their Forefathers: The King was truſted in great Matters, though he was bound to act by Law, and he commanded them to proceed by Law; and they made no doubt but if the Priſoners would apply to the King, who knew the Cauſe of their Impriſonment, he would relieve them; but they muſt leave Mercy to him. If in Juſtice they ought to have delivered the Priſoners, they would have done it; but upon thoſe Grounds and Records, on thoſe Precedents and Reſolutions, they could not deliver them, but they muſt be remanded. However, his Majeſty having releaſed all thoſe Gentlemen who were impriſoned for refuſing the Loan, in January following, the Nation ſeemed to look upon them as injured Patriots, who had ſuffered in the Cauſe of Liberty; and a Parliament being ſummoned to meet ſoon after, moſt of them were elected, and returned to ſerve as Members in it.

The Gentlemen who refuſed the Loan elected Members of Parliament.

The Parliament meeting on the 17th of March 1627, among other Grievances, this of impriſoning Gentlemen for refuſing the Loan, and not admitting them to Bail, was moved: And it ſeemed determined in the Houſe of Commons, not to grant his Majeſty any Supplies, till this, and the reſt of their Grievances, were redreſſed.

The Parliament meets.

The Commons reſent the Impriſonment of Gentlemen for refuſing the Loan, &c.

Sir Francis Seymour opened the Debate on this Subject, and, after ſome Preamble to his Diſcourſe, ſaid, How can we think of giving Subſidies, till we know whether we have any Thing to give? If his Majeſty is perſuaded by any, he may take from his Subjects what he will, I would gladly know what we have to give? It was ill for Subjects to give Laws to their Princes, and as ill that Princes ſhould uſe Force with their Laws; that this had been done, appeared by billeting of Soldiers, levying Money againſt Act of Parliament, and by impriſoning divers Gentlemen for the Loan, who, if they had ſubmitted, had been as much in Fault as thoſe that were the Projectors of it; though, to countenance theſe Proceedings, it had been preached (or rather prated) from the Pulpit, that all we have is the King's, Jure Divino: They forſook their own Function, and turned ignorant Stateſmen: They were willing to change their Conſcience for a good Biſhoprick: They ſaw how eaſy it was for a Prince, how juſt and good ſoever, to be abuſed, in regard he muſt ſee with other Men's Eyes, and hear with other Men's Ears. He obſerved, that thoſe Princes had been in the greateſt Want and Extremity, that had had exacted moſt of their Subjects; moſt unfortunate in the Choice of their Miniſters, and failed moſt in their Undertakings. It was clear that the Reaſon his Majeſty did not ſucceed in his Wars with France and Spain, was for want of faithful Council: He wiſhed he could ſay ſuch a one had been employed abroad. He confeſſed, he was no good Subject, nor well affected to his Majeſty, that would not freely lay down his Life, for the Service of his Majeſty and the Commonwealth: But, on the contrary, when againſt a Parliament-Law, the Subject ſhall have his Goods taken away, and be deprived of his Liberty, ſhould it be accounted want of Duty to ſtand upon their hereditary Privileges, confirmed by many Acts of Parliament?

They ſtrike at the Duke of Bucks.

In doing this they ſhould tread in the Steps of their Forefathers, who ever preferred the publick Intereſt before their own private Right, nay, before their Lives; nor could it be any wrong to his Majeſty to ſtand upon them, ſince they ſhould thereby be the better enabled to ſerve his Majeſty; but they muſt wrong their Poſterity and their Conſciences, if they ſhould willingly forego what belonged to them, by the Laws of God and of the Land; and this they ſhould do well to preſent to his Majeſty; they had no Cauſe to doubt of his gracious Acceptance of ſuch an Addreſs.

Sir Thomas Wentworth's Speech.

Surely, ſaid Sir Thomas Wentworth, in the greateſt Humility I ſpeak it, theſe illegal Ways are Puniſhments, and Marks of Indignation: The raiſing Loans, ſtrengthned by Commiſſions, with unheard of Inſtructions and Oaths; the billeting of Soldiers by Lieutenants, and Deputy-Lieutenants, have been as if they could have perſuaded Chriſtian Princes, yea Worlds, that the Right of Empire was to take away by a ſtrong Hand; and they had endeavoured, as far as poſſible, to do it. This had not been done by the King, (under the pleaſing Shade of whoſe Crown, he hoped they ſhould ever gather the Fruits of Juſtice,) but by Projectors, who had extended the Prerogative of the King beyond the juſt Symmetry, which made a ſweet Harmony of the whole: They had brought the Crown into greater Want than ever, by anticipating the Revenues: They had introduced a Privy-Council, raviſhing at once the Spheres of all antient Government; impriſoning the Subject, without either Bail or Bond. He added, they have taken from us, what? What ſhall I ſay? Indeed, what have they left us? All Means of ſupplying the King, and ingratiating ourſelves with him, taking up the Root of all Property; and concluded with a Motion to addreſs his Majeſty for four Things: 1. The Freedom of their Perſons from Impriſonment; 2. Not to employ them abroad, contrary to antient Cuſtom; 3. That no Levies be made on their Goods, but by Parliament; and 4. That there might be no billetting of Soldiers.

Sir Benjamin Rudyard's Speech.

Sir Benjamin Rudyard obſerved, That they had provoked two mighty Kings, (France and Spain) that they had united them, and betrayed themſelves more than the Enemy could; that if the King drew one way, and the Parliament another, they muſt all ſink: He deſired the Houſe therefore, to avoid all Conteſts with the King, and give him Leave to come off; he believed his Majeſty expected but the Occaſion: By truſting the King, and giving him a large Supply, according to his Wants, they would breed a Truſt in him; and by proſtrating their Grievances humbly at his Feet, they would find the beſt Way to his Heart: Concluding, let us all labour to get the King on our Side, which may be no hard Matter, conſidering the near Subſiſtence between the King and People.

1627. 3 Car. I.

Then Sir Edward Coke ſtood up, to ſhew that Loans were againſt the Laws of the Land, reciting thoſe Words in the 25th of Edw. III. Loans againſt the Will of the Subject, are againſt Reaſon, and the Franchiſes of the Land.

Sir Edward Coke.

Mr. Secretary Cook ſpoke in Behalf of the Court, propoſing both a Supply and Redreſs of Grievances: He acknowledged, illegal Courſes had been taken, which muſt be redreſſed by Laws and Puniſhments; but urged, that the Court had been neceſſitated to take theſe Courſes, and Neceſſity had no Law; they muſt enable the State to do what they required by their Petition: He would have them prepare a Repreſentation of their Grievances, but begin with the Supply, which would confound their Enemies more than ten Subſidies; and that they would not ſeem to put Conditions upon his Majeſty, who was a Prince jealous of his Honour.

Secretary Cook's Speech.

Sir Robert Phillip's Speech.

Sir Robert Phillips, on the other Side, ſaid, he acknowledged their Dangers from abroad were not chimerical, but real: They had provoked two potent Kings, who were ſtrongly united; but they muſt conſider their Dangers at home. He was more afraid of the Violation of their publick Rights at home than of a foreign Enemy. The late unaccuſtomed Violences affected all they had, though the People of this State were under no Subjection, but what they conſented to by the Original Contract between King and People: As there were Prerogatives and Privileges conferred on the King, ſo there were left to the Subject many, very many, neceſſary Liberties and Privileges, notwithſtanding what thoſe two Sycophants, Sibthorpe and Manwaring, had prated in the Pulpit to the contrary: Never any King violated the Subjects Liberty and Property, but it was immediately complained of, and redreſſed; and he was confident his Majeſty would do the ſame, if he was applied to. And having taken notice of the reſt of the Grievances the former Gentleman had mentioned, he fell upon the Impriſonment of Sir John Darnel, Sir John Heveningham, &c. for not paying the Loan: He ſaid, I can live, although I pay Exciſes and Impoſitions for more than I do; but to have my Liberty, which is the Soul of my Life, taken from me by Power, and to be pent up in a Jayl, without Remedy by Law, and to be adjudged to periſh in a Jayl; Oh improvident Anceſtors! Oh unwiſe Foreſathers! to be curious in providing for the quiet Poſſeſſion of our Lands and Privileges of Parliament, and to neglect our Perſons and Bodies, and to let them die in Priſon, or remain there remedileſs, durante beneplacito. If this be Law, what do we talk of our Liberties? Why do we trouble ourſelves with Diſputes of Law, Franchiſes, and Property of Goods? This is the Sum of all Miſeries, and I hope we ſhall ſpeak our Minds when this Judgment comes to be debated.

1628 4 Car. I.

All Things a State can be capable of, whether Bleſſings or Puniſhments, depend on this Meeting: If any think the King can be ſupplied, and the Commonwealth preſerved, without Redreſs of Grievances, he is deceived. The Kings of England were never more glorious than when they truſted their Subjects. Let the Houſe therefore, prepare their Grievances, fit for his Majeſty's View; not make a Law to give us new Liberties, but declaratory, with Penalties; ſo that thoſe that violate them, if they will be vile, may fear Infamy with Men; and then we ſhall think of ſuch a Supply as never Prince received; with our Money we ſhall give him our Hearts, and give him a new People raiſed from the Dead: We ſhall go home to our Countries, and leave our Poſterities as free as our Anceſtors left us.

Sir Edward Coke againſt himſelf.

The Caſe of the Impriſonment of the Gentlemen, for not paying the Loan, being again debated in the Houſe of Commons, the 29th of March, 1628, Sir Edward Coke averred, That Perſons committed by the King or Council, without Cauſe ſhewn, might be bailed.

Solicitor General.

To which Mr. Solicitor replied, That by the ſame Sir Edward Coke, Crook, Dodderidge, and Houghton, the whole Court of King's-Bench, it had been reſolved, that the Cauſe need not be diſcloſed, being per mandatum Concilii as Arcana Regni; and by Coke it was then ſaid, If the Privy-Council commit one, he is not bailable by any Court of Juſtice, and that Stamford's Opinion was ſo, Folio 72; and that his Opinion was the ſame on the Reſolution in the 34th of Eliz.

Sir Edward Coke.

Sir Edward Coke ſaid, that in Truth, when he read Stamford, he was of that Opinion; but of late, looking into the Records that had been cited, he was of another Mind. (From whence Sir Edward's Enemies inferred, that his Opinion was not much to be regarded, having been of one Mind while he was in Office, and of another after he was diſmiſſed from Employment.)

The Matter having been debated ſeveral Days in the Houſe of Commons, they came at length to the following Reſolutions, Nemine contradicente.

Reſolutions of the Commons, on the Subject of Liberty.

1. That no Freeman ought to be detained, or kept in Priſon, or otherwiſe reſtrained, by the Command of the King, or Privy-Council, or any other, unleſs ſome Cauſe of the Commitment, Detainer, or Reſtraint be expreſſed, for which by Law he ought to be committed, detained, or reſtrained.

2. That the Writ of Habeas Corpus may not be denied, but ought to be granted to every Man that is committed or detained in Priſon, or otherwiſe reſtrained, though it be by the Command of the King, the Privy-Council, or any other, he praying the ſame.

3. That if a Freeman be committed or detained in Priſon, or otherwiſe reſtrained, by the Command of the King, the Privy Council, or any other; no Cauſe of ſuch Commitment, Detainer, or Reſtraint being expreſſed, for which by Law he ought to be committed, detained, or reſtrained; and the ſame be returned upon an Habeas Corpus, granted for the ſaid Party; then he ought to be delivered, or bailed.

1628. 4 Car. I.

They alſo unanimouſly reſolved, that it is the antient and indubitable Right of every Freeman, that he hath a full and abſolute Property in his Goods and Eſtate; that no Tax, Tallage, Loan, Benevolence, or other like Charge, ought to be commanded, or levied by the King, or any of his Miniſters, without common Conſent by Act of Parliament.

The Commons afterwards, at a Conference with the Lords, on the ſeventh of April, communicated theſe Reſolutions to them; when ſeveral of the Committee of the Commons made Speeches on the Occaſion, to induce the Lords to concur with them in theſe Reſolutions.

Sir Dudley Digg's Speech at a Conference with the Lords, ſhewing the Antiquity of the Common Law.

Sir Dudley Diggs opened the Conference, and ſaid, he was confident their Lordſhips would cheerfully join with the Commons, in acknowledging God's great Bleſſing, in their good King Joſiah, in whoſe Reign, as in that of Joſiah of old, they had found (he could not ſay a Book of the Law, but) many fundamental Points thereof neglected and broken, which had occaſioned their Deſire of this Conference.

He ſaid he was commanded to ſhew, that the Laws of England were grounded on Reaſon, more antient than Books, conſiſting much in unwritten Cuſtoms, yet ſo full of Juſtice and true Equity, that their moſt honourable Predeceſſors and Anceſtors many Times propugned them with a nolumus mutari; ſo antient, that from the Saxon Times, they had continued for the moſt Part the ſame, as appeared in old remaining Monuments of the Laws of Ethelbert, the firſt Chriſtian King of Kent, Ina King of the Weſt-Saxons, Offa of the Mercians, and of Alfred, that great Monarch, who united the Saxon Heptarchy, whoſe Laws were yet to be ſeen.

That it was an undoubted and fundamental Point in this antient Common Law of England, That the Subject had a true Property in his Goods and Poſſeſſions, preſerving ſacred that meum & tuum, which was the Nurſe of Induſtry, and Mother of Courage; but this undoubted Birthright of free Subjects had lately been invaded and prejudiced by Preſſures, the more grievous, as they had been followed by Impriſonment, contrary to the Franchiſes of the Land; and when Redreſs had been ſought for, in a legal way, by demanding the Writ of Habeas Corpus, and a Diſcharge, or Trial according to the Law of the Land, they had failed of Succeſs; which had compelled the Commons to examine, by Acts of Parliament, Precedents, and Reaſons, the Reality of Engliſh Subjects Liberty, which he left to the learned Gentlemen that were to ſpeak after him, to communicate to their Lordſhips.

Sir Robert Cotton's Speech, ſpecifying the Acts made in Behalf of Liberty and Property.

Then Sir Robert Cotton (or, as others relate, Mr. Littleton) recited and explained the ſeveral Acts of Parliament, made in Behalf of Liberty and Property.

The firſt of theſe, he obſerved, was the Grand Charter of Liberties, firſt granted in the 17th Year of King John, renewed in the 9th Year of Henry III, and ſince confirmed in Parliament thirty Times; the Words whereof were, Nullus liber homo capiatur vel impriſonetur aut diſſeiſietur, de libero tenemento, &c. Niſi per legale judicium parium ſuorum, vel per legem terræ.

From

1628. 4 Car. I.

From whence it was evident, that no Freeman ought to be taken or impriſoned, but by the lawful Judgment of his Peers, or Equals, or by the Law of the Land; and by Law of the Land, he inſiſted, muſt be underſtood due Proceſs of Law.

That by 5 Edw. III. it was enacted, That no Man ſhould be attached by any Accuſation, nor forejudged of Life or Limb, nor his Lands, Goods, or Chattels, ſeized into the King's Hands, contrary to the Great Charter, and the Law of the Land: That the 25th of Edw. III. cap. 4. recites, that whereas it is contained in the Great Charter, that no Freeman ſhall be impriſoned, or put out of his Freehold, or free Cuſtom, unleſs it be by the Law of the Land; it is thereby eſtabliſhed, that, from thenceforth, none ſhall be taken by Petition, or Suggeſtion, made to our Lord the King, or to his Council, unleſs it be by Indictment, or Preſentment; or by Proceſs, made by Writ Original, at the Common-Law.

By the 28th of Edw. III. cap. 3. It is enacted, That no Man, of what State or Condition ſoever he be, ſhall be put out of his Lands or Tenements; nor be taken, impriſoned, diſinherited, or put to Death, without he be brought in to anſwer by due Proceſs of Law.

That in a Parliament Roll of the 36th of Edw. III. The Commons petitioned, that the Great Charter, the Charter of the Foreſt, and other Statutes, made for the Profit of the King, and his Commonalty, might be firmly kept, without giving Diſturbance, or making Arreſt contrary to them, by ſpecial Command, or in other Manner. And the Anſwer to the Petition, which made it an Act of Parliament, was, Our Lord the King, by the Aſſent of the Prelates, Dukes, Earls, Barons, and Commonalty, hath ordained and eſtabliſhed, that the ſaid Charters and Statutes be held, and put in Execution, according to the ſaid Petition.

In a Parliament Roll of the 36th of Edw. III. there is a Petition and Anſwer of the like Tenor: The 37th of Edw. III. cap. 18. agrees in Subſtance with it. By the Statute of 42 Edw. III. cap. 13. it is enacted, That no Man ſhall be put to anſwer, without Preſentment before Juſtices, or Matter of Record, or by due Proceſs and Writ Original, according to the old Law of the Land; and, if any Thing be done to the contrary, it ſhall be void in Law.

As to what was objected from the Statute of Weſtm. 1. cap. 15. which ſays, That a Man is not repleviable, who is committed by the Command of the King; and conſequently, that the Command of the King, without any Cauſe ſhewed, was ſufficient to commit a Man to Priſon, and detain him there:

He anſwered, That there was a Difference between Repleviable, which was always by the Sheriff, upon Pledges, or Sureties given, and Bailable, which was by a Court of Record, where the Priſoner is delivered to his Bail; and they are his Jailors, and may impriſon him, and ſhall ſuffer for him, Body for Body: As appeared by 33 and 36 Edw. III. Tit. Mainprize, 12 and 13. And, if the Words of the Statute were obſerved, it would plainly appear, that they extended only to the Sheriff, and other Inferior Officers, but did not bind the Hands of the Judges: For, in the Preamble, it is ſaid, Foraſmuch as Sheriffs and others, have taken and kept in Priſon, Perſons detected of Felony, &c. And in another Place, Under-Sheriffs, Conſtables, and Bailiffs, are mentioned: And in another Place, the Words are, Sheriffs and others, which have taken and kept in Priſon: And as every one knew, the Judges do neither arreſt, or keep Men in Priſon; that was the Office of Sheriffs, and other inferior Miniſters; and conſequently the Statute intended ſuch only, and not the Judges; they might ſtill bail Priſoners, by whomſoever committed.

1628. 4 Car. I.

This Interpretation he confirmed by the Authority of Newton, Chief Juſtice, 22 Hen. VI. 46. where he ſays, It cannot be intended that the Sheriff did ſuffer him to go at large by Mainprize; for, where one is taken by the Writ of the King, or the Commandment of the King, he is Irrepleviable; but in ſuch caſe his Friends may come to the Juſtices from him, if he be arreſted, and purchaſe a Superſedeas: Here the Judge declares, That the Sheriff had no Power, but the Judges had Power to deliver him that was committed by the King's Command; and both the antient and modern Practice manifeſt as much; for he that is taken for the Death of a Man, or for the Foreſt, is not Repleviable by the Sheriff: But the Juſtices of the King's Bench do bail for Murder, and for Offences done in the Foreſt, which they could not do, if the Word Irreplievable in Weſtm. 1. were meant of the Judges, as well as of the Sheriffs; concluding, that he conceived, he had now cleared the Declaration of perſonal Liberty, an antient and undoubted Truth, which, he obſerved, was fortified by ſeven Acts of Parliament, and not oppoſed by any Statute, or Authority of Law whatever.

Mr. Selden's Speech, ſhewing the Precedents for bailing Perſons committed by the King, or Council.

Mr. Selden, being appointed to open and explain the Precedents, for bailing ſuch Perſons as were committed by the King's ſpecial Command, or by the Command of the Privy-Council, ſaid, That in all Caſes, where any Right or Liberty belonged to the Subject, there was alſo a Remedy by Law, for the enjoying, or regaining, this Right or Liberty, when it was taken from him.

That the Writ of Habeas Corpus, or Corpus cum cauſa, was the only Remedy for him that was impriſoned by the ſpecial Command of the King, or the Lords of the Council, without ſhewing the Cauſe of the Commitment; and this Writ could not be denied the Subject: That the Precedents which concerned this Point, were of two Kinds: 1. Such as ſhewed expreſly, that Perſons committed by the Command of the King, or of the Council (without other Cauſe ſhewed) had been enlarged upon Bail, when they prayed it; whence it appeared plainly, that they were bailable, and to be ſet at Liberty: For, though they ought not to have been committed without a Cauſe ſhewn of their Commitment, yet the Judges, it was true, had always paid ſuch Reſpect to ſuch Commitments by the Command of the King, or Council, that upon the Habeas Corpus they rarely diſcharged the Perſon abſolutely at firſt, but only enlarged him upon Bail. 2. The ſecond Kind of Precedents, he ſaid, were ſuch, as it had been pretended, would prove the Law to be be otherwiſe; and that Perſons ſo committed ought not to be bailed.

Of the firſt Kind, he ſaid, there were twelve, fully and directly in the Point, to prove, that Perſons ſo committed, were to be delivered upon Bail: And of the ſecond, he averred, there was not one that proved the contrary: And having cited the ſaid ſeveral Precedents, and made his Comments upon them, he left them with their Lordſhips, for their further Conſideration.

Sir Edward Coke appointed to ſhew the Reaſonableneſs of theſe Laws.

The famous Sir Edward Coke being appointed by the Commons, to ſhew the Reaſonableneſs of admitting Men to Bail, that were committed by the King, or Council, made a heavy Declamation on that Subject; which having very little in it to the Purpoſe, but what had been inſiſted on before by others, I ſhall forbear taking any further Notice of it.

The Arguments for bailing Priſoners, committed by the King, &c. anſwered by Mr. Attorney.

After this, the Attorney-General anſwered the Arguments of the Committee of the Houſe of Commons; and they replied to him. Both Sides inſiſted, it ſeems, on the ſame Acts of Parliament, Records, and Precedents; but differed in the Interpretation of them: And it was often remembered, that Sir Edward Coke had declared himſelf of one Opinion, both in the Council Chamber, and the Court of King's-Bench, while he was in Place; and of another, when he was turned out, and became a Malcontent.

Serjeant Aſhley's Argument, for the King.

Serjeant Aſhley, King's Serjeant, was afterwards permitted to deliver his Sentiments on this great Caſe, at a Conference of both Houſes.

He obſerved, that it had been given out, that the King's Counſel had yielded up the Cauſe, becauſe they acknowledged the Statute of Magna Charta, and the other Statutes confirming it, were yet in Force: But this would not follow upon their Acknowledgment; for then no Impriſonment could be juſtified, but by Proceſs of Law, which he utterly denied; for that a Conſtable might ex officio, without any Warrant, arreſt and reſtrain a Man, to prevent an Affray, or to ſuppreſs it. Alſo, any Man, that was no Officer, might apprehend a Felon, without Writ, or Warrant. The Judges of the ſeveral Courts might commit a Man, either for Contempt, or Miſdemeanor, without either Proceſs or Warrant. Nor could the Counſel, on the other Side, deny, but if the King would alledge Cauſe, he might commit a Man, as the Judges do, without Proceſs, or Warrant: Whereupon, he ſaid, he did poſitively, and with Confidence, affirm, that Impriſonment, in many Caſes, might be lawful, without Proceſs, and was not prohibited by any Statute.

That the King, or Council, might commit to Priſon, per legem terræ: That there were ſeveral Juriſdictions, or Laws, in this Kingdom, which were reckoned the Law of the Land, beſides the Common Law; as the Eccleſiaſtical Law, the Admiral's Juriſdiction; and, in Time of War, Martial Law; and there was a particular Law, for Merchant-Strangers.

In like Manner, there was a Law of State: When the Neceſſities of the State required, they might proceed by natural Equity. Infinite were the Occurrences of the State, to which the Common Law extended not.

That if the King, or his Council, might not commit, how ſhould they compel Obedience to Acts of State: But the very Act of Weſtm. 1. ſhewed plainly, that the King might commit, and that his Commitment was lawful; or elſe that Act would never have declared a Man to be irrepleviable, who was committed by the Command of the King. God had given to Kings, Scepters, Swords, and Crowns: Scepters to inſtitute, and Swords to execute, Laws; and Crowns, as Enſigns of that Power and Dignity, with which they were inveſted: And could we imagine, that the King had ſo far transferred the Power of his Sword, to inferior Magiſtrates, that he had not reſerved ſo much of his ſupreme Power, as to commit an Offender to Priſon? We called him the Fountain of Juſtice, and would we ſo far exhauſt that Fountain, as to leave it dry? But thoſe that admitted he had ſo much Power, required he ſhould expreſs the Cauſe: This might be of miſchievous Conſequence: There was no State, or Government, whether Monarchical, or of any other Frame, which had not ſome Secrets of State, not communicable to vulgar Underſtandings; of which he gave this Inſtance: If a King employed an Ambaſſador to any foreign State, with Inſtructions, and he purſued them not, whereby Danger and Diſhonour accrued to the Kingdom, might he not be committed by his Majeſty? And yet his Inſtructions, and the Manner of his miſcarrying, might not be fit to be declared to every Keeper of a Priſon, and by him certified to the Judges, and debated in the Preſence of the Multitude: He concluded therefore, that the King, and his Council, had Power to puniſh by Impriſonment, without ſhewing particular Cauſe; eſpecially where it might tend to the diſcloſing Secrets of State: But, if he might freely ſpeak his Mind, he thought it a Queſtion too high to be agitated: For, however it ſhould be determined, the King, or his Subjects, or both, would be Loſers. If the Subject prevailed, he would loſe the Protection of the Government; and if the State prevailed, it might end in abſolute Sovereignty; but the King would loſe the Hearts of his Subjects, the firmeſt Support of his Throne. The beſt Way therefore, he conceived, would be to find out ſome Medium, to accommodate the Difference.

Mr. Serjeant having ended his Speech, the Lord Preſident acquainted the Commons, that, though at this free Conference Liberty had been given by the Lords, to the King's Counſel, to ſpeak what they thought fit for his Majeſty; yet the Serjeant had no Authority, or Direction, from them, to ſpeak in the Manner he had done; and he was committed to Cuſtody: But, upon his declaring his Sorrow for any haſty Expreſſion he might have uſed, he was diſcharged.

Serjeant Aſhley committed.

During theſe Conferences between the two Houſes, viz. on the 14th of April, the Earl of Suffolk was charged in the Houſe of Commons, with having ſaid, That Mr. Selden had razed a Record, and deſerved to be hanged, for going about to ſet Diviſions between the King and his his Subjects: Whereupon the Commons resolved, that a great Injury had been done them, Mr. Selden having been employed by them in the Conference with the Lords, in the great Cauſe, concerning the Liberty of the Subject; and ſent a Meſſage to the Lords, by Sir Robert Phillips, to demand Juſtice againſt the Earl of Suffolk, and to inform them, that the Words were ſpoken to Sir John Strangeways, a Member of the Commons Houſe.

Who demand Juſtice againſt him.

To whom the Lords anſwered, that the Earl of Suffolk, being a Man of great Place and Honour, had voluntarily proteſted, upon his Honour and Soul, that there paſſed no ſuch Words as thoſe from him to Sir John Strangeways.

On reporting which Anſwer, Sir John Strangeways proteſted in the Houſe of Commons, that, notwithſtanding the Earl's Denial, he did ſpeak thoſe Words unto him; and he would maintain it, any Way fitting a Member of that Houſe, or a Gentleman of Honour.

On the 17th of April, Sir John Elliot reported from the Committee, appointed to take into Conſideration, what was fit to be done, for the Juſtification of Sir John Strangeways: That they had examined Sir Chriſtopher Nevill, who being in the Lords Committee-Chamber, the Earl of Suffolk ſaid to him; Mr. Attorney hath cleared the Buſineſs, and made the Cauſe plain on the King's Side; and further ſaid, Mr. Selden hath razed a Record, and deſerved to be hanged; and the Lower Houſe would do well, to join with the higher, in a Petition to the King to hang him; for he went about to divide the King from his People, or Words to that Effect: That Mr. Littleton alſo depoſed, he heard the Earl of Suffolk ſay, that he would not be in Mr. Selden's Coat for 10000 l. and that Mr. Selden deſerved to be hanged. Whereupon the Commons reſolved; 1. That the Earl of Suffolk, notwithſtanding his Denial, had laid a moſt unjuſt and ſcandalous Imputation upon Mr. Selden, a Member of the Houſe, employed in the Service of the Houſe, and therein upon the whole Houſe of Commons. 2. That the Houſe, upon due Examination, was fully ſatisfied, that Sir John Strangeways had affirmed nothing but what was moſt true and certain; and, 3. That the Earl of Suffolk be again charged with it, at the Lord's Bar; and the Lords deſired to proceed in Juſtice againſt the Earl, and to inflict ſuch Puniſhment upon him, as an Offence of ſo high a Nature deſerved: But the Matter ſeems to have been accommodated amicably.

After theſe Debates, the Houſe of Peers required the Judges of the King's-Bench, to give their Reaſons, for the Opinions they had delivered in that Court, againſt bailing the Gentlemen, who had brought their Writs of Habeas Corpus to be bailed: Which the Judges at firſt excuſed themſelves from doing, till they had obtained the King's Leave; but having his Majeſty's Permiſſion, they very readily declared the Grounds they went upon.

The Judges give their Reaſons againſt bailing the Gentlemen.

And, firſt, Judge Whitlock ſaid, they were very ready, by their Lordſhip's Appointment, to clear any Aſperſion of the Houſe of Commons, in their late Preſentment on the King's-Bench, for a Wrong done the Subject (as they ſaid), by a Judgment lately given there; though if there had been any ſuch Thing, their Lordſhips, and not the Commons, had Power to queſtion and adjudge the ſame: But he averred, there was no Judgment given, whereby either the Prerogative might be enlarged, or the Right of the Subject trenched upon. It was true, in Michaelmas Term laſt, four Gentlemen did bring their Writs of Habeas Corpus, and the Return was per ſpeciale mandatum Domini Regis; and had they delivered them preſently, it muſt have been, becauſe the King did not ſhew the Cauſe, and ſo ſhould have adjudged, the King had done Wrong, which was beyond their Knowledge; for he might have committed them for other Matters than they imagined; and if it was objected, that thus theſe Gentlemen might have remained in Priſon all their Days: He anſwered, No; they did remit them only, till they might adviſe of the Matter: Had they bailed them immediately, they muſt have reflected on the King, that he had unjuſtly impriſoned them: And it appeared in Dyer, 2 Eliz. that divers Gentlemen being committed, and requiring Writs of Habeas Corpus, ſome were bailed, and others remitted; whereby it appeared, much was left to the Diſcretion of the Judges: And, at laſt, this was no Judgment; Mr. Attorney, indeed, had preſſed to have a Judgment entered for his Majeſty's Service: But they had commanded the Clerk to make no Entry, but in the old Form. He had ſpent his Time, he ſaid, in this Court, and never knew, by any Record, that, upon ſuch a Return as that, a Man was bailed, before the King was conſulted.

1628. 4 Car. I.

Judge Jones alſo declared, that no Judgment had been given: The Matter of Fact was, he ſaid, as his Brother had related it; adding, that if one had been committed by the Houſe of Commons, they would not have taken it well, if he had been bailed at his firſt Appearance in Court; nor would the King have done ſo in this Caſe.

Judge Dodderidge ſaid, upon conſideration of the Statutes and Records, they did not think they came ſo cloſe to the Caſe, as that Bail thereupon ſhould be immediately granted; but they might have had a new Writ the next Day; and he wiſhed, they had; for then they had ſeen more, and they had been eaſed of a great deal of Trouble: That the Attorney, on granting a Remittitur, preſſed for an Entry: But they all ſtraitly charged the Clerk, that he ſhould make no other Entry, than ſuch as their Predeceſſors had uſually made: And, as for the Difference that ſome had made, between a Remittitur and a Remittitur quouſq; he never yet met with any, though he had ſat in that Court fifteen Years.

The Lord Chief Juſtice, Sir Nicholas Hyde, ſaid, It was true, if the King could not commit, they had done wrong; but he knew of no ſuch Statute, that declared, the King might not commit: That, as to the Precedents the Priſoner's Counſel brought, they had ſhewn them they were miſtaken; and if they had erred, they had erred with their Fathers: There could be no Precedent ſhewn, where their Predeceſſors had not done as they had done; ſometimes bailing, ſometimes remitting, ſometimes diſcharging; but they never bailed any, committed by the King, or his Council, till his Pleaſure was firſt known. Thus did the Lord Chief Juſtice Coke in Raynard's Caſe. It was objected, indeed, that this would have been done, if the King had not written: But, why then was the Letter read, and publiſhed, and kept? And why was the Town-Clerk ſent carefully to enquire, whether the Men offered for Bail, were Subſidy Men, as the Letter directed? The Letter alſo ſhewed, that Beckwith was committed for Suſpicion of being concerned in the Powder-Plot; but no Proof being produced, the King conſented, he ſhould be bailed.

1628. 4 Car. I.

The Commons draw up a Petition of Right.

There were ſome Speeches afterwards made in the Houſe of Lords, ſome approving, and others cenſuring the Judges Conduct: The Commoners in the mean Time were framing a Petition of Right, about which they had ſeveral Conferences with the Lords, to obtain their Concurrence: At one of theſe Conferences, on the 25th of April, 1628. Doctor George Abbot, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſaid, he was directed by the Lords to obſerve to them, that his Majeſty's Service, and the Safety of the Kingdom, required they ſhould diſpatch the Buſineſs before them with all Expedition; and that their Lordſhips did in general agree with them, and did not doubt, but the Commons would agree with the Lords, to maintain and ſupport the Fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, and the Liberty of the Subject: That they did not reject what had been offered them by the Commons; but then their Lordſhips had drawn up ſome Propoſitions agreeing with them in Subſtance, which ſhould be read to them; and, if the Commons differed with their Lordſhips, he deſired, they would ſtrike out, alter, or diminiſh, as they thought fit, that they might arrive at the End they both ſo much aimed at.

The Lords offer them five Propoſitions.

Which are read.

Then the Lords five Propoſitions were read, and are as follow:

1. That his Majeſty would be pleaſed graciouſly to declare, that the good old Law, called Magna Charta, and the ſix Statutes, conceived to be Declarations and Explanations of that Law, do ſtill ſtand in Force, to all Intents and Purpoſes.

2. That his Majeſty would be pleaſed graciouſly to declare, that, according to Magna Charta, and the Statutes aforenamed, as alſo according to the moſt ancient Cuſtoms and Laws of the Land, every free Subject of this Realm, hath a fundamental Property in his Goods, and a fundamental Liberty of his Perſon.

3. That it is his Royal Pleaſure, to ratify and confirm unto all and every his loyal and faithful Subjects, all their ancient, ſeveral, juſt Liberties, Privileges, and Rights, in as ample and beneficial Manner, to all Intents and Purpoſes, as their Anceſtors did enjoy the ſame under the Government of the beſt of his moſt noble Progenitors.

4. That his Majeſty would be pleaſed graciouſly to declare, for the good Content of his loyal Subjects, and for the ſecuring them from future Fear, that in all Caſes, within the Cognizance of the Common Law, concerning the Liberties of the Subject, his Majeſty would proceed, according to the Common Law of this Land, and according to the Laws eſtabliſhed in the Kingdom, and in no other manner or wiſe.

1628. 4 Car. I.

5. As touching his Majeſty's Royal Prerogative, intrinſical to his Sovereignty, and intruſted him withal from God, Ad communem totius populi ſalutem, & non ad deſtructionem, his Majeſty would reſolve not to uſe the ſame to the Prejudice of any of his loyal People, in the Property of their Goods, or Liberty of their Perſons. And in caſe, for the Security of his Majeſty's Royal Perſon, the common Safety of his People, or the peaceable Government of this Kingdom, his Majeſty ſhall find juſt Cauſe, for Reaſons of State, to impriſon, or reſtrain, any Man's Perſon, his Majeſty would graciouſly declare, that within a convenient Time, he ſhall, and will, expreſs the Cauſe of the Commitment, or Reſtraint, either general or ſpecial; and upon a Cauſe ſo expreſſed, will leave him immediately to be tried, according to the common Juſtice of the Kingdom.

To theſe Propoſitions, Sir Dudley Diggs, at the ſame free Conference, replyed, That the Commons would be as ready to propugn the juſt Prerogative of his Majeſty, as their Lordſhips: But, as they are a great Body, that muſt adviſe upon all new Propoſitions, they could not give a preſent Anſwer to them, but would faithfully report them to the Houſe; from whence, in due Time, their Lordſhips ſhould receive an Anſwer.

The Senſe of the Commons, on theſe Propoſitions.

The next Day, being the 26th of April, the five Propoſitions being reported in the Houſe of Commons, Mr. Selden made a Speech upon the Occaſion, and obſerved, that the firſt of theſe Propoſitions, (viz.) To declare, that Magna Charta, and the ſix Statutes conceived to be Declarations and Explanations of that Law was ſtill in Force, was of no Uſe; for no Body doubted it: And, for the ſecond, That his Majeſty would declare, that every Subject had a Property in his Goods, and Liberty of his Perſon, he never heard it denied, but in the Pulpit, which was of no Weight: For the third, that his Majeſty would confirm all their juſt Liberties, none could tell what that would produce: For the fourth, It was not fit to be aſked, viz. That in all Caſes, within the Cognizance of the Common Law, concerning Liberty, his Majeſty would proceed according to the Common Law. If Perſons were committed, the Courts of Juſtice were open for the Parties to ſeek Juſtice. And, if any Thing was done againſt Law there, it was the Fault of them that ſat there: So they ſhould take it. His Majeſty did nothing againſt Law: And as for the fifth, It was not fit to be had, and therefore not fit to be aſked. If they had a Law to that Purpoſe, it would deſtroy their fundamental Liberties: What ſhould be interpreted, Convenient Time? Who ſhould judge of it, but the Judges? Any Man might be committed by that Clauſe, at pleaſure; none were exempted: At this little Gap every Man's Liberty might in Time go out.

His Majeſty obſerving that the Commons ſpent their whole Time in Debates on theſe Propoſitions, came to the Houſe of Peers the 28th of April, and the Commons being ſent for up, the Lord Keeper made a Speech to both Houſes: Wherein he told them, his Majeſty's

Affairs

1628. 4 Car. I.

Affairs were ſo preſſing, that they would admit of no Delay; and foreſeeing that their Debates would probably take up more Time than the Affairs of Chriſtendom would allow; his Majeſty had thought of this Expedient to ſhorten the Buſineſs, by declaring the Clearneſs of his own Heart and Intention; and, therefore, had commanded him to let them know,

The King's Declaration, on this Subject.

That he holdeth the Statute of Magna Charta, and the other Statutes inſiſted upon for the Subject's Liberty, to be all in Force; and aſſures you, that he will maintain all his Subjects in the juſt Freedom of their Perſons, and Safety of their Eſtates; and, that he will govern according to the Laws and Statutes of this Realm; and, that ye ſhall find as much Security in his Majeſty's Royal Word, and Promiſe, as in the Strength of any Law ye can make; So that hereafter ye ſhall never have cauſe to complain. And therefore deſired no Doubt, or Diſtruſt, might poſſeſs any Man, but that they would proceed ſpeedily and unanimouſly in the Buſineſs.

Secretary Cook's Speech, for the King.

The Commons being returned to their Houſe, Mr. Secretary Cook endeavoured to perſuade them to comply with the King: He ſaid, it was to be preſumed his Majeſty's Government would be according to Law: They could not but remember what his Father ſaid, He is no King, but a Tyrant, that governs not by Law: This Kingdom was to be governed by the Common Law, as his Majeſty had aſſured them it ſhould; all their Difference was in the Application of that Law: The general Government of the Kingdom in State Affairs, was in the Council-board, which might vary from the Common Law of the Kingdom in extraordinary Caſes: As in the Time of Dearth; Property of Goods might in ſuch a Time be forced, and the Owners compelled to bring Corn, and other Proviſions, to Market: When Coals have been held up at exceſſive Rates, the Council-board had cauſed them to be brought out and ſold: In Time of Peſtilence, Men might be reſtrained of their Liberties: If a Schiſm aroſe in the Church, the State might enquire into the Favourers of it: And if an Invaſion was threatned and managed by the King's Subjects, it was in the Power of the Government to reſtrain ſuch diſloyal Subjects of their Liberties: They daily ſaw all Laws broken, and all Laws would be broken for the publick Good: That his Majeſty had aſſured them, they ſhould never have Cauſe to complain for the future, and they ought to rely on his Royal Word: And as he had ſhewed himſelf the beſt of Kings, they would do well to acknowledge his Goodneſs, and promote that Union which they all deſired.

Sir Benjamin Rudyard's, on the other Side.

On the other Side, Sir Benjamin Rudyard ſaid, That Liberty was a precious Thing, and he that did not value it, deſerved to be valued accordingly: That the very Scope and Drift of Magna Charta, was to reduce the Regal to a Legal Power, in Matter of Impriſonment, or elſe it had not been worthy ſo much contending for. That it was true, no Court of Juſtice in England would diſcharge a Priſoner committed by the King Rege inconſulto, without acquainting the King, yet this good Manners was never made a legal Part of the Delivery.

1628. 4 Car. I.

It had been objected, that the King ought to have a Truſt repoſed in him; God forbid but he ſhould: He owned that it was impoſſible to take it from him; for the Wit of Man could not deviſe a Law that could comprehend all Particulars, all Accidents; extraordinary Caſes would happen, and when they came, if the Adminiſtration was for the common Good, there could be no Law urged againſt it; but the Law muſt be general, otherwiſe Admiſſions and Exceptions would fret, and eat out the Law to nothing. The King's Prerogatives were rather beſides the Law, than againſt it; and when they were directed to right Ends for the publick Good, they were not only concurring Laws, but Laws of ſingular Excellence. The King was certainly very tender of his preſent Honour, and of his Fame hereafter; and would think it hard, to have a worſe Mark ſet upon his Government, than upon any of his Anceſtors, by extraordinary Reſtraints; but as his Majeſty was good as well as great, he had intimated to them, that he would willingly have the Abuſe of Power reformed. By which he verily believed, his Majeſty well underſtood, what a miſerable Power it was, that had produced ſo much Weakneſs to himſelf, and to the Kingdom. That he ſhould be glad to ſee that good old decrepit Law of Magna Charta, that had been long bed-rid, as it were, walk abroad again, with new Vigour and Luſtre, attended by the other ſix Statutes: He doubted not but, upon a Conference with the Lords, they ſhould happily agree upon a Bill againſt Impriſonment for Loans, and Privy-Seals. As for Intrinſecal Power and Reaſon of State, they were Matters in the Clouds, where he deſired to leave them: Only as to Reaſon of State he would ſay, that in the Latitude it had been uſed, it had eaten out, not only the Laws, but all the Religion of Chriſtendom: But recommended it to them, that they would ſo carry Things, that they might ſee Parliaments on Foot; for as long as they were frequent, there would be no irregular Power; there could be no total or final Loſs of Liberty, but by the Loſs of Parliaments. As long as they laſted, what they could not get at one Time, they might at another.

Biſhop Hall's Letter to the Commons, for an Accomodation.

The ſame 28th of April, Doctor Joſeph Hall, Lord Biſhop of Exeter, ſent a Letter to the Houſe of Commons on this Subject, wherein he adviſes them, to be wiſe in their well-meant Zeal, and not argue away that precious Time that could never be recalled; obſerving, that while they diſputed, their Friends in Germany, the (Palatinate and Rochelle) periſhed, and they muſt follow them, adding: Where are we if we break? (and I tremble to think) we cannot but break if we hold ſo ſtiff. Our Liberties and Properties are ſufficiently declared to be ſure and legal; our Remedies are clear and irrefragable: What do we fear? Every Subject now ſees the Way chalked out for future Juſtice, and who dares from henceforth tread beſide it? Let us not, while we over-rigidly contend for an higher Strain of Safety, put ourſelves into a Neceſſity of Ruin, and utter deſpair of Redreſs. Let us not, in Suſpicion of Evils that may be, caſt ourſelves into preſent Confuſion. If you love yourſelves and your Country,

The King's Meſſage, if they would rely on his Word?

Still the Commons continued their Debates on the Violation of their Liberties and Properties; whereupon Mr. Secretary Cook brought them a Meſſage from his Majeſty, on the firſt of May, deſiring to know, whether the Houſe would reſt ſatisfied with his Royal Word, declared to them by the Lord Keeper? And aſſuring them if they did, it ſhould be Royally performed.

Mr. Secretary Cook's Speech upon it.

Upon this a profound Silence following, Mr. Secretary Cook roſe up again, and ſaid, I am ſtill confident of a good Iſſue of this Parliament, for I know his Majeſty is reſolved to do as much as ever King did for his Subjects: But if they conſidered his Majeſty, a young King, juſt come to his Crown, engaged in War, and yet denied neceſſary Supplies; what could they expect, when he was reduced to ſuch a State? That his Majeſty had called this Parliament to make up the Breach; aſſured them they ſhould have no further Cauſe to complain; aſſured them that the Laws ſhould be eſtabliſhed; and what could they deſire more? The Diſpute was, concerning the Liberty of the Subject, and the King's Prerogative; he hoped they did not mean to add any Thing to themſelves to depreſs him: Did they expect greater Liberties than their Forefathers had, and deſign to put the Crown into a worſe Condition than ever? He durſt not adviſe his Majeſty to admit of that: If what they now deſired was no Innovation, it was all mentioned in the Acts and Statutes that had been cited; and whatever they would add more, muſt be a Diminution of the King's Power, and an Addition to their own. They had a wiſe and prudent Prince to deal with, who had a Sword in his Hand for their Good; and this Good muſt be ſupported by Power: Did they think by their Debates, and putting Law-Caſes, they could make that not to be Law, which in Experience they every Day found neceſſary?

He muſt tell them freely, that he knew by Experience, and by the Place he held under his Majeſty, if he would diſcharge his Duty, he muſt commit, and neither expreſs the Cauſe to the Jaylor, nor to the Judges, nor to any Counſellor in England, but to the King himſelf; and deſired them to recollect, if thoſe who had been in the ſame Place, had not thus committed Men, without any Scruples or Doubts made of their Authority, or any Complaint made by the Subject. But, ſhould he do this without real Cauſe, and could not make the Neceſſity of it appear, when he was called upon, he muſt expect a heavier Puniſhment from his Majeſty than the Law could inflict.

1628. 4 Car. I.

They inſiſt on a Bill for their Security.

The Houſe were ſtill divided, whether they ſhould reſt ſatisfied with his Majeſty's Royal Word, for the Eſtabliſhment of their Liberties, or inſiſt on their being ſecured in a parliamentary Way: Sir Thomas Wentworth, who concluded the Debate, ſaid, ſince there had been a publick Violation of the Laws by his Majeſty's Miniſters, nothing would ſatisfy him, but a publick Amends: Their Deſire to vindicate the Subjects Right by Bill, was no more than their Anceſtors had ſhewn in the like Caſes.

Another Meſſage from his Majeſty.

During theſe Debates the Commons received another Meſſage from his Majeſty, by Mr. Secretary Cook, declaring, That however they proceeded, his Reſolution was to govern them according to the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Realm: That he would maintain them in the Liberties of their Perſons, and Properties of their Goods, ſo that they might enjoy as much Happineſs as their Forefathers did in the beſt Times: That he would rectify what had been amiſs, ſo that there ſhould be no juſt Cauſe to complain. And, as his Majeſty would rank himſelf among the beſt of their Kings, and ſhew he had no Intention to invade their lawful Liberties or Rights, ſo he would have them match themſelves with the beſt Subjects, not encroaching on that Sovereignty and Prerogative, which God had put into his Hands for their Good; but by containing themſelves within the Bounds and Laws of their Forefathers, without reſtraining, or enlarging them, by new Explanations, Expoſitions, and Additions, which he ſhould never give way to: That the Affairs of Chriſtendom were come to ſuch a Criſis, that they would admit of no longer Delay; and therefore he ſhould put an end to the Seſſion on Tueſday ſeven-night; and, if the Houſe was not ready in that Time to do what was fit for themſelves, it would be their own Faults.

Upon reading this Meſſage, Sir John Elliot ſaid, he feared his Majeſty was miſinformed, in what they were about, and propoſed their repreſenting to him, that they were not about making any thing new; obſerving, they had received many Interruptions by Meſſages, founded upon Miſreports, and Miſrepreſentations, to his Majeſty.

Their Grievances ſummed up.

Sir Miles Fleetwood ſaid, the Breach of this Parliament would be the greateſt Miſery that ever befel them: The Eyes of Chriſtendom were upon them: All their Proteſtant Friends were ready to be ſwallowed up by the Emperor's Forces: Their own Kingdom in a miſerable State: Their Religion invaded by the Roman Catholicks, under Colour of a Commiſſion, that was intolerable: The Defence of the Realm, by Shipping, decayed: The King's Revenue ſold, and gone; and where ſhould Relief be obtained, but in Parliament? propoſing they ſhould proceed by way of Bill, to eſtabliſh the fundamental Laws of Liberty and Property. At length the Commons agreed upon an Anſwer to all the King's Meſſages, which was preſented to his Majeſty, on the 5th of May, by their Speaker.

The Commons Anſwer to the King's Meſſages.

In this Meſſage they thank his Majeſty, for his many ample Expreſſions, of his Affection and Promiſes of governing them according to Law, and to maintain their Liberties and Properties:

1628. 4 Car. I.

perties: And as his Majeſty deſired to know, if they would reſt upon his Royal Word and Promiſe; they aſſured him, their greateſt Confidence was in his Grace and Goodneſs; without which, nothing they could frame, would be of any Safety, or Value to them; deſiring he would believe, they had as full Confidence in his Royal Word and Promiſe, as any Houſe of Commons ever repoſed in their beſt Kings.

But as there had been, of late, a publick Violation of the Laws, and the Subjects Liberties, by ſome of his Majeſty's Miniſters, they conceived, nothing leſs than a publick Remedy would raiſe the dejected Hearts of his loving Subjects, to a chearful Supply of his Majeſty; and begged Leave to lay hold of that gracious Offer, of ſecuring their Rights and Liberties, by way of Bill: That it was far from their Intentions, to encroach on his Sovereignty, or Prerogative; nor had they the leaſt Thought of ſtretching, or enlarging, the Laws, by any new Interpretations, or Additions: Their Deſires extended no farther, than to ſome neceſſary Explanation on that, which was truly comprehended within the Meaning of thoſe Laws; with ſome moderate Proviſion for Execution and Performance, as in Times paſſed, on like Occaſions, had been uſed.

His Majeſty's Reply.

To this his Majeſty replied, by the Lord Keeper Coventry, that he expected an Anſwer by their Actions, and not by dilatory Diſcourſes: They pretended to acknowledge a Truſt and Confidence in his Majeſty, but did not expreſs it in their Words and Actions; for what needed Explanations, if they doubted not the Performance of the true Meaning of theſe Statutes? Explanations would hazard an Encroachment on his Prerogative: And what needed a new Law, to confirm an old, if they repoſed any Confidence in the Declarations his Majeſty made to both Houſes, (as they themſelves acknowledged they did)? But, to ſhew clearly the Sincerity of his Majeſty's Intentions, he was content, that a Bill be drawn for the Confirmation of Magna Charta, and the ſix other Statutes, inſiſted upon for the Liberties of the Subject; but without Additions, Paraphraſes, or Explanations.

But if they ſought to tie the King's Hands, by new and impoſſible Bonds, they muſt be accountable to God and their Country, for the ill Succeſs of this Parliament. It was his Majeſty's Pleaſure, that, without further Replies, or Meſſages, or other unneceſſary Delays, they ſhould do what they meant to do ſpeedily, remembring the Shortneſs of the Time.

This Reply being debated by the Commons, Mr. Secretary Cooke again propoſed their relying on the King's Word, as more advantagious than a Bill, as it would engage his Majeſty's Affections to his People.

Sir Edward Coke, on the other Side, ſaid, It was never known, that general Words were a Satisfaction for particular Grievances: Never any Parliament relied on Meſſages. He did not diſtruſt his Majeſty; but Kings muſt ſpeak by Record, and in Particulars, and not in Generals. All ſucceeding Kings would ſay, Ye muſt truſt me, as you did my Predeceſſors; and truſt my Meſſages. Let us put up a Petition of Right; not that I diſtruſt the King, but that I cannot take his Truſt, but in a Parliamentary Way.

The Commons agree upon a Petition of Right.

1628. 4 Car. I.

And the Houſe agreeing to the Motion of Sir Edward Coke, the Petition of Right was finiſhed, and delivered to the Lords, at a Conference, for their Concurrence. In the mean Time their Lordſhips received a Letter from the King, importing, that his Majeſty, being deſirous of nothing more, than the Peace and Proſperity of his People, had permitted free Debates on the higheſt Points of his Prerogative, which his Predeceſſors had ever reſtrained, being Matters they would not ſuffer to be diſcuſſed in Parliament: That he had alſo condeſcended to the Deſires of his Subjects, in other things, ſo far, that it might fully ſatisfy all moderate Minds, and free them from all Fears and Jealouſies: But ſtill he found it inſiſted upon, that in no Caſe whatever, neither he, nor the Privy-Council, had any Power to commit a Man, without the Cauſe ſhewed: But ſhould he depart from that Rule of Government, practiſed for ſo many Ages, it would ſoon diſſolve the very Foundation and Frame of the Monarchy: Wherefore, as he had already made ſuch Propoſitions to the Commons, as might equally preſerve the juſt Liberty of the Subject; ſo he thought good to let their Lordſhips know, that without the Overthrow of Sovereignty, he could not ſuffer this Power to be impeached: However, his Majeſty declared his Reſolution to be, That neither he, nor his Privy-Council, ſhould at any Time after, commit, or command to Priſon, or otherwiſe reſtrain, the Perſon of any, for not lending Money, or for any Cauſe, which did not concern the publick Safety: And that in all Caſes of this Nature, which ſhould happen for the future, he would, upon the Petition of the Party, or the Addreſs of the Judges, readily expreſs the true Cauſe of Commitment, ſo ſoon as with Convenience and Safety the ſame was fit to be diſcloſed; and that in all criminal Cauſes, of ordinary Juriſdiction, the Judges ſhould proceed to deliver, or bail, the Priſoner, according to the known Laws of the Land, Magna Charta, and the other ſix Statutes, inſiſted on; which, he acknowledged, remained in full Force: This, he thought fit to ſignify to them, to ſhorten their Debates on this great Queſtion; the Seaſon of the Year, and the great Occaſions of the State, not allowing many more Days, for the Continuance of this Seſſion.

The King's Letter to the Lords, declaring his Intentions.

Given at our Palace at Weſtm. 12 May, in the 4th Year of our Reign.

The Lords communicated this Letter to the Commons; and at a Conference, the 17th of May, propoſed the following Addition to their Petition of Right, (viz.)

We preſent this, our humble Petition to your Majeſty, with the Care, not only of preſerving our own Liberties, but with due Regard to leave entire, that Sovereign Power, wherewith your Majeſty is entruſted, for the Protection, Safety, and Happineſs of the People.

The Lords offer a Clauſe, to be added to the Petition of Right.

Upon reporting this Addition in the Houſe of Commons, it was ſaid, What is this Sovereign Power? By this we ſhall acknowledge a Regal, Debates in the Houſe of Commons, upon the Clauſe.

1628. 4 Car. I.

Regal, as well as a Legal Power: This ſeems to be another diſtinct Power, from the Power of the Law. Sir Edward Coke ſaid, This will overthrow all our Petition: There never was a Petition, with a ſaving of the King's Sovereignty; Prerogative was a Point of the Law; but Sovereign Power was no Parliamentary Word: If we grant this, we give a Sovereign Power above all Laws. Sir Thomas Wentworth ſaid, If we admit of this Addition, we leave the Subject worſe than we found him: Let us leave all Power to his Majeſty, to puniſh Malefactors; but our Laws are not acquainted with Sovereign Power: We deſire no new Thing, nor do we offer to trench on his Majeſty's Prerogative: We muſt not recede from this Petition, either in the Whole, or in Part.

The Lords Reaſons for this Addition.

The Lords, however, at a Conference, inſiſted on this Addition, and ſaid, they intended to give no new Power, which the King had not before; but, as he was a King, he was a Sovereign, and muſt have Power, to be executed, for the Safety of the People; this could never be a Grievance: That both Houſes had already agreed, in a Manner, that the King was veſted with Sovereign Power: The Commons had acknowledged it, in a Speech, their Speaker lately made to his Majeſty, wherein he ſays, We have not a Thought to encroach on the King's Sovereignty; and they might as well therefore add it to their Petition.

The Commons Reaſons againſt it.

To this the Commons anſwered, That their Petition concerned, firſt, the levying Money, by Way of Loan. 2. The Impriſonment of their Perſons. 3. The Unlawfulneſs of billeting Soldiers in private Houſes; and, 4. The exerciſing Martial Law, in Time of Peace.

Theſe Things, they ſaid, they had repreſented to be againſt the Law of the Land, in their Petition: But ſhould they admit theſe Words, To leave entire that Sovereign Power, wherewith your Majeſty is entruſted, they ſhould admit a Sovereign Power in the King, above the Laws and Statutes of the Realm; and all the Grievances they complained of, might be exerciſed, and put in Practice again, by virtue of that Sovereign Power. This Clauſe, therefore, if it ſhould be admitted, would take away the Effect of every Part of the Petition, and become deſtructive to the Whole.

The Scope of their Petition, was not to mend their Caſe, but to reſtore them to the ſame State they were in before: But if that Clauſe was added, inſtead of mending the Condition of the Subjects, whoſe Liberties, of late, had been miſerably violated by ſome Miniſters, they ſhould leave them worſe than they found them: They ſhould intimate to their Poſterity, that there was a Truſt repoſed in the King, of Sovereign Power, ſuperior to all Laws, which he might exerciſe on any Emergency, and thereby ſuſpend all the Laws and Statutes of the Realm; which was a Truſt, they believed, very far from being deſired by his Majeſty; and which, being tranſmitted to a Succeſſor, of a different Temper, might enable him to alter the whole Frame of the Commonwealth, and diſſolve that Government, which had flouriſhed in this Kingdom for ſo many Ages.

They ſaid, They were very ready to acknowledge, in general Terms, his Majeſty's Sovereign Power; where it did not mean a Power of controuling and ſuſpending thoſe Laws they were petitioning for a Confirmation of, as it muſt do, in this Addition to their Petition. They would maintain his Sovereign Power conſtantly, even to the Hazard of their Lives, if there was Occaſion, as they were bound to do, by their Oath taken, this very Seſſion, in theſe Words: I, A. B. do utterly teſtify, and declare in my Conſcience, That the King's Highneſs is the ſupreme ſovereign Governor of this Realm, in all Cauſes, &c. And to my utmoſt Power, will aſſiſt and defend all Juriſdictions, Privileges, Preeminencies, and Authorities, granted, or belonging to the King's Highneſs, or united, or annexed, to the Imperial Crown of this Realm, &c.

1628. 4 Car. I.

But ſtill it was not proper, to make this Addition to their Petition of Right; becauſe it would overthrow and annihilate the Right, pretended to by them in the Petition itſelf.

The Lords and Commons agree, to leave out the Addition, and preſent the Petition.

The Lords afterwards agreed, to leave out the Addition, and inſiſted only on the Word Means, inſtead of Pretext, in the Petition; and on the Words not warrantable, inſtead of the Word unlawful: To which the Commons conſenting, the Petition was preſented to his Majeſty. On the 2d of June, the King came to the Houſe of Peers, and the Commons being ſent for up, his Majeſty ſaid,

The King's Anſwer.

I am come hither, to perform my Duty: I think no Man can think it long, ſince I have not taken ſo many Days in anſwering the Petition, as you ſpent Weeks in framing it; and I am come hither to ſhew you, that as well in formal things, as ineſſential, I deſire to give you as much Content, as in me lies.

Lord Keeper's Speech.

Then the Lord Keeper ſaid, that his Majeſty took it in good part, that both Houſes generally profeſſed, they had no Intention to diminiſh his Prerogative; and as they had cleared their Intention, ſo he came to clear his, and to ſubſcribe a firm League with his People, which was ever likely to be moſt conſtant and perpetual, when the Conditions were equal: That they could not be in a more happy State, than when their Liberties ſhould be an Ornament and Strength to his Majeſty's Prerogative, and his Prerogative a Defence of their Liberties. For his Part, he was reſolved, to give an Example, in the uſing of his Power, for the Preſervation of their Liberties, that for the future, they ſhould have no Cauſe to complain.

The Petition read.

Then the Petition was read, wherein they recite, that whereas it had been declared, and enacted, by a Statute made in the Reign of King Edw. I. entitled, Statutum de Tallagio non concedendo, that no Tallage or Aid ſhould be levied, but by Conſent of Parliament: And by a Statute of the 25 Edw. III. that no Perſon ſhould be compelled to make any Loan againſt his Will, or charged to pay any Benevolence: And by another Statute, that no Subject ſhould be compelled to pay any Tax, Tallage, or Aid, without Conſent of Parliament. Notwithſtanding which, divers Perſons had been required to lend his Majeſty ſeveral Sums of Money; others ſummoned before the Council, and impriſoned, for their Refuſal: And ſeveral other Charges had been levied on the 1628. 4 Car. I. the People, by the Command of his Majeſty, or the Privy-Council: And that, whereas by The Great Charter, it is declared, That no Freeman ought to be diſſeized of his Lands, or Liberties, but by the Laws of the Land; many of the King's Subjects had, nevertheleſs, of late been impriſoned, without any Cauſe ſhewn, and Bail refuſed on their bringing Writs of Habeas Corpus: And that Soldiers and Mariners had been quartered on the King's Subjects, againſt their Will; and Perſons had been tried and condemned by martial Law, who ought to have had the Benefit of the Laws of the Land.

They did, therefore, humbly pray, that no Man might be compelled, for the future, to make or yield any Gift, Loan, Benevolence, Tax, or ſuch like Charge, without common Conſent by Act of Parliament: And, that none be called to make Anſwer, or to take an Oath, or to give Attendance, or be confined, or otherwiſe be moleſted, or diſquieted, concerning the ſame, or for Refuſal thereof: And that no Freeman, in any ſuch Manner as is beforementioned, be impriſoned, or detained; and that his Majeſty would be pleaſed to remove the ſaid Soldiers and Mariners; and that his People might not be ſo burthened in Time to come: That the aforeſaid Commiſſions, for proceeding by martial Law, might be revoked and annulled; and that, for the future, no Commiſſions of the like Nature might iſſue to any Perſon whatſoever, to be executed as aforeſaid, leaſt, by Colour of them, any of his Majeſty's Subjects ſhould be deſtroyed, or put to Death, contrary to the Laws and Franchiſes of the Land.

All which they moſt humbly prayed of his moſt excellent Majeſty, as their Rights and Liberties, according to the Laws and Statutes of this Realm: And, that his Majeſty would alſo vouchſafe to declare, That the Awards, Doings, and Proceedings, to the Prejudice of of his People in any of the Premiſſes, ſhould not be drawn into Conſequence, or Example: And, that his Majeſty would alſo be graciouſly pleaſed, for the further Comfort and Safety of his People, to declare his Royal Will and Pleaſure, that in the Things aforeſaid, all his Officers and Miniſters ſhould ſerve him, according to the Laws and Statutes of this Realm, as they tendered the Honour of his Majeſty, and the Proſperity of the Kingdom. To which his Majeſty anſwered by the Lord Keeper.

The King's Anſwer to the Petition.

The King willeth, that Right be done, according to the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Realm; and that the Statutes be put in due Execution; that his Subjects have no Cauſe to complain of any Wrong, or Oppreſſions, contrary to their juſt Rights and Liberties; to the Preſervation whereof, he holds himſelf in Conſcience as well obliged, as of his Prerogative.

It gives no Satisfaction.

Upon Reading the King's Anſwer, in the Houſe of Commons, it appeared to be generally diſliked; and Sir John Elliot ſuggeſted, that it was Evaſive, and propoſed the drawing up a Remonſtrance of their Grievances; among which Doctor Manwaring's Sermon was mentioned in theſe Debates, being none of the leaſt: The Commons thereupon charged the Doctor, with advancing arbitrary Doctrines at the Lords Bar; and he was ſentenced to be impriſoned, fined 1000 l. ordered to be ſuſpended for three Years, and his Books burnt; and, that he ſhould make a publick Acknowledgement of his Faults at the Bar of the Houſe. 1628. 4 Car. I.

Dr. Manwaring ſentenced for his arbitrary Doctrines.

Two Meſſages ſent to the Commons.

His Majeſty, in the mean Time, ſent two Meſſages to the Houſe, to haſten the Diſpatch of the Buſineſs before them, and not ſpend their Time in aſperſing his Adminiſtration; intimating, that he ſhould put an End to the Seſſion on the 11th Inſtant. Theſe Meſſages incenſed the Commons ſtill more; and Sir John Elliot was beginning to make ſome Reflections on the Miniſters, when the Speaker ſtood up, and ſaid, There was a Command laid upon him, not to ſuffer them to proceed in this Manner: Whereupon there was a profound Silence, till Sir Nathaniel Rich ſtood up, and ſaid, We muſt ſpeak now, or for ever hold our Peace. And when ſome ſuggeſted, that Sir John Elliot's former Speeches, probably, had given his Majeſty Offence, the Houſe came to a Reſolution, That every Member of their Houſe was free from any undutiful Speech, from the Beginning of that Parliament to that Day: And the Houſe was immediately turned into a Grand Committee, to conſider of the Safety of the Nation; no Man being ſuffered to go out of the Houſe, but the Speaker. In this Committee ſeveral Members, particularly Sir Edward Coke and Mr. Selden, charged the Duke of Buckingham, with being the Author of all their Grievances; which they were putting to the Vote, when the Speaker returned with a Meſſage from his Majeſty, commanding them to adjourn till the next Morning; and that in the mean Time all Committees ſhould ceaſe.

The Commons charge the Duke of Bucks, as the Author of their Grievances.

The next Morning the King ſent them another Meſſage, by the Speaker, aſſuring them, he never intended to bar them of their Rights; but only to prevent all ſcandalous Reflections on his Councils, and Actions paſſed: This Meſſage not ſatisfying them, both Houſes addreſſed his Majeſty for a clear and ſatisfactory Anſwer to their Petition of Right. Whereupon his Majeſty came to the Houſe of Peers, (June 7.) and the Petition being again preſented to him, he anſwered, in a parliamentary way, Soit droit comme il eſt deſire: Which his Majeſty obſerved, was a full Anſwer; and yet no more than he granted them in the firſt; for the Meaning of that was to confirm their Liberties, knowing, according to their own Proteſtations, that they neither meant, or could, hurt his Prerogative; adding, that as he had ſhewn his Readineſs to ſatisfy their Demands; if this Parliament had not a happy Concluſion, the Sin muſt be theirs: And they were ſo good afterwards, to grant his Majeſty five Subſidies, and to confirm the five Subſidies granted by the Clergy. And now, it was imagined, all Differences were compoſed: But, a little after, the Commons preſented a Remonſtrance to the King, ſhewing, that both the Church and Commonwealth were ſtill in great Danger, the Laws not being put in Execution againſt the Roman Catholicks: Many of whom were in great Favour at Court; particularly the Counteſs of Buckingham (the Duke's Mother) by whoſe Protection, their Number, Power, and Inſolence, encreaſed; That Arminianiſm was encouraged by Doctor Neale Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Doctor Laud Biſhop of Bath and Wells, who, though Proteſtants, Both Houſes addreſs the King, for a more ſatisfactory Anſwer to their Petition. He gives a full Anſwer.

testants in Appearance, were in Reality Jesuits; recommending it to the King, to encourage painful Orthodox Preachers, observing that such were too much discountenanced: They again reminded his Majesty, of the illegal Methods that had been taken to raise Money by way of Loan; represented the Danger of keeping a Standing Army on Foot; the Terror they were under from his Majesty's German Troops; the Illegality of his taking Tonnage and Poundage; the Miscarriages of the Isle of Rhee; the Weakness of his Majesty's Forts; the Destruction of Trade by the French and Spanish Privateers; and the Loss of the Sovereignty of the Narrow-Seas: The principal Cause of all which Evils, they conceived to be the excessive Power of the Duke of Buckingham, and the Abuse of that Power; submitting it to his Majesty's Wisdom, Whether it was safe for himself, or his Kingdoms, that so great a Power by Sea and Land should be reposed in him; intimating, that they could not be satisfied, while he remained in Possession of the great Offices he enjoyed, and was continued in his Majesty's Councils.

Accuse the Duke of Bucks, as the Author of them.

The King's Answer.

To which the King answered, He little expected such a Remonstrance, after he had passed their Petition of Right; and soon after he sent them a Message, that he should put an End to the Session, the 26th Instant (June:) Whereupon they immediately set about framing another Remonstrance, against the King's taking Tonnage and Poundage; wherein they beseech him, to forbear receiving it; and, that he would not take it ill, if his Subjects refused paying Tonnage and Poundage for the future; telling him, they intended to prepare a Bill, to impower his Majesty to receive it, if they had been permitted to sit longer.

They resolve on another Remonstrance.

1628. 4 Car. I.

But the King, understanding they designed to clog the Bill with many Restrictions, and to continue these Duties but from Year to Year, whereas his Predecessors enjoyed them for Life, his Majesty did not think fit to encourage the Bill; and, in order to prevent the Commons presenting their second Remonstrance, came to the House sooner than they expected, and put an End to the Session, having first made a Speech to both Houses: Wherein he desired they would observe, that by granting their Petition of Right, he had not granted them any new, but only confirmed their antient Rights and Liberties: And as for Tonnage and Poundage, it was a Thing he could not want; it was never intended to be asked by them in that Petition, nor did he ever intend to part with it; of which he directed the Judges to take Notice. Concluding, that the Houses of Parliament, neither jointly, or separately, had any Power eito make, or declare, a Law, without his Consent, what new Doctrines soever had been taught. After which the Lord-Keeper declared the Parliament to be prorogued to the 20th of October.

Stroud's Habeas Corpus.

Proceedings against WILLIAM STROUD Esq; WALTER LONG Esq; JOHN SELDEN Esq; and others, on bringing their Writs of Habeas Corpus, to be bailed in the King's-Bench, in Easter Term, 1629, 5 Car. I.

1629. 5 Car. I.

Stroud, &c. summoned before the the Council.

THE Privy-Council, on the 3d of March, 1628. issued a Warrant, directed to Denzil Holles Esq; Sir Miles Hobart, Sir John Elliot, Sir Peter Hayman; John Selden, William Coriton, Walter Long, William Stroud, and Benjamin Valentine, Esquires, commanding their personal Appearance, before the Board, the Day following: At which Time Holles, Elliot, Coriton, and Valentine, appearing, and being examined, concerning the Disorders committed by them in the House of Commons, they refused to answer, as to any thing that had been said or done in their House, and were thereupon committed; and Warrants issued, for Sealing up the Studies of Holles, Selden, and Elliot: Long and Stroud absconding some time, a Proclamation was issued for apprehending them; and they afterwards surrendered: His Majesty intending to proceed against these Gentlemen in the Star-Chamber, the Attorney-General, by his Majesty's Directions, proposed several Queries to the Judges, concerning the Legality of such a Proceeding against Parliament-Men, for what had been said and done in the House: But it being afterwards resolved to drop the Proceedings in the Star-Chamber, I shall take no further Notice of them here.

Refuse to answer, as to what had been done in the House. And are committed.

They bring their Writs of Habeas Corpus.

In the mean Time, the Prisoners remaining in Custody, Mr. Stroud brought his Writ of Habeas Corpus, in Easter Term, 5 Car. I. to be admitted to Bail; and appearing in the Court of King's-Bench, the Return of the Habeas Corpus was read, importing, that William Stroud, Esq; was committed by Virtue of a Warrant under the Hands of twelve of the Lords of the Privy-Council; which Warrant was in the following Words:

The Return.

The Warrant for their Commitment.

You are to take Knowledge, That it is his Majesty's Pleasure and Commandment, that you take into your Custody the Body of William Stroud, Esq; and keep him close Prisoner, till they receive other Order, either from his Majesty, or this Board: For so doing, this shall be your Warrant. Dated 2 April, 1629. and directed, To the Marshal of the King's Bench, or his Deputy.

That he was also detained in Prison by Virtue of a Warrant under his Majesty's Hand, of the following Tenor:

A ſecond Warrant.

Whereas you have in your Cuſtody the Body of William Stroud, Eſq; by Warrant of the Lords of our Privy-Council, by our ſpecial Command, you are to take notice, that this Commitment was for notable Contempts by him committed againſt our Self and our Government, and for ſtirring up Sedition againſt Us, for which you are to detain him in cloſe Cuſtody, and to keep him cloſe Priſoner, until our Pleaſure be farther known concerning his Deliverance.

Given at Greenwich, 7 May, 1629. in the fifth Year of our Reign.

Directed, To the Marſhal of our Bench for the Time being; who returned, Et hæ ſunt cauſæ captionis & detentionis prædict. Gulielmi Stroud.

Walter Long Eſq; brought his Writ of Habeas Corpus alſo, at the ſame Time, whoſe Caſe was exactly the ſame.

Stroud's Counſel argues the Return inſufficient.

Mr. Aſk, of Counſel with Mr. Stroud, argued, that that the Return was inſufficient; for the firſt Warrant mentioned in it, being from the Lords of the Council, ſhewed no Cauſe of Commitment, which was expreſly contrary to the Reſolution of Parliament, and the Petition of Right granted by this King: And that the ſecond Warrant by the King was inſufficient; becauſe the King himſelf could impriſon no Man: He objected alſo, that the Commitment was too general and uncertain, being for notable Contempts: There were Contempts, he ſaid, of various Natures, and it appeared not to the Court, of what kind this Contempt was; and, as to the Word notable, every Contempt againſt the King was notable. The Words, againſt our Government, were likewiſe uncertain; a Contempt of any Court being a Contempt of the King and Government. The Words, for ſtirring up Sedition againſt Us, he obſerved, likewiſe, were indefinite and general: This Term was generally uſed adjectively, as for ſeditious Books, or ſeditious News. The Statute of 1 and 2 Phil. & Mar. ſays, If any Perſon ſpeak any falſe, ſeditious, or ſlanderous News of the Queen, he ſhall loſe his Ears, and pay a Fine of 100*l.* So that the Penalty of ſuch Sedition, was but a Fine, which is no Cauſe of Impriſonment without Bail: And what was the Sedition intended here, was not to be gathered from the Words, they were ſo general: As to the Words againſt Us, they were redundant; for every Sedition was againſt the King; and having cited ſeveral Caſes, to ſhew that Pleadings had been held vicious for the Generality and Uncertainty; as the 18th of Edw. III. where a Man was indicted quia furatus eſt equum, and did not ſay felonicè; whereupon it was adjudged ill, 29. Aſſ. 45. A Man was indicted, for that he was communis latro; and the Indictment held vicious, becauſe it was too general: He concluded with the Caſe of Peak and Paul, Hil. 33 Eliz. where the Defendants ſaid of the Plaintiff, Thou art a mutinous and ſeditious Man, and maintaineſt Sedition againſt the Queen; and the Words were adjudged not actionable.

The Argument of Mr Long's Counſel, againſt the Return

Mr. Maſon, of Counſel with Mr. Long, alſo argued, That a Commitment by the King, without ſhewing Cauſe, could not be good, ſince his Majeſty's granting the Petition of Right.

1629. 5 Car. I.

But what he principally inſiſted on, was, that Sedition was not any determined Offence in our Law; there was no Crime in Law called Sedition: That the Civilians defined it to be Seditio, or ſeceſſio, cum pars Republicæ contra partem inſurgit: So that Sedition, according to them, was nothing but Diviſion: That Bracton and Glanvile uſed the Word, Sedition, generally: That 25 Edw. III. which declared what Offences ſhould be Treaſon, did not mention Sedition amongſt them, and, conſequently, Sedition could not be interpreted Treaſon at this Day. To raiſe Tumults was Sedition; and yet one guilty of this Offence, was indicted only for a Treſpaſs, Trin. 21 Edw. III. Rot. 23. B. R. Garbart's Caſe. Pope was appealed by the Wife of J. S. becauſe he feloniouſly and ſeditiouſly murdered J. S. from whence it appeared, that Sedition was not to be taken as a Subſtantive; but might be applied adjectively to Treaſon, Treſpaſs, or other Offences. The 35 Eliz. cap. 1. is made againſt ſeditious Sectaries, that abſent themſelves from Church, the Penalty whereof was 10*l. per* Month. And Coke 4. 13. Lord Cromwell's Caſe, the Word Seditious is referred to Doctrine; from whence it appeared the Word was variouſly taken, according to the Subject treated of: That there were Offences of a higher Nature than Sedition, that were not Treaſon. 17 R. II. cap. 8. Inſurrections of Villains and others, is made Treaſon; which ſhewed, that before that Act it was not Treaſon; and that Act was repealed. By the Statute of 3 & 4 Edw. VI. cap. 5. To aſſemble the People to alter the Laws, is made Treaſon, if they continue together an Hour after Proclamation made; but if they diſperſe upon Proclamation made, it is not Treaſon: And if the ſtirring up Sedition againſt the King, was not Treaſon, there could be no Colour for detaining his Client, Mr. Long, in Priſon; and therefore he prayed, he might be diſcharged.

Berkley's Argument, for the Sufficiency of the Return.

Berkley, the King's Serjeant on the other Side, argued, That a Commitment, either by the King, or the Privy-Council, was good: It was every Day's Experience. 33 Hen. VI. 28. Poignes's Caſe was expreſs in it: The Petition of Right alſo admitted, they might commit: The Grievance there was, becauſe the particular Cauſe of Commitment was not expreſſed. It was not, indeed, fit for the King in Perſon to arreſt a Man; but he might command another to do it. This Impriſonment, before Conviction, is not a Puniſhment for any Offence, but rather an Arreſt, or Reſtraint, to prevent further Inconveniences. 14 Hen. VII. 8. A Juſtice of Peace may arreſt Men riotouſly aſſembled, for Prevention of further Miſchief. If a Houſe was on Fire, every Man might pull down the next, to prevent further Dammage: So, where there were Incendiaries in the State; they ought to be reſtrained and ſuppreſſed, leſt others ſhould be ſtirred up by them to ſubvert the Government. 22 Aſſ. 56. and 22 Edw. IV. 45. In falſe impriſonment, the Defendant juſtified, becauſe the Plaintiff was mad, and out of his Wits, and having done ſome harm, he bound and beat him, to avoid farther Harm; and the Juſtification was held good: So in Matters of Government, to avoid Commotions, the King ought to uſe his coercive Power againſt Men that are enraged, leſt they throw all into Confuſion.

As to that Objection, that the Return was general, and uncertain, he obſerved, That the Counſel for the Priſoners had divided the Words of the Return, which was an offering Violence to it; for an Expoſition ought not to be made by Fractions, but upon the whole Matter: Though the ſtirring up Sedition againſt Us, might be but an Offence fineable; yet, joined with the former Words, ſhewed it to be an Offence of the higheſt Nature; and, although Sedition itſelf might be too general an Expreſſion, yet, where it was Sedition againſt Us and our Government, it was particular enough, and could not be miſunderſtood: And, beſides, this being in the Caſe of a Return upon a Habeas Corpus, ſuch a preciſe Certainty was not required as in Indictments and Pleadings; therefore that Objection, that Sedition was not a Law Term, and that no Indictment for Sedition generally was ever ſeen, was of no Weight, though in ſome Caſes an Indictment for Sedition might be good; for it might amount to Treaſon. He agreed in Peak's Caſe, that for the Words, ſeditious Fellow, no Action lay; becauſe thoſe Words did not imply an Act done, but only an Inclination to do it: But, if a Man had uttered Words, importing, that Perſon had committed Sedition, they would be actionable, as was reſolved in Philips's and Badby's Caſe, 24 Eliz. Coke 4. 19. Thou haſt made a ſeditious Sermon, and moved the People to Sedition this Day, adjudged actionable: He agreed to Garboyl's Caſe, &c. for in thoſe Caſes Sedition was only taken adjectively, and ſhewed an Inclination only to do a ſeditious Act; and ſo Sedition might be applied to other Offences beſides Treaſon: That the Word Sedition is found in ſeveral Statutes; and Bracton, in his Book De Corona, ſays, If any by raſh Attempt, plotting the King's Death, ſhould act or cauſe any Act, to the Sedition of the Lord the King, or of his Army, it is Treaſon: And Glanvile ſays, To do any Thing in Sedition of the Kingdom, or of the Army, is High Treaſon. And Britton, fol. 16. It is High Treaſon to diſinherit the King; and Sedition tendeth to the Diſinheritance of the King: From whence it appears, that the Word Sedition is no Stranger to our Law; and, that ſuch Sedition as ſevers the People from the King, is Treaſon: That the Sedition mentioned in the Return might be High Treaſon, and yet the King might make it an Offence fineable: For he might proſecute the Offender in what Manner he pleaſed; and if it was Treaſon, the Offender was not bailable: That the Word Sedition was never taken in a good Senſe; it was always coupled with Treaſon, Rebellion, Inſurrection, and ſuch heinous Offences; and therefore prayed, the Priſoner might be remanded.

Littleton's Argument, for Mr. Selden.

In Trinity Term, 5 Car. I. Mr. Selden being in like Manner brought into the Court of King's Bench, by Habeas Corpus, and his Caſe being exactly the ſame with that of Mr. Stroud, Mr. Littleton, (aftewards Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, and Lord Keeper) of Counſel with Mr. Selden, moved, that his Client might be bailed. ——— He ſaid, he did admit that the King might commit a Man; and that a Man committed by the King was not repleviſable by the Sheriff, but he was evidently bailable by that Court, as appeared by the Petition of Right, and the Anſwer to it; and therefore he ſhould labour that Point no further: But lay down, as a Ground of his following Argument, that as Offences were of two Natures, either Capital, or as Treſpaſſes; ſo they were puniſhed in two Manners, viz. Capitally, or by Fine, or Impriſonment. For Offences of the firſt Kind, ſuch as Treaſon, and the like, Impriſonment was was only for the ſafe Cuſtody of the Offender; but for Miſdemeanors of the ſecond Nature, Impriſonment was impoſed on him as a Puniſhment. Then he laid it down as a Ground, That no Freeman that is impriſoned, only for Miſdemeanors before Conviction, could be detained in Priſon without Bail, if it was offered; unleſs in ſome particular Caſes, where it was ordained by a particular Statute.

That the Warrant of the Privy-Council, which ſignified the King's Pleaſure to commit the Priſoner, might be a good Ground for his Commitment; but it was no Ground for detaining him without Bail: And this the King had acknowledged, as the antient Right of the Subject, in the Petition of Right, and therefore was not now to be diſputed: That the Warrant of the King, as certified in the Return, contained no ſufficient Cauſe for detaining the Priſoner: The ſole Queſtion was, If the Return contained in it any Capital Offence; for if it contained only a Treſpaſs, or Miſdemeanor, then the Party was bailable. Then he conſidered the ſeveral Parts of the Return; the firſt Part whereof was, For notable Contempts by him committed againſt our Self, and our Government: But all Contempts, he obſerved, were, mediately or immediately, againſt the King, and his Government; and the Word notable, ſignified no more than notorious and manifeſt: It was but an emphatical Expreſſion of the Nature of the thing, and altered it not. Againſt Us: All Riots, Routs, Batteries, and Treſpaſſes, were againſt the King's Crown and Dignity; and the Nature of the Contempt ought to be expreſſed, that the Court might judge thereof: For Contempts in general, before Conviction, the Party could not be impriſoned without Bail.

The ſecond Part of the Return was, for ſtiring up Sedition againſt Us, which the other Side had ſaid, was ever taken in the worſt Senſe: That was true; but it did not follow from thence, that the Party which committed it, was not bailable. Sedition, in this Return, muſt be underſtood to be either as Treſpaſs, or High Treaſon: He ſhould conſider, therefore, 1. In what Senſe the Word Sedition was uſed. 2. How it ſhould be expounded here; and 3. what Senſe the Words againſt Us ſhould have here.

That Sedition was not to be found in the Diviſion of Offences in our Law, but as it was mingled and coupled with other Offences: Routs, Riots, and unlawful Aſſemblies, were much of the ſame Nature with it, and well expreſſed the Nature of Sedition: That the Engliſh Word was taken from the Latin, Seditio, which was uſed in the Bible, by Poets, Hiſtorians, and Orators, for Tumult, Uproar, or confuſed Noiſe: In Tacitus, it ſignified a Mutiny of the Army, when they repined againſt their Captain. In Italian, the elder Son of Latin, Sedition and Diſcord were were all one. In the Bible Seditio is tranſlated chiding, or murmuring; In ſeditione Corah, is engliſhed, In the Company of Corah: Facta eſt ergo ſeditio in Ephraim, is tranſlated, The Men of Iſrael gathered themſelves together: In Acts xv. 2. Facta eſt ergo Seditio, is tranſlated, Diſſenſion, and Diſputation; and Acts xxv. 5. Tertullus, the Orator, accuſes Paul, for moving Sedition; and the ſubſequent Words are, a Ring-Leader of the Sect of the Phariſees; ſo that his Sedition was but a Schiſm: The Lord Bacon has an Eſſay on Sedition, the Title whereof is, Of Seditions and Tumults; which ſhewed they were of the ſame Nature. And there is a Prayer in the Litany, From Sedition and Hereſy, &c. where Sedition ſignifies Schiſm, or the being of a Sect. In like manner, in the Act againſt Lollards, 2 Hen. IV. cap. 16. Sedition is taken for Diſſenſion and Diviſion in Doctrine, which is not made Treaſon by that Statute. 1 Phil. & Mar. againſt ſeditious Words, makes the Puniſhment only Pillory, o ra Fine of 100*l.* 13 Eliz. c. 2. makes the ſeditious bringing in of the Pope's Bulls Treaſon, which implies it was not ſo at Common Law. 23 Eliz. c. 2. enacts, That writing, or printing any Book, containing ſeditious and ſlanderous matter, to the ſtiring up Rebellion, was Felony; and in an Indictment on that Statute, Coke's Entries, f. 352, 353. there are the Words Rebellionem & ſeditionem movere; and yet it was but Felony.

Mich. 33 Eliz. Cawdry's Caſe, Coke's 5th Report, p. 1. Sedition and Schiſm are deſcribed thus: As Schiſm is a Separation from the Unity of the Church, ſo Sedition is a Separation from the Unity of the Commonwealth: And another Author ſays, a ſeditious Perſon differs from a Schiſmatick; becauſe the one oppoſeth the Spiritual Truth, the other the Temporal: And, as Schiſm of itſelf is not Hereſy, ſo Sedition, without other Adjuncts, is not Treaſon: And whereas it is objected, that both Bracton and Glanvile made Sedition Treaſon: He granted it; but they were obſcure: Theſe Authors neither remembered Law nor Language: And ſhall that which ſignifies ſeditio Regis, or tumultus Regis, be the ſame in Senſe with ſeditio contra Regem? Though theſe Authors reckon Sedition amongſt the Crimes læſæ Majeſtatis, they were old and obſolete, and not looked upon as Authorities in Law; as in pl. 356. and Coke 8. 35. But, if they were, they had them ſometimes on their Side; for Glanvile ſays, in his fourth Book, That a Man accuſed of ſuch a Crime ſhall be bailed. And Bracton ſays, If no Accuſer appears, they ſhall be ſet at Liberty: Hengham alſo reckons the Breach of the Peace amongſt the Crimes læſæ Majeſtatis; ſo does Glanvile, and Fleta, a Follower of Bracton, who tranſcribes from him, and calls Sedition Seductionem of the Lord the King. By the Civil Law, indeed, which is much cited by thoſe old Authors, Sedition is Treaſon; but we are not governed by the Civil Law: And he confidently affirmed, that there could not be ſhewn any Record, Book, or Statute, after the making of the Statute of 25 Edw. III. in which Sedition is taken to be a Capital Offence: But admitting that Sedition imported a greater Offence than a Tumult, yet there was no Colour to ſay it was Treaſon, it not being contained in the 25 Edw. III. which had aſcertained what ſhould be Treaſon: Beſides, the Words raiſing Sedition againſt Us, could not be intended Treaſon; for if it had been ſo, the King would not extend a Fault beyond the Magnitude thereof, ſo he would give to every Offence its true and genuine Name: The King ſtiles himſelf Us in his Writs; and every Diſobedience to a Writ may be ſtiled Sedition againſt Us: Riots, Routs, and unlawful Aſſemblies, might well be called, Sedition againſt us: But for ſuch Offences, a Man ſhall not be reſtrained of his Liberty upon an it may be. That ſuch a Return was neceſſary, by which the Court might be truly informed of the Offence; for the Writ of Habeas Corpus was, to ſubmit and receive what the Court ſhould ordain. Though he would not affirm, that it ought to be as certain as an Indictment; yet out of the Return the Subſtance of the Offence ought always to appear: The Return ought to have ſo much Certainty in it, that, if it be falſe, the Party grieved may have his Action on the Caſe: And, that the Court may judge of the Legality of the Cauſe.

Then he conſidered the Parts of the Return as they were coupled together —— for notable Contempts by him committed againſt Our Self, and Our Government, and for ſtirring up Sedition againſt Us. Here the King joins Sedition with notable Contempts; and in a manner ſays, that Sedition was one of thoſe notable Contempts mentioned in the firſt Part of the Return; ſo that he made it but a Contempt. Then as to the Generality and Uncertainty of the Return. M. 9 Edw. III. Roll. 39. B. R. Peter Ruſſel's Caſe is expreſs in the Point. The Return was, that he had committed divers Seditions againſt our Lord the King; and for that Cauſe he was detained, and no other: And becauſe the Return mentioned not, what Sedition in ſpecial, he was bailed, but not diſcharged: And he deſired the Bailment of the Priſoner only, and not his Deliverance. He deſired alſo, it might be obſerved, that, in Ruſſel's Caſe, there was an actual Sedition raiſed againſt the King; here the Priſoner was only charged with ſtirring up Sedition. 33 Eliz. it was reſolved by all the Judges of England, as appears by Judge Anderſon's Book, which was produced in Parliament, 3 Car. That all Men committed by the Privy-Council are bailable, if the Commitment be not for High-Treaſon: And had the Accuſation, mentioned in Ruſſel's Caſe of Sedition, been an Accuſation of Treaſon, the Judges ought not to have bailed him of Right: And he ſtill inſiſted, That the Priſoner being committed before Conviction of any Offence, and it being impoſſible to underſtand this Offence to be Treaſon, was baileable here; for which he offered two further Reaſons: 1. The Return here was for Sedition, and there was an Information in the Star-Chamber againſt the Priſoner for ſeditious Practices againſt the King and his Government: Though he did not affirm they were the ſame Offence, there was a Probability they were the ſelf-ſame; and, if they were the ſame, the Sedition here intended was not Treaſon, and ſo the Party was bailable: 2. The Priſoner was ready at that Bar, the laſt Term, and a Grand-Jury and the King's Counſel preſent; and yet no Indictment was preferred againſt the Priſoner:

Which

1629. 5 Car. I.

Which induced him to be of Opinion, that the Offence mentioned in the Return was not Treaſon, or ſo great as was pretended; and, upon the whole, concluded, that the Priſoner ought to be bailed.

The reſt of the Priſoners rely on Mr. Littleton's Argument.

Sir Miles Hobart, and Benjamin Valentine, and Denzil Holles, Eſquires, being brought to the Bar, the ſame Day, by virtue of their reſpective Writs of Habeas Corpus, would not give the Court the Trouble of hearing their Counſel, but all declared, they would rely upon the Argument made by Mr. Littleton.

The Attorney-General's Argument, for the Sufficiency of the Return.

Sir Robert Heath, Attorney-General, argued, on the other Side, that the Return was good, and the Priſoners ought not to be bailed; for that within the Return, there appeared good Cauſe of their Commitment, and of their detaining alſo. The firſt Warrant, indeed, was general; that it was by the Command of the King; and this, in former Times, was held a good Return, when due Reverence was paid to Government; but, tempora mutantur. However, he was ſtill of Opinion, that the firſt Commitment might be general; for if, upon Commitment, the true Cauſe ſhould be revealed to the Goaler, the Fact would be divulged, and the Accomplices eſcape Puniſhment. When the Cauſe was returned into Court, more Certainty was requiſite; for then, as had been objected, ſomething ought to be expreſſed, to which the Party might anſwer, and upon which the Court might ground their Judgment. And to prove this, the Petition of Right had been inſiſted on; though he did not think the Law was altered by that Petition. The Law remained as before, as appeared by the King's Anſwers to it, and by the King's Speech, the 26th of June, 1628. where he ſays, It muſt not be conceived, I have granted any new, but only confirmed the antient Liberties of my Subjects; and the People ought not to ſtretch the Words beyond the King's Intention. The Opinion of the Sages of the Law formerly was, that a Perſon committed by the Command of the King, or Council, without Cauſe ſhewn, was not bailable. The firſt Commitment was always held to be lawful, although it was by a Juſtice of Peace, or a Conſtable, and general: But here was a Commitment by the Council, and a particular Cauſe returned, ſufficient for detaining the Priſoners.

It had been objected, indeed, that Sedition was not a Word known in our Law; but it could not be miſunderſtood in this Place, where it was for ſtirring up Sedition againſt Us. The Word had various Acceptations, 'twas true, according to the Subject treated of: But here the Words againſt Us fixed the Senſe. Mr. Littleton had ſhewn, how Tacitus uſed it, and the Acceptation of this Word in ſeveral Places of Scripture, which Mr. Attorney conceived made for him, as Numb. xx. 3. populi verſi ſunt in ſeditionem, where ſeditionem is engliſhed murmuring; and the Fact was evidently High-Treaſon, againſt their Governor, and againſt God himſelf. Numb. xxvi. 9. In ſeditione Corah, it was manifeſt there was a great Inſurrection. Judg. xii. 1. Facta eſt ergo ſeditio in Ephraim, the Ephraimites roſe againſt Jephtha, who was then their Judge and Governor, and conſequently were in Rebellion. Acts xix. 40. The Town-Clerk there knew not how to anſwer for that Day's Sedition, or Inſurrection. Acts xxiv. 5. Tertullus accuſed Paul of Sedition, as a peſtilent Fellow, and an Enemy to the Government, though in reality he taught the Goſpel.

1629. 5 Car. I.

It had been objected, that if Sedition was a Capital Offence, it muſt be Treaſon; but as it was not compriſed within the Statute of 25 Edw. III. it could not be Treaſon. To which he anſwered, that upon an Indictment for Treaſon, ſuch a Sedition as this might be given in Evidence, and perhaps prove Treaſon. The Return was not, that he was ſeditious, which ſhewed only an Inclination; but that he ſtirred up Sedition, which might be Treaſon, if the Evidence would bear it. Then he cited a great many Acts of Parliament, where the Word Sedition was uſed; and ſhewed, that it was always coupled with Inſurrection, or Rebellion, which proved, that Sedition was a Word well known in our Law, of dangerous Conſequence, and which could not be expounded in a good Senſe: And from theſe Statutes it appeared, that there was but a narrow Difference, between Sedition and Treaſon, if there was any Difference at all.

It was objected alſo, he obſerved, that every Impriſonment was for Cuſtody, or Puniſhment; and if it was for Cuſtody, the Party, upon tendering ſufficient Bail, was bailable: But this was not always true; for Impriſonment for Cuſtody was for two Intents; one, that the Party which had offended, ſhould not avoid the Judgment of the Law. 2. That he ſhould do no Miſchief in the Interim, before his Trial: And though it had been ſaid, that the Party bailed was, notwithſtanding, impriſoned, he denied it: Nor ſhould the Bail ſuffer the like Puniſhment as ought to have been inflicted on the Party; the Bail could only be impriſoned. Serjeant Berkley had juſtly called a ſeditious Man, an Incendiary in the Government; and, as a common Incendiary, ſuch a one ought to be reſtrained of his Liberty. A mad Man might be reſtrained, on account of the Hurt he might do himſelf, and others, while he was at Liberty: A ſeditious Man was a mad Man in the publick State and Commonwealth, and therefore ought to be reſtrained: A Leper might be impriſoned, leſt his Leproſy ſhould infect others. The Infection of Sedition was as dangerous as any Diſeaſe, and therefore it was not wiſe, or ſafe, to ſet ſeditious Men at Liberty, by admitting them to Bail.

And though Ruſſel's Caſe, M. 9. E. 3. Roll. 39. had been objected to be in Point, it was not to the Purpoſe; for the Commitment was by a Juſtice of North-Wales; and the Party was accuſed of Seditions and Indecencies, where the latter Word qualified the former: But here the Detainment was by the King himſelf, for ſtirring up Sedition; and he deſired, it might be obſerved, that Ruſſel came into Court, upon a Habeas Corpus, 20 Sept. but was not delivered till Hillary Term following; and that after it was found, he was not guilty of the Offence, with which he was charged.

As to the Objection, that the Parties had been a long Time impriſoned, and no Proceedings yet againſt them; it was well known, there had been Proceedings againſt them; and they they declined to anſwer: And the King intended to proceed farther againſt them, in convenient Time: Beſides, more than three Months were requiſite for the Preparation of ſuch Proceedings: Some of the Offenders alſo had been delivered, as Coryton, and Sir Peter Hayman: And if any Injury was done the Priſoners, they themſelves were the Occaſion of it, by refuſing to ſubmit themſelves to the King.

That the Reſolution of the Judges, in 34 Eliz. had been much relied on: But that Reſolution was, that the Cauſe ought to be certified generally, or ſpecially; and here the general Cauſe was ſpecified, if the ſpecial Cauſe was not. Upon the whole, he held, the Bailment of the Priſoners was left to the Diſcretion of the Court. He had ſhewed them the Diſcretion of their Predeceſſors; and if any Danger appeared in their Bailment, he was confident the Court would not bail them: They would firſt conſult the King, who would ſhew them where the Danger lay, and prayed they might be remanded.

The King's Letter to the Judges, acquainting them, the Priſoners were removed to other Priſons.

A Day being afterwards appointed, for the Judges to deliver their Opinions, they received a Letter from his Majeſty, the Night before, importing, that whereas, by his ſpecial Command, Sir Miles Hobart, Walter Long, and William Stroud, had been lately removed from their ſeveral Priſons, and ſent to the Tower of London; and underſtanding, it was reported, he had done it to decline the Courſe of Juſtice, he thought fit to let them know the Occaſion thereof, and why he commanded, that theſe, and the other Priſoners, ſhould not come before them, viz. That he had heard, moſt of them had carried themſelves inſolently, and unmannerly, both to his Majeſty, and their Lordſhips; and he could not but reſent the Diſhonour that was done to himſelf, and his Courts of Juſtice, ſo far, as to let the World know, how much he diſliked it: And underſtanding, that their Lordſhips, and the reſt of the Judges, had not yet reſolved the main Queſtion, he did not think the Appearance of the Priſoners neceſſary; and until he found their Temper and Diſcretion to be ſuch, as might deſerve it, he was not willing to afford them Favour; however, he was content, that Selden and Valentine ſhould attend them to Morrow.

Given at Greenwich, 24 June, in the 5th Year of our Reign.

A ſecond Letter.

About three Hours after the Receipt of this Letter, the Judges received another from his Majeſty, importing, that upon mature Conſideration, he had reſolved, that all the Priſoners ſhould receive the ſame Treatment, and none of them ſhould come before the Court, until he had Cauſe to believe, they would expreſs more Modeſty and Civility, both towards himſelf, and their Lordſhips, than at their laſt Appearance they did.

The Priſoners not being brought to the Bar, according to the Rule of Court that had been made for that Purpoſe, Proclamation was made, for the Keepers of the ſeveral Priſons to bring in their Priſoners: Whereupon, the Marſhal of the King's-Bench (none of the other Keepers appearing) informed the Court, that Mr. Stroud, who was in his Cuſtody, was removed the Day before, to the Tower of London, by the King's own Warrant: And it appearing, the reſt of the Priſoners alſo had been removed from the Priſons where they were before, their Counſel moved the Judges, that they would, however, deliver their Opinions in the Caſe: But were anſwered, that could be to no Purpoſe; for the Priſoners being abſent, they could not be bailed, delivered, or remanded: And the Gentlemen were continued in Priſon, during the long Vacation that followed: But before the End of it, the Judges received Letters from the Privy-Council, requiring them to come to Town by Michaelmas-Day, becauſe his Majeſty had urgent Occaſion for their Service; and being come up accordingly, the next Morning, about 4 a-Clock, Letters were brought from Mr. Trumbal, Clerk of the Council, to the Lord Chief Juſtice, that he, and Judge Whitlock, ſhould attend the King, at Hampton-Court, that Morning, as ſoon as conveniently they could: And the Chief Juſtice, and Judge Jones, attending his Majeſty accordingly, he let them know, that he was content the Gentlemen ſhould be bailed, though they were ſo obſtinate, that they had refuſed to petition for their Liberty, and declare, they were ſorry they had offended him; but ſaid, he was reſolved to proſecute them at Common Law, and drop the Proceedings in the Star-Chamber. Theſe Judges, it ſeems, were of Opinion, that the Offence was not Capital; and that, by Law, the Priſoners ought to be bailed, on giving Security for their good Behaviour: Whereupon, his Majeſty ſaid, He would never be offended with his Judges, ſo as they dealt plainly with him, and did not anſwer him by Oracles and Riddles.

1629. 5 Car. I.

The Gentlemen continued in Priſon.

The Judges attend the King.

He is content the Priſoners ſhould be bailed.

Mr. Maſon moving the Judges of the King's-Bench, the firſt Day of Michaelmas Term, for their Reſolution in relation to the Priſoners, the Court declared, they were unanimous in their Opinion, that they might be bailed, finding Sureties for their good Behaviour, as was done in Ruſſel's Caſe, 9 Edw. III. which had been ſo often cited. To which Mr. Selden anſwered, in the Name of himſelf, and the reſt of the Priſoners, that they had their Sureties ready for Bail, but not for the good Behaviour; and deſired Bail might be firſt accepted, and that the Court would not inſiſt on the other, for the following Reaſons:

The Priſoners refuſe to find Sureties for their good Behaviour.

1. Firſt, The Caſe had been long depending: They had been impriſoned thirty Weeks: Many Arguments had been made, for and againſt their being admitted to Bail; but Sureties, for their good Behaviour, had never yet been demanded.

2. Becauſe the finding Sureties for good Behaviour, was ſeldom inſiſted on, on Returns of Felonies, or Treaſons; and it was an Implication they were culpable.

3. They demanded to be bailed, in Point of Right; and if it was not grantable of Right, they did not demand it: But the finding Sureties for the good Behaviour was merely a Point of Diſcretion; and they could not comply with it, without greatly offending the Parliament, where thoſe Matters were acted, which were ſurmiſed by the Return.

To which the Court anſwered, that the Return did not mention any thing done in Parliament; and they could not take Notice theſe things were done there: And Judge Whitlock obſerved, that the giving Sureties for the good Behaviour, was only for the Prevention of any Damage that might happen to the State: It was an Act of Government and Juriſdiction, and not of Law: And Judge Croke obſerved, it was no Inconvenience to the Priſoners; for the ſame Bail, and the ſame Recognizance, might ſerve both: And the Attorney-General Heath declared, he had an Information, ready in his Hand, to deliver into Court againſt them.

1629. 5 Car. I.

The Lord Chief Juſtice Hyde acquainted the Priſoners, that if they now refuſed to find Sureties for their good Behaviour, and were for that Cauſe remanded, they might not afterwards, perhaps, grant a Habeas Corpus for them, inaſmuch as they were acquainted with the Cauſe of their Impriſonment.

Then Serjeant Aſhley offered to be Bail for his Son-in-Law Mr. Holles; but Mr. Holles refuſing to be bound himſelf, the Court would not admit of it, as being contrary to the Courſe of the Court, to accept Bail, where the Principal refuſes to be bound: And Mr. Long having already found Sureties for his good Behaviour, at the Chief Juſtice's Chambers, ſeeing the Reſolution of his Companions, refuſed to continue his Sureties any longer, and was again remanded to Priſon, with the reſt, for not finding Sureties for his good Behaviour.

They are again remanded to Priſon.

Removed to the Gate-Houſe, on account of the Plague.

Selden, Hobart, Stroud, and Valentine, having been committed to the King's-Bench, and the Plague being very rife in Southwark, the three laſt petitioned the Judges of the King's-Bench, in Trinity Term, 6 Car. I. to be delivered over to the Gate-Houſe, Weſtminſter, to avoid the Infection; and the Judges thereupon iſſued a Writ to the Marſhal of the King's-Bench, commanding him to deliver them to the Keeper of the Gate-Houſe; ſending Writs alſo to the Keeper to receive them. Mr. Selden would not aſk this Favour of the Judges, while they were in Town; but when they were gone into the Country, applied himſelf to the Lord Treaſurer, to move the King, that he might be ſent to the Gate-Houſe alſo, to avoid the Danger: Which the Lord Treaſurer did; and his Majeſty agreeing to it, the Treaſurer ſent a Warrant to the Marſhal, ſignifying his Majeſty's Pleaſure, to remove Mr. Selden to the Gate-Houſe; and he was removed accordingly.

This the Judges repreſented to the Lord Treaſurer, at their coming to Town (in Michaelmas Term, 6 Car. I.), to be irregular; and that Mr. Selden had neglected to apply himſelf to the Court, as he ought to have done. The Lord Treaſurer anſwered, he did not move the King to remove him, till Mr. Selden aſſured him, on his Credit, that it was a legal Way; and if they thought fit, they might remove him back again; for the King did not intend to do any Thing contrary to the Rules of that Court: And Writs were ordered the ſame Michaelmas Term, to ſend the four Priſoners back again to the Marſhalſea.

1629. 5 Car. I.

Some of the Priſoners proſecuted for an Eſcape.

On the 23d of January, the Attorney-General exhibited two ſeveral Informations againſt the ſaid William Stroud, and Sir Miles Hobart, for Eſcapes from the Priſon of the Gate-Houſe. Their Caſe was as follows: When they were ſent in the Manner above related, from the Marſhalſea to the Gate-Houſe at Weſtminſter, the Keeper received them into a Houſe, lately built and adjoining to the Priſon of the Gate-Houſe, but no Part thereof; and the ſame Night gave Stroud leave to go to his Chamber in Gray's-Inn, and reſide there. Sir Miles Hobart alſo, being ſick, was allowed to reſide at his Lodgings in Fleet-Street, with his Keeper. And afterwards, the Plague increaſing in London, they were permitted to retire, with their reſpective Keepers, to their Seats, in the Country, for ſix Weeks; and then in Michaelmas Term following, they returned to the Keeper's Houſe, adjoining to the Gate-Houſe Priſon: But in all the Time they were in the Cuſtody of the Keeper of the Gate-Houſe, it could not be proved, they were in any Part of the old Priſon, unleſs when they once withdrew thither to a Cloſe-Stool: And being brought to their Trials, for this Eſcape, they were both acquitted: It being alledged, that they could not be convicted of an Eſcape, becauſe they were not confined in the Priſon: But the Judges, it ſeems, held, that their voluntary retiring to the Cloſe-Stool, made them Priſoners. It was reſolved alſo, that if a Priſoner depart from the Priſon, with his Keeper's Licence, it is, however, an Offence in the Priſoner (and puniſhable), as well as in the Keeper: And this Difference was made, between Breach of Priſon, and an Eſcape, that the firſt was againſt the Keeper's Will, and the other with his Conſent; to which the whole Court agreed.

And acquitted.

Some Points reſolved by the Judges.

The Information.

AN Information was exhibited againſt them, by Sir Robert Heath Attorney-General, reciting, that a Parliament was ſummoned to be held at Weſtminſter, 17 March, 3 Car. and that Sir John Elliot was duely elected, and returned Knight, for the County of Cornwal; and the other two, Burgeſſes of Parliament, for other Places; and Sir John Finch choſen Speaker: That Sir John Elliot, machinans & intendens, omnibus viis & modis ſeminare & excitare Diſcord, evil Will, Murmurings, and Seditions, as well verſus Regem, magnates, proceres, & juſticiarios, & reliquos ſubditos Regis, & totaliter deprivare & avertere regimen & gubernationem Regni Angliæ, tam in Domino Rege, quam in conſiliariis & miniſtris ſuis cujuſcunq; generis, & introducere tumultum & confuſionem in all Eſtates and Parts, & ad intentionem, that all the King's Subjects ſhould withdraw their Affections from the King. The 23d Feb. Anno 4*to Car.* in the Parliament, and Hearing of the Commons, falſo malitioſe & ſeditioſe, uſed theſe Words: THE KING'S PRIVY-COUNCIL, HIS JUDGES, AND HIS COUNSEL LEARNED, HAVE CONSPIRED TOGETHER, TO TRAMPLE UNDER THEIR FEET, THE LIBERTIES OF THE SUBJECTS OF THIS REALM, AND THE PRIVILEGES OF THIS HOUSE: And afterwards, upon the 2d of March, Anno 4*to.* aforeſaid, the King appointed the Parliament to be adjourned, until the 10th of March next following, and ſo ſignified his Pleaſure to the Houſe of Commons: And that the three Defendants, the ſaid ſecond Day of March, 4*to Car. malitioſe* agreed, and amongſt themſelves conſpired, to diſturb and diſtract the Commons, that they ſhould not adjourn themſelves, according to the King's Pleaſure, before ſignified: And that the ſaid Sir John Elliot, according to the Agreement and Conſpiracy aforeſaid, had maliciouſly in propoſitum & intentionem predict' in the Houſe of Commons aforeſaid, ſpoken theſe falſe, malicious, pernicious, and ſeditious Words precedent, &c. And the ſaid Denzil Holles, according to the Agreement and Conſpiracy aforeſaid, between him, and the other Defendants, then and there, falſo malicioſe & ſeditioſe uttered hæc falſa, malitioſa, & ſcandaloſa verba precedentia, &c. And that the ſaid Denzil Holles, and Benjamin Valentine, ſecundum agreamentum & conſpirationem predict' & ad intentionem & propoſitum predict' uttered the ſaid Words upon the ſaid ſecond Day of March, after the ſignifying the King's Pleaſure, to adjourn: And the ſaid Sir John Finch the Speaker, endeavouring to get out of the Chair, according to the King's Command, they, vi & armis & manu forti & illicito, aſſaulted, evil entreated, and forcibly detained him in the Chair: And afterwards, he being out of the Chair, they aſſaulted him in the Houſe, and evil entreated him, & vicenter manu forti & illicito, drew him to the Chair, and thruſt him into it: Whereupon there was a great Tumult and Commotion in the Houſe, to the great Terror of the Commons there aſſembled, againſt their Allegiance, in maximum contemptum, and to the Diſheriſon of the King, his Crown, and Dignity, &c. For which, &c.

Plea to the Juriſdiction.

To this Information the Defendants appearing, pleaded to the Juriſdiction of the Court: That the Court ought not to have Cognizance thereof, becauſe it was for Offences done in Parliament, and ought to be there examined and puniſhed, and not elſewhere. To which Plea the Attorney-General demurred, and the Defendants joined in Demurrer; and the next Term Mr. Maſon, of Counſel for the Defendants, endeavoured to ſupport their Plea, obſerving, that they were charged, 1. With ſeditious Speeches. 2. Contempts againſt the King, in reſiſting the Adjournment; and, 3. With a Conſpiracy to keep the Speaker in the Chair.

Demurrer thereupon.

Arguments of the Defendants Counſel, in Support of their Plea

That the Speeches contained Matter of Accuſation againſt ſome great Peers, of which the King could not take Notice. The Parliament was the King's Grand Council; and Councils ought to be ſecret and cloſe; none ought to have Acceſs to the Councils of Parliament; nor ought any of the Members to diſcloſe them, without the Conſent of the Houſe: The King ought to give no Credit to any private Reports of their Proceedings: That the Liberty of accuſing Gentlemen, had always been held parliamentary: And theſe Liberties and Privileges of Parliament, were to be diſcuſſed there, and not in other Courts, or by the Common, or Civil Law.

2. As to the Contempt of the King's Command, for adjourning the Parliament, he ſaid, it was a Queſtion, Whether the King could adjourn the Parliament, eſpecially by a verbal Meſſage? though he might prorogue it. The Judges, indeed, had reſolved, the King might adjourn the Houſe by Commiſſion, 27 Eliz. But it was not reſolved, he might do it by a verbal Command, ſignified by another. He admitted, the King might adjourn the Houſe in Perſon, or under the Great Seal, but not by a verbal Meſſage: None was bound to give Credit to ſuch a Meſſage: And where there was no legal Command, there could be no Contempt for Diſobedience. Beſides, as the Information was, there could be no Contempt; for the Information ſaid, that the King had Power to adjourn Parliaments; but here he commanded, they ſhould adjourn themſelves: And this was not in Purſuance of the Power he was ſuppoſed to have; the Adjournment of the Houſe was to be their own voluntary Act, which the King could not compel.

3. As

1629. 5 Car. I.

3. As to the Conſpiracy, to lay violent Hands on the Speaker, and keeping him in the Chair; the Houſe were privileged to detain him in the Chair; and other Speakers had been ſo ſerved: That the King could not prefer an Information of Treſpaſs; he ought to have been informed by a Jury, viz. by Indictment, or Preſentment: Nor could this be a Contempt, becauſe it appeared not, that the Houſe was adjourned; and, if ſo, the Speaker ought to remain in the Chair; for without him the Houſe cannot be adjourned: That the preſent Caſe was of great Importance, and without Precedent, and therefore was not determinable any where, but in Parliament. By the ſame Reaſon theſe Members were queſtioned, all the Members of the Commons might be queſtioned; and the Debates in Parliament muſt be ſubjected to the Determination of a petty Jury, if theſe Proceedings ſhould be allowed: No Man would dare to accuſe any great Offender, for the future, if Freedom of Speech in Parliament was to be puniſhed by Fines and Impriſonment: Gentlemen would neglect the publick Good, rather than hazard their own Ruin.

Further Arguments in Support of the Plea.

Mr. Calthorpe, alſo of Counſel for the Defendants, argued, that an Aſſault, or Conſpiracy, of the Members, could not be queſtioned out of Parliament; though he admitted, that Capital Offences, committed in Parliament, might.

That a Conſpiracy and Aſſault in Parliament, could not be examined in the King's-Bench, becauſe theſe Facts might be juſtifiable there. The bringing the Speaker to the Chair, might be by the Votes of the Commons, for ought appeared; and to determine theſe Matters here, was to make a ſuperior Court ſubject to an inferior Court. There never was any Precedent, that the King's-Bench had puniſhed Offences of this Nature, committed in Parliament, where a Plea was put in to the Juriſdiction of the Court, as in this Caſe; and where there was no Precedent, Non-Uſage was a good Expoſition of the Law: If that Court had Juriſdiction, there might be contradictory Judgments; the Parliament might determine one Way, and the King's-Bench another. He inſiſted alſo, as Mr. Maſon had done, that this Information ought to have been founded on an Indictment, or other Matter of Record, and not upon a bare Advertiſement, or Intelligenee, given to the King.

The Attorney-General's Arguments, on the other Side.

To theſe Arguments of the Defendants Counſel, the Attorney-General anſwered, that Informations of this kind, for Offences that were not Capital, were frequently brought in that Court: That it was true, Freedom of Speech ought to be permitted in Parliament; but not ſeditious Speeches, tending to the Subverſion of the Government: That the Biſhop of Carliſle, 1 Hen. IV. was arraigned in the Court of King's-Bench, for ſuggeſting in Parliament, that the King had no Right to the Crown; to which he did not plead Privilege of Parliament, but that he was Epiſcopus unctus, &c. That though the Court of King's-Bench was ſaid to be an inferior Court, it did, in many Caſes, judge of the Privileges of Parliament, as well as of Acts of Parliament: And it was reſolved, in the Time of Queen Elizabeth, by the Judges, that Offences done in Parliament, might be puniſhed there, out of Parliament.

1629. 5 Car. I.

The Defendants Plea to the Juriſdiction, over-ruled.

Then the Judges delivered their Opinions, that the Court of King's-Bench, as this Caſe was, had Juriſdiction, notwithſtanding theſe Offences were committed in Parliament; and that the impriſoned Members ought to anſwer over.

The Lord Chief Juſtice Hyde ſaid, it was true, an inferior Court could not meddle with the Judgments of a ſuperior Court; but if a particular Member of a ſuperior Court offended, he might be puniſhed in an inferior Court: As if a Judge committed a Capital Offence in that Court, he might be arraigned for it in a Court of Oyer and Terminer, at the Old-Bailey, which was an inferior Court to the King's-Bench.

Mr. Juſtice Whitlock ſaid, that all the Judges of England had reſolved this Point: And though it had been objected, that the Offence could not be examined here, unleſs it was Capital, he held, this Court had Cognizance of it, if it was Criminal, as the ſowing Sedition, to the Deſtruction of the Commonwealth was: That the Diſpute was not between the Judges of that Court, and the Parliament, or between the King and the Parliament; but between ſome private Members of the Houſe of Commons, and the King himſelf. Here the King himſelf queſtioned them, for theſe Offences, as well he might. Indeed, that which was done by the Conſent of the whole Houſe, could not be queſtioned elſewhere: But, if private Members would move, and ſtir up, Sedition in the Houſe, there was no ſuch Sanctity within theſe Walls, that they could not be queſtioned for it in other Courts. If a Burgeſs of Parliament becomes mutinous, he ſhall not plead the Privilege of Parliament, in Juſtification of his Diſloyalty. The Behaviour of Parliament-Men ought to be Parliamentary: No outragious Speeches againſt Great Miniſters of State, were ever ſuffered to go unpuniſhed: That it was univerſally agreed, Privilege of Parliament did not extend to Treaſon, Felony, or Breach of the Peace: And the laſt was the preſent Caſe, and therefore the Court of King's-Bench, might well take Cognizance of it.

Croke alſo held, that all Offences againſt the Crown were puniſhable in this Court: The Parliament, indeed, was a higher Court; but every Member was not a Court. If he committed an Offence, he might be queſtioned here: This being the Opinion of the whole Court, it was ruled, the Defendants ſhould plead over: But they refuſing to put in any other Plea, than to the Juriſdiction, Judgment was pronounced againſt them, by Mr. Juſtice Jones, the laſt Day of the Term, viz. that Sir John Elliot ſhould be committed to the Tower, and pay a Fine of 2000 l. and, upon his Enlargement, find Sureties for his good Behaviour: That Holles ſhould pay a Fine of 1000 Marks, be impriſoned, and find Sureties, in like Manner: And that Valentine ſhould pay a Fine of 500 l. be impriſoned, and find Sureties likewiſe.

Judgment by Nihil dicit. againſt the Defendants.

The Parliament of 1640. vote Sir John Finch Speaker, guilty of Breach of Privilege.

In the next Parliament, which met the 13th of April, 1640. it was referred to a Committee of the Commons, to conſider of the Breach of their Privileges, by Sir John Finch Speaker of the Commons, 5 Car. by refuſing to put the Queſtion

Queſtion on the Command of the Houſe to do it: And on the 20th of April, it was reported from the Committee, that Sir John Finch did not ſay, He would not put the Queſtion; but that, he durſt not put it; and, that he left the Chair, not to diſobey the Houſe, but to obey his Majeſty: Whereupon the Houſe reſolved, That it was a Breach of Privilege, for the Speaker not to obey the Commands of the Houſe; and that it appeared, the Speaker did adjourn the Houſe by the Command of the King, without Conſent of the Houſe, which was alſo a Breach of Privilege.

The next Parliament, of 1640. enquire into the Caſe of the impriſoned Members, 3 & 5 Car.

They were alſo about to enquire into the Impriſonment of Sir John Elliot, Mr. Holles, Mr. Selden, and the reſt of the Members of the Houſe of Commons, in the 3d and 5th of Car. but being ſuddenly diſſolved, no Progreſs was made in that Enquiry: Another Parliament meeting on the 3d of November 1640. and a Committee being appointed, to conſider of the Caſes of the impriſoned Members, Mr. Recorder Glyn reported from the Committee the Sufferings they had undergone in Defence of the Liberties of the Subject: Whereupon the Houſe, on July 6. reſolved, 1. That the iſſuing Warrants by the Privy-Council, compelling Mr. Holles, and the reſt of the Members of that Parliament, to appear before them, during the Continuance of Parliament, was a Breach of Privilege.

The ſummoning Members before the Council, voted a Breach of Privilege. Further Votes concerning them.

2. That the committing them was a Breach of Privilege.

3. As was alſo the Searching and Sealing the Chambers, Studies, and Papers, of Mr. Holles, Mr. Selden, and Sir John Elliot, and iſſuing Warrants for that Purpoſe, during the Parliament.

4. That the exhibiting an Information in the Star-Chamber, againſt Mr. Holles, and the reſt, for Matters done in Parliament, was a Breach of Privilege.

5. That Sir Robert Heath, Sir Humphrey Davenport, Sir Heneage Finch, Mr. Hudſon, and Sir Robert Berkley, who ſubſcribed their Names to the Information, were guilty of Breach of the Privilege.

9. That Sir James Whitlocke, then one of the Juſtices of the King's-Bench, was not guilty of this Delay.

10. Reſolved on the 8th of July, That Sir George Croke Knight, then one of the Judges of the King's Bench, was not guilty of this Delay.

11. That the Continuance of Mr. Holles, and the reſt of the Members, in Priſon, 3 Car. by the then Judges of the King's-Bench, for not putting in Sureties for their good Behaviour, was without juſt or legal Cauſe.

1629. 5 Car I.

12. That the exhibiting the Information againſt Mr. Holles, Sir John Elliot, and Mr. Valentine, in the King's Bench, for Matters done in Parliament, was a Breach of Privilege.

13. That the over-ruling of the Plea, pleaded by Mr. Holles, Sir John Elliot, and Mr. Valentine (upon the Information) to the Juriſdiction of the Court, was againſt the Law, and Priviledge of Parliament.

14. As was the Judgment given by Nihil dicit, the Fines impoſed, and their ſeveral Impriſonments thereupon.

15. That the proſecuting them in the Star-Chamber, and the King's Bench, was a Grievance.

Satisfaction voted to the ſuffering Members to be made them by the Lords of the Council, and Judges.

16. That Mr. Holles, Mr. Stroud, Mr. Valentine, and Mr. Long, and the Heirs and Executors of Sir John Elliot, Sir Miles Hobart, and Sir Peter Hayman, reſpectively, ought to have Reparation for their reſpective Damages and Sufferings, againſt the Lords and others of the Council, by whoſe Warrant they were apprehended and committed, and againſt the Counſel, that put their Hands to the Information in the Star-Chamber, and againſt the Judges of the King's-Bench.

Whitaker ſent to the Tower, for ſearching their Chambers.

17. That Mr. Laurence Whitaker, being a Member of the Parliament 3 Car. and entring the Chamber of Sir John Elliot, then likewiſe a Member of Parliament, ſearching his Trunks and Papers, and ſealing them, was guilty of a Breach of Privilege, being done before the Diſſolution of the Parliament.

18. Reſolved, That the ſaid Mr. Whitaker be forthwith ſent to the Tower; there to remain a Priſoner, during the Pleaſure of the Houſe.

Then Mr. Whitaker was called down to hear his Sentence; and, kneeling at the Bar, did not deny his ſearching and ſealing up the Chamber, Trunk, and Study, of Sir John Elliot, between the 2d and 10th of March, 3 Car. during which Time the Parliament was adjourned: But endeavoured to extenuate his Offence, by the Confuſion of the Times, and the length of Time ſince that Crime was committed, being thirteen Years; and the Command that was laid on him by the King, and twenty-three of the Privy-Council.

Further Report, That the Warrants, for ſummoning the Members, and ſealing up their Papers, were read.

Mr. Recorder Glyn afterwards made this further Report to the Houſe of Commons, viz.

That the Warrant, which ſo iſſued, and was ſubſcribed by twelve Privy-Councillors, to ſummon the nine Members of the Commons, 3 Car. to appear before them during the Parliament, viz. Mr. William Stroud, Mr. Benjamin Valentine, Mr. Denzil Holles, Sir John Elliot, Mr. John Selden, Sir Miles Hobart, Sir Peter Hayman, Mr. Walter Long, and William Coriton, dated the 3d Mar. 4 Car. and the Names of the twelve Privy-Councillors that ſigned this Warrant, were read, (the Parliament being adjourned the 2d of March to the 10th, and then diſſolved.)

The Warrants under the Hands of ſixteen Privy-Councillors, for committing of Mr. Denzil Holles, Sir John Elliot, Mr. John Selden, Mr. Benjamin Valentine, and William Coriton, cloſe Priſoners to the Tower, dated 4 Mar. 4 Car. during the Parliament, were read, with the Names of the Privy-Councillors that ſubſcribed them. The Warrants under the Hands of twenty-two

Reſolutions of the Commons, ann. 1667. concerning the ſaid impriſoned Members, and Freedom of Speech.

Mr. Vaughan made a Report from a Committee of the Houſe of Commons, appointed to conſider of the Freedom of Speech: To which the Houſe agreed, viz. That the Act made 4 Hen. VIII. entitled, An Act concerning Richard Strode, was a general Law, and extended to indemnify the Members of both Houſes of Parliament, for and touching any Bills, Speaking, Reaſoning, or Declaring, any Matter or Matters in and concerning the Parliament, to be communed and treated of; and was a declaratory Law of the ancient and neceſſary Rights and Privileges of Parliament. And it was further reſolved, on the 23d of November, That the Judgment given 5 Car. againſt Sir John Elliot, Denzil Holles, and Benjamin Valentine, in the King's-Bench, was an illegal Judgment, and againſt the Freedom and Privilege of Parliament. 1629. 5 Car. I.

On the 11th of December, 1667. the Commons, at a Conference with the Lords, communicated theſe Reſolutions to their Lordſhips, deſiring their Concurrence; and acquainted them with their Reaſons for making them.

The Commons offer their Reaſons to the Lords, for theſe Reſolutions.

They ſaid, the Houſe of Commons was accidentally informed of certain Books, publiſhed under the Name of Sir George Croke's Reports; in one of which a Caſe was publiſhed, which very much concerned this great Privilege of Parliament; and which, paſſing from Hand to Hand, amongſt the Men of the Long-Robe, might come in Time to be a received Opinion as good Law; and read the Caſe itſelf to their Lordſhips out of Croke's Reports, fol. 3. (which has been recited already.)

Then the Commons obſerved, that there was ſome conſiderable Differences, between the printed Book and the Record itſelf: For the Crime alledged conſiſting partly of Words ſpoken in the Houſe, and partly of criminal Actions, pretended to be committed; the Gentlemen accuſed pleaded ſeverally, viz. ſpecially to the Words, and a ſeveral Plea apart to the Criminal Actions: But, that the Court dealt ſo craftily, that they over-ruled the whole Plea mingled together, and took it in general; ſo that, perhaps, whatſoever was criminal in the Actions might ſerve for a Juſtification of their Rule, and might make it ſeem in Time to become a Precedent, and a ruled Caſe, againſt the Liberty of Speech in Parliament; which they durſt not ſingly and bare-faced have done.

That the Houſe of Commons did enquire, what ancient Laws fortified this the greateſt Privilege of both Houſes, and found in the 4th of Hen. VIII. an Act concerning one Richard Strode, who was a Member of Parliament, and fined at the Stannary Courts, in the Weſt, for condeſcending and agreeing, with other Members of the Houſe, to paſs certain Acts to the Prejudice of the Stannaries: This Act was made occaſionally for him; but did reach to every Member of Parliament that then was, or ſhould be: The Words being as follow:

The Tenor of Strode's Act, relating to Liberty of Speech.

And over that, it be enacted by the ſame Authority, That all Suits, Accuſements, Condemnations, Executions, Fines, Amercements, Puniſhments, Corrections, Grievances, Charges, and Impoſitions, put or had, or hereafter to be put or had, unto or upon the ſaid Richard, and to every other Perſon or Perſons afore-ſpecified, that now be of this preſent Parliament, or that of any Parliament hereafter ſhall be, for any Bill, Speaking, Reaſoning, or Declaring, any Matter or Matters concerning the Parliament to be commenced and treated of, be utterly void, and of none effect: And over that, be it enacted, by the ſaid Authority, That if the ſaid Richard Strode, or any of the ſaid other Perſon or Perſons, hereafter be vexed, troubled, or otherwiſe charged, for any Cauſes as is aforeſaid, that then, he or they, and every of them, ſo vexed or troubled, of or for the ſame, to have Action upon the Caſe againſt every ſuch Perſon or Perſons, ſo vexing or troubling any, contrary to this Ordinance and Pro-

1629. 5 Car. I.

Proviſion: In the which Action, the Party grieved ſhall recover treble Damages, and Coſts; and that no Protection, Eſſoine, or Wager of Law, in the ſaid Action, in any wiſe be admitted or received.

No Privilege for Criminal Actions in the Houſe, though there is for Words.

The Commons ſaid, It was very poſſible the Plea of thoſe worthy Perſons Denzil Holles, Sir John Elliot, and the reſt, was not ſufficient to the Juriſdiction of the Court, if they took in their Criminal Actions all together: But, as to the Words ſpoken in Parliament, the Court could have no Juriſdiction, while this Act of 4 Hen. VIII. was in force; which extended to all Members that then were, or ever ſhould be, as well as to Strode, and was a publick general Law, though made upon a private and a particular Occaſion.

They recommended alſo, to their Lordſhip's Conſideration, the Time when theſe Words in Sir George Croke's Reports were ſpoken, viz. 2 March, 4 Car. being the Parliament which began the Year after the Judgment, given in the King's-Bench about the Habeas Corpus, was newly reverſed, which concerned the Freedom of their Perſons: Thus their Liberty of Speech was invaded, as the Liberty of their Perſons had been before: And, not long after, the ſame Judges (with ſome others) joined with them in the Caſe of Ship-Money, invaded the Property of their Goods and Eſtates; ſo that their Lordſhips found every Part of thoſe Words, for which thoſe worthy Perſons were accuſed, juſtified.

If any Man ſhould ſpeak againſt any of the Great Officers; as the Chancellor, or Treaſurer, or any of the reſt recited in thoſe Acts (De Scandalis Magnat.) by accuſing them of Corruption, ill Counſel, or the like, he might poſſibly juſtify himſelf, by proving it: But in this Caſe it was impoſſible for him to do it, becauſe thoſe Judgments had preceded and concluded him.

The Commons obſerved further, That the Words in this Caſe are charged to be done ea intentione, which ought not to be; becauſe, by Law, whatever is not in itſelf lawful, cannot have an unlawful Intent annexed to it. Things unlawful might be made higher Crimes by the Illneſs of the Intent: For inſtance, taking away a Horſe is a Treſpaſs only; but the intending to ſteal him, makes it Felony: Borrowing a Horſe, though intending to ſteal him, was not Felony; becauſe borrowing is lawful: And there would be no Uſe of Freedom of Speech, if the depraved Intention might be annexed to this, or to any the moſt juſtifiable Action. If a Man drank Water, he might, at this Rate, be accuſed of a depraved Intention of ſubverting the King's Government, by deſtroying his Revenues of Exciſe and Cuſtoms.

Whatever is enacted, is lawful; but nothing can be enacted, till it be firſt moved or propounded by ſome Body: And if the Act wrongs no Body, neither can the propounding of it; and to that End the Members muſt be as free as the Houſes: There muſt be Debates, before any thing can be enacted.

In the Reign of Hen. VIII. when ſo many Perſons, viz. Abbots and Priors, were removed out of the Lords Houſe, and all religious Houſes and Lands taken away; an Information againſt any Members of Parliament, for propoſing ſo great an Alteration in Church and State, would have been very ſtrange. 1629. 5 Car. I.

Religion was further altered, they obſerved, in the Reign of Edw. VI. In Queen Mary's Reign, the Nation returned to Popery; and, in Queen Elizabeth, the Proteſtant Religion was reſtored: But, ſhould Informations have been allowed in the King's-Bench, in theſe Times, againſt Members, for propounding or debating theſe Matters, ſuch Changes could have never been effected.

Theſe, the Commons ſaid, were the Reaſons and Inducements they had to paſs the following Votes, to which they deſired their Lordſhips Concurrence, viz.

Reſolutions of the Commons, in which the Lords concurred.

Reſolved, &c. That the Act of Parliament of 4 Hen. VIII. commonly entitled, An Act concerning Richard Strode, is a general Law, extending to indemnify all and every the Members of both Houſes of Parliament, in all Parliaments, for and touching any Bills, Speaking, Reaſoning, or Declaring, of any Matter, or Matters, in and concerning the Parliament to be communed and treated of; and is a declaratory Law of the ancient and neceſſary Rights and Privileges of Parliament.

Reſolved, &c. That the Judgment given 5 Car. againſt Sir John Elliot, Denzil Holles, and Benjamin Valentine, Eſquires, in the King's-Bench, was an illegal Judgment, and againſt the Freedom and Privilege of Parliament.

In both which Votes, the Lords agreed with the Commons.

Writ of Error ordered to be brought by Lord Holles.

Their Lordſhips alſo taking into Conſideration the ſaid Judgment given in the Court of King's-Bench, in Michaelmas Term, 5 Car. I. againſt Sir John Elliot Knight, Denzil Holles, and Benjamin Valentine, Eſquires: Ordered, That the ſaid Denzil Holles (now Lord Holles, Baron of Ifeild) do cauſe the Roll of the Court of King's-Bench, wherein the ſaid Judgment is recorded, to be brought before the Lords by a Writ of Error, to the End, ſuch further Judgment might be given upon the ſaid Caſe, as the Houſe ſhould think fit. And the Roll being brought in accordingly, a Poſtea was added to the Record, wherein it is recited, that the Attorney-General came into Court, and acknowledged, that the aforeſaid Denzil Holles had paid his Fine; and, that the Attorney afterward brought into Court the King's Letters Patents, under his Privy-Seal, whereby his Majeſty remitted to the ſaid Benjamin Valentine his Fine, and all the reſt of the Judgment; and prayed, that the ſame might be enrolled and allowed: And Judgment was given on the Attorney's Prayer, that the ſaid Benjamin Valentine ſhould be diſcharged: And that the ſaid Denzil Holles afterwards brought a Writ of Error upon the ſaid Judgment, returnable in Parliament; and having aſſigned for Error, that the Words mentioned in the Information were ſpoken in Parliament, and were not, therefore, cognizable in any other Court: And that the ſaid Denzil Holles was alſo charged in the ſaid Information, with an Aſſault upon the ſaid Sir John Finch, the Speaker, to which the ſaid Denzil Holles had put in two ſeveral Pleas, and yet the Court had given but one Judgment on the Whole; whereas there ought to have been two two ſeveral Judgments, and ſeveral Fines impoſed.

That the Lords having heard Counſel on the 15th of April, 1668. as well to argue the Errors aſſigned by the Lord Holles, Baron of Ifeild, upon the Writ of Error brought againſt the ſaid Judgment given in the Court of King's-Bench 5 Car. I. againſt the ſaid Lord Holles, by the Name of Denzil Holles Eſq; and others; as alſo to maintain and defend the ſaid Judgment on his Majeſty's Behalf: Upon due Conſideration had of what had been offered on both Parts thereupon, The Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament aſſembled, do order, and adjudge, that the ſaid Judgment, given in the Court of King's-Bench, 5 Car. The Judgment againſt Lord Holles, &c. reverſed by the Lords.

And the following Form was thereupon affixed to the Tranſcript of the Record, viz.

Remarks on the Caſe of Darnel, &c. on their bringing their Writs of Habeas Corpus, to be bailed.

Among the Gentlemen that were committed, by the King and the Privy-Council, 3 Car. I. for not lending his Majeſty Money, on Privy-Seals for the Repayment thereof within the Space of 18 Months, five of them, viz. Sir Thomas Darnel, Sir John Heveningham, Sir Walter Earl, Sir Edmund Hampden, and Sir John Corbet, brought their reſpective Writs of Habeas Corpus, returnable in the Court of King's-Bench; and, upon their appearing in that Court, their Counſel moved, that they might be admitted to Bail.

Sir Thomas Darnel behaved himſelf with a great deal of good Manners and Temper, on this Occaſion; and ſeems to have been bailed, or diſcharged, by his Majeſty's Conſent upon the firſt Motion; for we hear nothing of him afterwards: But the other four, viz. Sir John Heveningham, Sir Walter Earl, Sir Edmund Hampden, and Sir John Corbet, inſiſted ſtrenuouſly, by their Counſel, that they ought, of Right, to be admitted to Bail by the Court of King's-Bench; and refuſed to make any Submiſſion, or Application to his Majeſty, for their Liberty; though it was intimated to them, both publickly and privately, that upon making ſuch Application, they might be diſcharged.

1627. 3 Car. I.

The Counſel for the Priſoners inſiſted, That the Returns of the reſpective Writs of Habeas Corpus were inſufficient, both in Form and Subſtance: As to the Form, they ſaid, the Return was uncertain and contradictory: But the Court over-ruled this Objection, and declared it to be certain, and not contradictory; neither did the Counſel for the Priſoners ſeem to relie much upon their Exceptions, as to the Form: The grand Objection was to the Subſtance, That they were committed by his Majeſty's ſpecial Command, without any Cauſe expreſſed in the Warrant; and there being no Cauſe expreſſed, they urged, that they ought to be admitted to Bail of courſe, it was a Right which the Judges of the King's-Bench could not refuſe them, on their being brought into Court by their reſpective Writs of Habeas Corpus.

But their Counſel, in arguing this Caſe, carried the Matter much farther: They did not only inſiſt, that their Clients ought to be admitted to Bail; but that neither the King, or the Privy-Council, had Power to commit any Man to Priſon; or, if they had, they could not do it without expreſſing the Cauſe in the Warrant: Nay, they urged, that no Man could be impriſoned, without a Preſentment, or Indictment, by any Authority whatever, according to Magna Charta, and ſix ſubſequent Statutes, made for the Explanation and Confirmation of that Statute.

To which the King's Counſel anſwered, That this could not be underſtood of the firſt Apprehenſion, or Commitment; becauſe every Court of Juſtice, every Juſtice of Peace, or Petty Conſtable, might arreſt and commit; and it was every Day's Practice to do it, without Preſentment, or Indictment: That Magna Charta, indeed, ſaid, that no Man ſhould be impriſoned, unleſs by Preſentment, or Indictment: But then it was added, aut per legem terræ, or by the Law of the Land. So that, if Commitments by the King, by the Privy-Council, or by a Juſtice of Peace, &c. were lawful Commitments before; the Statute of Magna Charta, and thoſe other Statutes made in Confirmation of it, had not altered the Law in this Reſpect; and that Magna Charta could only intend, that no Man ſhould be adjudged, or condemned, to be impriſoned, but by Preſentment, Indictment, or other legal Proceſs; and this ſeems to have been agreed alſo, at length, by the Priſoners Counſel.

The only Queſtion that continued to be diſputed, both at the King's-Bench Bar, and in Parliament afterwards, was, whether a Perſon committed by the King's ſpecial Command, or by the Command of the Privy-Council, without Cauſe expreſſed in the Warrant, ought, of Right, to be bailed by the Court of King's-Bench, on his being brought thither by an Habeas Corpus.

Many Precedents were produced by the Priſoners Counſel, to ſhew, that where Perſons had been committed, by the King, or Council, and no Cauſe ſhewn, they had been bailed by the Court of King's Bench.

On the other Hand, the King's Counſel inſiſted, that thoſe very Precedents, and many more, evidently ſhewed, that where Perſons were committed by the King, or Council, without Cauſe ſhewn, ſhewn, they were never bailed, until the King's Pleaſure was known.

1627-8. 3 & 4 Car. I.

The Lord Chief Juſtice, who delivered the Opinion of the whole Court, declared, that they, having viewed and conſidered all the Precedents, could not find that one Perſon, no, not One, committed by the King, without Cauſe expreſſed, that had been admitted to Bail without the King's Direction; and, thereupon, the four Gentlemen were remanded to Priſon, where they remained till the 29th of January following; when his Majeſty ordered them to be ſet at Liberty.

A Parliament being ſummoned to meet about ſix Weeks afterwards, viz. the 17th of March, $162\frac{7}{8}$, and the Gentlemen who had been impriſoned for the Non-payment of the Loan, elected Members of the Houſe of Commons: The Houſe was no ſooner met, but, amongſt the reſt of their Grievances, they fell upon this, of the Impriſonment of the four Gentlemen, for Non-payment of the Loan, and the Court of King's-Bench's refuſing to bail them, on bringing their reſpective Writs of Habeas Corpus.

If this was Law, ſome ſaid, there was an End of all their Liberties and Properties at once. If the King could demand fifteen or twenty Pounds of a Gentleman, by the ſame Rule he might require his whole Eſtate; and by the ſame Law, he impriſoned theſe Gentlemen for not lending their Money, he might impriſon all the Gentlemen in the Kingdom, and doom them to perpetual Impriſonment, if none of the Courts of Juſtice could admit them to Bail: That it was in vain for the King to aſk Supplies of his Parliament; for, if this was Law, they had nothing left to give: The King was already, in effect, the Grand, and, indeed, only Proprietor of all the Eſtates of the Kingdom, and his Subjects in a worſe Condition than Bondmen, or Villains of old; for, even thoſe, their Lords could not doom to perpetual Impriſonment without Cauſe. That a Priſoner thus committed, without a Cauſe expreſſed, was in a worſe Condition than one committed for Treaſon, or Felony; for ſuch Criminals muſt either be brought to Trial, or bailed: But theſe Gentlemen had no Proſpect of being ever delivered by Law; and, if the King had not been ſo gracious to conſent to their Enlargement, muſt have been Priſoners for Life.

On the other hand, it was ſaid, That a Truſt muſt be repoſed in the King, in whom the executive Power was lodged: That it was impoſſible for any written Laws to provide againſt all Exigencies of State: That there were many other Prerogatives the King had, that were as inconvenient as this of commiting Men without ſhewing Cauſe. The King might embaſe the Coin: The King might lay an Embargo on all Merchant Ships; and, in the Time of Peſtilence, reſtrain Men of their legal Liberties: But it was not to be preſumed his Majeſty would do any of theſe Things, unleſs there was a Neceſſity for them. If the King, or Council, could not commit a Man without expreſſing their Reaſons for it, all Secrets of State muſt be diſcloſed; Enemies muſt be made Maſters of our Councils; and Accomplices in Treaſon, or Rebellion, might be furniſhed with Opportunities of ruining the Government, or, at leaſt, of eſcaping Puniſhment: That it was the conſtant Practice, for the King and Council to commit, without ſhewing Cauſe, when the Diſcovery of it might be of ill Conſequence to the State; and they were the only proper Judges of State-Affairs; and that, upon Petition to his Majeſty, it was uſual to diſcharge Priſoners, after the Dange was over; but, that Judges of the King's-Bench never bailed, or diſcharged, any Man in theſe Caſes, without firſt conſulting the King, and receiving his Orders: And there was no Reaſon his Majeſty ſhould not be entruſted with this Power, or Prerogative, as his Predeceſſors had been: And, indeed, the Gentlemen on the other Side did acknowledge, that it was uſual for the Judges of the King's-Bench to acquaint the King, before they bailed ſuch Priſoners as were committed by the King, without Cauſe expreſſed, and receive his Majeſty's Conſent; but they would have this to be Matter of Compliment only; and, that the Court ought of Right to bail or diſcharge ſuch Priſoners, whether the King conſented to it, or not; otherwiſe the Liberties and Properties of all the People of the Kingdom would be at his Majeſty's Diſpoſal; and they were no better than Vaſſals, or Tenants at Will to the Crown.

1627-8. 3 & 4 Car. I.

Thus we ſee Matters were carried to very great Extremes, when by the Wiſdom of ſome of the Members of both Houſes (who well underſtood, that the true Intereſt of the Nation did not conſiſt, either in depreſſing the Crown, or giving up the Liberties and Properties of the Subject) theſe Differences were in a manner accommodated. The Parliament gave the King five Subſidies, to ſupply the Exigencies of the State: And his Majeſty, on the other hand, granted their Petition of Right, wherein he confirmed all the Statutes that prohibited raiſing Money by Loans, or Benevolences, and relinquiſhed his Right of impriſoning the Subject without Cauſe ſhewn.

The Hiſtory of the Parliament of 4 & 5 Car. I. 1627, 1628.

But it appeared, that there was a Set of Men in the Houſe that were not to be ſatisfied; Men, who fomented theſe Diviſions between the King and his People on ſeveral Accounts. There were thoſe, who were determined never to let fall the Cry of Jealouſies and Fears, till the Duke of Buckingham, the King's Prime Miniſter, was deſtroyed: There were others, Puritans and Preſbyterians in their Hearts, who could never reſt, till they ſaw the eſtabliſhed Church ſubverted, and their own Superſtition triumphant; which they apprehended was not to be done, but by the Deſtruction of the Civil Government: And there were alſo great Numbers of pure Commonwealthſmen, who were ready to join with the laſt to pull down the Monarchy, in order to ſet up Ariſtocracy, in which they and their Friends propoſed to have the greateſt Share of the Adminiſtration.

All theſe joined in the common Cry of Popery and Tyranny; and in fomenting Jealouſies and Fears among the People; while many more were influenced by their Numbers, Aſſurance, and ſpecious Pretences, to fall in with them in diſtreſſing the Government.

The King, therefore, had no ſooner granted the Petition of Right, but the Commons drew up a Remonſtrance, repreſenting to his Majeſty, 1628. 4 Car. I. that both the Church and Commonwealth were ſtill in great Danger, the Laws not being put in Execution againſt Roman Catholicks, and the Doctrine of Arminianiſm (the Freedom of the Will) encouraged, praying, that Orthodox (Puritan or Calviniſt) Preachers might be preferred, and their Adverſaries diſcountenanced: And having repeated their former Complaints of the Adminiſtration, in raiſing Money by Way of Loan, impriſoning the Refuſers, keeping up a Standing Army, &c. (though it was in a Time of actual War) they fall again directly on the Duke of Buckingham, the Prime Miniſter; declaring, they would never be ſatisfied, while he had any Share in the Adminiſtration; for he was the Author of all their Grievances.

To which the King anſwered, He little expected ſuch a Remonſtrance, after his granting their Petition of Right.

The Commons, however, proceeded to frame another Remonſtrance againſt the King's receiving Tonnage and Poundage; which his Majeſty being acquainted with, came on a ſudden to the Houſe of Peers, the 26th of June, and declared, that by paſſing the Petition of Right, he had not granted them any new, but only confirmed their antient Rights and Liberties; and, that as for Tonnage and Poundage, it was a thing he could not want: That it was never intended to be aſked by that Petition; nor did he ever intend to part with it: After which the Parliament was prorogued to the 20th of October following.

Soon after the riſing of the Parliament, the Duke of Buckingham aſſembled a very formidable Fleet and Army, to go to the Relief of the French Proteſtants at Rochelle: But while he lay at Portſmouth, juſt ready to embark, he was aſſaſſinated on the 23d of Auguſt, by one Felton, a diſcarded Lieutenant, and a zealous Fanatick, who ſtabbed the Duke to the Heart, with a Knife, as he paſſed out of one Room into another, under a Tapeſtry Hanging. The Villain, it ſeems, had a double Inducement to commit the Fact: Firſt, to revenge himſelf on his Grace, for not giving him a Captain's Commiſſion, to which he pretended: And, ſecondly, to deliver his Friends, the Puritans, from their great Enemy, the Duke: And, accordingly, we find, the Wretch gloried in the Murder, believing he had done God and his Country good Service; and never attempted to make his Eſcape, or oppoſe thoſe who came to apprehend him. He was tried, and condemned; and being executed the 29th of November following, was afterwards hung in Chains.

In the mean Time, the People were further diſguſted at the Impriſonment of ſome Merchants, who refuſed to pay the Duties of Tonnage and Poundage: And the creating Sir Richard Weſton Lord Treaſurer, and Prime Miniſter, who was ſuppoſed to be popiſhly affected, ſtill increaſed their Fears and Jealouſies: Inſomuch that, though the Duke of Buckingham, who ſeemed to be the principal Butt and Object of the People's Fury, was now dead; when the Parliament met on the 20th of January, $162\frac{8}{9}$. the Houſe of Commons appeared as clamorous as ever, falling immediately upon the Illegality of the King's receiving Tonnage and Poundage: Whereupon the King ordered both Houſes to attend him at Whitehall; and acquainted them, that it was not his Intention to challenge Tonnage and Poundage, as his Right; but that he took it only de bene eſſe, for the neceſſary Support of the Government, till it ſhould be granted him by Parliament: And, as they had now an Opportunity of preparing a Bill for that Purpoſe, he expected they would do it, without Loſs of Time, according to the Profeſſions they had frequently made, of their Readineſs to gratify him in this Particular. 1628-9. 4 & 5 Car. I.

This gave the Faction Occaſion to clamour more than ever. Inſtead of going upon the Bill of Tonnage and Poundage therefore, as his Majeſty deſired, they exclaimed againſt the Growth of Popery and Arminianiſm, which that Incendiary Elliot cried out, were breaking in upon them, like an Inundation; averring, that ſome of the Biſhops themſelves were not Orthodox, or ſound in Religion. They proceeded to ſend one of the Sheriffs of London to the Tower, for levying the Duties of Tonnage and Poundage; called the Officers of the Cuſtoms before them, for ſeizing the Goods of Mr. Rolls, one of their Members, for refuſing to pay Cuſtom: And when the King ſent them a Meſſage, that the Officers acted by his expreſs Orders, they cried out, Adjourn, Adjourn, breaking up in a tumultuous Manner. Being aſſembled again, two or three Days after, Elliot roared out again, that he found the Lord Treaſurer Weſton was building on the Foundation laid by his Maſter the Duke: That the Miniſters were for breaking Parliaments, leſt Parliaments ſhould break them; and that all Prieſts and Papiſts were protected by the Treaſurer: And when, on the 2d of March, $162\frac{8}{9}$. 4 Car. the Speaker delivered a Meſſage from his Majeſty, commanding them to adjourn, Elliot offered a Remonſtrance againſt Tonnage and Poundage; and, the Speaker refuſing to read it, Sir Miles Hobart locked the Door of the Houſe, and took away the Key. Coriton, another zealous Member, aſſaulted and ſtruck Mr. Winterton, who was for obeying his Majeſty's Command, while Elliot read the Remonſtrance himſelf, and the Speaker was urged by Mr. Selden and others, to put the Queſtion: But he anſwered, he was expreſly commanded by his Majeſty, to riſe as ſoon as he had delivered his Meſſage, and accordingly left the Chair: But Mr. Denzil Holles, Benjamin Valentine, and others, pulled him back again, and held him in the Chair by Force: And when ſome of the Privy-Council endeavoured to releaſe the Speaker, Holles ſwore, by God's Wounds, he ſhould not ſtir, till they gave him leave to riſe; and proceeded to read the following Proteſt, viz.

" Whoever ſhall bring in Innovation in Reli" gion, or by Favour ſeek to extend, or in" troduce, Popery, or Arminianiſm, or other
" Opinions, diſagreeing from the true and or" thodox Church, ſhall be reputed a Capital
" Enemy to the Kingdom and Commonwealth.
" 2. Whoever ſhall counſel or adviſe the take-
" ing and levying the Subſidies of Tonnage
" and Poundage, not being granted by Parlia" ment, or ſhall be an Actor, or Inſtrument,
" therein,

1628-9. 4 & 5 Car. I.

" therein, ſhall be reputed an Innovator in the " Government, and a Capital Enemy to this " Kingdom and Commonwealth. 3. If any " Merchant, or Perſon, whatſoever, ſhall vo- " luntarily yield, or pay, the Subſidies of Ton- " nage and Poundage, not being granted by " Parliament, he ſhall likewiſe be reputed a " Betrayer of the Liberties of England, and " an Enemy to the ſame."

The King, being informed of theſe tumultuous Proceedings in the Houſe, ſent a Meſſenger for the Serjeant, and his Mace (becauſe, had the Mace been taken off the Table, they would have been no longer a Houſe): But the mutinous Members kept the Serjeant locked in, and would not ſuffer him to attend his Majeſty. Then he ſent the Uſher of the Black-Rod, to order them to adjourn; but they would not admit him, or receive his Meſſage: Whereupon the King ſent for the Band of Penſioners, with an Intention (as 'tis ſaid) to force an Entrance: Whereupon the Commons roſe ſuddenly, having firſt adjourned themſelves to the 10th of March.

The Day after the Tumult, viz. on the 3d of March, Warrants were iſſued by the Privy-Council, ſummoning nine of the moſt diſorderly Members, mentioned in the Proceeding againſt Stroud, &c. to appear before the Board; which were obeyed by Holles, Elliot, Coriton, and Valentine; and the reſt afterwards were brought in, or ſurrendered themſelves: But they abſolutely refuſed to anſwer before the Council, for any thing that had been ſaid or done in Parliament: Whereupon they were committed to ſeveral Priſons.

On the 10th of March, the Day the Commons were adjourned to, the King came to the Houſe of Peers; and, without ſending for the Commons, acquainted their Lordſhips, that it was merely the undutiful and ſeditious Carriage of the Lower Houſe, that brought him thither, to diſſolve the Parliament. He did not, however, judge all that Houſe guilty: But there were, he ſaid, ſome Vipers among them, who caſt this Miſt of Undutifulneſs over moſt of their Eyes: And as theſe muſt look for Puniſhment, their Lordſhips, on the other hand, might juſtly expect from him, all the Favour and Protection that a good King owed to his loving and faithful Nobility. After which, the Lord Keeper diſſolved the Parliament, there being but few of the Commons preſent, as his Majeſty had not thought fit to command their Attendance.

Thus much of the Hiſtory of that Parliament which ſat in the 4th and 5th Years Car. I. ſeemed abſolutely neceſſary, to underſtand the Caſe of Mr. Stroud, and the reſt of the obnoxious Members, who brought their Writs of Habeas Corpus, to obtain their Liberty, in Eaſter Term, 5 Car. I. I ſhall proceed in the next Place to make ſome Remarks on the detaining thoſe Members in Priſon.

Remarks on the Habeas Corpus brought by Stroud, &c.

The Reader will remember, that the Counſel for Mr. Stroud, and the reſt of the nine impriſoned Members, inſiſted, that the Return of the Habeas Corpus was inſufficient, becauſe the firſt Warrant, mentioned in the Return, expreſſed no Cauſe of the Commitment; and the ſecond only ſaid, they were committed for notable Contempts, committed againſt Ourſelf, and our Government, and for ſtirring up Sedition againſt Us; obſerving, that the firſt Warrant was directly againſt the Petition of Right; and the Offences expreſſed in the ſecond, were not Capital, and conſequently the Priſoners ought to be bailed: And this appears to have been the Senſe of the Judges, though they had not an Opportunity of delivering their Opinions in open Court, in Trinity Term, 1629. the Priſoners being removed from their reſpective Goals, to other Priſons. 1629. 5 Car. I.

But it appears alſo, that it was the unanimous Opinion of the Judges of the King's-Bench, when the Priſoners appeared in Court, on the firſt Day of the following Michaelmas Term, that as they ſtood charged with Contempts againſt his Majeſty, and with ſtirring up Sedition, which were Criminal Matters, they ought to give Security for their good Behaviour: And as they refuſed to do this, their future Impriſonment muſt be aſcribed, in ſome Meaſure, to their own Obſtinacy; which leads me in the next Place to conſider, the Proceedings againſt three of the nine Members, viz. Elliot, Holles, and Valentine, againſt whom the Attorney-General, the ſame Michaelmas Term, preferred an Information, for ſeditious Speeches, for a Contempt, and for an Aſſault on their Speaker. To which their Counſel anſwered, that it was lawful, and Parliamentary, to charge Great Men, in the Houſe, with Crimes committed againſt the Conſtitution: That it was no Contempt, to refuſe to adjourn, upon a verbal Command; and that it was lawful for the Houſe to detain the Speaker in the Chair. However, that, theſe things being done in Parliament, they could only be queſtioned for them there; and therefore they pleaded to the Juriſdiction of the Court; and refuſing to put in any other Plea, Judgment was given againſt them by nihil dicit, and they were ſentenced to be fined, and impriſoned, as has been related already. Remarks on the Proceedings againſt Elliot, &c. for Sedition, &c.

As to the Reſolutions of the Commons, who raiſed the Rebellion in 1641. they will not be much regarded in this Caſe; after we have ſeen them, not only conſpire the Deſtruction of the King and Government, but fully accompliſh and execute their Treaſons: And though the Parliament, in the Year 1667. thought fit to aſſert their grand Privilege of Freedom of Speech, and reverſe the Judgment given, in the Court of King's-Bench, againſt Holles; yet they ſeem to have admitted, that a Breach of the Peace (ſuch as the Aſſault upon their Speaker, and forcing him into the Chair) might be taken notice of, and puniſhed by the Courts in Weſtminſter-Hall; for they obſerved, that the Judges cunningly blended the Speeches and the Aſſault together, in their Judgment, to give them a Colour for pronouncing it: And one of the Errors aſſigned for reverſing the Judgment is, that the Court gave but one Judgment, as to the Words and the Aſſault, when the Defendants pleaded two ſeveral Pleas; ſo that the antient Maxim ſtill remains unſhaken, that to a Charge of Treaſon, Felony, or Breach of the Peace, Privilege of Parliament cannot be pleaded: And had the Judgment been for Breach of the Peace alone, it had probably never been cenſured, or reverſed: There is no doubt to be made, that a Member, who is aſſaulted in the Houſe by another Member, may ſtill have an Action againſt the Aggreſſor, in the Courts of Weſtminſter-Hall. There is nothing ſo ſacred within thoſe Walls, as the then Attorney-General obſerved, as to privilege the Members to commit all Manner of Outrages there, with Impunity.

1629. 5 Car. I.

But, notwithſtanding the Commons did then ſo loudly exclaim againſt the Court of King's-Bench, for refuſing to bail Perſons committed by the King and Council, without Cauſe ſhewn; we have ſeen the Houſes themſelves, ſince that Time, aſſuming a Power, equal, if not ſuperior, to that the Crown then exerciſed; ſending Gentlemen to Priſon, without expreſſing any Cauſe, and not ſuffering them to be bailed, or delivered, on their bringing Writs of Habeas Corpus: And the Judges have ſo revered the Commitments of either Houſe, as not to dare to diſcharge the Priſoners, till the Parliament has been prorogued; and, in ſome Caſes, till it has been actually diſſolved; and that notwithſtanding the Habeas Corpus Act, that was made for the Protection of our Liberties: Which leads me to enquire, how the Law ſtands, in Regard to our Liberties at this Day.

The Law, concerning Bail, in Criminal Caſes, at this Day.

By a Statute made the 31ſt Car. II. cap. 2. it is enacted, That every Perſon committed for any Crime (unleſs it be for Treaſon, or Felony, plainly, and ſpecially, expreſſed in the Warrant) ſhall have a Writ of Habeas Corpus, returnable, immediate, before the Lord Chancellor, or one of the Judges, who may diſcharge him from his Impriſonment, taking a Recognizance, with one or more Sureties, for his Appearance, in the King's-Bench, the next Term, or at the next Aſſizes, Seſſions, &c. where the Offence was committed, unleſs it ſhall appear, that the Party, ſo committed, is detained upon legal Proceſs, Order, or Warrant, out of ſome Court, that has Juriſdiction of Criminal Matters; or by a Warrant ſigned and ſealed by a Judge, or ſome Juſtice of Peace, for ſuch Offence, as, by Law, the Priſoner is not bailable.

And if any Perſon ſhall be committed for Treaſon, or Felony, plainly and ſpecially expreſſed in the Warrant; and if upon his Prayer, or Petition, in open Court, the firſt Week of the Term, or the firſt Day of the Aſſizes of Oyer and Terminer, to be brought to his Trial, he ſhall not be indicted the next Term, or Seſſions, after his Commitment, the Judges, upon Motion made to them in Court, by the Priſoner, or any for him, the laſt Day of the Term, or Seſſions, are required to ſet at Liberty ſuch Priſoner, upon Bail: And if ſuch Priſoner ſhall not be indicted, and tried, the ſecond Seſſions after his Commitment, or ſhall be acquitted upon his Trial, he ſhall be diſcharged.

And if any of the Courts of Weſtminſter, in Term Time, or any Judge of the ſaid Courts, in the Vacation, ſhall deny ſuch Writ of Habeas Corpus, they ſhall ſeverally forfeit five hundred Pounds, to the Party grieved.

And it was further provided by this Act, That no Subject ſhould be ſent Priſoner into Scotland, Ireland, Jerſey, Guernſey, Tangier, or any Place beyond Sea: And that any Perſon ſo impriſoned, ſhould have an Action of falſe Impriſonment againſt the Perſons, by whom he ſhould be ſo committed, detained, impriſoned, ſent Priſoner, or tranſported; and againſt all Perſons, who ſhould make, or ſign, any ſuch Warrant, or be adviſing, aiding, or aſſiſting, in the ſame; and that the Plaintiff ſhould recover treble Coſts, beſides Dammages; which Dammages ſhould not be leſs than five hundred Pounds; and that the Offender ſhould incur a Præmunire, and be incapable of a Pardon.

1629. 5 Car. I.

And it was further provided, That, after the Aſſizes proclaimed, no Priſoner ſhould be removed from the common Goal of the County, but ſhould be tried before the Judge of Aſſize. However, after the Aſſizes, he may have his Habeas Corpus. And it is now held, that the Court of King's-Bench have a diſcretionary Power, of bailing Perſons, almoſt in every Caſe, even for Treaſon, or Felony, and are not bound, by the Statute of Weſtminſter 1. cap. 15. as Sheriffs and Juſtices of Peace are: And though they have of late paid a much greater Deference to a General Commitment of either Houſe of Parliament, than to a Commitment by the King himſelf, or the Privy-Council, during the Continuance of a Seſſion; yet, as has been obſerved, they do uſually venture to bail ſuch Priſoners as have been committed by either Houſe, after a Prorogation, or Diſſolution: And there has been an Inſtance of this Court's bailing a Nobleman, impeached of High-Treaſon, when the Parliament was diſſolved, Hawk. 111. A Commitment for Diſobedience to a Decree of the Court of Chancery, however, is held ſtill to be good, without ſhewing what the Decree was: And the Perſon committed, is not bailable by the Court of King's-Bench, notwithſtanding the Habeas Corpus Act: Nor will the King's-Bench bail a Perſon committed by any other Court of Record; unleſs it appear, the Perſon is committed for a Fact, which is indeed no Crime; or not within the Juriſdiction of the Court committing him; or where a Proſecution appears to be malicious, or the like. Hawk. 112.

And though the Court of King's-Bench may admit to Bail, Perſons excluded by the Statute of Weſtm. 1. cap. 15. yet they pay a great Regard to the Rules preſcribed by that Statute. There are few Inſtances of Perſons charged with Felony, or notoriouſly guilty of Treaſon, or Manſlaughter, that have been admitted to Bail, without ſome ſpecial Motive to induce the Court to grant it. As where a Perſon outlawed alledges Error in the Record; or a Perſon is convicted contrary to Evidence; or the Plaintiff, in an Appeal, hath unreaſonably delayed Proſecution; or where a Priſoner is in Danger of his Life, by Famine, or ſome malignant Diſtemper. ibid.

It is the Practice of the Court of King's-Bench, in admitting a Perſon to Bail, who is actually preſent in Court upon an Indictment, or Appeal, of Felony, or other Crime, puniſhable with the Loſs of Life, or Member, to take a general Recognizance to the King in a certain Sum, from each of the Bail, that the Priſoner

1629. 5 Car. I.

Priſoner ſhall appear at a certain Day, &c. And alſo, that the Bail ſhall be liable, in Default of his Appearance, Body for Body: And it ſeems left to the Diſcretion of the Juſtices, in admitting a Perſon to Bail for Felony, to take the Recognizance either in a certain Sum, or Body for Body. But at this Day, Perſons bound Body for Body, are not liable, on the Forfeiture of the Recognizance, to ſuch Puniſhment as the Principal would be, if found guilty; but can only be fined. 2 Hawk. 115.

A Perſon bailed for Felony, ought to have two Sureties at leaſt: And, it is the Practice of the King's-Bench, not to admit a Perſon to Bail upon a Habeas Corpus, on a Commitment for Treaſon, or Felony, without four Sureties. Pract. Reg. 110.

Theſe Proſecutions ſaid to be the Occaſion of the Grand Rebellion.

Give me Leave to obſerve further, That the Ruin of King Charles I. and the utter Subverſion of the Conſtitution, has been aſcribed, by ſome, to the Proſecution of the Gentlemen laſt mentioned. It is ſuppoſed, if his Majeſty had never levied Money without Conſent of Parliament, impriſoned the turbulent Members of the Houſe of Commons, and queſtioned them in the Court of King's-Bench, for their Behaviour in the Houſe, he might have gone in Peace to his Grave: That theſe Proceedings gave the People a Handle, to encroach on his Prerogative, embarraſs his Affairs, and uſurp an Authority to controul, and even ſubdue the Crown; without which, they were taught, their Liberties and Properties could never be ſecured.

But, ſurely, it is poſſible to fall into ſuch Times, that all the Wiſdom and Virtue that ever any Prince poſſeſſed, cannot preſerve him; and, if ever there was ſuch an unhappy Conjuncture, it was in this Reign: The Enemies of this Prince dwelt altogether on his arbitrary Diſpoſition, and the illegal Ways he took to raiſe Money, in order to juſtify their Rebellion and Uſurpation: But they are very ſilent as to the unparalelled Provocations they gave him, and the Neceſſities they reduced him to; which in a manner compelled him to take thoſe extraordinary Ways: Such was the undutiful Behaviour of the Commons, to this young Prince, at his Acceſſion, before they could diſcern whether his Adminiſtration would be good or bad, that, though they had drawn the Crown into a War, they would not raiſe one Penny of Money to ſupport it; whereby the Expedition againſt Spain miſcarried in the firſt Year of his Reign; and in the ſecond, the Princes of Germany and the Danes, in Confederacy with England, were defeated and ruined: Nay, they went farther, and denied to ſettle the Duties of Tonnage and Poundage on him, for the ſupport of his Houſhold, under Pretence, that he had taken them, on his Acceſſion, without their Leave, though his Anceſtors had ever done the ſame. And when they had diſtreſſed him to ſuch a Degree, what could they expect? His Majeſty ſaw the Government muſt ſink, and be diſſolved, if he had no Revenue to ſupport his Adminiſtration; and the Parliament would not give him a Penny, unleſs he would diſcard the Duke of Buckingham, and ſuch of his Miniſters as they had taken a Prejudice to, and ſuffer their Leaders to govern all his Councils: And when the King declared, that the Duke was innocent, of his own Knowledge, of what they charged him with; even this would not ſatisfy them: Now, unleſs it be ſaid, that a King is obliged to deliver up his Miniſters, how faithful and able ſoever, and transfer his Authority to ſuch Men as a powerful Faction ſhall impoſe upon him, I cannot ſee how he could avoid taking extraordinary Ways to raiſe Money, which was, indeed, what his Enemies wanted, and rejoiced to ſee him driven to theſe Extremes: There were a great many Gentlemen among the Commons, it is true, that were for accomodating Matters, by granting Supplies, and relieving the King's Neceſſities. But we find the Enemies of the Miniſtry, the Puritans and Republicans, were too hard for them: When one Grievance was remedied, they immediately ſtarted another, and diſtracting the People with imaginary Jealouſies and Fears, threw all into Confuſion; and by the ſame Acts they might have ruined any Prince that every reigned.

1629. 5 Car. I.

We have no Inſtance of a King of England, of more Virtue, Parts, and Learning, than King Charles the Firſt was; and, whatever his Enemies may ſuggeſt to the contrary, farther from aſſuming an arbitrary Dominion: All he deſired was, to retain the legal Prerogatives his Anceſtors enjoyed: He would, perhaps, have been contented with much leſs Power than many of them exerciſed, had he not ſeen the Commons aiming at Dominion, and daily encroaching on the Regal Prerogatives; and found, if he gave way to their inſatiable Demands, they would infallibly deſtroy the Conſtitution both in Church and State. It is ſufficiently evident, that the Ambition of the Commons, joined with the reſtleſs Zeal of the Puritans, to deſtroy the Church of England, and eſtabliſh their Idol, Preſbytery, were the principal Sources of the Grand Rebellion; and that thoſe People who reduced King Charles to the Neceſſity of raiſing Money by thoſe extraordinary Ways, were greater Enemies to their Country than thoſe, who adviſed him to uſe thoſe Means for his Preſervation.

Neceſſity has no Law, according to the Proverb; or rather, all Laws muſt give way to Neceſſity: This is a Doctrine the Saints themſelves inculcated ſoon after, urging the Neceſſity of Rebellion againſt their Sovereign, to preſerve their Rights and Liberties; and taxed the Subject more arbitrarily and extravagantly, to ſupport their Rebellion and Uſurpation, than any King had ever done.

The rude Treatment of the Laws by their Hero Cromwell, when ſome urged Magna Charta, in Defence of their Liberties and Properties, will never be forgot; that mighty Advocate for Liberty and Property, when he had depoſed his Sovereign, and uſurped his Throne, gave the grand Charter of the Peoples Liberties the Title of Magna Farta, and appears to have looked upon the reſt of the Laws of the Kingdom with equal Deriſion and Contempt; taxing, impriſoning, decimating, tranſporting, and murdering the Nobility and Gentry, at Pleaſure; who ſoon ſaw their Error, in contributing to the Deſtruction of the Monarchy; and no doubt, heartily wiſhed for King Charles's Adminiſtration again.

1629. 5 Car. I.

But not to inſiſt on the Examples of Rebels and Uſurpers, who exclaim the loudeſt againſt the Invaſion of Liberty and Property, when they are out of the Adminiſtration, and are the the moſt intolerable Oppreſſors themſelves, when poſſeſſed of Power: Let us but ſuppoſe that when King George I. came to the Crown, he had found it engaged in War with two potent Enemies, by the Advice of Parliament, (which was the Caſe of King Charles I.) and the Parliament would not have raiſed one Penny of Money, either for the Support of the War, or the Maintenance of his Houſhold; while our good Allies periſhed for want of our Aſſiſtance; the Faction at the ſame Time, attacking and reviling his Adminiſtration, before he had been ſix Months upon the Throne, and it was impoſſible to diſcern whether it would be good or bad: Would King George's Friends, in ſuch a Caſe, have thought themſelves obliged to ſtand ſtill with their Arms a-croſs; and, becauſe the Parliament proved ſullen or peeviſh, have ſuffered the Succeſſion of the Hannover Family to have been defeated, and his Enemies triumph over them? Would they not rather have exerted their utmoſt Efforts, and raiſed Men and Money, by all the Methods they could invent, whether legal or illegal, to preſerve the Crown on his illuſtrious Head; and would they not have juſtified themſelves, as the Miniſters of King Charles the Firſt did, by that Almighty Plea of Neceſſity.

Far be it from me to juſtify the Ways that were taken in the Reign of King Charles I. for raiſing Money, ſuppoſing it were poſſible to have avoided them; but Neceſſity, it ſeems to be agreed on all Hands, will juſtify taking Meaſures that are not ſtrictly legal: And if a Prince of King Charles's Wiſdom and Virtue was puſhed upon thoſe unwarrantable Ways and Means by the Perverſeneſs of a Faction; I wiſh, when ever any of his Succeſſors find themſelves in the like unhappy Situation, they may extricate themſelves out of their Difficulties by Ways leſs oppreſſive than thoſe that Prince was compelled to make uſe of. But to proceed; The Friends of Monarchy are frequently repreſented, by their Enemies, as in love with Slavery, and ready to ſacrifice their Liberties and Properties to every ambitious Prince: But I would have the Republicans know, That the Loyaliſts have as great a Value for thoſe ineſtimable Bleſſings of Liberty and Property, as any Whig of them all: The only Difference is, That the former apprehend their Laws and Liberties are more likely to be preſerved under a Monarchichal Form of Government; and the latter imagine, That Liberty is no where to be found but in a Commonwealth.

For my Part, if we are to be tyrannized over, I had rather have one than five hundred Tyrants; I had rather ſee one upon the Throne, than a Tyrant in every Pariſh almoſt: But it is very notorious, there is much more Danger of Oppreſſion and Tyranny under a Commonwealth than a Monarchy; for the Weight of the Nobility and Gentry of a Nation will ever prove a Balance, ſufficient to prevent our Kings committing any great Exceſſes; they will not ſee their Laws trampled on, and their Properties invaded, without oppoſing ſuch Encroachments, and repreſenting their Grievances to the Throne; as we find by Experience they have frequently done with good Succeſs, even in the Reigns of our greateſt Princes, ſuch as Edward the Third, Henry the Fifth, that of Queen Elizabeth, &c. But then they were ſo wiſe to be content with their antient Privileges, and did not attempt to ſtrip the Crown of all its Prerogatives: Where-ever this has been attempted it has always ended in Confuſion, and the Subverſion of the Government. And let the People's Grievances and Oppreſſions be never ſo inſupportable under a Commonwealth, there is no Redreſs to be expected; the Tyrants are ſo numerous, and are Men of that Wealth and Intereſt in every Part of the Nation, and have ſuch an Influence over the inferior People, among whom they reſide, that there is no contending with them: In thoſe unhappy Times, when this was our own Caſe, we ſee the State would not ſuffer the People ſo much as to petition for a Redreſs of Grievances, or find any Fault with their Adminiſtration, how deſtructive ſoever to Liberty and Property. And if we look abroad into the Commonwealths of Venice, Genoa, and Holland, their Governments are more deſpotick than that of the Grand Seignior; they will not ſo much as ſuffer the People to mention, much leſs oppoſe, their Adminiſtration; and if they ſuſpect any of their Subjects to have a Deſign to demand any Alteration in the Adminiſtration, they are immediately apprehended by a kind of Secret Committee, thrown into Dungeons, and perhaps put to death, without being ſuffered the Benefit of an open Trial; Theſe are ſome of the Liberties and Privileges uſually annexed to a Republican Form of Government, which ſome People are ſo fond of, and which ſurely none can heartily deſire, unleſs they expect to conſtitute Part of the State, and enjoy the Privilege of domineering over their Prince as well as their Fellow-Subjects.

Great Encomiums are beſtowed upon thoſe Patriots, who have from Time to Time contended to clip the Wings of the Prerogative, and make the Crown in a Manner dependant on the People: But what did they ever get by this Conduct? King Charles II. being treated in this Manner, when he ſaw it was impoſſible otherwiſe to ſupport his Dignity and Authority, and he was in Danger of becoming ſubject to the Commons, made the leading Men amongſt them his Penſioners, and by that means procured their Conſent to a Standing Army; governing as abſolutely in the latter Part of his Reign, as ever his Predeceſſors had done before the Prerogative was reduced.

Whereas had thoſe wiſe Men been content with the antient Conſtitution, neither Penſionary Parliaments, or Standing Armies, had been thought neceſſary to force the Subjects Obedience: They need not then have raiſed Taxes to pay their Repreſentatives for doing the Buſineſs of the Court, and pay thoſe Troops that were raiſed to bridle their Fury.

Our wiſe Patriots, by aiming at an unbounded Liberty, and to be freed from the Dominion of their lawful Prince, compelled him to raiſe Forces for his Preſervation, which might have been fatal to their Liberties, if he had had any Inclination clination to invade them. It was happy for us, he desired no more than that all his Subjects might be easy and happy, and did not make use of those Forces to render himself absolute: If he had, we might have thanked those Patriots for it, whose Ambition in a manner forced him into those Measures.

Give me leave to observe further, That the Puritans have been the most implacable Enemies to the Constitution and Peace of their own Country of any set of Men in it since the Reformation: We have seen them in Queen Elizabeth's Reign, attacking her Government, and threatening to depose her, unless she would destroy the established Church, and introduce their Sect into the Administration: Nay, we find they were ready to join with the Pope and the Spaniard in the memorable Year 1588. to the utter Ruin both of our Religious and Civil Rights: But the Queen, by hanging up some of these seditious Betrayers of their Country, put a stop to their Encroachments, and maintained the Dignity of the Crown; and yet were her Subjects then the happiest People upon the Face of the Earth; nor did the Nation ever make a greater Figure in the World, than under her Administration.

King James I. on the contrary, unhappily relaxed the Reins of Government, and suffered the People to dispute and controul his Administration to such a Degree, that, according to his Son's Expression, they put the Dice upon him, and made him dependant on them.

Instead of the Stuarts endeavouring to establish a despotick Power, it is evident, the Puritans and Republicans, from the Time of their Accession to this Throne, have endeavoured to deprive that Family of all its just Rights, and entirely to subvert the Constitution in Church and State, which they unhappily effected in the Reign of King Charles I. And yet we have seen some of our young Nobility and Gentry, whose Ancestors fell with the Crown, and in Defence of it, stupidly celebrating that melancholly Day as a Festival, which the Nation justly solemnizes as a Fast, for the detested Murder of one of our greatest Monarchs, dressing up Calves Heads, making Bonfires, and pouring out red Wine, to shew how they approved of the spilling the Blood of that King; and that they would gladly have embrued their own Hands in it, if they had lived in those Days: What an Affront must this be to the Stuarts Race; to the Prince, who now happily fills the Throne, and even to Monarchy itself? For those Rebels gloried, they had destroyed the King, and Monarchy with him; and perjured the whole Nation, by compelling them to abjure the Stuart Family, and all Kingly Government.

This the Saints then made the pious Test for admitting Men to Offices in the State, and all other Preferments; though they exclaim now against the Government, for requiring any Test of their Loyalty and Affection for the Establishment.

1629. 5 Car. I.

I shall conclude these Remarks with some Account of Sir John Elliot, that grand Incendiary, who may be said to have laid the Foundation of the Civil Wars, though he did not live to see the glorious Confusion he aimed at.

This Gentleman, Mr. Echard informs us, was not of a very antient Family, but had a good Estate in Cornwall: That he had been a Fellow-Traveller and an intimate Companion of the Duke of Buckingham's, before his Advancement, and afterwards as great a Flatterer of him as any Man: That in the same Parish with Elliot lived another Gentleman of a fair Character, named Moyle, some time a Member of Parliament, with whom Elliot having had a Difference, went to his House under pretence of a Visit, and whilst Moyle was drinking a Glass of Wine, Elliot treacherously stabbed him; and leaving the Gentleman, who hospitably entertained him, dead, as he imagined, made his Escape to London: Where he applied himself to Buckingham, and by his Means obtained a Pardon for the supposed Murder (pretending Moyle had been killed in a Rencounter.) Elliot was obliged, however, to advance a considerable Sum of Money to get the Pardon expedited, lest the Baseness of the Fact should be discovered before it had passed the Seals: And it was no sooner sealed, but Elliot received Advice, that Mr. Moyle was in a fair Way of Recovery: Whereupon he applied himself to the Duke again, to have his Money returned, which his Grace did not gratify him in, but procured him the Honour of Knighthood, as an Equivalent for it; which was, however, far from satisfying Elliot for the Money he had paid. He vowed, therefore, to be revenged on the Duke for the Injustice he apprehended was done him, by one who had formerly been his Equal, and his Friend; and did not fail to make good his Threats on every Occasion. Mr. Moyle out-lived this Outrage above forty Years, and gave this Relation of the Fact himself to the celebrated Dean Prideaux, from whom Mr. Echard had it: So that all this pretended Zeal of Elliot's for his Country, was founded in Revenge; and the greatest Patron of Religion and Liberty among the Commons, appears to have been an infamous Assassin: He afterwards died a Prisoner in the Tower, where he was confined for refusing to give Security for his good Behaviour, after having been guilty of numberless Insults on the the Government, raised a Tumult in the House of Commons, and laid violent Hands upon their Speaker, which was the Occasion of his Commitment and Prosecution in the King's-Bench: And though the Lords afterwards reversed the Judgment against Holles for Error, it is remarkable that they were so sensible of the Merits, or rather Demerits, of this pretended Patriot Elliot, that they never did reverse the Judgment against him, but it remains upon Record to this Day.

The Indictment.

THE Dittay, or Indictment, ſets forth, That whereas, by ſeveral Statutes of the Kingdom of Scotland, it is enacted, that all Leaſing-makers, and Tellers of Lies, which may engender Diſcord between the King, his Barons, Great Men, and Lieges, ſhall forfeit Life and Goods to the King. Notwithſtanding which, the ſaid James Lord Uchiltrie, in the Month of May, then laſt paſſed, having heard by the Relation of Donald Lord Rea, that certain Speeches, Surmiſes, and Informations, were made unto him (the ſaid Lord Rea) by David Ramſay, Robert Meldrum, and ſeveral other Perſons beyond Sea, in Sweden, Pomerland, and Holland, reſpectively; and by the ſaid David Ramſay, and divers other Perſons, within the Kingdom of England, anent ſome Plot, and dangerous Purpoſe, intended againſt the King, Queen, and Prince, and againſt the Land, by ſurpriſing the King's Houſes and Caſtles of Edinburgh, Stirling, and Dunbarton; and for ſeizing the Town of Lieth. The ſaid Lord Uchiltrie, not contented with revealing what the Lord Rea had informed him of, out of a malicious Deſign, and in order to create Diſcord betwixt the Lord Marquis of Hamilton, the Earls of Haddington, Roxburgh, and Buccleugh, and his Majeſty, did, on the 17th of May, then laſt paſſed, ſignify to his Highneſs, that the Buſineſs was Treaſon intended againſt his Majeſty; and that the principal Party was the Marquis of Hamilton, as he was informed; and to induce his Majeſty to believe him, he delivered to the Lord Treaſurer (Weſton) a Liſt of Names, to ſhew his Majeſty, the Strength of the ſaid Marquis of Hamilton's Party and Adherents in Scotland: Wherein he named the Marquis of Hamilton, the prime Agent, and named the Earl of Melros, now Earl of Haddington, the Earl of Roxburgh, and the Earl of Buccleugh, to be Plotters: And that upon the Marquis's Arrival at London, from Scotland, the ſaid Lord Uchiltrie went to his Majeſty, when he was at Dinner, and boldly, and male-pertly, ſpoke theſe Words to him; Sir, now you know the Buſineſs, but know not the Time; and therefore, Sir, either do, or die; doing thereby, what in him lay, to move his Majeſty to take ſome ſudden and violent Courſe, for the Subverſion of the Life and Honour of the ſaid Marquis; and that the ſaid Paſſages were maliciouſly forged, invented, and practiſed by the Panel (the Priſoner), without any Foundation, or Authority, from the Relation of the Lord Rea, as was manifeſt, from his own Depoſitions, and by the Declaration of the ſaid Lord Rea, who had averred, that he knew nothing againſt the Perſon of the Marquis, but that he was as good a Subject, as any the King's Majeſty had; and that the Panel (the Priſoner) and not the Lord Rea, did name the Earl of Buccleugh, as one who would take up Arms in Scotland, to aſſiſt the Marquis. By which Leaſings, Calumnies, and ſlanderous Speeches, untruly plotted, deviſed, and vented, by him, againſt the ſaid Marquis of Hamilton, the Earls of Haddington, Roxburgh, and Buccleugh, his Majeſty's faithful Counſellors, and loyal Subjects, he had manifeſtly contraverted the Tenor of the ſaid Statutes, and incurred the Pains therein mentioned, viz. the Puniſhment of Death, which ought to be executed on him, with all Rigour, to the Terror and Example of others.

The Evidence produced.

The Evidence produced againſt the Lord Uchiltrie was, firſt, his own Examination before ſome Lords at London, the 20th of June; wherein he ſays, that about the 7th of May laſt, the Lord Rea told him (at the Bear, near London-Bridge), that he believed there was a Plot againſt this Land; and though he had no certain Ground for it, if he had ſtaid but five Weeks longer in the Low Countries, he ſhould have known the Certainty: That on the 13th of the ſame Month, he came to his, the Examinant's Chamber, and told him, he had learned more Certainty; and that the Purpoſe of the Marquis of Hamilton's Levies, as divers of his Officers and Followers had informed him (the ſaid Lord Rea) was, that either they ſhould not go out of England, or Scotland; or, if they did, they ſhould return to England, or Scotland again, and ſurprize the King's Houſes and Caſtles in Scotland, viz. the Caſtles of Edinburgh, Stirling, and Dunbarton, and fortify themſelves in Leith, and ſhould afterwards take Berwick, and march into England, where they intended to ſeize the King's Perſon, and impriſon him; to ſend the Queen to a Cloyſter; to captivate the young Prince with his Father, and to ſtrike off the Heads of all the principal Men about the King, both Engliſh, and Scots; and particularly the Lord Treaſurer of England, the Earl of Monteith, Sir William Alexander, and Sir Thomas Hope: That the Lord Rea, thinking it fitter to be diſcovered by the Examinant than by himſelf, leſt thoſe, whom it concerned, might ſuſpect the Matter, deſired the Examinant to acquaint his Majeſty, or the Lord Treaſurer, therewith; and that he accordingly attended the Treaſurer, and told him, he had Something to reveal, that concerned his Majeſty, and all his Kingdoms, and Poſterity; and that the Lord Treaſurer thereupon inſtantly went went up to the King, and returning, told the Examinant, that his Majeſty had given him Commiſſion to hear his Relation.

The Examinant further ſaid, that the Lord Rea told him, he had much of this beyond Sea, from Robert Meldrum, and David Ramſay: But that, ſince his coming into England, he had ſpoken with Sir James Ramſay, Sir James Hamilton, Colonel Alexander Hamilton, and Captain Douglas, and had gotten ſomething out of every one of them; and that he had alſo ſpoken with the Lord Seaforth, and underſtood ſomewhat from him.

That, on Monday, the 16th of May, the Examinant attended the Lord Treaſurer at Whitehall, and told him, the Matter he had to relate concerned the Lord Marquis of Hamilton, and his Actions; and delivered to the Treaſurer a Liſt of Names, to repreſent the Strength of the Lord Hamilton's Party and Adherents in Scotland: But he no ſooner mentioned the Marquis of Hamilton's Name, than the Treaſurer ordered him to defer his Relation, till he had acquainted the King again: That the Examinant, attending the King, by the Treaſurer's Direction, the Thurſday following, he told his Majeſty, that the Buſineſs was Treaſon againſt his Majeſty; and the Party was the Marquis of Hamilton, as the Examinant was informed: That it was the filthieſt Treaſon that ever was intended; and he was ſorry any Scotiſh Man ſhould have a Hand it; for it was a Shame to the whole Nation: And then the Lord Rea himſelf coming in, made his Relation to his Majeſty, who ſent them both to the Lord Treaſurer; and his Lordſhip directed the Lord Rea, to put his Relation in Writing: Whereupon the Lord Rea, and the Examinant, went away together, and ſat up all Night: And the Lord Rea firſt putting it into Writing, the Examinant wrote it out of the Lord Rea's Papers, who carried it the next Day to the Lord Treaſurer; but the Examinant was not then preſent. However, attending the Treaſurer afterwards, he demanded whoſe the Hand-Writing was; and the Examinant acknowledged, it was his; and it not being ſubſcribed, the Examinant carried the Lord Rea to the Treaſurer's, where he read over the Paper, and ſigned it, ſaying, He would ſeal it with his Blood. The Examinant further ſaith, that he told the Lord Treaſurer, that the Lord Rea informed him, he had yet more, and would ſay ſo much, that the Marquis ſhould not have the Face to deny it; which the Lord Rea, then preſent, affirmed: Inſomuch that the Lord Treaſurer ſaid, Then is the Buſineſs at an End, and there needs no Writing.

That the Lord Rea told the Examinant, on the Sunday Morning, when the Marquis of Hamilton arrived Poſt from Scotland, that the Lord Seaforth aſſured him (Lord Rea), that their Purpoſe was to take the King, the Queen, and the Prince: And the Examinant demanding, how they would effect it, the Lord Rea replied, the Lord Seaforth had told him, they were great with the Earl of Dorſet, who had the Cuſtody of the Prince; and that he (Lord Rea) alſo ſaid, he was aſſured by the Lord Roxburgh, that the Marquis, and his Company, would haſten their Purpoſe; adding, that the Hamiltons had ſurely taken ſome Vent of the Buſineſs: That Rea alſo ſaid, Sir James Ramſay told him, he had 1500 Men in Readineſs; but they ſhould not come to London, till their Buſineſs was ready withal; which the Examinant, the ſame Morning, acquainted the Lord Treaſurer with, and wiſhed the Lord Treaſurer to adviſe the King, to go to London, for his Security: And that the ſame Day, when the King was at Dinner, the Examinant acknowledges he ſpoke theſe Words, Sir, now we know the Buſineſs, but know not the Time; and therefore, Sir, either do, or die.

1631. 6 Car. I.

Then the Lord Rea's Examination, the 21ſt of June, was read, wherein he acknowledged, that two or three Days before the Marquis of Hamilton went to Scotland, he (Lord Rea) did ſay to the Lord Uchiltrie, that his Lordſhip was better acquainted with the Laws of this Land, than the Examinant; and therefore deſired to know, what Danger it was, if any Man, hearing beyond Sea of things that might be dangerous to the King or State, ſhould not reveal it? To which the Lord Uchiltrie anſwered, No leſs than your Head, and Eſtate: And this was all that paſſed between them, at that Time: But that going to the Lord Uchiltrie's Lodgings again, about ten Days after, he aſked him the ſame Queſtion, and deſired his Advice: And the Lord Uchiltrie promiſed readily to adviſe him, when he ſhould be acquainted with the Particulars; and that he would not reveal the Matter, without his Conſent: Whereupon, he (the Lord Rea) told the Particulars to the Lord Uchiltrie, who ſaid, it was neceſſary the Matter ſhould be diſcovered, and doubted the Examinant had concealed it too long already. To which he (Lord Rea) replied, that conſidering it concerned one ſo near the King, as the Marquis of Hamilton, he thought it not fit to break it to the King himſelf, leſt his Majeſty ſhould reject it; but it was fitter for ſome other to do it; and therefore deſired his Opinion, how to diſcover it: And that the Lord Uchiltrie, by his (the Lord Rea's) Conſent, went the next Morning to the Lord Treaſurer's, to lay the Matter before him: But the Lord Treaſurer then refuſed to hear him, till he had a Warrant from the King: And that both the Lord Uchiltrie, and the Examinant, attending the King afterwards, at Greenwich, he (Lord Rea) made a full Relation to his Majeſty: And that the King demanding, why he had not told him ſooner of it, he, the Examinant, anſwered, that conſidering the Nearneſs of the Marquis of Hamilton to his Majeſty, he was afraid his Majeſty would have been impatient with him (the Examinant): That thereupon they were referred to the Lord Treaſurer, who directed him (Lord Rea) to put the Relation in Writing: Whereupon he and the Lord Uchiltrie ſat up together all Night; and the Examinant writing it firſt down, the Lord Uchiltrie wrote it, Sheet after Sheet, out of the Examinant's Paper, who carried it to the Lord Treaſurer; but not having ſigned it, he, (Lord Rea) and the Lord Uchiltrie, went to the Lord Treaſurer's again, two or three Days after, where he (Lord Rea) ſigned it, and ſaid, He would make it good with his Blood: That the Examinant afterwards had further Particulars from the Lord Seaforth, which he communicated to the Lord Uchiltrie, who told the Examinant, on Sunday Morning, that he had been with the Lord Treaſurer, and had told him of the Paſſages with the Lord Seaforth, and of the Marquis's Return from Scotland; and that he conceived his Majeſty might be in Danger at that Time. To which the Examinant replied, he had done ill; for there was no ſuch ſudden Danger to be feared; and that the Examinant being the ſame Afternoon with his Majeſty, after he had been ſo advertiſed of preſent Danger, the Examinant told him, he had been with the Lord Seaforth, but had not the Certainty of things, deſiring he might go to the Lord Seaforth's again, and he ſhould learn all: And his Majeſty declaring, what Danger had been ſuggeſted to him, on the Return of the Marquis, the Examinant proteſted, he knew nothing againſt the Perſon of the Marquis; but that he was, for ought the Examinant knew, as good a Subject as any the King had.

A ſecond Examination of Lord Rea.

Then a ſecond Examination of the Lord Rea, taken the ſame 21ſt of June, 1631. was read, wherein he ſays, that having deliberately read over the Examination of the Lord Uchiltrie, taken the 20th Inſtant, he acknowledged, it was all true in Subſtance, unleſs in the following Particulars, viz. that he did not tell the Lord Uchiltrie, the 13th of May, that he had learned more Certainty than ever he had before; but that he had learnt more Certainty, ſince he came to England, than he had before; and that inſtead of ſaying, they intended to ſtrike off the Heads of all the principal Men about the King, the Examinant ſaid, he was informed, they would ſtrike off the Heads of the Spaniſh Faction; and named the Lord Treaſurer, the two Biſhops, the Earl Marſhal, the Earl of Carliſle, Sir Francis Cottington, the Lord Monteith, Sir William Alexander, Sir Thomas Hope, and Sir Kenelm Digby; and that he was ſo informed, touching the Spaniſh Faction, by Mr. Meldrum, and David Ramſay; and touching the Scots, by the Earl of Seaforth. He acknowledge, he ſaid, that ſince his coming to England, he had ſpoken with Sir James Ramſay, Sir James Hamilton, and Captain Douglas, and gotten ſomewhat out of every one of them; but denied, he had ſpoken with Alexander Hamilton, ſince his coming to England.

He denied, that either he, or the Lord Uchiltrie, ſaid, that he could ſay ſo much, as the Marquis ſhould not have the Face to deny it; but that he ſaid, he could bring as honeſt a Man, as this Examinant, that would tell to the Marquis's Face, more than this Examinant would do: And this he meant of the Lord Seaforth.

He confeſſed, he ſaid, Sir James Ramſay told him, he had fifteen hundred Men in Readineſs; but that he would not bring them together, till the Parties in Scotland were firſt ready: That Sir James told him as much; and that there were good Officers; and the Earl of Eſſex, and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, were Sureties for ſome of them; which was all he ſaid concerning the fifteen hundred Men.

That he was not acquainted with the Liſt of Names delivered by the Lord Uchiltrie to the Lord Treaſurer; nor had any thing to do therein.

1631. 6 Car. I.

A ſecond Examination of Lord Uchiltrie.

After which, the ſecond Examination of the Lord Uchiltrie, taken the 24th of June, 1631. was read; wherein he ſays, he was acquainted with the Buſineſs concerning the Marquis of Hamilton, by the Lord Rea: But that the Lord Rea was not privy to the Liſt of Names this Examinant delivered to the Lord Treaſurer; and that the Reaſon he did in that Paper mention the Lord Marquis, to be the prime Agent, was, the Lord Rea's telling him, the Lord Marquis's Followers had ſaid, the Intent of the Marquis's Levies was to invade Scotland: And if, out of his Care for the King's Safety, he had gone too far, he truſted his Majeſty would impute it to his Duty.

That being aſked, Why, in the ſaid Paper, he made the Earls of Melros, Roxburgh, and Buccleugh, to be Plotters, he ſaid, the Lord Rea told him, the Lord Seaforth had affirmed to him, that the Earls of Melros and Roxburgh were acquainted with the Particulars and Secrets of the Buſineſs; and that the Lord Rea ſaid, he could not gueſs who elſe ſhould be in the Plot, unleſs the Lord Buccleugh; of whom the Lord Rea ſaid, he heard him ſpeak terrible and preſumptuous Words againſt the King, at his own Table, in Holland.

That he might have miſtaken, when he ſaid, they intended to ſtrike off the Heads of All the principal Men; for, ſince he recollected himſelf, he believed the Lord Rea ſaid, they would ſtrike off the Heads of Many.

That he did ſtill avow, he ſaid before the Lord Treaſurer, that the Lord Rea could ſay ſo much, as the Marquis ſhould not have the Face to deny it: And that the Lord Rea being then preſent, and hearing it, did not gainſay it.

A third Examination of Lord Rea.

A third Examination of the Lord Rea, the 24th of June, alſo was read; wherein he ſays, that the firſt Time the Lord Seaforth had any Speech with him, touching the Earls of Melros and Roxburgh being privy to the Particulars and Secrets of the Lord Marquis's Buſineſs, was on Monday, after the Marquis's coming out of Scotland; and that the Lord Uchiltrie having ſome Diſcourſe with this Examinant, who might be likely to take Arms in Scotland, if the Marquis of Hamilton ſhould take up Arms; the ſaid Lord Uchiltrie, and not this Examinant, named the Lord Buccleugh; and that thereupon the Examinant told him, that at the Siege of the Boſch, he heard the Lord Buccleugh uſe ſome Words, whereby this Examinant took him to come malcontent out of England.

Lord Uchiltrie's Defence.

Theſe Examinations having been read in Evidence againſt the Lord Uchiltrie, his Advocates (or Counſel) objected, that they ought not to proceed againſt him in Scotland, but in England; and by the Laws of that Kingdom, as the Offence is alledged to be committed there.

To which the Lord Advocate anſwered, that his Majeſty, by his Letter, had ordered the Council, that he ſhould be tried by the Laws of Scotland; and that his Majeſty's Letter was grounded on the Civil and Common Law.

The

1631. 6 Car. I.

The Priſoner's Counſel replied, That his Majeſty's Letter muſt be underſtood without Prejudice to his lawful Defence; and, that the alledged Crimes contained in the Indictment, might be lawful in England, though criminal in Scotland: That there was no reaſon the Priſoner ſhould be puniſhed in Scotland, for a Fact committed in England, not puniſhable by the Laws of Engiand.

That the Facts laid in the Indictment had no Dependance, or Relation, to the Leaſings mentioned in the Acts therein recited: That it was incumbent on every Subject, that ſhould hear treaſonable Speeches, to reveal them, whether they were true or falſe; for that the Hearer was no Judge of: This could not be conſtrued a telling of Lies, to create Diſcord between the King and his People, but rather to ſuppreſs and prevent the ſame: That the concealing Treaſon was puniſhable by the Laws of all Nations, as well as thoſe of that Kingdom, and particularly by the Acts that had been cited; and conſequently the the Diſcovery of it could not be Criminal: That the ſame Acts that were made againſt Leaſing-making, required the Hearer of Treaſon, to reveal it on Pain of Death; ſo that the Priſoner was under a Neceſſity of diſcovering it.

Reply of the King's Advocate.

The King's Advocate replied, That if the Priſoner had confined himſelf within his Duty of Revealing the Treaſon, although it had been falſe, he would have deſerved to have been rewarded for it, rather than puniſhed: But when he had heard only ſome conjectural Speeches from the Lord Rea, and had thereupon poſitively charged the Marquis of Hamilton, and the Earls of Haddington, Roxburgh, and Buccleugh, with Treaſon, without ſufficient Grounds, adding twenty or thirty other Noblemen, as Adherents to them, and had uſed that Motto, Sir, Now either do or die, in order to incenſe his Majeſty to take ſome violent Courſe againſt the Marquis's Perſon, or Life; this might well be interpreted Leaſing-making, within the Acts of Parliament mentioned in the Indictment: The Priſoner was not proſecuted for relating what he had heard of the Lord Rea, but for the Additions and Comments he had made on that Relation.

The Priſoner's Defence continued.

The Priſoner's Counſel urged on the other Side, That he had added nothing but what might be ſupported by the Relation he had received from the Lord Rea; and that, if it agreed in Subſtance with what the Lord Rea had depoſed, and might be fairly deduced from it, the Priſoner could not be charged with Leaſing-making: There was no Neceſſity of his repeating the very Words the Lord Rea had uttered; and they inſiſted, that the Lord Rea's firſt Examination on the 18th of May, and ſigned by him, might be read in the Priſoner's Juſtification, which was with a great deal of Difficulty, at length, allowed to be read by the King's Advocate; in which the Lord Rea depoſed, That while he was at Stockholm, Colonel Alexander Hamilton, Brother to the Earl of Haddington, Sir James Hamilton, Son to the ſaid Earl, and two more of the Hamiltons, who were Officers in the King of Sweden's Army, quitted that Service, to ſerve under the Marquis of Hamilton: That drinking Healths one Night with the ſaid Hamiltons and David Ramſay, the Examinant aſked Colonel Alexander Hamilton the Marquis's Chriſtian Name, who anſwered, James, by the Grace of God; and Sir James added, King of Scotland, and it ſhould be ſo: That the ſame Night, being alone with David Ramſay, he told the Examinant of many Abuſes in the Court of England, laying the blame upon the Lord Treaſurer, and ſaid, Popery and Arminianiſm had ever come from the Biſhops: That there was nothing looked for, but Deſolation and Change in Religion; and that the poor Soul the King was blinded to his Ruin; and he had retired from Court, becauſe no honeſt Man could live there: And when the Examinant anſwered, there was no Remedy but Patience, Ramſay replied, By God, Donald, I will uſe your own Phraſe, We muſt help God to amend it: That demanding, what Content my Lord Marquis had at home, he ſaid, None; for the King had forced him to marry a Wife that was a very Beaſt: Adding, that the Lord Marquis was a good Proteſtant, and before it were long, he would let the World ſee his Aim was the Defence of Religion: To which the Examinant anſwered, it availed them little to make the Goſpel a fair Paſſage in Germany, if they loſt it at home: Whereupon Ramſay ſaid, There were many honeſt Men in their Land, and the Marquis would uſe his Army to protect them, which was his only Aim: That in July the Examinant met Mr. Meldrum at Stockholm, and aſking him, what News from England, he anſwered, Matters were worſe and worſe; the King gave greater Way to Papiſts and Arminians than before: That Cottington was gone to beg Peace with Spain: However, the Marquis governed all; was made Keeper of Windſor, and Knight of the Garter, and was to be Admiral of England: That the Examinant telling Meldrum, his Couſin David Ramſay had ended his Negotiation to his Mind; and that Alexander Hamilton was to get Powder, Arms, and Ammunition, for the Marquis, from Sweden; Meldrum threw down his Cap, cut a Caper, and ſaid, Good News; I am made for ever: But, good my Lord Rea, is this true? To which the Examinant anſwered, Yes; for I have one Double of the Contract; I am egaged in the Buſineſs to David Ramſay, Alexander Hamilton, and Sir James Hamilton, and by Letter to my Lord Hamilton. O! my Lord, ſaid Meldrum, that was the Work of God, and not Man, to inſpire your Lordſhip to go with us.

That Meldrum told Lindſay, a Friend of the Examinants, That ſix thouſand trained Soldiers would do the Turn, with their own Faction in the Country: That the next Day Meldrum ſaid to the Examinant, that King Charles was good for nothing; created for nothing but Deſolations, and undoing of Kingdoms, Religion, and People: There was no way but to immure him, or clap him in a Dungeon, which was eaſy to be done; for after the Men were liſted in Scotland, they might take a Month's Time to learn to handle their Arms at Leith, without Suſpicion; and might ſeize on the Caſtles of Edinburg, Stirling, and Dumbarton, in one Night; and having fortified Leith, and taken Berwick, they might afterwards march into England: That Meldrum added, he was writing a Declaration of the Juſtice of the Mar-

1631. 6 Car. I. Marquis's Quarrel, with the tyrannical Uſage and Sufferings of the Church under King James, and now worſe groaning under his Son, with the Hamilton's clear Title to the Crown; and that nine of the beſt Earls in Scotland would live and die with them: That the Body of England was alſo with them, and ſome of the Nobility, for evil Will to the Treaſurer: That the next Day, there coming News of the Birth of the Prince, the Examinant demanded, if that would cool the Marquis's Intentions; whereupon Meldrum ſighed, and ſaid, Not if the King and Queen of Bohemia would give their Daughter to the Marquis, as they had promiſed.

That meeting Meldrum afterwards at Leſlie's Tent, Meldrum took the Examinant aſide, and related ſome Converſation he had with the Secretary of Sweden: Said, he told the Secretary, that it was greatly for the Advantage of his Maſter, whoſe Ambition was without Limits, that the Marquis ſhould raiſe a War in Britain; for, if the King of Sweden would reduce Denmark, his Britiſh Majeſty would not be able to aſſiſt his Uncle; and the Swediſh Secretary anſwered, That we care not for, nor do we fear your King; for if he would not help his own Siſter, he will never help his Uncle: That Meldrum added, they intended to caſt the Prince into Priſon with his Father, and ſend the Queen home to her Mother: That they would impriſon their Adverſaries, till all was their own; and the Marquis would take Pledges of all that ſtood Neuter.

That the Examinant going afterwards to Holland, met David Ramſay at Amſterdam, who brought him a Letter of Compliment and Thanks from the Marquis: Told him, all went right with the Marquis; and he had gotten ten thouſand Pounds from the King, and the Wine-Cuſtoms of Scotland for ſixteen Years, which he would ſell: That all Things went on without Obſtacle; they only ſtaid for Arms and Ammunition, eſpecially Powder, and deſired the Examinant to preſs the Swediſh Ambaſſador hard for ſome: That aſking where their Forces were to meet, Ramſay ſaid upon the Sea, and afterwards land in Scotland or England; but he would ſay no more: The Marquis would communicate things to him that he durſt not.

Ramſay alſo ſaid, That England had made a Peace with Spain very prejudicial to the Hollander: That Carliſle, Cottington, Kenelm Digby, and the Spaniſh Faction, had prevailed on the King to bar the Hollander from Fiſhing, which fell out luckily for them; and deſired the Examinant to make an Intereſt with the Prince of Orange and the States, to aſſiſt the Marquis; which he did.

That at the Examinants coming to England, he waited on the Marquis, who returned him Thanks, and ſaid, he would detain him with him, aſſuring the Examinant, that he that would hazard himſelf with him in this Buſineſs, it ſhould be a tye to him and his Poſterity, to hazard his Fortune and Eſtate with him and his.

That the Marquis going down to Greenwich in a Barge, with Sir James Ramſay, Sir James Hamilton, and ſome other Scots Gentlemen, the Marquis's Dependants, it was moved, If they went to make an Inſurrection, where they ſhould begin; and the Marquis anſwered, he would march to London directly; and the ſame Day the Marquis told the Examinant, he would ſell the Wine Cuſtoms, for he expected no more from England: That Captain Douglas told the Examinant, that they ſhould have a hundred Barrels of Powder from the King, and they would make a ſhift for Arms: That Sir James Ramſay told the Examinant the laſt Sunday at Greenwich, he had 1500 Men in Readineſs on a Week's Notice, or leſs; and he ſtaid only till he heard the Men of Scotland were ready; and that he ſhould meet them at the Rendezvous at Norwich; and Sir James Hamilton told him, the Engliſh Rendezvous would be at Harwich: That the Earl of Roxburgh told the Examinant, that he, and others, the Marquis's Friends, were at firſt againſt theſe Courſes; but ſince they ſaw his Lordſhip ſo far engaged, and, that he only aimed at the Glory of God, he and all his Friends would put to their helping Hand: That the Marquis thought himſelf ever bound to the Examinant, and ſo did all his Friends; and he (Lord Roxburgh) aſſured him, he truſted him; and that he never took a more faſt and real Friend by the Hand. 1631. 6 Car. I.

After the reading this Depoſition of the Lord Rea's, the King's Advocate obſerved, that it was plain the Priſoner had affirmed the Treaſon poſitively; and that the Marquis was prime Agent; together with the Speeches ſpoken to his Majeſty on the Sunday after Dinner; as alſo his calling the Earls of Haddington, Roxburgh, and Buccleugh, Plotters: And that he had no Warrant from the Lord Rea for theſe Allegations; for the Repreſentation made by the Priſoner of the prime Agent and Plotters, was given in on the 16th of May, whereas the Lord Rea's Examination was not given in till the 18th of the ſame Month.

To this the Priſoner's Counſel anſwered, that when he charged the Marquis, and the other three Lords, with Treaſon, he did not do it of his own Knowledge, but added, as he was informed, which acquitted him of being a Leaſing-maker, or Forger of Lies: And, that he ſpoke it by Information, was clear by his own Depoſitions, as well as by the Depoſition of the Lord Rea, who acknowledged the Priſoner's Depoſition to be true, in all Points, to the beſt of his Knowledge: Nor was it ever heard, or practiſed, that any Subject being neceſſitated by Law to reveal what concerned the King or the State, and revealing the ſame with his Informer, and conſtantly abiding thereby, and willing to maintain the ſame upon any Torture, or Trial, whatever, that the Revealer, upon the Party's Denial, ſhould be called in Queſtion of his Life, as the Deviſer and Forger: And, if this ſhould now be made a Precedent, Conſpirators againſt the Government might be ſecure; becauſe no Man durſt reveal their Treaſons for the future.

And, whereas it is objected, that the Priſoner could not have his Information from the Lord Rea, becauſe he gave in a Liſt of the Lords concerned in the Plot on the 16th of May, and the Lord Rea's Depoſitions were not made till the 18th; they anſwer, that the Lord Rea gave this Information verbally to the Priſoner, on the 13th of May, though he did not put it in writing till the 18th; and this appear-

1631. 5 Car. I. ed from the Priſoner's Examination, and by the Account the Lord Rea gave of the Conſpiracy, on the 14th and 15th of that Month: Who then declared, that the Subſtance of what the Priſoner had related was true.

As to the Repreſentation, and Liſt of Names given in by the Priſoner, his Counſel anſwered, That theſe were written and given in upon the Lord Treaſurer's enquiring into the Friendſhips, Blood, and Intereſt of the Lord Marquis, that he might make an Eſtimate of his Power and Influence in Scotland, in caſe his Friends ſhould join him; and this was clear from the Writing itſelf, wherein it is ſtiled a Repreſentation, and not an Information, or Accuſation; there was no Intention to caſt any Reflection on the Lord Marquis, or the other three Noblemen, by that Writing.

As to the Words do or die, it was a uſual Phraſe, and imported no more than ſee to your Safety; being a faithful Advice to his Majeſty, and not a malicious Counſel to draw Miſchief upon any other: He had no Intention to inſtigate, or ſtir up his Majeſty, to any violent Courſe againſt the Marquis's Life and Honour; but to prevail on his Majeſty to go to London for his Security, as appeared by other Words he uſed at the ſame Time: Nor could the Words, do or die, be interpreted Leaſing-making, becauſe they were not Words of Affirmation, but of Counſel or Advice: That, whether the Lord Rea's Information was true or falſe, the Priſoner could not be charged with Leaſing-making, ſince it appeared, what he related came from the Lord Rea, who, at his firſt Examination, when the King aſked him, Why he had not revealed the Matter ſooner, anſwered, becauſe it concerned the Marquis of Hamilton, who was ſo near to his Majeſty; from whence it appears, that the Lord Rea accuſed the Marquis, and that the Priſoner only revealed what he had from that Lord: And, as for the Lord Rea's ſaying, he knew nothing againſt the Perſon of the Marquis afterwards, it was not to be regarded, becauſe it contradicted what he ſaid before. It was inſiſted alſo, that the Lord Rea was but one Witneſs; that he was not upon Oath; and, that he ought to have given his Teſtimony viva voce: And, beſides, his Evidence ought not to be admitted in this Caſe, becauſe it tended chiefly to excuſe himſelf, and to aſperſe the Priſoner, who, according to his Duty, had revealed theſe Treaſons, as he heard them, to the King, which he was obliged to do, whether they were true or falſe: The Lord Rea was to anſwer for the Truth of the Facts he acquainted the Priſoner with.

The King's Advocate replied, That the Priſoner could not juſtify himſelf by any Thing the Lord Rea had related to him; for he received no poſitive Information from the Lord Rea, againſt the Marquis; or had any Warrant from him to call him Party or Prime Agent; and in Matters of this high Nature, ſuch as Treaſon, no Illation by Conſequence was to be permitted, at the Peril of him who made the Inference. That in all Rea's written Relation, there was not a Word ſpoken directly againſt the Marquis, neither by David Ramſay, or by Robert Meldrum; but only ſome mad frantick Speeches uttered by Meldrum on his own Imagination, or Wiſh to have it ſo, for the Diſturbance of the State, by expreſſing the manner, how ſuch an Enterprize, according to his fooliſh Opinion, might be performed. Not a Word of Meldrum's hearing that from my Lord Marquis, or from any, who declared they heard the Marquis ſpeak it: And, as to Ramſay, the worſt that he ſaid was, that the Marquis was diſcontented; and, that his Deſign in levying Forces was for the Protection of Religion, meaning that glorious Enterprize for the Aſſiſtance of the King of Sweden, which could never ſupport the Speeches ſpoken by the Priſoner to his Majeſty, viz. That it was a Treaſon; an odious Treaſon; and the Lord Marquis a Party; That it was the filthieſt Treaſon that ever was intended; and, that he (the Priſoner) was ſorry that any Scotchman ſhould have fallen into it, it being a Shame to the whole Nation. Which was a poſitive Affirmation, not as the Priſoner was informed, but as he himſelf did infer, upon the Relation made to him by the Lord Rea, who would give the Priſoner no Aſſurance he had any certain Grounds, as was manifeſt from the Priſoner's Depoſition on the 20th of June.

1631. 6 Car. I.

The Priſoner's Counſel ſtill inſiſted, that he could not be charged with Leaſing-making, becauſe the Lord Rea was preſent, when he informed the Lord Treaſurer and the King of the Treaſon, and did not contradict any Part of the Information, but aſſented to the Truth of it: That the Form of Speech was not in queſtion here, but the Matter; and if the Priſoner had reported in other Words, or by a Deſcription, or Paraphraſe, that which the Lord Rea related to him, without changing or altering the Subſtance, he had committed no Fault, nor could be eſteemed a Leaſing-maker.

The Priſoner, having repeated the Subſtance of his Defence to the Jury, added, that he did not charge the ſaid four Noblemen with Treaſon; he only charged the Lord Rea as his Informer and Author; humbly atteſting, that if the Lord Rea contradicted him in any eſſential Points, he did him Wrong; and, if his Majeſty would pleaſe to let the Lord Rea be confronted with him, his Innocence would appear: But, if not, he was ready to hazard his Life to the Glory of God, and the clearing the Truth of the Buſineſs, with a Proteſtation, that he carried no Malice againſt the Lord Rea: That, if the Buſineſs could not be decided this Way; or, if his Majeſty was pleaſed to admit of Torture before a Trial by Duel, he (the Priſoner) was ready to bear out the Torture with him, and to be tried thereby with the ſaid Lord Rea.

Then his Majeſty's Letter to the Privy-Counſel of Scotland was read, wherein he declares the Marquis of Hamilton, and the other three Lords, innocent of what they were accuſed; and that the prime Informer had cleared them upon Oath, teſtifying them (as his Majeſty knew them to be) as good and faithful Subjects as were in his Kingdoms: And whereas he had formerly recommended to them, the promoting the Levies, and Tranſportation of the Men that were to ſerve under the Marquis; he again, required them to contribute their beſt Help and and Authority to effect the ſame.

Dated at Greenwich, the 29th of June, 1631.

1631. 6 Car. I.

After which, the Lord Advocate ſummed up the Evidence for the four Lords, and made his his Obſervations upon it, as the Priſoner's Counſel did on his Part. But I do not meet with any Arguments, but what had been made uſe of before, and, therefore, it is not neceſſary to take any further Notice of them.

The Court being adjourned to the 1ſt of February, I preſume the Jury then found the Priſoner Guilty; but the Editor is perfectly ſilent in that Matter, and only relates, that he was then ſentenced to perpetual Impriſonment; and, it appears, he remained a Priſoner in Blackneſs Caſtle twenty Years.

Remarks on the Trial of the Lord Uchiltrie.

As I cannot pretend to any Knowledge in the Laws of Scotland, my Remarks on this Trial will be but ſhort. It muſt be confeſſed, that there are ſome Things that appear very extraordinary in it; and particularly the ſending down a Nobleman to Scotland, to be tried in that Kingdom for a Fact committed in England. Nor was it leſs ſtrange, that he ſhould be tried for his Life, for revealing a Treaſon, when he produced the Perſon himſelf who gave him the Information, and actually atteſted the Subſtance of it: The Influence of the Hamiltons, and his Majeſty's Confidence in them, was certainly very great at that Time, and their ſubſequent Conduct gave the World but too much Reaſon to ſuſpect that the Lord Uchiltrie had very hard Meaſure. I ſhall ſay no more, but leave the Reader to judge of the Caſe, from theſe Proceedings, and the Hiſtory of this Reign. 1631. 6 Car. I.

Lord Audley's Trial, for a Rape, and Sodomy.

The Trial of MERVIN Lord AUDLEY, Earl of Caſtlehan, for a Rape and Sodomy, before the Lord Keeper Coventry, Lord High Steward, and the reſt of the Peers commiſſioned to try him, 25 April, 1631. 7 Car. I.

1631. 7 Car. I.

Three Indictments found againſt him.

THREE Indictments had been found againſt this Lord by the Grand Jury at the preceding Lent Aſſizes for Wiltſhire. The firſt for a Rape on his own Wife, whom he held by Force, while one of his Servants lay with her: And the other two Indictments were for Buggery with a Man.

Reſolutions of the Judges, in Caſes of Rape and Sodomy.

Before the Trial, the Judges came to the following Reſolutions, on certain Queries, ſent them by the Lord High Steward:

1. That a Peer could not be tried by a common Jury, but muſt be tried by his Peers.

2. That a Peer could not challenge any of his Peers.

3. That a Peer could not have Counſel, but on Points of Law.

4. That his own Examinations taken without Oath, might be read againſt him; but the Examinations of others muſt be upon Oath.

5. That the Wife, in caſe of a Rape, being the Party wronged, may be Evidence againſt her Huſband.

6. That where one ſtood mute in a Rape he might have his Clergy; but not in Buggery.

7. That to denominate the Offence a Rape, there muſt be Penetration.

8. That the Lords Triers might eat and drink before they agreed; but could not ſeparate, or adjourn, till they gave their Verdict.

9. That a Peer could not be convicted by leſs than twelve Peers.

10. That if a Priſoner ſtood mute in an Appeal, he muſt be hanged; for that it was an Attainder.

11. That a Peer ſtanding mute in an Indictment, might be preſſed to Death.

12. That the Lord High Steward, after a Verdict, might take Time to adviſe upon a Point of Law; and his Office continued till Judgment given.

It was reſolved alſo, That if a Woman was a Whore, ſhe might however be raviſhed: But it was a good Plea for the Man, that ſhe was his Concubine. And that, if a Man took a Maid by Force, and raviſhed her, and ſhe afterwards gave her Conſent, and married him, this would not purge the Offence, but it was ſtill a Rape.

The ſaid ſeveral Indictments being certified, and brought into Court, and the Priſoner commanded to the Bar, the Evidence was produced: And firſt, the Examination of the Lady Audley, as to the Rape, who depoſed, that her Lord (the Priſoner) called his Servant Brodway, into his Bed while ſhe was aſleep: That ſhe waked, and made all the Reſiſtance ſhe could; but his Lordſhip held both her Hands, and one of her Legs, till Brodway lay with her: That, as ſoon as ſhe got from him, ſhe would have killed herſelf with a Knife, and that Brodway forced it from her. Brodway's Examination alſo was read, who confeſſed, that his Lordſhip called him into his Bed, and bid him lie with his Lady; and, that he did lie with her, whilſt his Lord held one of her Legs and both her Hands.

The Lady's Evidence of the Rape.

The Raviſher's Examination read.

As to the Sodomy, Brodway depoſed, That the Earl uſed his Body as the Body of a Woman; but never pierced it, only emitted between his Thighs.

Evidence of his Sodomy with Brodway.

Fitz-Patrick, another Servant, depoſed, That his Lord had twice committed Sodomy with him (the Deponent): That Henry Skipwith, another Servant, had lain with the Lady Audley, by his Lord's Command, and in his Preſence: But the Lady, in her Examination, ſays, ſhe cried out, and that Skipwith did not lie with her.

With FitzPatrick.

Evidence of the Pains Lord Audley took, to debauch his Wife and Family.

The Lady Audley alſo depoſed, That the firſt or ſecond Night after ſhe was married, her Lord called Ampthill (who had been his Page, and to whom he had married his Daughter) to his Bedſide ſide, and ſaid, Now her Body was his, and, if ſhe loved him, ſhe muſt love Ampthill: That he made Skipwith come naked into his Chamber; and delighted to call in his Men-ſervants, and ſhew her their Nudities, recommending the largeſt to her.

1631. 7 Car. I.

His Son's Wife abuſed

Skipwith alſo depoſed, That his Lord made him lie with the young Lady Audley, his Son's Wife, who was then but twelve Years of Age: That he could not enter her at firſt, and the Lord Audley fetched Oil to open her Body, but ſhe cried out, and he could not enter her yet; then his Lord ordered Oil to be brought a ſecond Time, and the Deponent entered her.

The young Lady alſo depoſed, That the Lord Audley ſaw Skipwith lie with her ſeveral Times; and, that nine Servants of the Family alſo had ſeen it: That ſhe had no other Maintenance than what ſhe had from Skipwith; and that, among other Arguments the Priſoner uſed to make her lie with Skipwith, he told her her Huſband did not love her; and threatened to turn her out of Doors, if ſhe would not: Adding, that he would tell her Huſband ſhe did, if ſhe did not; and confirmed the Circumſtance, of their uſing Oil to penetrate her Body.

That the Priſoner made his Servants lie with a Whore before him.

Fitz-Patrick alſo depoſed, That his Lordſhip kept a Whore in the Houſe; and, that he made four or five of his Servants lie with her in his Preſence; and his Lordſhip lay with her in their Sight.

Other Points of Law reſolved by the Judges.

The Judges Opinion being demanded on ſome Parts of the Evidence, reſolved, That it was Buggery within the Statute, where the Body is uſed ſo far as to emit thereon, without Penetration: And ſo, where there was an Emiſſion upon a Woman's Belly, it ought to be adjudged a Rape: And that in a Rape a Woman is not limited to any Time to make her Complaint, if the Proceſs be by Indictment; but in an Appeal ſhe is.

Lord Audley's Defence.

The Lord Audley, in his Defence, ſaid, That his Wife's Teſtimony ought not to be regarded, ſince ſhe had confeſſed her lying with Brodway. To which it was anſwered, he could not urge that Fact in his Defence, ſince he had forced her to ſuffer it. Then he ſaid, that his Wife and his Servants were not competent Witneſſes; and that they were put upon practiſing againſt him by his Son, who ſought his Life: Adding, That his Wife had been falſe to his Bed, and had a Child in his Abſence; and then made Proteſtations of his Innocence. But Woe to that Man (he ſaid) whoſe Wife and Servants ſhould be admitted Witneſſes againſt him, and whoſe Son conſpired his Death! His Son was now come of Age, and wanted his Lands, and his Wife a young Huſband, now he was grown old, and had therefore plotted his Deſtruction.

He is convicted both of Rape and Buggery.

The Lords Triers having been withdrawn ſome Time, returned, and were unanimous in their Opinion, that the Priſoner was GUILTY of the Rape: But as to the Sodomy, eleven of his Peers were of Opinion, that he was NOT GUILTY, and ſixteen declared him GUILTY; which Difference of Opinion ſeems to have ariſen from the Evidence that Brodway gave, that the Lord emitted between his Thighs, but never penetrated him.

He is executed.

Judgment was afterwards paſſed upon the Priſoner, that he ſhould be hanged: However, he obtained the Favour of being headed; when he profeſſed himſelf perfectly innocent of the Crimes he was charged with. 1631. 7 Car. I.

Fitz-Patrick tried, and convicted of Sodomy.

The Lord Audley's two Servants, Lawrence Fitz-Patrick and Giles Brodway, were brought to their Trials, the firſt for Sodomy, and the other for a Rape, June 27. 1631; when Fitz-Patrick's Confeſſion was produced againſt him, as Evidence of his having committed Sodomy with his Lord; and the Jury deſired to be informed, if the Perſon who ſuffered the Buggery to be committed upon him, could be ſaid to commit Buggery, as the Words of the Statute were. To which the Lord Chief Juſtice anſwered, That every Acceſſary to a Felony, was a Felon in Law: And the Priſoner voluntarily proſtituting his Body, when he was not only of Underſtanding and Years, to know the Heinouſneſs of the Offence, but of Strength to reſiſt his Lord, he was guilty of Buggery.

Another Point of Law reſolved.

Fitz-Patrick's Defence.

The Priſoner in his Defence inſiſted, That the Evidence he had given for the King, at his Lord's Trial, ought not to be produced againſt him at a Trial for the ſame Fact: But the Court anſwered, it might; and that it was ſufficient to convict him: Whereupon the Jury found him GUILTY.

Brodway tried, and convicted, of a Rape.

At Brodway's Trial the Lady Audley appeared in Court, and gave the ſame Evidence of the Priſoner's committing a Rape upon her, while her Huſband held her, as ſhe had done at her Lord's Trial: And the Court demanding, whether the Priſoner entered her Body, when he forced her, ſhe anſwered, He did; and ſhe intended to have expreſſed as much at the Lord Audley's Trial: And Brodway having confeſſed as much before, the Jury found him Guilty; and they were both hanged, confeſſing the Facts at their Executions.

They are both executed.

Remarks on the Trial of Lord Audley, and his Servants.

In theſe Trials it appears, That Emiſſion, either in Rape, or Buggery, compleats the Offence, though there were no Penetration; for Emiſſion is ſaid to be, prima facie, an Evidence of Penetration. But where it was poſitively ſworn, that there was no Penetration, as in the Trial of this Buggery, the Evidence ſurely ought to have been taken entire, and no Preſumption allowed againſt poſitive Proof. And, when both Brodway and Fitz-Patrick had been Evidence for the King againſt the Lord Audley, it ſeems a little hard, to produce their own Depoſitions againſt themſelves, and hang them upon that Evidence. Wherever an Offender is made an Evidence againſt his Accomplice at this Day, his Life is ſpared: Nor is it any Objection to his Teſtimony, that he ſwears to ſave his own Life; though, were he convicted, or but indicted for the Offence, it is admitted, he could not be a Witneſs againſt his Fellow-Priſoners: But, for my Part, I cannot ſee why his Teſtimony is not as good, after he is indicted, as before; for, in both Caſes, he gives his Evidence to ſave himſelf.

It may be gathered alſo, from theſe Trials, that this old laſcivious Lord had continued theſe infamous Courſes in his Houſe for many Years; for the Lady depoſes, that he propoſed his Servants lying with her, and inſiſted on her ſubmitting to their Luſt, the very firſt or ſecond Night of their Marriage. And upon this, it appears to have been made a Queſtion, Whether the the Lady ſhould be admitted an Evidence of the Rape on her Body, after ſo many Years elapſed, when ſhe had never complained of it before? And, though it was reſolved ſhe might; yet, it is allowed to be a ſtrong Preſumption againſt a Woman, if ſhe make no Complaint in a reaſonable Time. Indeed, it ſeems pretty plain, that this Lord had been ſo ſucceſsful in debauching his Family, and contributing to his own Diſhonour, that he had made them almoſt as bad as himſelf: The Lady, after ſhe had been expoſed to his Servants, and forced to lie commonly in the ſame Bed with them and her Lord, ſeems to have loſt all Modeſty at length, and to have ſubmitted to their Embraces: For he inſiſts upon it in his Defence, that ſhe was a leud Woman, and was got with Child in his Abſence; which, probably, was the Occaſion of that Queſtion, Whether a Woman, that was voluntarily a Whore to ſome, ſhould be allowed to ſwear a Rape againſt others? And we find the Lady inſiſting, that ſhe never had ſubmitted to any Man till ſhe was raviſhed by Brodway; which ſeems to admit, ſhe did afterwards: And we find that poor young Lady, his Son's Wife, acknowledging, that after Skipwith had once lay with her, ſhe ſubmitted to his Embraces frequently, by her Father-in-Law's Command, even in the Preſence of this Lord and his Servants; which muſt certainly give his Son, the young Lord Audley, the laſt Uneaſineſs, and put him upon proſecuting his Father. Another Reaſon, that the Lady and her Son commenced this Proſecution, after they had forborne ſo long, was, that they ſaw his Lordſhip ſettling great Part of his Eſtate upon that infamous Pack of Servants, who had been the Partners of his Crimes, and that they ſhould be reduced to a ſtarving Condition, by his Bounty to them, if there was not a Stop put to it. And though it may be objected, that the Son's impeaching his Father was the Way to loſe his Eſtate, which would be forfeited to the Crown by his Conviction; there was no doubt to be made, but ſo virtuous a Prince as King Charles I. would reſtore it to the Son, who had been ſo notoriouſly wronged by his Father, both in the debauching his Wife, and ſquandering away the Eſtate of the Family on ſuch vile Wretches.

The Information.

THE Information, exhibited by Sir Robert Heath the Attorney-General, ſet forth, That, whereas his Majeſty was ſupreme Head of the Church: That all Churches were ſacred, and both founded and maintained by Regal Power; and that no Perſon ought to make any Alterations in the Structure or Ornament of Churches, without Licence of the Biſhop of of the Dioceſe, or the Ordinary for the Time being, who derived their Authority from the King: Nevertheleſs, the ſaid Henry Sherfield, the Defendant, being an Inhabitant of the ſaid Pariſh of St. Edmonds, did, in January, in the 5th Year of this King, conſpire with ſome factious Perſons, to deface a Window in the ſaid Church, which was an antient fair Window, containing the Hiſtory of the Creation: And that, notwithſtanding the Biſhop of Sarum commanded the contrary, and made a publick Act thereof, the Defendant, in October following, getting the Keys of the Church, locked himſelf in, and there beat down the ſaid Window, and utterly defaced it; and afterwards boaſted that he was a Defacer of Idolatry; for which Offence the Attorney-General demanded Juſtice.

The Defendant's Anſwer.

To this Charge the Defendant put in his Anſwer, and ſaid, that the Church of St. Edmonds antiently belonged to a Monaſtery, and with it came to the Crown in the Reign of King Henry VIII. and there remained till King James granted it to Gouge and Lloyd, who afterwards granted it to Bartholmew Tookey, and others, to the Uſe of the Pariſh of St. Edmonds; ſo that the Right of the Church was in the Pariſhioners (of whom he was one) and they were ſeized thereof, as of their Lay-Fee; and that the ſaid Church was exempt from the Juriſdiction of the Biſhop of Sarum: That they, as lawful Owners, had Power, without the Biſhop, to take down or ſet up any Window, and to do any other thing in repairing, or adorning the ſaid Church, and for Reformation of ſuch Things as were amiſs in the ſame.

That the Pariſhioners and Veſtry-Men of the ſaid Pariſh, had, Time out of Mind, made Orders for the making of new Windows, for Alterations in the Seats, and many other Things for Ornament, and otherwiſe, without the Licence of the ſaid Biſhop, or any other Ordinary.

That as to the Window, ſaid to contain the Hiſtory of the Creation; it was not a true Relation, or agreeable to the Deſcription contained in the Books of Moſes: That there was the Figure of a little old Man in a blue and red Coat, for God the Father. And in placing the ſeveral Days Works of God in the Creation, they had ſet the fourth before the third; and that which was done on the 5th Day, to be done on the 6th Day: And in one Place God the Father was repreſented as creating the Sun and Moon, with a Pair of Compaſſes in his Hand, as if he had done them according to geometrical Rules.

That it was not one of the faireſt Windows in the Church, but an ordinary Window, and the Damage done to it very inconſiderable: And he conceived, the defacing this prophane Repreſentation of God the Father, was not ſo heinous

heinous a Crime as to deſerve the Cenſure of that Court: That, in his Judgment, it was utterly unlawful to make ſuch Repreſentations of God the Father; and he looked upon himſelf to be juſtified in defacing it, by the Orders iſſued in Queen Elizabeth's Reign, for taking down and aboliſhing of ſuperſtitious Images and Pictures, eſpecially in Churches: That he had alſo the Authority of a Veſtry, for doing it; which being aſſembled in January, 1629. ordered, that the Defendant might, if he pleaſed, take down the ſaid Glaſs Window, ſo as, at his own Coſt, he repaired the ſame with plain Glaſs: And that the Glazier might not miſtake the Window, he confeſſed he pulled down with his Staff, two or three ſmall Quarreys of Glaſs, and ſo left it to the Church-wardens, to repair it.

That the Defendant's Seat in this Church happened to be ſo placed, that he had the ſaid Window always in his Eye, which had troubled his Conſcience for twenty Years; and this had induced him to procure the ſaid Order of Veſtry: That he had done it without any Diſturbance; not to arrogate to himſelf any Authority, but as bound to do what he did, to preſerve a good Conſcience: That he, and the other Defendants, were Juſtices of Peace, and not altogether private Perſons, and were alſo entruſted by the Pariſhioners to ſee the thing done.

And he denied, that the Biſhop of Sarum ſent to him, to forbid his taking the Window down, or that he had any Notice of ſuch Inhibition: But, that on the contrary, he often attended the Biſhop, and his Lordſhip never mentioned the thing to him; and therefore the Charge, that it was done againſt the Biſhop's Directions, was not true: But this Defendant did aver, that what he had done, was lawfully done: And to all the other Offences he pleaded NOT GUILTY.

The Solicitor's Obſervations on it.

Upon reading the Anſwer in Court, the Solicitor-General obſerved, that the Defendant had confeſſed the Charge, and juſtified it; ſo that there was no Occaſion for any further Examinations, or Interrogatories; the ſole Queſtion was, Whether a Pariſhioner might of himſelf pull down, and ſet up, what he conceived to be idolatrous, and ſo take upon him to be a Reformer?

The Evidence againſt the Defendant.

Then the Depoſitions of the Witneſſes were read, who teſtified, that a little after Michaelmas, about Four in the Afternoon, the Defendant went to the Sexton's, and having gotten the Key of the Church-door, locked himſelf into the Church, and ſtanding upon one of the Seats, broke the Window with a little black Staff, with a Spike at the End of it: That while he was doing this, he fell off the Seat, and hurt himſelf to that Degree, that he lay groaning on the Floor a conſiderable Time, and was carried home on Horſeback; and that he was forced to keep his Houſe for a Month: That the Window was broken in eleven Places; and that after this, the Windows of the Church were broken by others: Inſomuch that, they were forced to ſet a Watch for a Fortnight, to prevent further Miſchief.

Another Witneſs depoſed, that he heard the Defendant ſay, he would have taken down the Window, but the Biſhop's Chancellor oppoſed him, though he knew not why he ſhould; for it was a Lay-Fee.

1632. 8 Car. I.

Another depoſed, that Mr. Sherfield moved the Veſtry about this Matter; and they all conſented to it, except two, who ſaid, they deſired to have the Biſhop's Leave for doing it; and Sherfield anſwered, Do not trouble yourſelves; I will give my Lord Biſhop Satisfaction: That the Deponent was afterwards Church-warden of the Pariſh; and the Biſhop, having heard of the Order of Veſtry, ſent for him, and commanded, that it ſhould not be executed; and that the Biſhop made a publick Act thereof. The Counſel for the Biſhop alſo acknowledged, that the Church was a Parochial Church, and ſubject to the Biſhop's Juriſdiction; and that their Client was miſtaken in that Point, when he put in his Anſwer; and did not now inſiſt on it.

Obſervations of the King's Counſel on the the Evidence.

Then the King's Counſel obſerved, that the Queſtion was not, what was fit to be in a Church; but that he had taken upon him to determine, what was fit: That the Church was governed by Biſhops, and this was a Parochial Church, the Defendant knew very well, being himſelf a Pariſhioner; and though his Counſel declined it, his Defence was, that it was a Lay-Fee, and that he had Authority to pull down the Window: That he was well acquainted with the Biſhop, and yet never deſired his Leave to take it down; but applied to the Veſtry, for Power to do it: That he pretended to juſtify the Fact alſo, as he was a Juſtice of Peace; but the Matter appertained to the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction: And it was ſtrange, if the Defendant being a Veſtry-man, had not Notice of the Biſhop's Inhibition: That, if it was done by the Agreement of the Veſtry, why was it done ſo privately, and none of the Veſtry with him? And laſtly, why was not the Order of Veſtry purſued, by taking down the Glaſs, and putting up other Glaſs in the Room of it? What Authority had the Defendant to break the Window, inſtead of repairing it, as the Veſtry ordered?

The Defendant's Counſel anſwer the Charge.

To this the Defendant's Counſel anſwered, that they acknowledged he did take down Part of the Glaſs; but ſaid, it did not appear he had any Notice of the Biſhop's Inhibition: That their Client was no Sectary, or factious Perſon, as was charged, but always comformable to the Rights and Ceremonies of the Church, and had been very active in his Station, to puniſh Separatiſts: That he had not done this of his own Head, or out of a private Spirit, but that the Paſtor of the Church, and the Veſtry, as well as himſelf, conceived the Picture to be idolatrous, and that it ought to be removed, and accordingly made an Order for removing it; and that it was not done in Oppoſition to the Church-Government, or Governors: And, beſides all the Canons and Conſtitutions for taking away ſuch ſuperſtitious and idolatrous Relicks, they ſhould prove, in Fact, that there had been much Idolatry committed with this Picture. They did not go about to entitle the Veſtry to any Juriſdiction; they knew they were ſubordinate to the Biſhop, and he might puniſh them, if they abuſed their Power: But though they have not legally a Juriſdiction, they do de facto meet, and do ſuch Things: And the Queſtion was, Whether it could be a Crime, when the Curate and Church-wardens aſſented to it, according to the Statute.

1632. 8 Car. I.

The Defendant's Proofs.

Then the Injunctions in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth were read, empowering Commiſſioners to take away things of this Nature; and the like in the firſt of King James.

The Depoſitions of the Defendant's Witneſſes alſo were read, who teſtified, that he was conformable to the Church, and received the Lord's Supper kneeling.

That the Veſtry-men of the ſaid Pariſh had often ordered Seats in the Church to be taken down, and new ones made; and taken down Windows, Walls, and Pieces of the ſame Church; altered the Reading-Deſk, and ſet up the Pulpit in a new Place; without any ſpecial Order from the Biſhop, or Ordinary.

That on the 16th of January, 1629. there was an Order of Veſtry, for taking down the ſaid Window, becauſe it darkened the Church; and for that it was ſuperſtitious; and that five of the Veſtry-men were Juſtices of Peace in the ſaid City of New Sarum.

The Vicar of the Pariſh alſo depoſed, that the Defendant was conformable; and that the Damage done to the Window, was a Trifle: That there was in it a Picture of God the Father, creating the Heavens, Earth, Sun, Moon, and all Animals: But this Hiſtory of the Creation contained many Miſtakes, Falſities, and Abſurdities: That he had ſeen ſome People kneeling down, and adoring the old Man in it, which repreſented God the Father.

The King's Counſel reply.

Then Mr. Attorney obſerved, that there was a great deal of Difference between Repairing and Reforming: That Reformation ought always to be done by the Supreme Power, not by private Men. When private Perſons, or Veſtries, took upon them Reformation, he would be bold to ſay, This was the ready Way to bring all into Confuſion. If this was ſuffered, what would they do next? Some held our Churches unclean and idolatrous, becauſe Common Prayers were ſaid in them, and Maſſes had heretofore been ſaid in them; and they would proceed ſhortly to take away the Churches themſelves. As to the kneeling down to the Windows, ſome would do the ſame to the Picture of a Saint, or a Prophet; and by the ſame Rule Mr. Sherfield might pull down the painted Windows of Lincoln's-Inn Chappel (where he was a Bencher): But, if he thought the Window an Occaſion of Idolatry, why did not he complain of it to the Ordinary, in all the twenty Years, he ſaid, it had been an Offence to him? If he thought it an Occaſion of Idolatry, others might think the contrary; and ſo a Tumult might have been raiſed about it, and an Inſurrection might have followed, which had many Times happened, on more trifling Grounds.

As to the late Queen's Injunctions, &c. that had been read, they were to authorize the Ordinary, to enquire of things fit to be reformed in Churches by Church-wardens, and other Officers; and they were to preſent them to the Ordinary; and ſo they were to be reformed by the Power of the Ordinary, and not by the Church-wardens, or Veſtries: And though it was ordered, that all Relicks of Idolatry and Superſtition ſhould be taken away, yet every Memorial, or Story, of a Saint, or Prophet, was not a Relick of Idolatry, or Superſtition, and to be pulled down. They might as well take upon them, to pull down Cathedral Churches, becauſe they were built in Form of a Croſs; and other Churches, becauſe they ſtood Eaſt and Weſt, which was held ſuperſtitious by ſome. Reformation had always been a Work of publick Authority, and private Men had been puniſhed in this Court heretofore, for attempting it. In the late Queen's Time, many went about, breaking down Croſſes, Images, and Pictures, of all Sorts, and were ſentenced for it; and others, in King James's Reign, were fined an hundred Marks a-piece, for defacing Croſſes in the Highways, in the Night Time; and they are ſaid to be refractory Browniſts and Puritans in the Sentence; concluding, that the Defendant had no Authority for what he did, and therefore left him to their Lordſhips Cenſure.

1632. 8 Car. I.

The Sentence of the Court.

Then the Lord Cottington, Chancellor of the Exchequer, proceeded to ſentence the Defendant. He ſaid, theſe were the Actions of Browniſts and Puritans, as appeared upon Record: He conceived, his Anſwer was againſt him; and though he now quitted that Part of his Juſtification, it ſhewed what Spirit he was of. It had been ſaid, he was a wiſe Man, and an old Man, and learned in the Laws; but it had been a better Argument of Extenuation, if they had ſaid, he was a weak Man, or a mad Man: That great Miſchiefs might follow, if theſe things were ſuffered: That it was a great Offence and Preſumption in him, that knew the Law ſo well: If he had applied to the Ordinary, or to his Majeſty, to have the thing done, he had incurred no Blame, and might have received Thanks for it; but it was not in the Power of him, or the Veſtry, to do it. This Attempt might have occaſioned a Tumult; it was done in Contempt of the Church, and the King's Supremacy; and therefore his Sentence was, That he ſhould loſe his Place of Recorder; be bound to his good Behaviour; make a publick Acknowledgment of his Fault in the Church, and in the Cathedral; and pay a Fine of 1000 l. to the King.

Sir Robert Heath, Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, (but Attorney-General when the Information was exhibited) ſaid, he did agree it was an Offence: He durſt not give Encouragement to any private Man, to do any publick thing in the Church, or Commonwealth, of his own Authority; but however, he was for mitigating the Sentence of Lord Cottington; for he ſaid, it did not appear, that the Defendant did this againſt the Biſhop's Authority, but without it. There was Cauſe, he was ſatisfied, for the removing the Window, there being a Picture of God the Father in it: But ſtill they ſhould have told the Biſhop of it; which ſince neither Mr. Sherfield, nor the Veſtry did, he was not to be excuſed in that: He ſhould therefore agree, to ſentence him for his Fault; but he was not for removing him from his Places of Recorder, or Juſtice of Peace; or bind him to his good Behaviour: But he would have him acknowledge his Fault before the the Biſhop of Sarum; and for the Fine, he thought 1000*l.* too much for an Error, as there appeared no Contempt; and therefore he ſet a Fine but of 500 Marks upon him.

The Lord Chief Juſtice Richardſon ſaid, that the Defendant was guilty of an Offence, in arrogating to himſelf a Power not belonging to him; and his Zeal, and good Intention, would not excuſe him: But as it was an involuntary Error, and not done in Contempt, and that he knew the Defendant to be a good Magiſtrate; to have given a great Check to Vice in the City of Saliſbury; that he was conformable to the Church, and not diſaffected to the Government; he ſhould not lay more than a Fine of 500 l. upon him; nor was he for taking away his Place of Recorder, or Juſtice of Peace; but would have him make a Submiſſion and Confeſſion of his Fault, before the Biſhop of Saliſbury.

Mr. Secretary Cook was not for inflicting any other Puniſhment upon him, than his making a Confeſſion of his Fault, and Submiſſion to the Biſhop; and the reſt of the Court having delivered their Opinions, it appeared, that nine of the Lords were for ſetting a Fine of 1000*l.* upon Mr. Sherfield the Defendant; that he ſhould be put out of his Place of Recorder; be bound to his good Behaviour, and make an open Acknowledgment of his Fault in the Church of St. Edmond, where the Offence was done; and likewiſe in the Cathedral Church of Sarum, before the Biſhop there, and the Deans and Prebendaries of that Church: And nine others (the Lord Keeper being one) were of Opinion, that he ought not to loſe his Place of Recorder; but that he ſhould make an Acknowledgment in private to the Biſhop of Sarum, of the ſaid Offence, and in ſuch Manner, and before ſuch Perſons, as the ſaid Biſhop ſhould think fit: And as to the Fine, theſe were again divided; four (whereof the Lord Keeper was one) ſet no Fine; five gave their Voices for a Fine; four of them ſet 500 Marks, and one of them, viz. the Lord Chief Juſtice Richardſon, 500*l.* which Fine of 500*l.* was taken for the King; it having been a Rule of the Court of Star-Chamber, when there was a Difference of Fines, and an odd Number, the King was to have the middle Fine.

The Trial of Prynne, for Libelling the Government.

The Charge.

THE Information was brought in the Name of the Attorney-General Noy, and ſet forth, That the Defendant, Prynne, compiled, and put the ſaid Libel to the Preſs, condemning all Plays, Dancings, Maſques, Feſtivals, &c. And though he knew their Majeſties, and the Miniſters of State, were ſometimes preſent at ſuch Entertainments, yet the Defendant railed, and inveighed againſt them, and all that were preſent at them: That he condemned Hunting, and all other rural Sports; the keeping Chriſtmas, and other publick Feſtivals, and holy Days; and even the making Bonfires, the erecting May-Poles, and the dreſſing up Houſes with Ivy; endeavouring to move and incite the People to Rebellion, and to lay violent Hands on their Prince, for ſufferring ſuch things: That this Libel alſo contained many infamous Expreſſions againſt his Majeſty, and his Houſhold, and caſt ſeveral Aſperſions on the Queen, and uncharitable Cenſures on all Chriſtian People, recommending factious and diſcontented Perſons, ſuch as Dr. Leighton, and Mariana the Jeſuit, in order to withdraw the King's Subjects from their Allegiance: That he dealt with Sparkes, a common Publiſher of unlawful Books, to print this Libel; and with Buckner, another Defendant, to licenſe it; and with the other four Defendants, to print Part of the ſame, to the great Scandal of the Government, &c.

Prynne, in his Anſwer, confeſſed his compiling of the ſaid Book, which, he ſaid, was nothing elſe but a Collection of Arguments, againſt Stage-Plays; and he did not intend to reflect on the King and State; and that it was duly licenſed, and entered at Stationers-Hall, as the Law required: That he was ſo far from encouraging Schiſm, or Sedition, that he had with much Joy and Thankfulneſs acknowledged the Happineſs and Peace, he, and the reſt of his Majeſty's Subjects, enjoyed under his Government: And if any thing in his Book ſhould, contrary to his Deſign, be conſtrued, to tend to Schiſm, or Sedition, he craved Pardon and Grace; and deſired the Court to take into their Conſideration, that he had already been a Year Priſoner in the Tower.

Prynne's Anſwer.

The Attorney-General obſerved, in opening the Charge, That the Defendant's Book was the Evidence againſt him, where he did not only rail at Plays and Dancing, and at his Majeſty, the Court, and all that were preſent at them, but againſt Hunting, rural Sports, Feſtivals, holy Days, Biſhops, Church-Muſick, and Church-Ceremonies, promiſcuouſly; and even againſt the long Hair of Men and Women, and Perukes; and againſt Cards, Tables, and 1633. 9 Car. I. and all manner of Diverſions; inſinuating we were returning into Paganiſm again; and adviſing People, to leave the Kingdom, and go and ſerve God in other Countries: That, tho' it might be lawful for thoſe that had a Miſſion, to write againſt the Abuſe of Plays in modeſt Terms, that would not excuſe Mr. Prynne, who could pretend to no ſuch Miſſion, and had raked together all the vileſt Terms, and Billingſgate Language, to revile the Government, and all Mankind.

Paſſages in his Book produced as Evidence. Then ſeveral obnoxious Paſſages were read out of the Book, as Evidence againſt him; and particularly that, where he reſembled his Majeſties Government to that of Nero's, (viz) The Multitude of our London Play-haunters are ſo augmented, that all the antient Devils Chapels, though five in Number, are not ſufficient to contain their Troops; whence we ſee a ſixth now added to them: Whereas, in vicious Nero's Reign, there were but three ſtanding Theatres in Pagan Rome, though far more ſpacious than Chriſtian London: In the ſame Libel, he calls Church-Muſick, the Bleating of brute Beaſts; and ſays, the Choriſters bellow the Tenor, as if they were Oxen; bark a Counter-point, like a Kennel of Dogs; roar a Treble, as if they were Bulls; and grunt out a Baſe, like a Parcel of Hogs.

The Defence made by Prynne's Counſel. The Defendant's Counſel ſaid in his Defence, That many of the Paſſages in his Book were relatively ſpoken, and moſt of them the Opinions of other Authors; and, that he had no Thoughts of comparing the preſent Times with thoſe of Nero's; but they could not wholly excuſe him: They ſuppoſed he had ſo fixed his Eyes on the Abuſes of the Stage, that he had neglected to guide his Pen; and adviſed him to lay hold on the Rock of the King's Favour, and the Mercy of the Court: They begged, their Lordſhips would believe his Intentions were fair and honeſt, though his Expreſſions harſh; and hoped, that the Abuſe of Plays would a little plead his Excuſe: That thoſe who had licenſed the Book, were rather guilty than he; and none but unlicenſed Books had yet been brought before that Court: That the Charge againſt him was made out by Inferences and Conſequences that were forced and ſtrained; and that the Paſſages quoted did not of Neceſſity carry that Meaning that had been put upon them; deſiring their Lordſhips would conſtrue his Intentions as he had explained them in his Anſwer upon Oath; and, as that had been admitted Evidence againſt him, as to his compiling the Book, ſo they would alſo admit it to be Evidence for him, to clear the Integrity of his Heart.

The Lords cenſure Prynne. Three Days having been ſpent in Hearing this Cauſe, on the fourth the Lords proceed to give Judgment in it: And firſt, the Lord Cottington, Chancellor of the Exchequer, gave his Opinion. He ſaid, the Defendant ſtood charged with publiſhing a libellous Book, (or, rather, a Volume of Libels, containing 1000 Pages) againſt his Majeſty and the State: That Prynne had here vented his Malice againſt the King, Prince, Peers, Prelates, Magiſtrates; againſt all Mankind, and againſt all Things; but moſt remarkably againſt the Church, and the Government thereof: But, that being no Part of the Information, he ſhould not cenſure him for his Reflections on the Church, but for his endeavouring to enflame the People againſt the King and Government. 1633. 9 Car. I.

That his Expreſſions were to be taken according to their plain genuine Senſe, and not according to the Interpretation he was now pleaſed to put upon them: That he did not ſpeak relatively, as his Counſel ſuggeſted, but poſitively, when he ſaid, That our Engliſh Ladies, ſhorn and frizled Madams, had loſt their Modeſty: That Plays were the chief Delight of the Devil, and they that frequented them were damned; and, that Princes dancing in their own Perſons, was the Cauſe of their untimely Ends: That though he pretended his Intention was only againſt publick and common Plays, the Tenor of his Book run againſt Plays in Princes Palaces: That his Book was levelled againſt the King and State: That he deſerved another kind of Trial; and the Defence he had made, did but aggravate his Offence; therefore his Sentence was, That the Book be burnt by the Common Hangman: That he be put from the Bar, and excluded from the Society of Lincoln's-Inn; and, that he be degraded by the Univerſity of Oxford: That he ſtand in the Pillory at Weſtminſter and in Cheapſide, and loſe an Ear at each Place; and ſtand with a Paper on his Head, declaring his Offence to be, the publiſhing an infamous Libel againſt both their Majeſties, and the Government: That he be fined five thouſand Pounds, and ſuffer perpetual Impriſonment. The Sentence againſt Prynne.

Sentence againſt the other Defendants. As to Buckner, who repreſented, that he was Chaplain to the late Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and licenſed but Part of the Book, and ſaid, he abhorred and deteſted the Cenſures againſt Eccleſiaſticks; the Court ſet a Fine of 50 l. upon him: As to Sparkes, he pleaded, that the Book was licenſed before he printed it; but 64 Pages only appearing to be licenſed, he was fined five hundred Pounds: As to the reſt of the Defendants, the Attorney-General not having proceeded further againſt them, they were not cenſured.

The reſt of the Lords were unanimous in the Cenſure and Sentence againſt Prynne; and the Lord Chief Juſtice Richardſon declared, That his Offence would have been adjudged High-Treaſon, if he had been indicted for it in the Courts of Common Law.

Remarks on Prynne's Trial. This Man's Sentence has been the Subject of many a Lamentation. But ſhould a Writer at this Day, take upon him to denounce, That all who frequented Plays were damned, when he knew the King and Royal Family were ſometimes at theſe Entertainments; ſhould he reflect perſonally on the Queen, as this Writer did, and prefer Nero's Government to the preſent Adminiſtration; ſhould he take upon him to new-model both Church and State, and endeavour to incite the People to Rebellion, in order to accompliſh the wild Schemes he had formed; whether, as the Lord Chief Juſtice Richardſon obſerved at this Hearing, ſuch a one might not be indicted and convicted of High-Treaſon, I very much queſtion: And, if ſo, ſurely this Gentleman was mercifully dealt with, when he loſt only his Ears: And, indeed, it is reported of Prynne himſelf, when he ſaw what Confuſion ſuch ſeditious Libels had brought upon the Kingdom, That the King had done

1634. 10 Car. I.

The Charge.

THE Indictment recites, That, whereas by the Laws of Scotland, whoever defames his Majesty, depraves his Laws, or misconstrues his Actions, incurrs the Pain of Death: And that, whoever shall hear such scandalous Speeches, or Writings, and not reveal the same to some Magistrate, and apprehend the Author, if it be in his Power, shall incur the like Pain: And, whereas a scandalous and seditious Libel was found in the Custody of John Dunmure, and dispersed among the King's Subjects, reproaching his Majesty's Government and Behaviour in Parliament; depraving divers Acts of Parliament, and misconstruing his Majesty's Proceedings: Which said scandalous and seditious Libel, the said John Dunmure had of the said John Lord Balmerino, who was the Author, or Contriver, of it; or, at least, was guilty of hearing and concealing thereof; or, of not discovering William Haig, whom he affirmed to be the Author thereof: And was also guilty of divulging and dispersing the said Libel; and so far knew of the making the same, that he interlined it whith his own Hand; caused his Servant Robert Dagliſh, to make a Copy of it, and delivered it to the Earl of Rothes, and to the said John Dunmure, whereby it was dispersed, to the Dishonour of his Majesty, &c. He, the said Lord Balmerino had thereby incurred the Pain and Punishment of Death, which ought to be inflicted on him, to deterr others from attempting the like.

The Libel mentioned in the Indictment.

The Libel mentioned in the Indictment was entitled, The humble Supplication of great a Number of the Nobility and others, Commissioners in the late Parliament: In which the Scotish Malcontents express great Uneasiness at some Acts that had passed in the Parliament of Scotland, empowering his Majesty, with the Consent of the Clergy, to prescribe what Apparel the Clergy should wear in Time of Divine Service, and authorizing him, with a competent Number of the Clergy, to make Laws and Constitutions in Relation to Ecclesiastical Affairs; threatening his Majesty, if he did make use of the Authority given him by those Acts, and introduce any Thing new in Religious Matters, he would endanger losing the Hearts of many of his Subjects.

They tell him also, That no just Prince ever censured his Subjects for giving their Voices; and, that the Notes his Majesty took in the Parliament House, of the Names of those who dissented from those Acts, and his refusing to hear the Reasons of those that dissented, made them very apprehensive of Innovations in their Kirk.

They charge his Majesty also, with squandering away the Supplies granted in Parliament, and the Revenues of the Crown, upon extravagant Courtiers: That he allowed the printing of Popish and Arminian Books in England, and suppressed the Answers to them; and suffered Arminianism to be preached in Scotland with Impunity: They complain also, that Papists were permitted to sit in Parliament; of Abuses in the Coin; and of his slighting the Representations of their Grievances. The greatest Part of which Libel is set forth in the Indictment.

The Defence made by the Prisoner's Counsel.

The Counsel for the Prisoner represented in his Behalf, That it was not the Intent of the Legislature, to inflict Capital Punishments on the Authors of such Reproaches as were laid in the Indictment: That those Acts had never been put in Execution; or, if they had, they were long disused, and therefore ought to be looked upon as abrogated.

And further, that the Writing mentioned in the Indictment, was an humble Petition and Supplication to his Majesty, and not a Libel: That the Indictment was insufficient; because the Fact was not laid to be done with a seditious Intent: And he could not be charged with concealing the Libel; because the Indictment itself sets forth, that he delivered it to the Earl of Rothes, to deliver to his Majesty: That it could not be said, he was the Author of it, Mr. William Haig having under his Hand acknowledged himself the Author; and that the Prisoner's interlining it, could be no Argument of his contriving it.

That the hearing, and not revealing, ought not to be deemed Criminal, till the Writing was first declared infamous and seditious; and he ought not to be charged with the not apprehending the said Mr. Haig; because the apprehending intended by the Act, was only where the Party has been declared to be the Author.

The Reply, of the King's Counsel.

To this the Lord Advocate replied, that what had been offered by the Prisoner's Counsel, either related to the Sufficiency of the Indictment, which he left to the Court; or, to the Truth of the Facts, which he left to the Jury, (after he had made his Remarks on them.) And the Court, sitting the 20th of December, delivered their Opinions, as to the Sufficiency of the Indictment.

The Opinion of the Court, as to the Sufficiency of the Indictment.

1. As to the first Exception made by the Prisoner's Counsel, they declared, that the Acts of Parliament, on which the Indictment was founded, were still in force.

1634. 10 Car. I.

2. That the Indictment had well purſued the ſaid Acts of Parliament.

3. They held, there might be more Authors than one; and that the Words of the Act included the Adviſer, Deviſer, and Conſulter.

4. They adjudged the Writing to be a ſcandalous and reproachful Libel.

5. As to the divulging, they leave that, with the other Facts, to be tried by the Jury; and declare, if that only ſhall be found, it is to be puniſhed arbitrarily at the Diſcretion of the Court.

The Evidence given to the Jury.

A Jury being impanneled on the 20th of March, conſiſting of eight Peers, and ſeven Commoners, the Evidence againſt the Priſoner was produced; and firſt, the Libel found in the Hands of Dunmure, and another Copy of it, interlined by the Priſoner, were read, with Dunmure's Depoſition, that the Lord Balmerino delivered the firſt Copy to the Deponent, and enjoined him to keep it private.

Three Examinations of the Priſoner were alſo read, wherein he confeſſes, that he had the ſaid Libel of Haig; that he communicated it to the Earl of Rothes and Mr. Dunmure; and that he had received ſeveral Letters from Haig, ſince he abſconded: The Depoſition of Robert Dagliſh, the Priſoner's Servant, alſo was read, wherein he depoſed, that he copied the ſaid Libel by his Maſter's Order, and at the ſame time took a Copy for himſelf.

The Earl of Rothes's Depoſition was read, wherein he ſays, he received the Supplication from the Lord Balmerino, to be communicated to his Majeſty; but that he always thought it ought to be ſuppreſſed.

The Priſoner convicted.

The Jury being withdrawn, and returning into Court brought in their Verdict; whereby they acquitted the Priſoner of being the Author, or Adviſer of the Libel; as alſo, of the not apprehending the ſaid William Haig; and they acquitted him of divulging and diſperſing the ſaid Libel: But found him GUILTY of the hearing the ſaid Libel; and of concealing, and not diſcovering the ſaid William Haig, whom the Priſoner affirmed to be the Author of it.

Whereupon the Lord Juſtice-General, by the Advice of the Aſſeſſors, declared, That the ſaid John Lord Balmerino had incurred the Pain of Death by the ſaid Acts of Parliament; but the Execution of the Sentence was ſuſpended, till his Majeſty's Pleaſure was known.

But pardoned. This Lord's Ingratitude.

It ſeems, his Majeſty afterwards pardoned this Lord: But, inſtead of acknowledging the Grace, he became one of his moſt implacable Enemies; and had a great Share in the Scotiſh Rebellion that happened ſoon after.

1634. 10 Car. I.

The Factiontreaten to murder the Judges, and Jury.

Biſhop Burnet relates, That this Lord was ſo much the Darling of the Kirk, that the King durſt not puniſh him: That he was no ſooner condemned, but it was reſolved by the Faction, to break open the Priſon-doors, and ſet him at Liberty; or, if he ſhould be put to Death, to revenge it on the Court and Jurors who convicted him; and that ſome undertook to murder them; and others, to burn their Houſes.

Remarks on Lord Balmerino's Trial.

In Compiling the State Trials, it was thought fit to intermix ſome Scotiſh Trials, which might ſhew in what Inſtances their Proceedings differed from thoſe of England; and eſpecially ſuch as illuſtrated their Hiſtory and our own, as this Trial does, by exhibiting to our View ſome of thoſe Grievances, or pretended Grievances, for which the Scots fomented the Rebellion, that ended in the Subverſion of the Government of both Nations. And here we find, that a Nobleman is not tried by his Peers in Scotland, but in the Ordinary Courts, and by a Jury conſiſting of Peers and Commoners, who are always above thirteen (in this caſe fifteen) and their Verdict determined by a Majority of Voices. It is obſervable alſo, that the Court firſt determine whether the Facts in the Indictment amount to Treaſon, or Felony; and whether they are well laid; and afterwards a Jury is impaneled to try the Facts. Whereas in England, the Jury take both the Law and the Fact upon themſelves, and bring in a general Verdict, of GUILTY, or NOT GUILTY: Though, it is true, in England Exceptions may be taken to the Indictment before the Trial, and the Priſoner may move in Arreſt of Judgment after Conviction, where any Thing appears illegal, or inſufficient, on the Face of the Indictment. It is obſervable alſo, that where a Perſon was Capitally convicted in Scotland, it was uſual to execute him the ſame Day he is condemned, and not allow him Time to prepare for Death, as is practiſed in England: But then the Proceedings appear to be much longer depending in Scotland than in England; for this Trial of Lord Balmerino's began the 3d of December, 1634. and the Jury did not bring in their Verdict, till the 20th of March following: And laſtly, it appears, that the Evidence conſiſted of Written Examinations and Depoſitions; and the Witneſſes were not produced perſonally in Court, to give their Teſtimony in the Preſence of the Priſoner, according to the Practice of the Courts of England in Capital Caſes.

Proceedings againſt JOHN BASTWICK, M. D. HENRY BURTON Clerk, and WILLIAM PRYNNE Eſq; for Seditious Libels, in the Court of Star-Chamber, 14 June, 1637. 13 Car. I.

1637. 13 Car. I.

A very imperfect Piece.

THIS could never have gained Admiſſion among the State-Trials, if it had not been to ſhew the Sufferings of the Saints, for The Good Old Cauſe. The Editor does well to inform us, it was written by his (or rather their*) Friends; for there is very little that looks like a Trial in it. It conſiſts chiefly of the* Sayings and Lamentations of the Priſoners, at their Condemnation, and in the Pillory; and a Speech of Archbiſhop Laud's*, after the Sentence.*

Minutes of the Information.

All that we can learn of the Information exhibited by the Attorney-General is, That it was preferred againſt the ſaid Baſtwick, Burton, and Prynne, for Writing and Publiſhing Seditious and Schiſmatical Books againſt the Government, in Church and State.

The Anſwers omitted.

Theſe Gentlemen, it ſeems, drew up their reſpective Anſwers to the ſeveral Informations preferred againſt them; but they were found to be ſuch flagrant Libels on the Government, that their Counſel durſt not ſign them: Whereupon Mr. Prynne preſſed, that he might ſign his Anſwer himſelf; but was ordered to put in an Anſwer that was leſs offenſive, than the Libels, for which he was proſecuted: And Prynne, and the other two, refuſing to put in any other Anſwers, than ſuch as were repleniſhed with Sedition and Calumny, the ſeveral Informations, or Charges, were ordered to be taken pro confeſſo, and the following Sentence pronounced upon the Priſoners. Prynne was condemned to be ſet in the Pillory in Palace-Yard; to loſe the Remainder of his Ears; to be branded with a hot Iron in each Cheek; to pay a Fine of 5000 l. and to be impriſoned in Caernarvon Caſtle. Baſtwick and Burton were ordered alſo to be ſet in the Pillory in Palace-Yard; to loſe their Ears; to pay a Fine of 5000 l. each, and to be impriſoned in the Caſtles of Launceſton and Lancaſter.

They refuſe to put in any but ſcandalous Anſwers.

The Charge taken pro confeſſo.

The Sentence paſſed on them.

Archbiſhop Laud would not be concerned in the Sentence, becauſe, he ſaid, it might look like Revenge in him, theſe Libels being levelled againſt his Grace perſonally, as well as againſt Epiſcopacy, and the Eccleſiaſtical Government.

The Purport of Archbiſhop Laud's Speech.

The Tendency of the Archbiſhop's Speech, after the Sentence, was to ſhew, That notwithſtanding the Priſoners, and other diſaffected People, clamoured againſt Innovations in Religion, they, and their Adherents, were the grand Innovators; endeavouring to ſubvert and deſtroy the Church of England, eſtabliſhed by Statute Law, and introduce the Geneva Plan in the Room of it; and that they were perpetually inciting the People to take up Arms, and break out into Rebellion againſt the Government, in order to compel his Majeſty to enter into their Meaſures.

The Priſoners ſuffer.

The Priſoners were ſet in the Pillory, their Ears cut off, &c. in Purſuance of the ſaid Sentence, on the 30th of June, 1637. Prynne was confined in Caernarvon Caſtle, in Wales; and Baſtwick and Burton, in the Caſtles of Launceſton, and Lancaſter: But on the 27th of Auguſt following, by an Order of Council, Baſtwick was removed to the Iſle of Scilly; Burton to the Iſle of Guernſey; and Prynne, to a Caſtle in the Iſle of Jerſey; with Orders, that none ſhould have Acceſs to them, without Leave of the Governors of the reſpective Places, where they ſhould be confined: And, that they ſhould not be allowed Pen, Ink, or Paper, or any Books, reflecting on the eſtabliſhed Church: That all Letters and Parcels, directed to them, ſhould be opened, and the Wives of Baſtwick and Burton ſhould not be permitted to reſide in the Iſlands where they were reſpectively confined: And the Priſoners remained in the ſaid reſpective Iſlands, to which they were ſeverally ſent, untill they were ſet at Liberty by the Parliament, that begun the Grand Rebellion, in the Year 1641. when they were brought back to London in Triumph, as will be related hereafter.

Sent to diſtant Caſtles.

Removed to other Priſons.

Releaſed in 1641.

Prynne, the Reader obſerves in a former Trial, had his Ears cropped, for writing a Libel, called, Hiſtriomaſtix, reflecting on the King, the Court, and indeed on all Mankind, that were not of the Geneva Stamp; for which he remained a Priſoner, and ſtill continued Libelling the Government, till he was brought before the Court of Star-Chamber again, for theſe repeated Acts of Sedition. Theſe laſt bleſſed Eſſays are levelled chiefly againſt the Biſhops, and the eſtabliſhed Church: He ſtiles the Archbiſhop, Arch-Agent for the Devil; calls the Biſhops, Luciferian Lords, execrable Traitors, and devouring Wolves. Baſtwick the Phyſician was proſecuted chiefly for writing againſt the High Commiſſion Court; and Burton the Clergyman, for making it the conſtant Driſt of his Sermons and Converſation, to traduce the King and Government; but more particularly the Biſhops, and the Eccleſiaſtical State: And ſuch was the Matter contained in ſome of theſe Libels, that the Judges were of Opinion, that theſe harmleſs Saints might have been convicted of High-Treaſon, if Indictments had been preferred againſt them in the King's-Bench. However, the Miniſtry were ſo merciful, as to cauſe them only to be proſecuted for Miſdemeanors in the Star-Chamber. Notwithſtanding which Indulgence, they continued to aggravate their Crimes, by their inſolent Anſwers; which, whether they were fit for Counſel to ſign, may be gathered from the following Paſſages, viz. That the Prelates were Invaders of the King's Prerogative Royal; Contemners and Deſpiſers of the Holy Scriptures; Advancers of Popery, Superſtition, Idolatry, and Prophaneneſs: That they abuſed the King's Authority, to the Oppreſſion of his Loyal Subjects; and therein expreſſed great Tyranny,

Part of the Priſoners Anſwers.

1637. 13 Car. I. Tyranny, Cruelty, and Injuſtice: And that in the Execution of this Performance, they ſhewed neither Wit, Honeſty, nor Temperance; nor were they the Servants of God, as they ought to be, but of the Devil; with a great deal more of the like Tenor.

Poſſibly there was not that Government in the World, except our own, but would have proceeded Capitally againſt ſuch Offenders, as they found ſtirring up the People to Sedition and Rebellion, eſpecially when they had the Impudence, in their Defence, to require the Deſtruction of the eſtabliſhed Church, and the Governors of it; without which, it evidently appeared, they were determined never to deſiſt from their traiterous Purpoſes: And in fact, we ſee, they never left off their Railing and Calumnies againſt the Adminiſtration in Church and State, till they entirely deſtroyed both, and brought the Nation into ſuch a State of Confuſion and Miſery, both in Spirituals and Temporals, as no People ever before experienced. Would our good Friends the Dutch ever have ſuffered ſuch an Attack upon their Calviniſtical Church, to have gone unpuniſhed, eſpecially if their State had been threatened, on a Refuſal to comply with ſuch Reformers? Would not our Neighbours of Scotland, call a Conſpiracy to ſubvert their Preſbyterian Kirk, an Invaſion on the Conſtitution, and proſecute thoſe who ſhould dare to revile and undermine their Preſbyterian Eſtabliſhment, with far greater Rigour than theſe Saints were proſecuted? Would ſuch Anſwers ever be ſuffered in a Court of Juſtice, as theſe Criminals would have put in, if they could have found Counſel hardy enough to have ſigned them? Or rather, would they not have been ſeverely puniſhed for this impudent Defence, or rather Offence, in the Face of one of the higheſt Courts of Juſtice? With what Reaſon then can their Friends and Succeſſors in Iniquity clamour at the Puniſhment inflicted on theſe Incendiaries, when it is evident to all the World, that, inſtead of loſing their Ears, they ought to have loſt their Heads, as Prynne himſelf confeſſed, when he ſaw the Uſurpation eſtabliſhed.

The Character Lord Clarendon gives of theſe pious Confeſſors, for the Faith of Calvin, is, "That they were three Perſons, moſt notorious "for their declared Malice againſt the Govern-"ment of the Church by Biſhops, in their ſe-"veral Books and Writings, which they pub-"liſhed to corrupt the People, with Circum-"ſtances very ſcandalous, and in Language "very ſcurrilous and impudent, and which all "Men thought deſerved very exemplary Puniſh-"ment. They were, continues that celebrated "Hiſtorian, of the three ſeveral Profeſſions, "which have the moſt Influence on the Peo-"ple; a Divine, a Common Lawyer, and a "Doctor of Phyſick; none of them of any "Intereſt, or Eſteem, with the worthy Part "of their ſeveral Profeſſions, having formerly "been all looked upon, under Characters of "Reproach; yet, when they were all ſen-"tenced, and for the Execution of that Sen-"tence brought out to be puniſhed as com-"mon and ſignal Rogues, expoſed upon Scaf-"folds, to have their Ears cut off, and their "Faces branded with hot Irons (as the pooreſt "and moſt mechanick Malefactors uſed to be, "when they were not able to redeem them-"ſelves by Fines, for their Treſpaſſes; or to "ſatisfy any Dammages, for the Scandals they "had raiſed againſt the good Name and Re-"putation of others) Men began no more to "conſider their Manners, but the Men; and "each Profeſſion, with Anger and Indigna-"tion enough, thought their Education, De-"grees, and Quality, would have ſecured them "from ſuch infamous Judgments, and treaſured "up Wrath for the Time to come." 1637. 13 Car. I.

But why ſhould theſe ſeveral Profeſſions think it a greater Diſgrace, that Criminals of their Degree, or Quality, ſhould be pilloried, and ſtigmatized, than that they ſhould be hanged, drawn, and quartered, for Sedition and Treaſon, as theſe Criminals certainly deſerved to be, by Prynne's own Confeſſion? Poſſibly the Speeches they were ſuffered to make, when their Ears were cut off in the Pillory, had an ill Effect upon ſome of the Engliſh Audience, who are obſerved to overflow with Pity, when they ſee the moſt notorious Villains ſuffer for their Crimes; not conſidering the Miſchief they have done, and would do, if they were ſuffered to go on with Impunity: They conſider barely the Smart and Ignominy the Criminal undergoes, and, forgetting their Offences, look upon them as innocent Men: This, it muſt be confeſſed, is frequently the Caſe of the unthinking Mob: But one would not have expected ſuch a Conduct from Men of any Education, or Reflection: That theſe ſhould treaſure up Wrath and Revenge againſt their Governors, for inflicting infamous Puniſhments upon the moſt infamous Villains, is a little unaccountable, eſpecially when all Men (as the ſame noble Author obſerves) were agreed, they deſerved a very exemplary Puniſhment, and that they ought to have paid for their notorious, obſtinate, and repeated Offences, with the Loſs of their Lives, if they had been puniſhed according to their Demerits. Indeed the Parliament that begun the Rebellion in 1641. thought theſe Sufferers merited ſo much from them, by contributing to ſpirit up the People againſt their Sovereign, and the eſtabliſhed Religion, that after they had cauſed them to be brought quite through England, from their reſpective Priſons, in a triumphant Manner, that Aſſembly gave each of them a Reward of 4000 l. and upwards; and Prynne was afterwards, upon a Vacancy, elected a Member of that Parliament, and ſat in the Houſe during great Part of the Uſurpation: But he appears at length to have been as much out of Favour with the Uſurpers, as ever he was with his lawful Prince: He lived to ſee, and be convinced of the Miſchiefs he had brought upon his Country; and being elected a Member of Parliament, in the Year 1660. was as forward in reſtoring King Charles II. as he was in depoſing his Father King Charles I.

The Parliament of 1641. reward them with 4000 l. a-piece.

Prynne convinced of his Error. And contributes to the Reſtoration.

The King against Hampden.

The Trial between his Majesty King CHARLES I. and JOHN HAMPDEN Esq; upon the Assessing Ship-Money on the Defendant, 1637. 13 & 14 Car. I.

1637. 13 Car. I.

HIS Majesty King Charles I. in the Beginning of February, 163$\frac{6}{7}$. caused the following Case to be proposed to the Judges, viz.

The Case of Ship-money, proposed to the Judges.

CAROLUS Rex.

" When the Good and Safety of the King" dom in general is concerned, and the whole
" Kingdom is in Danger; Whether may not
" the King, by Writ under the Great Seal,
" command all his Subjects, at their Charge,
" to provide and furnish such Number of Ships,
" with Men, Victuals, and Munition, and
" for such Time as he shall think fit, for the " Defence and Safeguard of the Kingdom,
" from such Danger and Peril; and by Law
" compel the doing thereof, in case of Refusal
" and Refractoriness? And whether, in such " a Case, is not the King sole Judge, both of " the Danger, and when, and how, it is to
" be prevented and avoided?"

The Judges Opinion of it.

To which the Judges answered, " We " are all of Opinion, that when the Good
" and Safety of the Kingdom in general is " concerned, and the whole Kingdom in Dan" ger, your Majesty may, by Writ under the " Great Seal, command all your Subjects, at " their Charge, to provide and furnish such
" Number of Ships, with Men, Munition,
" and Victuals, and for such Time, as your " Majesty shall think fit, for the Defence of " the Kingdom, and may by Law compel
" the doing thereof, in case of Refusal; and " that your Majesty is the sole Judge, both " of the Danger, and when, and how, the " same is to be prevented and avoided."

The Names of the 12 that signed the Opinion.

Signed by all the twelve Judges, viz. Jo. Brampston, Jo. Finch, Humph. Davenport, Jo. Denham, Rich. Hutton, W. Jones, Geo. Croke, Tho. Trevor, Geo. Vernon, Fra. Crawley, Rob. Berkley, and Fra. Weston.

This Resolution his Majesty caused to be published, and entered in the Courts at Westminster, and directed the Judges to communicate it to the People, in their respective Circuits.

The Tenor of the Writ to the Sheriff of Bucks, to assess the County towards a Ship.

The Occasion of demanding the Opinions of the Judges was this: A Writ had been issued in the eleventh Year of King Charles I. directed to the Sheriff of Bucks, the Bailiff and Burgesses of Buckingham, &c. reciting, that his Majesty being given to understand, that the Sea was infested by Thieves, Pirates, and Sea-Robbers, as well Turks, Enemies to Christianity, as others, who took and plundered the Ships of his Majesty's Subjects, and those of his Allies, who used to be protected heretofore by the English Nation: That his Majesty considering also the Danger that in these Times of War hung over us; and desiring to provide for the Defence of the Kingdom, the maintaining the Dominion and Protection of the Sea, and the Security of his Subjects; he does therefore command the Sheriff, &c. upon their Faith and Allegiance, that they provide in this County, a Ship of War, of 450 Tons, with 180 Men, Guns, Gunpowder, double Tackling, and all other things necessary; and to bring the said Ship to Portsmouth by the 1st of March next, provided with Victuals, Mariners, Wages, and all other Necessaries, for twenty six Weeks, in order to proceed with his Majesty's other Ships of War, and those of his other Subjects, for the Defence of the Sea, and themselves: And the said Sheriff, &c. are further commanded, within thirty Days after the Receipt of this Writ, to assess every Person equally within the said County (who had no Share in the said Ship, and did not serve therein), towards the Charges of providing the said Ship, &c. according to their Estates and Employments; and the Portions so assessed, to levy by Distress, or other lawful Ways: And if any Person should be found rebellious, or refractory, in the Premises, to imprison him till further Orders.

The Tenor of the Scire facias, for Hampden to shew Cause, why he did not pay the Money assessed.

Some of the Inhabitants of the County of Bucks refusing to pay the Money required of them, for fitting out a Ship, a Scire Facias was issued to the Sheriff of Bucks, reciting, that whereas several Sums of Money, in a Schedule thereto annexed, had, by virtue of the above-said Writ of 4 Aug. 11 Car. been assessed upon divers Persons in that County, for providing a Ship of War, which were not yet paid: And that upon a Certiorari, dated 9 March, 13 Car. the said Sums, and the several Persons on whom they were assessed, were certified into Chancery; and from thence, by Mittimus, dated 5 May, were sent into the Exchequer, that Process might issue against the Defaulters. The Sheriff was thereupon commanded, quod scire faceret the several Defaulters, that they should appear in the Exchequer, in Octab. Trin. 13 Car. and shew Cause, why they should not pay the respective Sums assessed on them: And the Sheriff returned quod scire fecit, John Hampden Esq; who was assessed twenty Shillings, and had not paid it: Whereupon Mr. Hampden appeared, and demanded Oyer of the scire facias; of the Schedule of the Writ dated 4 Aug. 11 Car. the Certiorari and Mittimus; and of their several Returns; and demurred to them: And Mr. Attorney joining in Demurrer, the Cause was adjourned into the Exchequer-Chamber, to be heard before all the Judges of England.

Hampden appears, and demurs to the Writ, &c.

The Cause heard before all the Judges.

All the Judges being assembled in the Exchequer-Chamber, in Hillary Term, 163$\frac{7}{8}$. Mr. St. John, Counsel for Mr. Hampden, entered upon his Defence, and said, He admitted that the King was by Law entrusted with the Care and Defence of the Realm; that the Militia was entirely in his Hands; that no Man might ſend out a Ship of War, or erect a Bulwark upon his own Land, againſt an Enemy, without the King's Commiſſion; nor might the Subject, without a ſpecial Commiſſion, arm, or draw Troops together, or make any general Collection of Money of the Subjects, though with their Conſent: The ſuprema poteſtas was inherent in his Majeſty, as Part of his Crown and kingly Dignity: His Majeſty alſo was the ſole Judge of Dangers from abroad; and when, and how, the ſame ought to be prevented. He admitted further, that the Law had given the King a Power, by Writ, to command the Inhabitants of each County to provide Shipping, for the Defence of the Kingdom, and might compel the doing thereof; ſo that the Queſtion was not, in whom the ſupreme Power of giving the Authority to the Sheriff, which was mentioned in the Writ, did lie (for that was in the King); but the Queſtion was, By what means this ſupreme Power was to be communicated and applied, the Law of England having known Rules, which were neceſſary to be obſerved in ſuch Caſes?

As the King could not apply his Laws, in many Caſes, without the Aſſiſtance of his Judges; ſo, in other Caſes, he could not communicate, either his Power, or Juſtice, to his Subjects, without the Aſſiſtance of his Parliament: That it did not appear, that this Writ, which gave Power to ſell and alter the Property of the Defendant's Goods, iſſued from his Majeſty, ſitting in Parliament: And the Queſtion then would be, If it was not erroneouſly iſſued?

There were ſeveral known and undoubted Ways and Means, whereby the Law had provided for the Defence of the Realm, both by Land and Sea, without this Way in the Writ; as firſt, by the Tenure of Lands. The Kings had antiently all the Lands in their own Hands: Their Books agreed, that all the Lands in the Kingdom were held, mediately or immediately, of the Crown: And as the Law had intruſted the King with the Defence of the Kingdom, ſo had it intruſted him with the Reſervation of ſuch Tenures, as might ſerve for that Purpoſe.

Every Man, who held by Knight's Service, was to find a Man completely armed: He who held by a whole Knight's Fee, forty Days: He who held by half a Knight's Fee, twenty Days; and ſo in Proportion: And it appeared by the Red Book, that there were thirty thouſand Knights Fees held of the Crown, at the Conqueſt: And ſince the Tenants by Knight's Service, were obliged to ſerve but forty Days, other Tenures were reſerved; ſuch as Grand-Serjeanty, Tenures by Cornage, and Caſtle-guard; and, according to Littleton, there were eleven thouſand of theſe Tenures, for the Defence of Caſtles and Fortreſſes, within the Realm; moſt Part of which were upon the Sea-Coaſts, or upon the Frontiers of Scotland and Wales, the Places of greateſt Danger. Beſides which, there were Tenures by Petty-Serjeanty, which were intended for the finding of all ſorts of Armour and Munition for the War.

1637. 13 Car. I.

The Cinque-Ports, and other Frontier Places, were allowed ſeveral Privileges; ſuch as, having all Juriſdiction within themſelves, &c. not only to invite People to ſettle in them, but, that the Inhabitants might never be obliged to remove from their Dwellings, and leave ſuch Towns expoſed to the Enemy: That the King was actually poſſeſſed of theſe Military Services, as he received the Profits of Wards, Marriages, Reliefs, &c. (the Fruits of them); and theſe Profits were to be laid out in the Defence of the Realm, as appeared by many Authorities.

That there were other Tenures reſerved for Sea Service: In the Regiſter, fol. 2. one Town is ſaid to hold by the Tenure of furniſhing five Ships annually: In the Iter Roll of Eſſex, 13 Edw. I. Rot. 7. it is preſented, that the Town of Maldon held by the Service, of finding one Ship; and from the Time of their Rendezvous, they were to remain in the Service forty Days at their own Expences. Many other Towns held by this Tenure of finding Ships: and, uſually, when the Tenants were ſummoned to the Land Service, theſe were ſummoned to perform their Services at Sea; and the Summons to each run in the ſame Words, (viz.) cum toto ſervitio veſtro quod nobis debetis: And in the 13th of Edw. III. Pars 1. M. 11. the King declares, That the Cinque Ports, and other great Towns and Havens, are franchiſed pur eſtre mure inter nous & Aliens, that they may be a Wall between us and Foreigners.

There were other Tenures created, whereby Rents were reſerved out of Lands for Servants Wages: All Men had not antiently an equal Right to Liberty and Property: The Villain's Perſon was not free; his Lord might impriſon him, and tax both his Lands and Goods de haut & de baſs. Tenants in Antient Demeſne and Burghers, had an abſolute Freedom in their Perſons; but were liable to be taxed for the Defence, and other neceſſary Affairs of the Realm, without Conſent of Parliament. Such Tenants in Antient Demeſne, were to plow and manure the King's Lands; and, according to an antient Manuſcript, the Corn, and other Proviſions ariſing thereby, were deſigned to ſtore the King's Garriſons: And ſuch Tenants were taxable at the King's Pleaſure, as Villains were, but only for the Defence of the Realm, and other Neceſſities of State: And there were ſtill a third ſort of Tenants, called Freeholders, who held by a certain Rent, and had an abſolute Freedom in their Perſons and Eſtates, and could only be taxed in Parliament.

Beſides theſe Tenures, the Law has conferred divers Prerogatives on the King, which were intended to be employed for the Defence of the Kingdom, and other publick Occaſions; ſuch as the Property of all Treaſure-Trove, and Gold and Silver Mines: In the Parliament Roll of 6 Rich. II. M. 42. the Commons petition, that the King will live on his Revenues; and that the Wards, Marriages, Reliefs, Eſcheats, Forfeitures, and other Profits of the Crown, may be ſpent in the Wars for the Defence of the Kingdom.

That Aids and Subſidies, and likewiſe Tonnage and Poundage, before they were granted

1637. 13 Car. I. the Crown for Life, were intended not only for the Protection of Merchants, and the ordinary Defence of the Sea, but for the Defence thereof in Times of extraordinary Danger, from the Incurſions of Enemies, &c. as appeared by the ſeveral Grants of them in the Parliament Rolls; and when they were granted for Life, it appears by 12 Edw. IV. 13. they were granted, that the King might always have Treaſure in Readineſs to oppoſe an Invaſion: That his Majeſty was in the actual Poſſeſſion of theſe, and had by his Proclamation declared, that they were granted to his Anceſtors for the Defence of the Seas, and the Safety of the Realm; and, that he received them for that Purpoſe.

That by the Statute of Wincheſter, 13 Edw. I. Every Man, according to the Value of his Lands and Goods, is to find Horſe and Armour for the Defence of the Realm; and by 5 Hen. 4. every Man is to find Armour againſt Invaſions.

He inſiſted, that the Service of the Cinque Ports, Tonnage and Poundage, and the other Duties above-mentioned, were the ordinary legal Ways appointed for the Defence of the Sea. The way by the Writ; by aſſeſſing and altering the Property of the Subjects Goods, without their Conſent, as it was an unuſual and extraordinary Way, ſo he ſhould ſhew it was not legal. If the Service of the Ports had been firſt required, and the Money, ariſing by the Ways aforeſaid, had been laid out in the Defence of the Kingdom, and theſe had not been ſufficient; if it ſhould be admitted, in that Caſe, that the Writ was legal, yet, in this Caſe, it could not be ſo; becauſe it was a Maxim in Law, that we ought not to have recourſe to extraordinary Means, when the ordinary Means were ſufficient: As no Man could ſue in Chancery, when he might have Remedy at Common Law; nor, ought any Man to be tried by a Court-Martial, while the Civil Courts were open. But he held, That the Property of the Subjects Goods could not be affected, or altered, without an Act of Parliament, though it were for the Defence of the Realm; which, he ſaid, was evident from the Aids and Subſidies which had been granted by Parliament; and from the antient Summons to Parliament: For when Aids were demanded, the particular Cauſe of Defence, and againſt what Enemy, were ſpecified: His Majeſty could not, without a Parliament, tax his Subjects, even for the levying Land-Forces for the Defence of the Kingdom; for maintaining his Forts and Caſtles; for warlike Stores, or Proviſions; for the Maintenance of Priſoners, or Hoſtages; or for preſerving the publick Peace; and, if he could not tax them for theſe Services, it was evident he could not tax them for any.

He admitted, that after the Statute of Wincheſter, every Man, according to his Eſtate and Abilities, was to find all manner of Arms, as well for the Defence of the Realm againſt Foreigners, as for the Preſervation of the Peace: And that, upon a ſudden Invaſion, or Rebellion, they were compellable to march out of their reſpective Counties to oppoſe either, where the King went in Perſon; as appeared by 11 Hen. IV. cap. 1 & 18. And he admitted, that as long as they remained at home in their ſeveral Counties, they were to have no Wages: But he denied, that the Subject was taxable for Wages, or Proviſions, or otherwiſe, for finding of Soldiers out of their reſpective Counties, for Defence of the Kingdom; or that they were compellable to do it at their own Charge. 1637. 13 Car. I.

He acknowledged, indeed, that before the Reign of Edw. III. Commiſſions had iſſued for that Purpoſe: To balance which, it was evident, that Armies of 30000 Men, beſides thoſe who were obliged to ſerve by their Tenures, had been maintained at the King's Charge, from the Time they marched out of their reſpective Counties. And, upon a Rebellion in the Reign of Henry VIII. againſt which the King intended to have gone in Perſon, Privy-Seals were ſent to moſt of the Gentry, to attend the King with their beſt Retinues; and they ſhould bring the Bills of their Expences with them, which were promiſed to be repaid: And it appeared, that thoſe who loſt their Horſes in Battel with the Enemy in the Reigns of Edw. I. and Edw. II. were entitled to Dammages for the Loſs of their Horſes: That the King alſo bore the Charge of ſuch Frontier Caſtles and Towns as were beſieged, appeared by the Allowances made in the Exchequer, Trin. 27 Edw. I. Rot. 47. pro tuitione NEW-CASTLE contra Scotos, qui hoſtiliter Regnum in partibus illis invaſerunt: And the Charge of maintaining Priſoners taken in defenſive Wars were frequently allowed in the Exchequer, 4 Edw. II. Rot. 22. dorſ.

Then he proceeded to ſhew, that Money borrowed by the King, for the Defence of the Realm, had not only been repaid upon Petition, but recovered by Suit in the ordinary Courts of Juſtice. Comm' Paſch' 31 Rot. 41. the King borrowed of Henry Thomſon 149 l. pro defenſione Regni; which was ſued for, and Re-payment ordered: And Paſch' 29 Edw. I. Rot. 18. The King pro urgentiſſimis Regni negotiis & defenſione totius Regni, having ſeized the Money of all the Abbies, Cathedrals, and Religious Houſes, and promiſed to return it: Upon Petition for it, at the Parliament held at Lincoln, he promiſed the Re-payment of it again, Ita quod Regis conſcientia ſuper hoc exoneretur. But, if the King had apprehended, when he wanted Money for the Defence of the Realm, he might have taxed his Subjects for it, he would never have anſwered, that he would repay it, ad exonerandum conſcientiam; for then, in Equity and Conſcience, the Parliament ought to have ſatisfied ſuch Debts.

That the Subject was not liable to ſuch Charges for the Defence of the Kingdom, he obſerved alſo, was evident from ſeveral Acts of Parliament; as 4 Will. I. where the King grants that all Freemen ſhould hold their Lands and Poſſeſſions free from all unjuſt Exactions and Tallages, Niſi ſervitium ſuum liberum quod de jure nobis facere tenentur. And the Grant or Statute, obtained of King John at Runningmead, That no Aid ſhould be levied but by the Common (or Grand) Council of the Kingdom. 25 Edw. I. cap. 5 & 6. That no Aids ſhould be taken, but by Conſent in Parliament; and by the Statute De Tallagio, that no Tallage, or Aid, ſhall be taken without Conſent: And it happened, that the Grievances which procured the the laſt Statute, were Exactions made by the King for the Defence of the Realm.

The Statute 14 Edw. III. c. 1. declares, That the People ſhall not be compelled to make any Aid, or ſuſtain any Charge, but in Parliament. He cited alſo 25 Edw. III. and 1 Rich. III. againſt the taking of Loans and Benevolences. And in the 3d Year of the preſent King, a Commiſſion iſſuing, for Aiding his Majeſty's Allies beyond Sea, or for the Defence and Safety of the Kingdom; that Commiſſion was condemned by both Houſes of Parliament, and cancelled in his Majeſty's Preſence.

He did admit, that the Danger might ſometimes be ſo preſſing, that the Subjects Goods might be taken away without their Conſent: There might be ſuch Times when Property ceaſed, and all Things reſolved again into the common Principles of Nature; as in Caſes of Fire, and ſudden Invaſions: Any Man may juſtify pulling down Houſes, in the firſt Caſe, or erecting Bulwarks upon other Men's Lands, in the other: In ſuch Times, not only his Majeſty, but every one, was empowered to take the Goods of another, pull down their Houſes, or burn their Corn, to cut off Proviſions from the Enemy, and do ſuch other Things as might conduce to the Safety of the Kingdom, without any Reſpect to Property, 12 Hen. VIII. 2 Br. tranſ. 406. 8 Edw. IV. 23. And when the King proclaimed War, the Law took Notice of it; the Subjects of the Nation againſt whom War was proclaimed, immediately left their Properties here, and could maintain no Action for them; and any of the King's Subjects might ſeiſe the Goods of ſuch a Foreigner: But here it did not appear by the Writ, that War was proclaimed againſt any Nation: So that the Point was, Whether the King, in Time of Peace, without Conſent of Parliament, could alter the Property of the Subjects, upon a Suggeſtion, that Money was wanting for the Defence of the Kingdom; eſpecially, when it appeared by the Writ, that the Time allowed for bringing in the Supply, was ſeven Months; and conſequently the Neceſſity, in reſpect of Time, was not ſuch, but that a Parliament might have been called, time enough to have raiſed a Supply.

The Argument of the Solicitor-General, for the King.

Sir Edward Littleton, the Solicitor-General, argued on the other Side in the Behalf of the King, and obſerved, That the Writ directed to the Sheriff of Bucks, 4 Aug. 11 Car. I. for providing a Ship for the Defence of the Kingdom, was the Ground of the Aſſeſſment; and the Reaſon ſet forth was, Quia ſalus Regni periclitabatur, which was not only confeſſed by the Demurrer, but teſtified by the King under the Great Seal: The ſole Queſtion therefore was, Whether the King, finding the Safety of the Kingdom neceſſarily required the Aid commanded in the Writ, might not require that Aid for the Preſervation of the Kingdom and People?

It was agreed, that the Kingdom was to be defended, and that the King was entruſted with that Defence; but it was denied, that he might do it out of Parliament: He was ſorry, there could be no Salvation for the People but in Parliament: Mr. St. John had admitted the King might do this, if there was an actual War, or a War proclaimed; and, why then might it not be done, when the Safety of the Kingdom was in Danger? The fundamental Rule, cited by himſelf, was, that the Safety of the People was the Supreme Law; and it would be ſtrange, if the King could by his Writ grant them a Remedy for the Recovery of their private Eſtates, and ſhould not have Power to iſſue a Writ for the Defence of the Kingdom, when it was in imminent Danger.

The Common Safety was to be preferred to our private Eſtate: Upon an Invaſion, it was lawful to erect Bulwarks on any Man's Land, for the Defence of the Kingdom; and ſhould not a King have Power to put our Out-works at Sea, our Naval Walls, in a Condition to oppoſe the Enemies Landing at our Doors: By the King's Command, the Suburbs of any Town might be burnt, or razed: And in 1588. great Armies of an 100,000 Men, and upwards, were raiſed by the Queen's ſole Authority, and maintained at the Subjects Charge; and Orders were given, if they could not prevent the Enemies landing, to burn the Towns, and deſtroy the Corn, and all manner of Proviſion that might afford them Suſtenance. Where was Property in that Caſe? There was no poſſibility of ſaving private Fortunes, if they ſuffered the Kingdom to be loſt.

The King had many Prerogatives that affected the Subjects Property; as digging in any Man's Houſe, or Lands, for Salt-Petre, and Royal Mines; and many things were made lawful by Neceſſity, which otherwiſe were not: It is abſurd to talk of obſerving Rules and Forms, when the Kingdom was in Danger of being loſt; when the keeping the Laws would be the Ruin of the Commonwealth. The King might lay a Charge upon the Subject for building the Walls of a Town, becauſe they have the Benefit of it in Time of Danger; and was not the whole Kingdom preſerved by keeping a Navy at Sea? It was agreeable to Law, that where the People received the Benefit, they ſhould contribute to the Charge: And in leſſer Matters, ſuch as Pontage and Paveage, the King might impoſe, or charge and diſtrein the ter' tenents, to make Contribution proportionable to their Eſtates and Abilities.

If there were but Rumours of Wars, the Laws were ſilent; much more, when the King foreſees the Danger, and declares it. In Queen Elizabeth's Reign, greater Things were done upon leſs Occaſions: Ships were taken up, the Ports ſhut, and Men raiſed on the leaſt Apprehenſion of Danger. It would be ſtupid, to make no Preparations againſt an Enemy, till he was actually on our Coaſt; it might then be too late to prevent his landing.

The making War and Peace was a Royal Prerogative, the People had nothing to do with, nor were all Dangers fit to be communicated to them: The King beſt knew the Exigency of Affairs. It might not be prudent to have the Kingdom without a Navy, when ſuch great military Preparations were making in the neighbouring Kingdoms. Dangers ought to be prevented, as well as removed.

Before the Conqueſt, King Ethelred commanded, that every 310 Hides of Land ſhould find a Ship. Danegelt was paid annually before the Conqueſt, for the Maintenance of a Fleet, as well in Peace as War; but afterwards, only in Time of War: Danegelt is ſaid to be releaſed by the Confeſſor; becauſe he dreamed he ſaw the Devil dancing upon the Danegelt; but it appears by the Black-Book to have been reſumed, and paid in the Conqueror's Time; and it was paid alſo in the Reign of Hen. II. as appears by the Pipe-Roll; and though the Name was altered, the Thing continued. In King John's Time they gave a fourth Part of their Revenues for the Defence of the Land. In th 48th of Edw. III. ſome Captains not being able to maintain themſelves, the King commanded they ſhould be paid De Com. Comitat. 48 Edw. III. M. 2. de pecunia levand' circa tuitionem maris.

In the Reign of Hen. III. the Citizens of London and Men of Greenwich, were commanded to guard the Mouth of the Thames. Clauſ. 48 Hen. III. M. 11. dorſ. And when any refuſed to attend the Defence, the King commanded to ſeize their Lands, take the Profits, and anſwer them into the Exchequer: The finding of Arms did not begin upon the Statute of Wincheſter; that Statute only appointed in what manner the Country ſhould be rated: The County of Berks, though an inland County, was aſſeſſed towards the Defence of the Sea, and upon a Refuſal, a Capias in manus was awarded to anſwer it in the Exchequer, 24 Edw. I. And having cited a great many Authorities, eſpecially in the Reign of Edw. III. he obſerved, that it was evident from thoſe Records, that both Sea and Land had been guarded by the Commons, when the King apprehended any Danger; and, if the Danger was great, no Age, or Sex, or Order, were exempted; the Refuſers being compelled by Impriſonment, or the Seizure of their Lands or Goods, to perform it: And the Writs ſignificantly expreſſed, that no Wages in theſe Caſes ought to be paid by the King: Then he cited ſeveral Commiſſions for Defence, in the Time of the Civil Wars between the Houſes of York and Lancaſter; and particularly a Commiſſion of Array, iſſued by King Edw. IV. to raiſe a Power againſt his great Adverſary and Rebel, Hen. VI. who lately enjoyed the Crown by Uſurpation; and ſhewed, that by the Statute of 1 Hen. VII. cap. 16. every Subject was bound by his Allegiance, to aſſiſt when Need required. Statute 35 Hen. VIII. cap. 13. recited, That the Subject was bound to aſſiſt the King, with Body, Lands, and Goods, in his Wars; and in 4 & 5 Phil. & Mar. Commiſſions of Array were iſſued to all Gentlemen. In 3 & 4 Phil. & Mar. Calais being beſieged, the Warden of the Cinque-Ports was commanded to make Proclamation in Kent, that all, from ſixteen to ſixty, ſhould repair to Dover, to ſave Calais, on Pain of Death. In the Reign of Queen Elizabeth a Commiſſion iſſued, to muſter all Men againſt Scotland; and with theſe Commiſſions went Inſtructions, that the Service was neceſſary, becauſe all our Neighbours were in Arms.

When the Spaniſh Armada threatened the Kingdom, in the Year 1588. the whole Kingdom was in Arms, at the Subjects Charge, by Orders from the Council-Table; and the City of London being required to find ten Ships, furniſhed out 20: Such was the Subjects Affection for their Prince and Country in thoſe Days; they did not diſpute, but obey: Letters were in like manner ſent to other Towns, to provide Shipping; and Colcheſter refuſing to contribute, was compelled to it: Nor did the Queen wait till the Year 88. while the Tops of the Spaniſh Ships might be ſeen from the Coaſt, but ſhe made theſe Preparations in the Year 1587. when there was only a Rumour, that the Spaniards intended to invade the Kingdom: Great Forces being aſſembled in London, in the Year 1599, for the Defence of the Queen againſt the Earl of Eſſex, the Charge was borne by the People, and even the Inns of Court contributed towards it; and where the Gentlemen did not aſſiſt in Perſon, ſhe had their Purſes. In the 2d Year of the preſent Reign a Proclamation iſſued, that all Men ſhould repair to certain Parts of the Kingdom, and continue there till the Danger was over; and the Reſolution of the Judges, the laſt Year, that the King might command the Subject to provide Shipping for the Defence of the Realm, he thought was ſufficient to ſatisfy all reaſonable Men of the Legality of ſuch Commands: However, the King had now given leave, that the Matter ſhould be publickly debated for the Satisfaction of his Subjects, and that the Records might be ſearched; and he obſerved Mr. St. John had taken great Pains in it: But the Records that had been cited by him were not of ſuch Weight as thoſe produced for the King; for, if his Predeceſſors had ſometimes, for the Eaſe of his Subjects, remitted any Thing, this was not of that Weight as the ſhewing the conſtant Uſe of that compulſive Power uſed by the Crown, and obeyed by the People: If any King had ſpoken in gentle Terms, as King John when he was depoſed, this would not be of that Force as the Words uſed in the Writs.

It had been ſaid, that the King had a private, and a legal Will: That he could not act in many Caſes but by certain Rules, and by the Mediation of others; and, particularly, that he could not ſit in Judgment himſelf, but muſt adminſter the Laws by his Judges; which he denied; for the Pleadings in the King's Bench were coram Rege. Edward IV. ſat there in a Trial of Rape; and the famous Judge Popham ſat at the King's Feet, and other Judges on each Side of him: And King James actually adjudged thoſe two Caſes, Bellingham's and Sir Thomas Lake's: Nor did the Book, cited to prove the contrary, ſay, the King ſhould not judge; but that, if one was convicted before the Judges, the King ſhould not ſet the Fine, becauſe he did not hear the Cauſe.

It had been urged, that this Writ of Shipping made a Change in the Law, which could only be altered by Act of Parliament; but here was no Change in the Law, it having been the Cuſtom of all Ages: Nor was it any Argument, that, becauſe the King could do a Thing by Parliament, he could do it no way elſe. As to the Survey that had been taken of the King's Revenues, Tenures by Knight's Service, the Profits of Wards, Reliefs, &c. there was no Authority to ſhew that theſe were intended for the Maintenance of Wars; for theſe were reſerved for the conſtant Support of the Government, whether in Peace, or War: Nor could theſe, and the Service of the Cinque, Ports be sufficient to defend the Nation againſt an Invaſion: The whole Body of the Kingdom muſt, and ever did, contribute to the Defence of it; in which all were concerned: Nor was Tonnage and Poundage ever intended for extraordinary Service, but only for the conſtant Guard of the Coaſts in Time of Peace: Queen Elizabeth had Tonnage and Poundage; the Service of the Cinque Ports, &c. and yet her People gave her Subſidies; and ſhe raiſed both Men and Money, for the Defence of the Realm, by her Commiſſions, beſides.

It was true, nothing ought to be taken from the Subject ordinarily, but in Parliament; but that did not prove, he was not to contribute to his own Defence in Caſes of imminent Danger: It was admitted, indeed, that the King ought to have the Direction of the War; but to what Purpoſe was this, if he could command neither Men, or Money? Nor was it a good Argument, that the King could not command the Aid of his Subjects, becauſe he ſometimes borrowed Money of his Subjects: And though it had been ſaid, our Kings had maintained Armies themſelves; it did not follow from thence, that the King could not command his People to attend him, or his Lieutenant, as had been the Practice of all Ages.

As to the Statutes that prohibited the levying Money on the People, without Conſent of Parliament; This muſt be underſtood of unjuſt Exactions, as appeared by thoſe very Statutes, and of ordinary Caſes; not where the whole Kingdom was in Danger, as was admitted by the Demurrer: And there might be Danger foreſeen by the King, though no War was actually proclaimed; of which the King was the only Judge.

Mr. Holborne's Argument for Mr. Hampden

Mr. Holborne, another of Mr. Hampden's Counſel, obſerved on his Behalf, That upon the 4th of Auguſt, 11 Car. I. the Day of the Date of the Writ, the King could not charge the County of Bucks, to find a Ship at their own Charge; for that it did not appear by that Writ, that in the King's Judgment, the Kingdom was in Danger of being loſt; or, if it did, that the Danger was ſo inſtant and unavoidable, that it neceſſarily required this Aid, and could not expect a parliamentary Conſideration; and laſtly, that the Truth of this could not be legally proved by the King's Certificate.

The Writ only mentioned, Loſſes of Merchants by Pyrates and Sea-Robbers; no Danger to the Kingdom, or People in general, or ſuch inſtant Danger, at leaſt, as to require this Command in the Writ, even in the King's Judgment: There were above two hundred Days between the Teſte of the Writ, and the Rendezvous appointed by it: The ſummoning a Parliament required but forty Days; and in the remaining Time the Parliament might have conſidered of the Defence: The only Doubt was occaſioned by the Mittimus, which recites the Writ of the firſt of Auguſt, and then adds, Quia ſalus Regni periclitabatur, which, it was ſaid, the Defendant had confeſſed by his Demurrer: And, if that did not hold, that the King, who was the ſole Judge of the Danger, had certified it under the Great Seal: That the Words Salus Regni periclitabatur were but relative, and referred only to the Dangers mentioned in the firſt Writ; neither could any further Clauſes be legally added in this, tending to the ſame End; and conſequently, their Demurrer was no Confeſſion of any ſuch Danger.

1637. 13 Car. I.

And had the Words been poſitive, the Word Salus was but a metaphorical Expreſſion, and the Law would not endure Metaphors in Writs and Pleadings: Nor did theſe Words import immediate Danger of the Loſs of the Kingdom; for applying the Word Salus to a Natural Body, the Doctor might ſay, his Patient was not in Health, and yet, he might be in no Danger of Death: And the ſame Senſe it muſt have in the Body Politick. The Words might imply Danger, yet not ſuch a Danger as to threaten the immediate Loſs of the Kingdom.

As to the King's having declared his Opinion under the Broad-Seal, they made no Doubt of the King's Word. They believed there was a Danger, though not ſo apparent to them: But in legal Proceedings, his Majeſty's Opinion, and Certificate in Things of Fact, were not binding: But what he chiefly relied on was, that though it did not appear by the Mittimus, that the 4th of Auguſt the Kingdom was in Danger of being loſt, that was not ſufficient in Law; nor could their Demurrer hurt them; becauſe this did not appear in the Writ of the 4th of Auguſt itſelf; for how could the Subject know by the Writ of the 4th of Auguſt, what Dangers would be declared afterwards? And, admitting the King had ſaid, the Kingdom was in ſuch inſtant Danger of being loſt, and that it could not be prevented any other way; yet, if the contrary appeared in the Record, then neither was the Demurrer, or Confeſſion, or the King's Certificate, concluſive: Every Conſideration but thoſe of protecting the Merchants from Pyrates and Robbers, and the ordinary Defence of the Sea, muſt be thrown out, becauſe they were not contained in the firſt Writ: He ſaid, he thought he might, without further Argument, venture his Client's Cauſe upon this; and he ſhould be glad, if the Caſe might receive a Determination on the penning of the Writ: He was willing to decline the main Queſtion out of Duty to his Majeſty, (viz) Whether by the fundamental Policy of England, the King could charge the Subject, out of Parliament, for the Common Good, or, for the neceſſary Defence of the Realm, if in his Majeſty's Judgment the Danger was inſtant, and unavoidable?

To which the Lord Chief Juſtice anſwering, They did not uſe to judge of Caſes by Fractions, Mr. Holborne proceeded, and ſaid, Since it was their Command he ſhould go on, he hoped his Majeſty would excuſe them for arguing what could not elſe be determined, profeſſing, both for himſelf, and his Client, that when they mentioned, how far a Governor, ſubject to Error and Will, might uſe Regal Power, they acknowledged their preſent Happineſs, in being bleſſed with ſo juſt a Prince, that, were his Majeſty immortal, as he deſerved, and they were ſure his Succeſſors would inherit his Virtues, they ſhould wiſh the Regal Power might be unlimited, and free from political Advice.

Then he proceeded to enquire, Whether the King could, out of Parliament, charge the Subject, either for the Guard of the Sea, or the Defence of the Kingdom, though he judges it in Danger

1637. 13 Car. I.

Danger of being loſt: As to the Diſtinction of Dangers, ordinary and extraordinary, there was no great matter in it, he thought; for, if the King was Judge of that Danger, then he had no Reſtraint but his own Will.

He acknowledged, indeed, that Property muſt yield to Neceſſity; and in Caſes of actual Invaſion, and inſtant Danger, it was not only in the Power of the King, but of a Subject, to enter upon another's Property: He may make Bulwarks, or do any Act upon any Man's Land, and invade any Man's Property towards Defence: Nay, he might prejudice the King himſelf, in Point of Property: He might take the King's Horſes, and blow up his Fortreſſes, to prevent their falling into the Enemies Hands: But then there muſt be actual and apparent Danger.

He knew it was held as a Maxim, That the King could do no Wrong; and that, therefore, the Law had repoſed this Truſt in him, of charging the Subject; but he could ſhew where the Law took notice, the King might do amiſs: The King had a double Capacity, as a King, and as a Man; and to ſay, as a Man, he could not err, was ſtrange: He was liable to Infirmities and Miſtakes, like other Men; and, leſt ſuch Infirmities ſhould injure the Body politick, the Law had provided Means to prevent it; as the Writ of Ad quod damnum, if any Dammage accrued to the Subject by the King's Grant, the Patent was naught: And though the King might grant Pontage, Paveage, and Murage, yet, he could not grant them, where there was no Occaſion, or a Sum that exceeded the Benefit the Subject was to receive by them: There were other Judges of the Juſtneſs of the Proportion, beſides the King, when a Patent came to be queſtioned: And, if the Law did not allow the King an abſolute Power in ſuch Trifles, it was not to be ſuppoſed he ſhould have it in Matters of this Importance; and that there ſhould be no Judge but himſelf, of the Occaſion, or Proportion.

Were the Law allowed the King to charge any one abſolutely, it was not as a Subject, but as a Tenant by reaſon of Tenure, which aroſe by a precedent Conſideration: But even in thoſe Charges in reſpect of the Tenancy, where the Charge might come often, it was not left to the King's Judgment; as in Eſcuage, which was to be aſſeſſed in Parliament: The Aids to make his Son a Knight, or to marry his Daughter, are Things that could happen but once, and ſo were left more to the King's Diſcretion; and, in theſe Caſes, the Law did not give the King a Power of charging the Subject, but in reſpect of ſome Benefit received; and it was but juſt, that they, who received the Benefit, ſhould bear the Charge: The Crown had not a Power to lay a Charge for the publick Good; if the King created an Office, with a Fee, it was void: The King granted a Rate upon every Barge that paſſed the Bridge, and it was held void; and ſo in ſetting up Lights for the Benefit of Sea-faring Men, he could not charge the Subject.

William the Conqueror granted, that all Men ſhould hold their Lands freed from all unjuſt Exaction, or Tallage; nothing was to be demanded but by Tenure; and ſuch Grants were as binding as Statutes now; and, if all Taxes were diſcharged, except thoſe ariſing by Tenure, conſequently, the Subject was liable to no other: The Exception explained the Rule: He inſiſted alſo, that the Charter of King John, Magna Charta, and the other Statutes made in Confirmation of it, extended to all manner of Taxes and Charges, except thoſe ariſing from Tenure: That thoſe Laws prohibited the laying any Taxes on the People, without Conſent of Parliament; and, if this was againſt Law, it was no matter what the Practice had been. They muſt reduce Precedents to Laws, and not Laws to Precedents; and, notwithſtanding the Practice, the Subject made a continual Claim againſt them.

1637. 13 Car. I.

Danegelt, he ſuppoſed, was begun in the Time of the Saxons, by common Conſent, and raiſed but upon emergent Occaſions; and not intended as a Proviſion for all Times: He acknowledged, it was continued by ſome Daniſh Kings; but that it was generally decried by the People, and, at length, relinquiſhed by the Confeſſor: That the Conqueror, indeed, reſumed it, but the People made Terms with ſeveral of his Succeſſors, for laying it down; and the Charter of King John put an End to it. From whence he inferred, that though there were ſuch a Practice, under Pretence of defending the Sea, the People decrying it, it was not ſuch a Practice as could create a Law. When Danegelt was laid down, he acknowledged there was a Charge for providing Shipping in the room of it; but this too was generally decried; and by the Statute, De Tallagio non concedendo, 25 Edw. I. an End alſo was put to that; and in the 29th of the ſame Reign, the King contracted for Ships at his own Charges.

He admitted alſo, That in the Reigns of Edw. II. and Edw. III. Writs were iſſued for Shipping againſt the Enemy; but theſe were pro ſalvatione Regni, and the King ſent Money for the Soldiers Victuals; and, though Edw. III. broke theſe Rates, ſometimes he repented of it, and demanded Supplies for Shipping in a parliamentary Way; and theſe Ship Writs generally ended with Edw. III.

Then he proceeded to ſhew, That whatever Eſtate the King had, he had it in his politick Capacity, and was obliged, both in ordinary and extraordinary Caſes, for that Reaſon, to bear the Charges of the Defence of the Kingdom; and upon this Ground all Acts of Reſumption were founded; and the antient Lands of the Crown were not alienable. When all the Lands were in the King, he diſpoſed of ſome for the Service of the Kingdom, from whence Tenures originally aroſe; and divers Lands were given on Condition of finding Ships, beſides thoſe given to the Cinque Ports: And though it had been ſaid, theſe were not ſufficient for the Defence of the Kingdom, in caſe of a Foreign Invaſion; it appeared by Domeſday-Book, that the King had a great Navy, and no leſs than ſixty thouſand Knights Fees, in the Conqueror's Time: So that there was Proviſion made for Defence in the Inſtitution of our Government, and particularly for the Guard of the Sea: The King alſo had the old Cuſtoms, Tonnage and Poundage, &c. for this End.

And

1637. 13 Car. I.

And though all Property must submit to Necessity, yet a distant Danger will not authorise a Man to invade another's Property. If Queen Elizabeth, did in the Year 1588. command the burning the Corn, and other Provisions, if the Enemy landed; he thought, she could not lawfully command them to burn their Corn, before the Enemy landed. The King might command burning the Suburbs of a Town, to prevent an Enemy's posting himself in them; but, if there was only a Fear of a War, the King could not command it. All positive Laws must cease, in Time of extreme Danger: But whether all Laws relating to our Persons and Properties ceased, when the Danger was but conceived, he submitted to their Lordships.

But admitting the King could command his Subjects to find Ships, Whether he could give a Power to the Sheriff, to make an Assessment, as the Writ directed, was a Question? In all politick Charges the Law provided they should be equal, as in the Case of Subsidies and Fifteenths; and in Danegelt they taxed by Hides: But how the Sheriff should have Knowledge to charge all Men's Estates equally, he was at a Loss to conceive. If the Law entrusted the King with this Power, it did not entrust the Sheriff, and Under-Sheriff: Assessments were usually laid by others, and not by the Sheriffs. If a Hundred was charged, they had Ways of laying it on themselves proportionably; and if such a Levy was made, it was a Question, Whether the Money could be brought into the Exchequer by scire facias? He believed, this was the first Writ that ever was of the kind: It not only gave a Power of levying the Money, but prescribed the Way; by Imposition, by Distress, and Sale: He knew no Case could match it.

The Attorney-General's Argument for the King.

Sir John Banks, the Attorney-General, replied to Mr. Holborne, the Defendant's Counsel: And first he laid down this Position; That the King, as he was King of England, pro defensione regni, tuitione maris, &c. when in his Judgment he conceived it a Time of such Danger, as necessarily required the Aid commanded in this Writ, might command and compel his Subjects, per totam Angliam, to set forth Ships, with Men and Ammunition, and double Skippage, as well by his Writ under the great Seal, as by Consent of Parliament; and held, that this Power was not derived from the People, but reserved to the King, when positive Laws first began. The Regal Power was not confined to the politick Advice of Parliament; he might exercise it without Consent of Parliament, and even when Parliaments were sitting, as his Ancestors had ever done.

The Romans governed this Island five hundred Years, by their Prefects, without Controul: The Saxon Kings succeeded them; and it appeared from antient Grants and Edicts, that the naval Power was commanded by those Princes, for the Defence of the Realm.

King Edgar, who began his Reign in the Year 959. set out a Navy of 3600 Ships, and commanded, that every Year, at Easter, a Fleet of 3000 Ships should be equipped for the Sea-Service. King Ethelred, in the Year 1008, fitted out a Royal Fleet, commanding every 310 Hides of Land to find a Ship, and every eight Hides to find a Man, to rendezvous at Sandwich, and oppose the Danes; at which Rate, there must be assembled 11000 Ships, and 45000 Soldiers, and upwards: And this was done by the King's sole Command, per totam Angliam: And in the 36th Year of his Reign, he commanded a Fleet to be ready every Year at Easter, under a certain Pain. King Canutus, the Dane, also commanded a naval Armament yearly; and this was done by the Advice of the Lords; and if these were to be deemed Acts of Parliament, or Laws, they were confirmed by William the Conqueror. He held, the King of England was an absolute Monarch; nothing could be ascribed to a King, but what was inherent in his Person, as appeared both by our Records, and Acts of Parliament: And, the Mirror that was written before and at the Conquest, declares, that the King had the Supreme Dominion by Sea and Land; and the very Soil of the Sea belonged to him, when the Waters left it.

As the Law had entrusted the King with War and Peace, no private Subject ought to distrust him, and insinuate, that he would cause Forces to be mustered, and Ships to be provided, where there was no imminent Danger: He was the sole Judge, and ought not to be questioned: He had no Superior, but God, according to Bracton.

It had been objected, indeed, that there must be a concurrent Power, a Politick Advice in Parliament: But Kings were before Parliaments, and might statuere, without the Aid of Parliament. There was a Time, when no municipal Laws were established, but Kings governed by natural Equity; and since there were positive Laws in England, it was evident from the Records, that they had prescribed the Time for issuing these Writs, the Number of Ships, the Time of Rendezvous, and how long they should remain upon the Sea, for the common Defence. The King, at this Day, could impower a Corporation, to make Laws for their Good; and it was strange he should not have that Power in himself, for the general Welfare of the Kingdom.

The Kings of England had at all Times commanded what was necessary for the common Defence; as the walling of Towns, of which the Precedents were numberless. He also laid Embargoes on Shipping, for the Defence of the Realm, and in all Ages made Ordinances, relating to the Royal Navy, by himself, by his Council, and by the Advice of the Peers; and such Ordinances had been obeyed, even while Parliaments were sitting; and granted other Supplies for the War; which was a strong Argument, that the King needed not the Aid of Parliament, to command his Forces: And in the 13th of Edw. III. when the King condescended to ask the Advice of the Commons, for the Guard of the Sea, the Commons declared, they had nothing to do with it; they had no Cognizance of it.

He said, he had collected five hundred Precedents, whereby it would appear to the Court, that these Writs had been issued by the King's Mandate, without Advice of Parliament; and should not these Precedents, some of them before William I. and continuing for so many 1637. 13 Car. I. hundred Years, obtain the Force of a Law, though they had been diſcontinued ſince the 50th of Edw. III. as Mr. Holborne affirmed, and in which it appeared he was miſtaken, there being great Numbers of Ships commanded into the Service, in like Manner, in the Reign of Hen. VI. And, though theſe Writs had ſometimes been petitioned againſt, it appeared, that the Service nevertheleſs went forward; and the Anſwer the King gave to them le Roy s' aviſera was always the Anſwer given when he refuſed a Bill. It appeared, the Service had always been done, the Mariners Wages paid by the Country, and that ſome Men had particular Diſcharges; for that they were in the King's Service, or that they lived near the Sea-Coaſts, 23 Edw. III. M. 14.

That theſe Writs were iſſued, not only in Time of actual War, or on an Invaſion, but when the King conceived Danger might enſue, Rot. Clauſ. 48 Hen. III. M. 2. It appears in the Reign of Edw. III. that the King, hearing the French had an Intention to invade the Realm, ſent out his Orders to provide Ships: The Words uſed in thoſe Writs were Ut Audivimus: Ut Intelleximus: Quia vulgaris opinio Regnum noſtrum Angliæ invadere; therefore he commanded a Fleet to be fitted out to Sea, and Forces to be levied by Land: And here he produced Precedents, ſhewing, theſe Writs had been iſſued at the ſame Time Supplies were given in Parliament for the War, and that this Service was required of the Inland, as well as of the Maritime, Counties, and obſerved, that the Rule in Law was, that every one, who received a Benefit, muſt afford Contribution.

By the Charter of Edw. I. the Ports were to find fifty two Ships: But when the Service required it, All their Ships were preſſed into the King's Service: That the Ports were utterly unable to perform this Service, now the greateſt Part of their Trade was gone: There were few Ports had any Trade at this Day, except London, Newcaſtle, Briſtol, and Hull. The Wealth of a ſingle Portſman in thoſe Days, was equal to the Wealth of a whole Town at preſent: And if the Ability of the Maritime Towns failed, it muſt be ſupplied by the reſt of the Kingdom; the Nation was not to be left defenceleſs. Before there were Commiſſions of Sewers, if a Man, who was obliged to defend the Sea Banks, was not able, the County were obliged to contribute to it; becauſe they might receive Profit or Loſs by it: And agreeable to this was the Caſe of the Iſle of Ely, where all that had ſalvationem & damnificationem were obliged to contribute. The Objection, that Inland Towns had been diſcharged upon Petition, was nothing to the Purpoſe, unleſs they had ſhewn the Reaſon of ſuch Diſcharges; for that the Town of Beverly inſtanced in, was diſcharged by virtue of a Charter of Exemption; and others had been diſcharged, as being exempt from the Admiral's Juriſdiction.

Then he produced Precedents to ſhew, that theſe Writs had been iſſued where no Cauſe had been declared, no manifeſt Danger expreſſed, or againſt what Enemy the Armament was intended, as Rot. Pat. 13 Hen. III. M. 5. a Writ commanding the Sheriffs of Kent and Eſſex to take up all Ships in thoſe Counties, to be ready at Portſmouth, to go upon ſuch Service as we ſhall command. So in the Reigns of Edw. I. Edw. II. Edw. III. and Hen. VI. Writs were iſſued, for fitting out Ships, and the Service concealed; nor was it always proper to divulge the Reaſons of warlike Preparations: And yet this was the great Objection made to the Writ of the 4th of Auguſt, that the King had not declared ſufficient Cauſe for iſſuing it: He had not acquainted the Counſel at the Bar, with what was not fit to be communicated even to the Privy-Council, but reſerved to the Council of War: But, had there been fewer Reaſons given, it had been more agreeable to former Writs; and, notwithſtanding what had been ſaid to the contrary, the ſame Power of Aſſeſſment had been granted by them, and ſometimes Levies made by Diſtreſs and Impriſonment; nay, by the Seizure of Lands and Goods, and the Charge laid on the Inland Towns, as well as the Maritime. Rot. Scot. 8 Edw. II. M. 9. de navigio providend' &c. That theſe Writs had been directed alſo to Sheriffs, as well as to Commiſſioners; and the Lands of Sheriffs had been extended for their Negligence in executing theſe Writs; and they had been commanded to levy the Money, by Diſtreſs and Impriſonment of thoſe that refuſed. 1637. 13 Car. I.

As to the Objection, that a Parliament might have been called Time enough, to have raiſed Supplies in the ordinary Way; it was known their Proceedings were very ſlow, and they might have diſappointed the King; and the Time of Preparation, and Continuance of the Service, was ever left to the King. It appeared by the Council Books, that the Preparations made againſt the Spaniſh Invaſion, were in Octob. 1687. and their Fleet did not ſet Sail from Spain, till June, 1688. Nor did the Queen think fit to call a Parliament in all this Time; but, by an Order of Council, ſhe commanded a Royal Fleet to be fitted out at the Charge of the Subject: From whence it appeared, that there was not any Particular contained in this Writ, but what was warranted by Precedents, and that in a much higher Degree. And here he produced ſeveral more Precedents, to ſhew, that ſuch Defence by Shipping, had been required, not only of the Maritime Places, but per totam Angliam.

As to the Charter of King John, which had been mentioned, it was obtained by Force of that King, in his Diſtreſs, at Running Mead, and recalled the next Year; nor was it ever after confirmed, or inſiſted on: And the Statute of Magna Charta took away nothing that of Right belonged to the Crown: Theſe Writs continued to be iſſued afterwards, which ſhewed that Magna Charta did not affect them. The ſame Anſwer he gave to the Statute de Tallagio non concedendo; for this was not properly an Aid, but a Contribution of King and People, for the Defence of the Realm; and the 25 Edw. I. expreſly excepts ſuch Aids as have been due and accuſtomed. The Practice in the Reigns of Edw. I. Edw. II. Edw. III. and Rich. II. ſhewed plainly, that thoſe Statutes never intended to take away this Branch of the Royal Power, which was one of the King's higheſt Prerogatives. The Statute of 1 Edw. III.

1637. 13 Car. I. indeed ſaid, that none ſhould be compelled to go out of his County, but where Neceſſity required; and this Writ required no more: There was a Neceſſity in the King's Judgment; and ſome of the following Statutes related to foreign Wars: That the 1 Edw. III. reſerved a Power in the Crown, in Caſes of Neceſſity: And as to that Reſolution, in 2 Rich. II. that the Commons could not be charged, but in Parliament; this was no Act, and was in the Non-age of a Prince, who did not aſſent to it: That the Acts of Tonnage and Poundage, which were ſaid to be given for the Defence of the Sea, appeared to have been given in the Reigns of Queen Elizabeth and King James, for the ordinary Defence of the Sea: And as to the Petition of Right, it was declared by all, that there was no Intention of leſſening the King's Prerogative by it: He did not inſiſt on a Power of laying Impoſitions on the Subject, out of Parliament; it was not in Queſtion here: No Man's Property was invaded, or Goods ſeized, unleſs he incurred a Forfeiture by Contempt; and by a wilful Contempt the Subject might loſe his Property. Dyer 16. & 13 Eliz. 296. if the King command a Subject to return home, and he refuſes, he ſhall forfeit his Goods for his Contempt: So if any one wilfully contemn the King's Writ, he ſhall be diſtreined: But this is no Invaſion of the Subject's Property.

As to that Objection, that the Revenues of the Crown would defray all ordinary and extraordinary Charges; and that the Tenures by Knight's Service, the Profits of Sturgeons, Whales, &c. were reſerved for theſe Purpoſes, every one knew, that the King's Revenues would not anſwer the Expences of his Civil Government, and much leſs were ſufficient for the Defence of the Kingdom: And to ſay, that every Man, by the Inſtinct of Nature, would contribute to the Defence of the Kingdom, when there was a real Neceſſity, was extremely ridiculous. If every Man was made Judge of the Danger, and of what Share he ought to contribute to the Defence, it was not to be expected there would be any Defence made to the Purpoſe: God was pleaſed antiently to appoint Captains and Leaders to his People: An Army left to themſelves (without a General, or Commander), to do what was right in every one's Eyes, was not likely to do much in the Defence of the Kingdom. This muſt be ſaid therefore only to captivate the People, by ſuggeſting, that every Man was veſted with a kind of ſovereign Authority, to direct and controul his Prince, whenever he ſaw fit.

It had been ſaid, that it was better to ſuſtain a Miſchief, than an Inconvenience, whereby every Man's Property might be taken from him, as often as the King pleaſed: But ſurely the Loſs of the whole Kingdom, wherein the Loſs of Liberty and Eſtate was included, muſt be of worſe Conſequence than the taking a ſmall Contribution, towards the common Defence, in a Caſe of Neceſſity. The former was a Miſchief that deſtroyed both the Head and the Members: He wondered therefore, to hear the Defendant's Counſel apply that Rule to this Caſe. As to that Exception, that a Scire Facias ought not to iſſue for the Debt; for that the Writ of the 4th of Auguſt directed it to be levied by Diſtreſs; and becauſe it was no Debt to the King; he anſwered, that whovever detained a publick Duty, might be queſtioned for it by the King; and whatever was pro communi utilitate, might be levied by Proceſs out of the Exchequer; concluding, that there was no Act of Parliament that deprived the King of the Power of commanding a Fleet to be equipped, at the Charge of the Subject, for the common Defence, when he found there was a Neceſſity for it: And, had there been no Law to compel the Performance of this Duty, Nature, and the inviolable Laws of Self-Preſervation, ought to move the Subject to obey it. The King was the Centre wherein they all met; the Soul of the Body politick, whoſe proper Act it was to command; and he humbly deſired their Lordſhips Judgments therefore for the King. 1637. 13 Car. I.

Then the Judges proceeded to deliver their Judgments in the Caſe: And firſt, Sir Francis Weſton, one of the Barons of the Exchequer, who ſaid, he conceived there was ſufficient Matter to charge Mr. Hampden with the twenty Shillings, aſſeſſed on him; and therefore he gave his Judgment for the King. There was a Rule in Law, he obſerved, that if a Man demurs generally to a Writ, he confeſſes all the Matters of Fact that are alledged: So that all the Dangers alledged in the Writ, were confeſſed by the Demurrer of the Defendant; and though it was objected, that the Allegations in the Writ of the 4th of Auguſt only were confeſſed, the Demurrer ſaid, that the Writ with the reſt of the Proceedings and Schedules, did not contain Matter ſufficient; ſo that they were to give Judgment on the whole: And the Writ of Mittimus ſaid, Salus Regni periclitabatur. It had been objected indeed, that Salus ſignified Health, but it ſignified Safety alſo; and though it was ſaid, the Danger was not fully ſet forth in the Writ of the 4th of Auguſt, he anſwered, it might not always be proper to divulge what Danger the Nation was in: But in the Writ of the 4th of Auguſt, there was not only a Danger from Pirates mentioned, but that the Dominion of the Sea was in Danger of being loſt; and that there were great Dangers apprehended from the Nations that were at War round about us; and they ought to believe this, if there was no other Reaſon for it, but that the King declared it: But it was evident to all Men, the Kingdom had actually been in Danger for three or four Years laſt paſſed, from the great Fleets that had been fitted out, and the Land Forces that had been raiſed, by the neighbouring Nations; and had we not had a good Fleet at Sea, we muſt have been expoſed to their Inſults and Invaſions.

It had been objected, that the Money thus raiſed for Shipping, might be applied to other Uſes: But there was no Colour for ſuch a Suggeſtion, nothing was ſaid of any Money to be paid to the King, but the Sheriff was to rate the County ſecundum facultates, towards providing a Ship.

And whereas it is ſaid, the Party was to be impriſoned, and his Goods taken away, he anſwered, ſwered, The Scire facias was not to ſhew Cauſe, why he ſhould not be impriſoned, or his Goods ſold; but, why he ſhould not be charged with the Money aſſeſſed upon him.

1637. 13 Car. I.

It was urged, That the Defence of the Kingdom lay upon the King; becauſe he had Knights Service, Eſcuage, and other Services, to enable him to do it: But theſe were Tenures reſerved on ſeveral Grants made by the King; and he was no more bound to defend the Kingdom on this Account, than his Subjects, who had the like Tenures: And, as to the Service of the Ports, every one knew that this was not a ſufficient Defence for the Kingdom at this Day; and cited abundance of Writs that had been iſſued for the Defence of the Sea. Then he obſerved, that, of the fifty two Counties of England and Wales, thirty three were Maritime Counties, and the Inland but nineteen, whoſe Contributions did not amount to above a fourth Part of the Charge; ſo that the Cauſe was not of that Conſequence as was imagined: Indeed, the Maritime Places received the greateſt Benefit by the Sea, and were better prepared againſt ſudden Invaſions; and therefore Writs, for the moſt Part, iſſued to the Maritime Places: But as the Inland Counties alſo received Protection from this Defence, they ought to contribute towards it when there was Occaſion, as it appeared they had actually done. Clauſ. 48. Hen. III. M. 2. A Writ was directed to the Mayor and Bailiffs of Bedford, to raiſe Horſe and Foot, and march to the Sea-Coaſts, to oppoſe an Invaſion. Rot. 26. Edw. I. M. 5. Writs were directed to the Sheriffs of Hertford, Eſſex, Nottingham, Derby, Huntington, Cambridge, &c. pro cuſtodia Maritima.

He did not think the Aid demanded by this Writ was within the Meaning of the Statute de Tallagio non concedendo; for by the Words No Aid, it was agreed, that the Aid for marrying the King's Daughter, or making his Son a Knight, were not meant; and if, by no Tallage, it had been intended the King ſhould demand no Money, then all Fines, Amerciaments, and all lawful Impoſitions due to the King, were taken away; and therefore, this could not be the Meaning of it: He conceived it was meant only, to take away all Taxes and Tallages that were unlawful.

The ſtrongeſt Statute that had been cited was, 14 Edw. III. which ſaid, That the Subject ſhould not be taxed, without a Parliament, for the Defence of the Kingdom; but then, they did not ſhew by any Act, that the King was to be charged with the Defence of the Kingdom; but, ſuppoſing the Act to be as ſtrong as they would have it, in the Caſe of a ſudden Invaſion, which the King was unable to reſiſt without the Aid of his Subjects, muſt they not give way to Neceſſity, and aſſiſt him, rather than the Kingdom ſhould be loſt? and, if they admitted, that Acts of Parliament muſt give way to Neceſſity, it was all that was contended for.

The King was no more obliged to call a Parliament, than Queen Elizabeth was, in the greateſt Danger in 1688, or on the Rebellion in the North: She raiſed Forces by Sea and Land, at the Subjects Charge, when there was but a Rumour of the Spaniards Intention to invade the Kingdom, and it was never complained of by the enſuing Parliament; on the contrary, they raiſed Money to repay what ſhe had expended, or borrowed; and the ſame Acts of Parliament were then in Force as were now. It was objected, indeed, that the King might pretend Danger where there was none; but, if this Power was in the King, it was not to be taken away, becauſe he might miſemploy it: If the Sums raiſed had been miſapplied, there might have been ſome Colour for a Complaint; but the Money was expreſly for a Ship; and if they would have taken any Advantage of that, they ſhould have pleaded it. There did not appear any Money to be coming into his Majeſty's Hands: Nay, the Writ expreſly ſaid, That no Part of the Money ſhould be converted to any other Uſe, but that of Building a Ship.

He thought the Sheriff a very proper Perſon alſo, to aſſeſs the County, as being beſt acquainted with it; and a Scire Facias might very properly iſſue for it: A Writ was ſent to the Mayor and Bailiffs of Oxford, to repair the Walls and Ditches of that Town; and the Subjects taxed for that End, notwithſtanding thoſe Acts which declared, that the Subject ſhould not be taxed for Defence, without a Parliament; and with much greater Reaſon ought the Subject to be charged, towards the Repair of the wooden Walls of the Kingdom: There was no Act for taking this Charge by Writ away; it was a general Cuſtom; and general Cuſtoms made the Common Law of England: They muſt try new Cauſes by the old Laws, and do as they had done in former Times: He was perſuaded in his Conſcience there was immediate Danger; and there was a Neceſſity this Danger ſhould be prevented: He conceived the Proceedings were legal; and that there was ſufficient Cauſe to charge the Defendant with the twenty Shillings aſſeſſed on him; and that he ought to pay it.

The Judgment of Sir Francis Crawley.

Sir Francis Crawley, one of the Juſtices of the Court of Common Pleas, gave his Judgment next: He admitted, that in ordinary Caſes the Charge of defending the Realm belonged to the King: He had the Cuſtoms, for the Protection of the Trade of the Nation againſt Pirates, and Enemies; and in extraordinary Caſes, the Charge of the Defence ought regularly to be ſupplied by Parliament, and could not be done without it. The ſame Law which required the King to defend his People, required the Subjects to grant him Aids towards that Defence. The Statute De Tallagio non concedendo, no doubt, was a Statute, and the Words were Nullum Tallagium ſine aſſenſu Parliamenti; and in 14 Edw. III. the King declares, he will impoſe no Charge, or Aid, on the Subject, but in Parliament: But ſtill, if Neceſſity, and the Danger of the Commonwealth required it, and would not admit of calling a Parliament, the King might lay a Charge without their Conſent: And the whole Iſland being concerned by the Event, the Charge ought to be borne in the inland Countries, as well as by thoſe that were more immediately expoſed: There were ſeveral Precedents, where Writs had gone to the inland Counties, for the Guard of the Sea, Clauſ. 48 Hen. III. 24 Edw. I. 26 Edw. III. Writs into Berks, Oxon, &c.

The

1637. 13 Car. I.

The Kingdom had been conquered four Times: It concerned the King, the Head of the Commonwealth, to be circumſpect: Even Conjectures and Probabilities were to be regarded: If there was a violent Preſumption, that ſome potent Neighbour was preparing to invade us, was it not fit we ſhould inſtantly prepare for our Defence? And there might be juſt Reaſons of State, why theſe Things ſhould not be revealed in Parliament, and ſo communicated to the Enemy; and the King might in ſuch Caſes, Jure Gentium, charge the Subject without his Conſent in Parliament.

As to the Statutes of the 25th of Edw. I. 14 Edw. III. and the Petition of Rights, 3 Car. I. he anſwered, that if there were an expreſs Statute, that the King ſhould not have Aid of his Subjects, but in Parliament, were the Kingdom in never ſo much Danger, it would be a void Act; becauſe it was manifeſtly unreaſonable: To follow the Letter of the Law, in ſome Caſes, would be the higheſt Injuſtice and Folly; the Laws of God and Reaſon were an implied Exception, and underſtood in every general Law.

This Right of Impoſition without Parliament, appertained originally to the King, as he was a Sovereign, in Right of his Crown: They could not have a King without theſe Royal Rights: No, not by Act of Parliament.

And although the Word ſalus in the Mittimus was ſaid to be a metaphorical Word, he held it to be certain enough; for in the Writ of Oyer and Terminer, the Words were Omnes qui habent damnum vel ſalvationem. But he was of Opinion, that the Writ of the 4th of Auguſt, without this, contained ſufficient Matter for this great Preparation; for it ſaid, Leſt we loſe the Dominion of the Sea; and was not that a good Reaſon, to prevent other Powers becoming Maſters of the Sea? It was ſaid alſo Conſideratis etiam periculis, &c. conſidering the Danger is ſo evident and great in theſe warlike Times, that a Force is neceſſary by Sea and Land: They had alſo by their Demurrer confeſſed the Danger; and that it was preſent, imminent, and inſtant, and greater than the King, without the Aid of his Subjects, could reſiſt; and, conſequently, that it was dangerous attending the Delays of Parliament: He exhorted the Subject, therefore, to relie on their pious King, whoſe Prerogative and Right of Sovereignty it was to defend the Realm; and gave Judgment for his Majeſty.

The Judgment of Sir Robert Berkley.

Sir Robert Berkley, one of the Juſtices of the King's Bench, delivered his Judgment next: He obſerved, that the Defendant had demurred generally, without any Proteſtation; and, acknowledging the Matter to be true, put it upon the Sufficiency, or Inſufficiency, in Point of Law to charge him: He admitted, that the King could not, at all Times, and on all Occaſions, charge the Subject, without Conſent of Parliament: We were Freemen, not Slaves, or Villains, to be taxed de alto & baſſo. Although this was a Monarchy, and the King had Jura ſummæ Majeſtatis, his Government muſt be according to the Laws of the Kingdom; and by thoſe Laws the Subjects were not Tenants at Will of their Lands: They had a Property in their Poſſeſſions, and a Birthright in the Laws of the Kingdom: Theſe Laws could not be altered, or abrogated, without their Conſent in Parliament. 1637. 13 Car. I.

Then he proceeded to ſhew, that the antient Danegelt, which was levied for the Defence of the Sea, was not levied by Authority of Parliament, but by the King's Command: However, he obſerved, that the Danegelt differed from the preſent Charge in ſeveral Inſtances; for that was annual, this only in caſe of Neceſſity; that was collected by the Hides of Land, this out of the perſonal as well as real Eſtates; that was an Aid of Money, this of Shipping and Armour in kind; that was to protect Sea-faring Men againſt Pirates, this for the common Defence of Sea and Land: In that the Clergy were originally exempted; but this Charge was general upon all, without Exception: In the next Place he endeavoured to ſhew, that the Charge he demanded was not within the antient Acceptation of the Words, Aids, Miſes, Priſes, Taxes, or Tallages; or of the Word Subſidy: Theſe he agreed, could not be levied without Conſent of Parliament: That Aids were of two kinds; either 1. Such as were Aids and Services too; as to make the King's Son a Knight, or to marry his Daughter: Theſe Aids common Perſons had, who had Signiories, as well as the King; and, therefore theſe could not be meant by the Word Aids. 2. The ſecond ſort of Aids were granted the King for building Bridges, for his Wars: and ſometimes to be diſpoſed of at Pleaſure, Rot. Parl. 25 Edw. III. n. 12. Miſes were Preſents made to the King in Kind, at his coming to the Crown: Priſes were Part of the Subjects Goods taken from them, for the King's Uſe, without Pay; as Priſage of Wines: And Taxes and Tallages were Tenths, Fifteenths, or other Subſidies granted by Parliament.

Nor was the principal Thing commanded in this Writ to levy Money, but to provide a Ship; though the refuſing to pay the Duty, indeed, was, in effect, a Refuſal to obey the principal Command; for he that denied the Means, denyed the End: And this, concerning the Safety of the Nation; the King, as Head and Sovereign thereof, had, incident to his Regal Office, a Power of Coercion, and might enforce thoſe to pay it who refuſed their Quota's. The Scire facias, however, was not to have Execution, as to the King's Money, or for a Debt due to the King, but to bring on a declaratory Payment, that Mr. Hampden ought to be charged twenty Shillings towards providing a Ship for the County of Bucks.

Thus, having ſhewn what the Caſe was not, he came to the grand Queſtion, Whether his Majeſty, to prevent the Ruin of the Kingdom, might not by his own Authority, without the Conſent of Parliament, impoſe a Charge on his Subjects in general, to provide ſuch Shipping as he in his Judgment found neceſſary to join with his own Ships, and attend the Service as long as his Majeſty thought fit; and alſo to be at the Expence of victualling and furniſhing them with all manner of Tackling, Ammunition, and Proviſions.

For ſolving this Queſtion he ſaid, he would conſider the fundamental Policy, Maxims, and Rules of Law, for the Government of the Realm. And firſt, he thought it plain, that the Govern-

1637. 13 Car. I. ment was originally Monarchical; and though Mr. Holborne had aſſerted, that the King could take nothing of the Subject without Conſent of Parliament, there were two Maxims which diſproved this: 1. That the King was entruſted with the State of the Commonwealth; 2. That the King can do no wrong. Fitzherbert, Bracton, and Glanville all held, that the King muſt have Arms as well as Laws: Forces to defend the Kingdom againſt foreign Enemies, as well as Laws to adminiſter Juſtice by at home: And, if he muſt have theſe, he muſt not want the neceſſary Means, or be dependant ex aliorum arbitro; for it was a Rule in Law, Quando quis aliquid alicui concedit, concedit & id ſine quo res ipſa eſſe non poteſt. He held alſo, that the King, of mere Right, ought to have, and the People were bound in Duty to yield him, Supplies for the Defence of the Kingdom in Parliament: The ſame Law which obliged the King to defend the People, obliged them to contribute towards their Defence: And the Kingdom wanting a preſent neceſſary Defence, and it being dangerous to wait for a parliamentary Supply, the Duty was not therefore loſt, becauſe they wanted Time to obſerve the Form. He acknowledged, the Parliament was the ſupreme Court, or Council, of the King and Kingdom; yet ſtill it was but a Council: The King might call, prorogue, or diſſolve it at Pleaſure; and what he did therein, was looked upon as juſt and neceſſary.

Great Bodies, he obſerved alſo, moved ſlowly; and, though ſome held Parliaments could not err, it was evident particular Members might; and others might have ſiniſter Ends, and create Delays and Diſturbances; and Parliaments themſelves had ſometimes been cenſured, as unlearned and unmerciful.

This Point, of maintaining the Dominion of the Sea, was a weighty Conſideration; not only the well Being, but the very Being, of the Commonwealth depended on it; and, therefore, it behoved the Subject to haſten to the Defence of it: The Safety of the Publick was the ſupreme Law; particular Intereſts were not to be conſidered, where the publick Welfare was at Stake: He obſerved alſo, that, though there had been many Writs of this kind, in ſeveral Reigns, there never was an Action brought, till now, for any thing done in purſuance of them, unleſs in the Abbot of Robertſbridge's Caſe; and there it was confeſſed in the Pleadings, that the aſſeſſing Mens Lands to contribute to the Guard of the Sea, by the King's ſole Command, was good in Law: And, it was remarkable, that whenever a Charge had been impoſed, without Conſent of Parliament, in a Caſe of Neceſſity, there was not one Inſtance of a King's acknowledging ſuch a Charge, to be againſt Law. In none of the Statutes that had been cited was there any expreſs Clauſe, importing, that no Charge ſhould be impoſed for neceſſary Defence, without common Conſent; and, if ſuch a Clauſe had been offered, he queſtioned if it would have been of any Force: But all theſe Statutes, being general, muſt have a reaſonable and equitable Expoſition: The Defence of the Kingdom, and the Safety of the Commonwealth, muſt be underſtood to be clean out of thoſe Laws; otherwiſe the Laws that were made, for the Good of the Commonwealth, might prove the Ruin of it. He concluded, That, upon the Reaſons and Authorities cited, the twenty Shillings impoſed on Mr. Hampden, towards providing a Ship, was conſonant to Law; and, conſequently, Judgment ought to be given againſt him, Quod one-retur.

1637. 13 Car. I.

The Judgment of Sir George Vernon.

Sir George Vernon, one of the Juſtices of the Common Pleas, contented himſelf with giving his Judgment, without offering his Reaſons for it. He ſaid, he held, That the King, for the Publick Good, might charge his Subjects for the Defence of the Kingdom; and, that a Statute derogatory to this Prerogative would not bind the King: He might in Caſes of Neceſſity diſpenſe with any Law, and therefore, concluded, that Mr. Hampden ought to be charged with the twenty Shillings aſſeſſed on him.

The Judgment of Sir Thomas Trevor.

Sir Thomas Trevor, one of the Barons of the Exchequer, did ſpeak to the Caſe; but his Argument is wanting; only it appears he gave his Judgment againſt the Defendant.

Sir George Crooke, one of the Juſtices of the King's-Bench, argued on the other Side: He obſerved, that his Brethren had all argued one Way; and ſaid, he would willingly have concurred with them, if he could have ſatisfied his Judgment with their Reaſons; but he muſt not go with the Multitude againſt his Conſcience; declaring it to be his Opinion, that Judgment ought to be given for the Defendant; for which he offered his Reaſons.

He ſaid, it might be objected to him, that they had all reſolved the Caſe under their Hands; and he acknowledged, he had given his Opinion under his Hand in two Caſes; to the firſt voluntarily, in December 1635, as follows:

I am of Opinion, that where the Good and Safety of the Kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole Kingdom in Danger, of which his Majeſty is the only Judge, there the Charge of Defence ought to be borne by all in general.

This, he ſaid, he ſhould always maintain; for when the Kingdom was in Danger, the King might command every Man in the Nation, with all his Force, to come and defend it at all Times, and at all Places in the Kingdom; and if any one refuſed, he was fineable and puniſhable.

That the ſecond Opinion he ſigned, was in February, 1636. (viz.) When the Good and Safety of the Kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole Kingdom in Danger, his Majeſty may, by Writ under the Great Seal, command the Subjects of this Kingdom, at their own Charges, to provide and furniſh ſuch a Number of Ships, with Men, Victuals, and Ammunition, and for ſuch Time as his Majeſty ſhall think fit, for the Defence and Safeguard of the Kingdom from ſuch Danger. And, that his Majeſty may compel the doing thereof, in Caſe of Refuſal and Refractorineſs; and in this Caſe his Majeſty is ſole Judge of the Danger; and where, and how, the ſame is to be prevented and avoided.

He confeſſed, he ſubſcribed this Opinion; though he then diſſented, he ſaid, from his Brethren, and declared as much; for he conceived ſuch a Charge could not be impoſed but by Parliament; in which one of his Brothers agreed with him, and four others diſſented in ſome Particulars: But the greateſt Part ſeem-

1637. 13 Car. I. ing reſolved, and it being ſaid to be uſual, for the leſſer Number to ſubſcribe where there was a Difference; and it being agreed, that this Subſcription would not bind them, if it ſhould afterwards come judicially before them; and being aſſured, his Majeſty ſhould be acquainted which of them diſſented, he did conſent to ſubſcribe: But, this being before he had ſearched the Precedents, or heard any Arguments, he did not hold himſelf bound by that Opinion; and, if he had been once of that Opinion, yet, upon better Advice, he thought it no Shame to retract it.

Then he proceeded to his Argument, and obſerved, that this was the firſt Writ ſince the Conqueſt, that ever iſſued to an Inland County, to prepare a Ship with Men, &c. for ought appeared by any Record; and, where there was no Precedent, according to Littleton, the Law would not allow of any ſuch Writ.

The King, he admitted, might grant Tolls, Fairs, Pontage, Piccage, Murage, &c. which were for the Good and Eaſe of the People, and the Profit of thoſe who took the Benefit thereof, and where the Sums were ſmall and reaſonable; but if they were great Sums, the Law adjudged them void. As to the Caſe of an Inundation, the King alſo might by his Commiſſion cauſe all thoſe who had Lands, or Commons, in the Level, to be contributory to the Sea-Walls: But this could not be laid upon a Town, or County, in general; only on ſuch particular Men as might have Loſs, or Benefit thereby; and this was to be ſettled by a Jury; and ſo it was at this Day on a Commiſſion of Sewers. 10 Coke 142. The Caſe of the Iſle of Ely.

And, whereas it was alledged, that this Charge was impoſed for the Publick Safety, and every one reaped an Advantage by it; he did admit, that in caſe of imminent Danger, there muſt be a Defence made, by every Man in Perſon, when the King commanded it: Every Man was bound per ſe & ſua to defend the Kingdom: But the laying a Charge on the Kingdom, either for making or preparing Ships, or levying Money in lieu thereof, was not to be done but in Parliament: If this Writ was allowed, no Man could tell what his Charge might be: And, though his Majeſty would uſe his Power moderately, Judges in their Judgments were to have regard to future Times: Danegelt was firſt inſtituted, on Neceſſity, to defend the Kingdom from the Ravages of the Danes; and, though it was at firſt but 10000 l. within two hundred Years it encreaſed to 48000 l. and who knew what Bounds this would have?

Tonnage and Poundage, it appeared, where granted in the Reign of King James, that the Crown might have Money in Bank for the Defence of the Sea; and thoſe Duties were taken now, and, he preſumed, applied to the ſame Uſe.

The leaving it to the Sheriff, to tax the People at Pleaſure, he held alſo, to be illegal; it ought to be done by a Jury, as in the Caſe of Sea-Walls: And, though it had been doubtful by the Common-Law, whether ſuch a Charge might be impoſed by Writ; yet, ſince the Statutes de Tallagio non concedendo, and the other Acts that had been made, declaring, that no Impoſitions could be laid on the Subject, but in Parliament; the King could not charge his Subjects without their Conſent: Beſides, the Queſtion was only upon the Writ of the 4th of Auguſt; for the Writ of Mittimus reciting, that Salus Reipublicæ periclitabatur was iſſued a Year and a half after the Writ of the firſt of Auguſt, and conſequently could not help it: Nor was this notified to the Sheriff, or the Inhabitants of the County, to induce them to provide a Ship; it was only a Notification to the Barons of the Exchequer, ſhewing, that this was the Reaſon of iſſuing the former Writ: Nor was it poſitively affirmed, that there was any Danger; but only ſaid, Quia datum eſt nobis intelligi that Pirates had done Miſchief: He obſerved further, That untrue Suggeſtious were frequently inſerted in Writs and Patents, which did not effect the King's Conſcience: The Law ever imputed them to thoſe who miſinformed the King, and thruſt in ſuch Suggeſtions; and therefore all Patents, granted on untrue Suggeſtions, were void: He admitted that, on a ſudden Danger, the King might command Men from all Parts of the Kingdom, for the Common Safety; but he could not command the Money out of his Subjects Pockets, by diſtraining their Goods, or impriſoning their Perſons, he conceived. 1637. 13 Car. I.

If any Dangers were apprehended from abroad, by the Confederacies of Foreign Powers againſt the Kingdom, there would be Time enough for aſſembling the Parliament, which, by the Inſtitutions of King Alfred, was to aſſemble twice a Year; and by ſome Statutes made in the Reign of Edw. III. a Parliament was to be holden once a Year, and oftner, if need required: And as, in this Caſe, there were ſeven Months between the Teſte of the Writ and the Rendezvous appointed, there was Time for a Parliamentary Supply; and it was not to be preſumed a Parliament would have refuſed to contribute what was fit for their own Safety and Defence.

He admitted, if a Statute was made, that the King ſhould not defend the Kingdom, it would be void; but, a Statute that Money ſhould not be levied, or Men compelled to build Ships, without Conſent of Parliament, would be a good Law, and agreeable to Reaſon: The King might reſtrain himſelf from laying any ſuch Charge on the People; and he was a Prince of that Juſtice and Piety, that he would not do it, if he was truly informed it was againſt Law. The principal Fault, therefore, was in thoſe who deviſed theſe Writs, and in his Judges, who declared they were lawful. He would not ſpeak againſt the King's Prerogative, he ſaid; they were ſworn to maintain it; but if this Charge was againſt Common Law, and againſt ſo many Statutes, then there was no ſuch Prerogative. The King could do no wrong was indeed, a Maxim in our Law; for the Wrong was imputed to thoſe who adviſed and executed it, and not to the King, who might be abuſed by falſe Suggeſtions.

Royal Power, he admitted, might be uſed in Caſes of Neceſſity and imminent Danger, when ordinary Courſes would not avail; as in a Rebellion or ſudden Invaſion: In ſuch Caſes Martial Law might be uſed, they were not to

1637. 13 Car. I.

ſtay for legal Proceedings. But in Times of Peace, and no extreme Neceſſity, legal Courſes were to be uſed, and not Royal Power. That the King being impowered to command all Perſons in the Kingdom to the Defence of the Sea Coaſts, and to preſs all Shipping for the Guard of the Sea in Time of Danger; theſe had ever been deemed ſufficient againſt any Power whatever, and there was no Neceſſity of iſſuing Writs to every County of England to prepare Ships at their own Charge. In the 23d Year of Edw. I. the French King prepared a Navy, the Roll ſays, to invade the Kingdom, Et Linguam Anglicanam de terra delere, to blot out the Engliſh Name; whereupon, the King commanded all Ships and Men with Arms, to be in a readineſs; and the like Commands were iſſued in the Reigns of Edw. III. Hen. IV. and Hen. VIII.

And if ſuch a Charge might be laid on Maritime Places, yet he held it was not legal to charge Inland Places, nor was there any Precedent for it; the Law did not require Impoſſibilities: This County had neither Ships nor Mariners; they were converſant in Huſbandry, and ſcarce ever ſaw a Ship; and they were not obliged to look for Mariners in another County. When Writs had been awarded, therefore, to inland Towns, ſuppoſing them to be maritime, they had been diſcharged when the Truth appeared. He had diligently peruſed the Records, he ſaid, and did not find any Precedent of a Writ ſent to a Sheriff of an Inland County, to command their building a Ship at the Charge of the County.

There had, indeed, been Writs ſent to the Maritime Towns, to provide Ships and Mariners, and ſend them to the Place of Rendezvous in the Time of Danger; but even thoſe were moſt commonly at the King's Charges, though ſometimes at the Charge of the Ports and the adjacent Towns; which, he ſuppoſed, occaſioned the making the Statute of 14 Edw. III. Cap. 1. After which there was but one Record of ſuch a Writ iſſued to a Maritime Town, except thoſe iſſued 1 Hen. IV. which were complained of and recalled.

Then he proceeded to ſhew, that the Motives in the Writ were inſufficient for the commanding a Royal Navy to be equipped: In former Times the Inducements mentioned in the Writs were, That great Princes, in open Hoſtility, had provided great Navies and Armies to invade the Kingdom; but that ſuch Preparations ſhould be made againſt Pirates was never known; againſt theſe the Vice-Admiral with a ſmall Squadron was uſually employed, and not the grand Fleet. There was no Fear of loſing the Dominion of the Sea from any Force that Pirates could raiſe, much leſs that every County ſhould be charged to ſend out Ships againſt them; and the Command, to provide Wages for the Mariners for twenty-ſix Weeks after the Rendezvous, was ſtill more illegal: Thoſe who held by Knights Service were obliged to be at their own Expences but forty Days. And in ſeveral Commiſſions of Array that had been iſſued, the People were to be at the King's Charges after marching out of their reſpective Counties; this Aſſeſſment, therefore, being entire, as well for Wages as other Charges, was utterly illegal.

Nor was the Command to aſſeſs Men at the Sheriff's Diſcretion, warranted by any Precedent; a Power given to Sheriffs to impriſon Men was illegal. No Man was to be arreſted, or his Goods ſeized, contrary to Magna Charta, as appeared from ſeveral Statutes that had been cited; and yet by colour of this Writ, the Sheriff might impriſon any Man, even a Peer. He held alſo that the Certiorari being awarded to the late Sheriff, was wrong awarded; for all Writs ought to be directed to the preſent Sheriff, requiring him to demand of the late Sheriff, what was done upon the former Writ; and the Scire Facias therefore grounded upon it was not good; nor did the Scire Facias ſhew to whom the twenty Shillings was to be paid, and conſequently was inſufficient. Upon the whole he concluded, that no Judgment could be given to charge the Defendant.

The Judgment of Sir William Jones.

Sir William Jones, another of the Juſtices of the King's-Bench, then proceeded to give his Judgment, together with his Reaſons for it. He ſaid the Queſtion was not, Whether the King could draw this into a perpetual Charge, for it was founded upon a Fear of Danger, and when that ceaſed, the Tax muſt likewiſe ceaſe. Bro. tit' Protection. it was held the King could not grant a Protection for three Years, but he might renew it every Year, as there was Occaſion: So here the King, upon an emergent Occaſion, might command Ships; but he could not make the Charge perpetual, becauſe the Occaſion might ceaſe.

They had already delivered their Opinions, he ſaid, in this Caſe, and ſubſcribed them: As for his Part, he was an old Man, ready to drop into the Grave, his Tongue and his Heart, therefore, ſhould go together. He declared he was ſtill of the Opinion he ſubſcribed; he ſaw no Reaſon to recede from it; he thought the Grounds of Law and Nature ſupported it; for theſe were undoubted Maxims; Salus populi ſuprema lex. Qui ſentit commodum, ſentire debet & onus. Quod omnes tangit, ab omnibus debet ſupportari. So that, when there was imminent Danger, the Charge of Defence ought to be laid on the whole Kingdom, which was not denied by the Defendant's Council. Indeed, it was not every Fear or Rumour that could draw this Burthen upon the Subject; but ſuch a Danger as the King in his Judgment declared did require a ſpeedy Defence; he was ſole Judge of the Danger, and how to prevent and avoid it: And if the King was by Law to defend the Kingdom, he might certainly lay a Charge in order to it; for, if he could not, how ſhould he defend his People. The King was by Law the Protector of the Perſons, Lands, and Goods of his Subjects; he had a Prerogative in them for this End, not for his own Profit. The King could not cut any Man's Woods, or dig Gravel in his Lands, for his private Uſe; but for the publick Good he might; and even erect Fortifications on any Man's Lands. And though the King could not command any Man to build his own Palace, yet he might command Pontage, Murage, &c. which were for the Subject's Benefit; and in the firſt Year of King James a Duty was laid upon Merchandize, without Conſent of Parliament, it being in a Caſe of Neceſſity, and for the public Good.

The

1637. 13 Car. I.

The Objections he obſerved were many, and his Brother Crooke had doubled and redoubled them: Brother, continued he, We ſit next one another, antient Judges, though of different Opinions; I ſpeak according to my Conſcience, as you have done according to yours; you ſay, by the Laws of this Kingdom, the Subjects have a Property in their Goods, ſo that without their Conſent they cannot be taken away. I anſwer, This does not trench upon their Properties: If this be a lawful Prerogative, how is the Subjects Property invaded? The Law annexed this Charge to the Lands and Goods of the Subject from the Beginning, and made them liable to it by tacit Condition. He would not have Men clamour, therefore, he ſaid, as if the Subject was diveſted of the Property of his Goods; when the Duty was to be applied to the Defence of the Kingdom, in which his own was included.

He ſaw no Reaſon why a Difference ſhould be made neither between Inland and Maritime Places, ſince the Kingdom was one entire Body, and it was for the common Defence; the King might unite an Inland to a Maritime County; and, before the Diviſion of Counties, the Charge was general, all over the Kingdom. And whereas it was urged, that it would be a great Inconvenience, if the King might charge when and what he pleaſed by this Writ, he anſwered, as the Law repoſed this Truſt in his Majeſty, it was not to be preſumed he would require it of his Subjects, when there was no Occaſion.

It had been objected farther, that Dr. Cowel and Dr. Manwaring had been cenſured by Parliament for the like Tenets; but this was a Miſtake. He acknowledged they were deſervedly cenſured and puniſhed; for Cowel aſſerted, that the King might make Laws without a Parliament, and wrote againſt the Common Law: And Dr. Manwaring, in two Sermons, maintained, that the King was not bound to obſerve the Laws; that the Rights and Liberties of the Subject were at his Diſpoſal; and that the Authority of Parliament was not neceſſary for levying Subſidies: Whereas the preſent Queſtion was, Whether the King could not command the Subject to provide Ships, for the Defence of the Kingdom, in Time of Danger?

He held alſo, that no general Words in a Statute could extend to take away the King's Prerogative; for, if they could, the Aids for making the King's Son a Knight, and for marrying his Daughter, would have been taken away, which it was admitted they were not. His Brother Crawley held, that even ſpecial Words in an Act of Parliament would not take away the King's Prerogative of defending his Subjects. Aud he heard it reſolved in Parliament, in the firſt Year of King James I. when a Motion was made for diſſolving the Tenures by Knights Service, that ſuch an Act would have been void, becauſe they were inherent in the Crown, for the Support and Defence of the State; and 2 Hen. VII. an Act to reſtrain the King's Non obſtante, to diſpenſe with penal Laws, as not to pardon Murder, was held void. He was of Opinion alſo, that the Record expreſſed ſufficient Cauſe for the Crown to require this Aid. If the King affirmed there was Danger, this was not traverſable, and had he ſaid no more than pro defenſione Regni, it had been ſufficient. He gave Judgment, therefore, that Mr. Hampden ſhould be charged with the twenty Shillings, provided none of it came into the King's Purſe. 1637. 13 Car. I.

The Judgment of Sir Richard Hutton.

Sir Richard Hutton, one of the Juſtices of the Common-Pleas, delivered his Opinion next. He held, that this Charge could not be impoſed, but by Parliament: It was againſt Magna Charta, and the other Statutes made in Confirmation of it; which, he conceived, ſo ſecured the Subjects Property, that it could not be touched without an Act of Parliament. He cited Forteſcue alſo, who ſaid, in his 9th Chapter, That the King could not alter any Law: He governed his People, not only by Royal, but by Politick Power; and could lay no Charge on them, but in Parliament.

It had been objected, indeed, that this Royal Power was ſo inſeparable from the Prerogative, that an Act of Parliament could not take it away: And, he confeſſed, there were ſome ſuch inſeparable Prerogatives; as the Tenure in Capite, which the King could not releaſe: And, when a Law was propoſed, for the taking away the Court of Wards, in the Reign of King James, it was held, it would be a void Law: An Act of Parliament alſo, that the King ſhould not defend the Kingdom; or, that he ſhould have no Aids of the Subject towards the Defence, ſuch Acts would not be binding, becauſe they were againſt natural Reaſon: But here the King was not reſtrained from laying a Charge, but only tied to one Means; (viz.) to do it by Parliament: He did not ſee, but Danegelt might have been raiſed now, as well as formerly, if it had not been for the Statutes that had been cited; but, ſince thoſe Statutes, he held no Money could be levied on the Subject but by Parliament. As for Pontage, Murage, &c. the Law allowed them, becauſe the Subject had a particular Benefit by them.

And although it had been alledged, that in this Caſe there was no Money to be paid by the Subject, but only a Ship provided by the Sheriff; and it was admitted that, if the Writ had been to levy Money, it would have been void; it did not appear by the Record, that any Ship was provided; and if ſo, a Writ could not iſſue againſt the Defendant for Diſobedience: Beſides, it was known to all the World, that not Ships, but Ship-Money, was wanted. If a Ship had been alledged to have been built, it might have been traverſed; but as the Caſe was, Mr. Hampden could do nothing but demur. He confeſſed, he had ſubſcribed the Reſolution, with the reſt of the Judges; but his Opinion was always againſt it. He ſigned in Conformity to the greater Number, as was uſual: And though they had been of Opinion, the King might charge the Subject, in caſe of a general Danger, they never meant a Danger from Pirates. He was ſtill of Opinion that in Time of War, when an Enemy was in the Field, the King might uſe his Subjects Goods, but not elſe. In the latter End of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, her Majeſty deſired a Benevolence, and Money was gathered even in the Inns of Court; he himſelf paid twenty Shillings: But when the Queen 1637. 13 Car. I. was informed by the Judges, it was againſt Law, ſhe ordered the Money to be repaid; and he received his twenty Shillings again.

He held, there was not a ſufficient Danger expreſſed in the Writ; and the Mittimus, which iſſued almoſt two Years afterwards, wherein it was ſaid, Salus regni periclitabatur, could not make that legal which was not ſo ab initio; no ſubſequent Matter could help it: The Power given to the Sheriff alſo, to impriſon and deſtrain thoſe who refuſed, was againſt Magna Charta. And the commanding the Sheriff to aſſeſs Men, he conceived, was illegal; becauſe it made him both Judge and Party, if he was to pay any thing for his own Eſtate: Nor could the Scire facias be awarded to one who was not Sheriff at that Time: The Money alſo was directed to be raiſed by Diſtreſs, or Impriſonment, and conſequently could not be raiſed by Scire facias. He admitted, the King might lay Duties on Merchandize, becauſe he defended the Merchants from Pirates. In King James's Reign five Shilling a Ton was laid upon Currants, and adjudged legal: But, as this Caſe was, he held, both as to Matter and Form, that they could not give Judgment for the King.

Judgment for the Defendant.

The Judgment of Sir Humphrey Davenport, Lord Chief Baron.

Sir Humphrey Davenport, Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, in his Argument on this Subject, ſaid, That, according to what he underſtood of the Laws of England, Judgment ought to be given for the Defendant; for when he conſidered the firſt Command in the Writ of the 4th of Auguſt, That the County ſhould provide a Ship at their own Charge, and the ſecond, for Taxation; the one ſeemed repugnant to the other: For the firſt Command was general to all, and by the laſt, a Power was limited to particular Perſons, the Sheriffs, Bailiffs, &c. who muſt be exempted from the firſt general Charge, becauſe they could not aſſeſs themſelves; it ought to have been done by a Jury, per ſacramentum proborum hominum. The firſt Act which the Sheriff was commanded to do, he conceived, was by the ſecond Power diſcharged; and, as theſe Powers did not cohere, they were not warranted by Law.

Where Things were reduced to a Certainty by the King's Courts, indeed, the Sheriff might execute, take a Man's Goods, or impriſon him; but, where there was an Uncertainty, the Law had annexed to his Office a Method of reducing them to a Certainty; namely, by a Jury, as in the Caſe of Partition by Parceners, &c. he was to impannel a Jury, to make an equal Partition.

He was of Opinion, the Tax was very fit to be be impoſed in a Time of Danger; but, that ſecond Power given to the Sheriff, to free himſelf and lay it on others, was not good.

He did not think the Incurſions of Pirates a ſufficient Cauſe for ſuch an Armament; but, as to thoſe Expreſſions in the Writ, Quia datum eſt nobis intelligi: Ut informatur: Vulgaris eſt optimo opinio: Rumor eſt, &c. they were well enough, according to the Precedents: The King need not declare, how he knew it, ſo he declared, the Kingdom was in danger; he was the ſole Judge of it, and his Certificate was not traverſable. And, he obſerved further, that the prædones mentioned, when Danegelt was given, were not ordinary Pirates, but ſuch Powers as endangered the whole Kingdom: That Tax therefore was juſtly impoſed to repel the Danes, who were common Enemies; but he held, it was taken away by the Statute of Edw. I. and the other Acts that had been cited. He was in doubt alſo, whether the Certiorari and Mittimus could revive the firſt Writ, which was not returnable, and never executed, according to the Tenor of it, within the Time prefixed. The Nature of a Writ not returnable was, to command a poſitive Thing to be done within a certain Time; and, if it was not done accordingly, there was an end of the Force of that Writ: So here, the Power given to the Sheriff, not being executed within the Time preſcribed, could not be renewed; the Mittimus, in which thoſe Words Salus Regni periclitabatur are inſerted, could not revive, or inforce the Commands of the firſt Writ; it was no more than a Suggeſtion, upon which a Scire facias could not iſſue.

1637. 13 Car. I.

Again: This Money was appropriated to the preparing a Ship; but, it did not appear a Ship was built, a Collector appointed, or any Act done relating to it; therefore, how could they give Judgment? The Scire facias was for Mr. Hampden to ſhew Cauſe, why he ſhould not pay the Sum impoſed on him: But, to whom the Money ſhould be paid, it did not appear; and, therefore, he did not ſee how the Defendant could be charged with it.

As to the grand Queſtion, he ſtill held, That where the Kingdom was actually in Danger, or in Expectation of Danger, and the ſame was expreſſed in the King's Writ, his Majeſty might charge his Subjects without a Parliament, for the Defence of it; and he was the ſole Judge thereof: But, if the Danger was not ſo imminent, and a Parliamentary Advice might be had, then the Charge could not be legally impoſed without a Parliament: And, as to the Mandates in the Writ of the 4th of Auguſt, were not good, they could not give Judgment to charge the Defendant.

Judgment for the Defendant.

The Judgment of the Lord Chief Juſtice Finch

Sir John Finch, Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, proceeded to give his Judgment next: But, before he entered on the Merits of the Cauſe, he ſhewed by what Steps it was brought into the Exchequer Chamber. He ſaid, the firſt Writs were iſſued to the Maritime Places and Poſt-Towns, the 20th of October, in the 10th Year of the preſent King; and, that his Majeſty relied very much on the Opinion of the late Attorney-General, Mr. Noy, in it.

That the Precedents were brought to the Chief Juſtices, and the Chief Baron, who having diligently peruſed them, did give it under their Hands, that the Dominion of the Sea belonged to the King; he was the ſole Proprietor thereof, and the Defence of it belonged to his Majeſty: That the Cinque-Ports had been required, heretofore, to provide ſuch a Number of Ships, of ſuch Burthen as Occaſion required: As to the Time, Place, and continuance of their Attendance, it was at the King's Pleaſure.

That, afterwards, the Danger growing general, and his Majeſty conceiving it unreaſonable, that the Maritime Places ſhould bear all the Charge, where the whole Realm was intereſted, he required the Opinion of the Lord Chief Ba-1637. 13 Car. I. ron, and himſelf, concerning it; and they delivered their Opinion, firſt verbally, That, where the whole Kingdom was in Danger, the Charge ought to be borne by all his Subjects: And Writs being ordered accordingly, that to the Sheriff of Bucks was iſſued among the reſt.

Afterwards, the Legality of theſe Writs being queſtioned, his Majeſty required the Opinion of every one of the Judges ſeparately; and every one, by himſelf, delivered his reſpective Opinion under his Hand: Particularly Judge Crooke ſubſcribed ſingly by himſelf; and, where Opinions were ſo delivered, he conceived, they ought to produce very good Grounds for varying from them: And he affirmed, thoſe Opinions were ſo delivered, that no one Judge knew the Opinion of the reſt. That the 2d of February, $163\frac{6}{7}$, his Majeſty ſent a Letter to all the Judges, to have their Opinions together; to which they returned their Anſwer the ſeventh: That the Judges, Hutton and Crooke, did then agree, the King was ſole Judge of the Danger: (Though Crooke had ſaid nothing of this in his Argument, and Hutton nothing againſt it:) But, they all declared, they did not deliver thoſe Opinions as binding; nor did his Majeſty require they ſhould: However, they were ſoon after publiſhed.

Then he proceeded to the principal Points, and ſaid, he was of Opinion, that the Danger to the whole Kingdom ought to be expreſſed clearly in the Writ of the 4th of Auguſt: But then he conceived the Words datum eſt nobis intelligi, certain enough; it was ſufficient that the King knew the Danger: And he obſerved, there were not only Dangers mentioned from Pirates, but from the neighbouring Powers engaged in War; for the Words in the Writ were, Conſideratis periculis quæ undique his guerrinis temporibus imminent', ita quod nobis & ſubditis noſtris defenſionem maris & Regni noſtri omni feſtinatione qua poterimus convenit, &c. And it might have been well enough without the Preamble: The King need not declare the particular Danger.

And, though it had been objected by the Juſtices, Hutton and Crooke, that the Writ was in effect, to raiſe Money, and not to build a Ship; he put the Caſe, if either of them was to find a light Horſe and Arms, if he had none, he muſt hire, or buy them with his Money; but yet, the Charge was not for Money, but for finding a light Horſe; and the requiring the County to build a Ship was a parallel Caſe; if they had not Materials, they muſt buy them: Here was no Money to come into the King's Purſe.

The Objection alſo, that Bucks was an Inland County, and knew not how to build Ships, was trifling; for they might, however, contribute to the building one in a proper Place: And, as the Defence of the whole Kingdom ought to be at the Charge of the whole Kingdom, ſo the Power of laying this Charge was, by the Policy and fundamental Laws of the Realm, ſolely veſted in the King: As the Law had given the King this Power, ſo it had given him the Means to put it in Execution.

And, although the Law gave every Man a Property in his Goods; yet every Man had a Property in another's Goods for the Publick Safety: Something muſt be ſpared, and employed, for the Security of the reſt; and the Intereſt the King had in his Subjects Eſtates, was for their Common Good. The Parliament, he confeſſed, was an excellent Means of charging the Subject; but not the only Means: The King held his Diadem from God, and all others held their Lands from him. He had a great Veneration for Parliaments, he ſaid, and ſhould ever gratefully remember the Honour the late Parliament had done him. in chuſing him their Speaker; but he wiſhed ſome had not ſown the Tares of Diſcontent in that Field of the Commonwealth.

1637. 13 Car. I.

It was certain Kings were before Parliaments: Antiently the Kingdom was governed by the Regal Power, limited by no poſitive Laws: The King had originally the Sovereignty of the whole Kingdom, and the Power of charging it by Sea and Land: And, as the Law ſtill gave the King the Power of defending the Kingdom, ſo it gave him the Power of charging the Subject for that End: If the Sea and Land conſtituted but one entire Kingdom, and the King was Lord of both, then was the Subject bound to the Defence of the Sea, as well as the Land: All were bound to find Ships, and other Neceſſaries, for that Defence; and, as they were Iſlanders, the Defence of the Sea was moſt neceſſary.

Then he obſerved, that there had not been cited one Authority to prove, that, in the Time of Neceſſity and Danger, the King might not charge the Subjects for the Defence of the Kingdom: On the other Hand, all thoſe Authorities, which ſhewed the King was entruſted with the Defence of the Kingdom, and had Aids and Taxes given him in many ſuch Caſes, proved, that the Subjects, in Caſes of Neceſſity and Danger, was bound to pay them to the King for the Defence of the Realm. Thoſe Prerogatives alſo, of granting Pontage, Murage, and digging of Salt-petre, ſhewed, that for the Good of the Publick, the King was intereſted in the Eſtates of his Subjects, and might charge them for their Well-being, much more, when the very Being of the Commonwealth was at Stake, and in Danger.

Beſides, by all the antient Precedents that had been cited in the Reigns of Alfred, Edgar, and Ethelred, thoſe in the Reigns of K. Edw. III. &c. and thoſe in the late Reign of Q. Elizabeth, it appeared, that Writs and Commiſſions were iſſued for the Defence of the Kingdom: And, the Letters from the Lords of the Council in 88. had the Queen's Writs in them. Mr. Juſtice Crooke alſo had owned, that the Subjects were compellable to ſerve in their Perſons; and ſurely the Bona Corporis were ſuperior to Bona Fortunæ: There was more Reaſon that the Subjects Eſtates, than their Perſons, ſhould be in the King's Power, to enable him to defend the Realm.

It had been objected, indeed, that the Writ was againſt the Common Law; becauſe there was no Precedent of a Writ to an Inland County to find a Ship: But there were Precedents of the King's charging the Subject of the Inland Counties towards the Defence of the Kingdom, though not in that Manner, by finding Ships.

1637. 13 Car. I.

That as to the Charters and Statutes which had been cited, to ſhew that the Subjects Goods could not be taken from them, but by Conſent of Parliament; all that could be gathered from them, was, that they ſhould be freed from all unjuſt Taxations: They could not intend a Charge for the neceſſary Defence of the Realm. Mr. Juſtice Crooke, in reciting the Conqueror's Laws, he obſerved, left out this material Clauſe, (viz.) Statuimus & firmiter præcipimus ut omnes liberi homines totius Regni præd' ſint fratres conjurati ad monarchiam noſtram pro viribus ſuis & facultatibus contra inimicos pro poſſe ſuo defendend' & viriliter ſervand', &c. Where it was apparent they were to defend the Kingdom pro facultatibus, as well as viribus; and that the Conqueror did not intend to diſcharge any Body from defending the Kingdom in Caſe of Neceſſity: And thoſe Words in Forteſcue, importing that the Subject had an abſolute Property in his Goods, intended no more, than that the King could not take them to his own Uſe; and that he could not, for his own Uſe, lay any Burthen upon the Subject without Conſent of Parliament; but all private Property muſt give way to the publick: Though a Man has a Property in his own Goods, he cannot uſe them to the Detriment of the Commonwealth; he ſhall not ſet Fire to his own Houſe or Goods, that may endanger his Neighbours; nor ſhall he carry his Goods to a foreign Market, to the Prejudice of the Nation: And to remove that ſcandalous Suggeſtion, that the King intended to make a private Advantage of the Money, he ſaid, both he and the Lord Chief Juſtice Brampſton, had heard his his Majeſty ſolemnly declare, he thought himſelf bound in Conſcience to convert all this to the Uſe it was given for; and, in Fact, the King had every Year expended much more in his Sea Armaments than ever he received by this Contribution. And whereas it had been ſuggeſted, that though his Majeſty would not charge them but in Caſes of Neceſſity, yet this might be a Precedent for his Succeſſors to charge them at Pleaſure; he anſwered, If future Kings ſhould charge them unreaſonably, this would be no Precedent for it; and the right Uſe of a Thing ought not to be condemned becauſe it might be abuſed.

The Law alſo repoſed as great a Confidence in the King in other Caſes: He might pardon all Offences, but if he ſhould, no Man would be ſafe; he might make Peace and War, by either of which he might undo the Kingdom, and every Man's Liberties and Properties might be loſt in the general Deſtruction he might bring upon them by theſe means; but it was not to be preſumed, the King would do any thing againſt the publick Good of the Kingdom, and therefore the Law had declared, The King could do no wrong.

It had been acknowledged alſo, he obſerved, that in Time of War, when the Courts of Juſtice were ſhut, the King might charge the Subject; but there might be Wars in ſome Parts of the Kingdom when the Courts were open at Weſtminſter; and whether the Danger extended to All, or Part, All ought to be charged, as well to the Sea as Land Service, they both made but one Kingdom; and a Danger in Expectancy, he held, was ſufficient to charge the Subject: In 88 the Enemy had been upon them, if the Danger had not been foreſeen by the Queen, and provided againſt.

1637. 13 Car. I.

But farther, If the Subject could be charged only in Parliament, then they made the Parliament, and not the King, Judge of the the Neceſſity of a Defence: It would be ridiculous to acknowledge the Power of making a Defence to be in the King, and not allow him the Means to perform it. Acts of Parliament might take away the Flowers and Ornaments of the Crown, but not the Crown itſelf. He held, an Act to bar the Succeſſion would be void, and ſo would an Act, that no Lands ſhould hold of the Crown, or to abſolve the Subjects from their Allegiance, or take away the King's Power of defending his People; in like Manner, an Act, that he ſhould not command his Subjects Perſons and Purſes in order to defend them, would be void: Nor was this properly an Aid impoſed, but a Contribution of King and People; the King was taxed as well as they.

That ſuch Aſſeſſments as theſe had ever been made by Sheriffs, or ſuch as the King thought fit to truſt, and not by Juries: Beſides, the Command was to provide a Ship, and if that had been done there had been no need of an Aſſeſſment; and Mr. Hampden had the leaſt Occaſion of any Man in England to complain of the Inequality of it. As to the Objection that the Sheriff taxed himſelf in this Caſe, the Juſtices of Peace, in levying Subſidies, aſſeſſed themſelves, and Commiſſioners of Sewers taxed their own Lands; and the Writs for levying the Expences of Knights of the Shire were directed to the Sheriff, who aſſeſſed himſelf; and if a Fine was laid upon a County he aſſeſſed it, and yet was chargeable towards it. As to the commanding ſix and twenty Weeks Pay to be provided, there were Precedents where the Counties had been obliged to pay their Soldiers after they marched out of their Counties. Where the King paid them, it was uſually for foreign Wars, not in Caſes of Neceſſity, when they marched in Defence of the Kingdom; and there was no going out of the Realm here: The Sea and Land made but one Kingdom, as had been reſolved in the Exchequer.

And though it had been objected, that by Magna Charta no Freeman could be impriſoned, here was no Impriſonment in Queſtion; nothing but the Aſſeſſment, (viz.) Why the Defendant ſhould not pay the Money aſſeſſed, or ſhew Cauſe to the contrary?

Nor was the Objection, that the Certiorari was directed to two Sheriffs, the late and the preſent Sheriff, more to the Purpoſe: Nothing was more common; nor was the firſt Writ determined, becauſe the Time mentioned in it for preparing the Ship was not expired; for the Writ was irreturnable, and ſo needed no reviving: And though it was ſaid, it did not appear any Ship was prepared, he anſwered, it was prepared; but if it was not, the Fault was in them who had not paid their Quota's. And the King might well bring this Scire facias, as he was intereſted in all Actions for the publick Good, and might recover as in the Caſes of Pontage and Murage; much more, when it was for the Defence of the Realm, though it was not fit it ſhould be expreſſed to be for the King, becauſe becauſe it was for the publick Good only. He concluded, that he was of Opinion the Proceedings were according to Law, and that the Defendant ought to be charged with the twenty Shillings aſſeſſed on him.

Judgment for the King.

The Judgment of Sir John Brampſton.

Sir John Brampſton, Lord Chief Juſtice of the King's-Bench, in delivering his Opinion, ſaid, He conceived, whenever the whole Kingdom was in Danger, his Majeſty might command all his Subjects to join with him in Defence of it: That the Acts of Parliament which had been cited were but declaratory of the Common Law. By the 1 Edw. III. cap. 5. indeed, it was ſaid, That none ſhould be compelled to go out of their Counties, except in Caſes of Invaſion and Neceſſity, and then it ſhould be done as in Times paſſed; therefore what the Uſage was in Times paſſed, was the Queſtion; and it appeared by the Precedents, where they marched at the King's Charge, it was to a foreign War, or to the ordinary Defence; and there was no doubt but in ſuch Caſes the King had paid the Charge: But he was ſtill of Opinion, that in Caſes of Neceſſity, the Subject might be compelled to ſerve out of the County at his own Charges. That it appeared from Fitz. Nat. Br. 28, and in Calvin's Caſe, that the King might command his Subjects, on their Allegiance, to go with him, or in his Service, to the Wars, as well without the Realm as within. The 7th of Hen. IV. ſays, that none ſhall attend the King in his Wars out of the Realm without Wages: But in the Realm they were at his Command, in Times of common Danger, without Wages, as appeared by a Multitude of Precedents, which explained the Statutes of Edw. III. particularly the Abbot of Robertsbridge's Caſe was concluſive: And 10 Edw. III. M. 2. Fol. 18. the King commanded by his Writ an hundred Men to be ſent to Portſmouth; and they refuſing to march without Pay, the King anſwered, No Wages were due; it was a publick Danger.

As to that Objection, that there were no Precedents of the Subjects ſerving out of the Realm; He anſwered, The Sea and Land were but one Kingdom; and if formerly the Seamen were content to defend the Coaſts by Sea, in Conſideration the Inland Counties took upon them the Charge of the Land Service; he knew no Reaſon, why they might not be obliged to bear the publick Charge together, in Caſes of Neceſſity. Mr. Selden had obſerved in his Mare clauſum, That it was the antient Uſage, to charge both the Inland and Maritime Counties on any great Emergency: And Sir Edward Coke admitted, That it could never be the Meaning of the Great Charter, to take away the King's Prerogative and exempt the Subject from the Charge of Defence: And as to that Objection, that a Parliament might have been called, it had been well anſwered, That a timely Preparation muſt be made, when Danger threatned: It might be too late, when the Enemy was at our Doors: The King was Judge of the Danger, and the Subject was bound on his Allegiance, to aſſiſt him in any publick Danger.

The Danger, he acknowledged, muſt be expreſſed in the Writ, and he conceived it was ſufficiently expreſſed; the Words being pro defenſione Regni, & tuitione maris &c. Had it been only a Danger from Pirates, an ordinary Danger; then indeed the Defence ought to have been at the King's Charge. As to the Writs, the only Exception he had to them was, that it did not appear, neither in the one, or the other, to whom the Money was to be paid: There was no Precedent where Judgment had been given, and not ſaid to whom: He inclined therefore to believe, this was a good Exception; but in all other Points he agreed with the Majority of the Bench.

Motion in Parliament to reverſe the Judgment againſt Hampden, and puniſh the Judges.

In the Parliament, that was aſſembled the the 13*th.* of April 1640 Mr. Waller moved in the Houſe of Commons, to have this Judgment reverſed, and the Judges puniſhed, for pronouncing it. He was not for entring on the Supply, till this, and their other Grievancies were redreſſed: He ſaid it was neceſſary they ſhould be reſtored to the Property of their Goods (which he apprehended was taken from them by this Judgment) before they could have any thing to give. If the King could tax them at Pleaſure, all they had was the King's already: Adding, that their Liberties were no leſs affected than their Fortunes, by this Judgment; ſince the King was thereby empowered to impriſon their Perſons, for Non-payment of this Tax: Concluding with a Motion, That the Houſe might firſt conſider the reſtoring the Nation to its fundamental and vital Liberties, the Property of their Goods, and Freedom of their Perſons, and then enter upon the Supply: But, this Parliament ſitting but a few Days, nothing was done in it.

The like Motion in the next Parliament.

The Lord Falkland, in the Parliament that began November 1640. moved the calling the Judges to Account again; obſerving, That as they had allowed the King the ſole Power in Neceſſity, and the ſole Judgment of Neceſſity, they had enabled him to take from them what he would, when he would, and how he would, and conſequently left them neither Liberties nor Properties; and thus, by the Transformation of them from the State of free Subjects to that of Villains, diſabled them by legal and voluntary Supplies to expreſs their Affections to his Majeſty: They muſt therefore think of taking away this Judgment, and theſe Judges together, and of regulating their Succeſſors, by their exemplary Puniſhment.

Reſolution againſt Ship-Money.

After many Debates and Invectives againſt the Judges, for giving this Judgment in the Caſe of Mr. Hampden, the Houſe of Commons reſolved, on the 7th of December, that the Charge impoſed on the Subjects, for providing and and furniſhing Ships, and the Aſſeſſments for raiſing Money for that Purpoſe, commonly called Ship-money, were againſt the Laws of the Realm, the Subjects Right of Property, and contrary to former Reſolutions in Parliament, and to the Petition of Right. 2. That the extrajudical Opinions of the Judges, in the Caſe of Ship-money, were againſt Law; the Liberty and Property of the Subject; contrary to former Reſolutions in Parliament; and to the Petition of Right. 3. That the Writs, called Ship-writs, were againſt Law, Liberty, and Property, &c. and 4. That the Judgment againſt Mr. Hampden, in the Matter and Subſtance thereof, and the making Mr. Hampden chargeable, was againſt Law, Liberty, and Property, &c.

Which Reſolutions the Commons communicated to the Lords, at a Conference, by Mr. St. John, who made a very long Speech upon the Occaſion: But, as it contained nothing more than is to be found in the Arguments abovementioned, I ſhall not trouble the Reader with it.

Mr. Hyde's Speech, upon impeaching Judge Berkley.

Mr. Hyde (afterwards Lord Chancellor) made a Speech againſt Ship-money, and Ship-writs, on the carrying up Articles of Impeachment againſt Sir Robert Berkley, one of the Juſtices of the King's Bench. Wherein he tells their Lordſhips, That the Judges firſt begun with countenancing Impoſitions and Taxes on the Merchants in Trade, and, by Burthens and Preſſures on the Gentry, in caſe of Knighthood, before they arrived at that univerſal Deſtruction of the Kingdom by Ship-money, which promiſed them Rewards and Security for all their former Services: By doing the Work of a Parliament, in granting his Majeſty Supplies: (They thought they ſhould never more be called to Account by Parliaments, which they had thus rendered uſeleſs, and might now ſhare the Spoils of their Fellow-Subjects with Impunity). The Commons, therefore, hoped their Lordſhips would ſpeedily call theſe Judges before them, to anſwer the Articles laid to their Charge, and do Juſtice on them, according to their Demerits.

Theſe Judges were impeached for High Treaſon, and other Miſdemeanors: The Subſtance of the Articles preferred againſt Sir Robert Berkley being of the following Tenor.

The Articles againſt Sir Robert Berkley.

1. That the ſaid Sir Robert Berkley, being one of the Juſtices of the King's Bench, had traiterouſly endeavoured to ſubvert the fundamental Laws, and eſtabliſhed Government, and to eſtabliſh an arbitrary tyrannical Government, as he had manifeſted by wicked Words, Opinions, Judgments, Practices, and Actions, mentioned in the following Articles.

2. That, whereas by the Statute of 25 Hen. VIII. Victuals were appointed to be rated, he had delivered his Opinion, that Corn was ſuch Victual as was intended to have a Price ſet upon it, contrary to the plain Meaning of the ſaid Statute, with an Intent to lay an unlawful Charge on the Subject.

3. That an Information being preferred in the Star-Chamber againſt John Overman, and fifteen other Soap-makers, for exerciſing their Trade contrary to a Patent, granted for the ſole making of Soap; and their Anſwer being referred to him, and others, he certified to the Star-Chamber, that the whole Anſwer, except four Words, and the ten laſt Lines, ought to be expunged: And the Interrogatories and Depoſitions, on the Behalf of the Defendants, being alſo referred to him and others, he certified, that thirty-nine of them ought to be ſuppreſſed: Which Certificates were contrary to Law: And, by Reaſon thereof, the ſaid John Overman, and the fifteen other Defendants, were ſentenced by the Star-Chamber to be committed to the Fleet; diſabled from uſing their Trade; one of them fined 1500 l. two of them 1000 l. a-piece, and four of them 1000 Marks a-piece; to the utter Ruin of the Defendants, and to the Overthrow of the free Trade and Liberty of the Subject.

1637. 13 Car. I.

4, and 5. That, being one of the Juſtices of the King's Bench, and ſworn to adminiſter Juſtice according to Law, he had ſubſcribed the ſaid Opinion, declaring the Lawfulneſs of levying Ship-money.

6. That he had delivered his Opinion againſt John Hampden Eſq; in the Caſe of Ship-money, in the Exchequer Chamber.

7. That he declared at the Aſſizes held at York, in Lent 1636. that it was lawful, and an inſeparable Flower of the Crown, for the King to command, not only the Maritime Counties, but alſo thoſe that were Inland, to find Ships for the Defence of the Kingdom; and, that this was the Opinion of all the Judges: And, whereas there was a Rumour, that ſome of them ſubſcribed againſt their Judgment, he ſaid, It was a baſe and unworthy Thing, for any Man to give his Hand contrary to his Heart; wiſhing, for his own Part, that his Hand might rot from his Arm, that was guilty of ſuch a Crime: Notwithſtanding, he knew, that Mr. Juſtice Hutton, and Mr. Juſtice Crooke, who had ſubſcribed, were of a contrary Opinion, and ſubſcribed but in Conformity to the Majority. And, he, the ſaid Sir Robert Berkley, then alſo ſaid, that in ſome Caſes the Judges were above an Act of Parliament, with an Intent to countenance the ſaid unjuſt Opinions, and terrify thoſe who ſhould refuſe to pay Ship-money, or ſeek any Remedy at Law againſt the ſaid unjuſt and illegal Taxation.

8. That Richard Chambers, Merchant, bringing an Action againſt Sir Edward Bromfield, Lord Mayor of London, for impriſoning the ſaid Chambers, on his Refuſal to pay Ship-money: Upon a Debate of the ſaid Caſe, in the Court of King's-Bench, the ſaid Sir Robert Berkley ſaid, that there was a Rule of Law, and a Rule of Government; and, that many Things which might not be done by the Rule of Law, might be done by the Rule of Government; and would not ſuffer the Legality of Ship-money to be argued: All which Opinions, Declarations, and Speeches, were deſtructive of the fundamental Laws; the Subjects Right of Property; and contrary to former Reſolutions of Parliament; and the Petition of Right.

9. That the ſaid Sir John Berkley, being Juſtice of Peace for the County of Hertford, did, at the Quarter-Seſſions there, revile and threaten the Grand Jury, for preſenting the Removal of the Communion Table in All-Saints Church in Hertford out of the Place where it antiently ſtood, and ſetting it Altar-wiſe, as an Innovation: And, that he committed Browne, one of the moſt active of the ſaid Grand Jury, to Priſon for one Night, declaring, that they had nothing to do to meddle with Church Matters; and compelled the Grand Jury to ſay, they were ſorry for what they had done; cauſing them to tear the ſaid Preſentment in Pieces, and trample it under their Feet: And, by his threatening, reviling Speeches, and unjuſt Actions, he ſo terrified the Jurors in thoſe Parts, that they durſt not preſent any Innovations in Church Matters; And whereas, Ingram and Carter indicted Matthew Brook, Parſon of Yarmouth, for refuſing to adminiſter the Sacrament to them, becauſe they would not receive Tickets with their Names in them, the ſaid Sir Robert Berkley diſcouraged the Proſecutor's Counſel at the Aſſizes, and over-ruled the Matter of Law, ſo that the Jury found for the ſaid Brook; bound the ſaid Ingram to his Good-Behaviour, for proſecuting the ſaid Indictments, and ordered him to pay Coſts; and Carter being abſent, he cauſed a Vacat' to be entered, and an Attachment againſt the ſaid Carter: Which ſaid Proceedings were contrary to Law.

10. That, he refuſed to bail Alexander Jennings, and ſeveral others, who were committed for not paying Ship-money; and alſo, refuſed to bail William Pargiter, who was committed, for refuſing to pay five Shillings, aſſeſſed on him by a Commiſſion of Array, iſſued when the Scots entered England: That he had denied Writs of Habeas Corpus to ſome; and delayed them, when they were demanded by others; and refuſed to bail ſeveral, though no Cauſe appeared on the Return to hinder it: Which Things were deſtructive to the Laws of this Realm, contrary to former Reſolutions of Parliament, and to the Petition of Right.

11. That he had refuſed to grant Prohibitions to the Eccleſiaſtical Courts, where he ought to have granted them by Law.

All which Words, Opinions, and Actions, were ſo ſpoken and done by him traiterouſly and wickedly, to alienate the Hearts of his Majeſty's Liege People from his Majeſty; to create Diviſions between them, and to ſubvert the fundamental Laws, and eſtabliſhed Government: For which they did impeach the ſaid Sir Robert Berkley of High Treaſon againſt his Majeſty, and of the Miſdemeanors aboveſaid; praying, that he might be put to anſwer the Premiſſes, and Juſtice done upon him, &c.

The Lords, on the 20th of January, 164$\frac{0}{1}$, reſolved, that the Ship-writs, and the Judges Opinions on them, were contrary to the Laws and Statutes of the Realm; and to the Rights and Properties of the Subject; and to former Judgments of Parliament: And, on the 26th of February, they agreed, the ſaid Judgment given in the Exchequer-Chamber againſt Mr. Hampden, ſhould be vacated.

An Act againſt Ship-money, &c.

An Act alſo paſſed the ſame Seſſion, declaring, That the Charge impoſed on the Subject, for providing and furniſhing of Ships, commonly called Ship-money, and the extrajudicial Opinions of the Juſtices and Barons, and the Writs, and every of them and, the Agreement, or Opinions, of the greater Part of the Juſtices and Barons, and the Judgment given againſt John Hampden Eſq; for the Payment of Ship-money, were contrary to, and againſt the Laws and Statutes of the Realm; the Right of Property; the Liberty of the Subjects; former Reſolutions of Parliament, and the Petition of Right made in the third Year of the King.

1637. 13 Car. I.

The Judgment againſt Hampden, declared void.

And that, all and every the Records and Remembrances of the ſaid Judgment, againſt the ſaid John Hampden, and all and every the Proceedings whatſoever, upon, or by Colour of, any of the ſaid Ship-writs, ſhould be adjudged utterly void; and that all and every the ſaid Judgment, Enrolment, Entries, Proceedings, and Dependants, of what kind ſoever, ſhould be vacated and cancelled, in ſuch Manner and Form as Records uſed to be vacated.

Articles preferred againſt ſix more of the Judges.

Articles of Impeachment were carried up alſo againſt ſix more of the Judges. Thoſe againſt Judge Crawley particularly, by Mr. Waller, on the 6th of July, 1641. in which he was charged with the extrajudicial Opinions above ſpecified, and, declaring in his Circuit, That Ship-money was ſo inherent a Right in the Crown, that it was not in the Power of the Parliament to take it away. But the Editor of theſe Proceedings does not give us the particular Articles againſt Judge Crawley, or againſt any of the reſt of the Judges; except thoſe againſt Lord Finch, which will be found in the Proceedings againſt him in the following Sheets.

A Review of the Proceedings, in the Caſe of Ship-money.

I ſhall in the next Place take a Review of theſe long and intricate Proceedings, and endeavour, in a ſummary way, to ſtate the Arguments on either Side: After which, I ſhall proceed to make ſome Remarks on the Whole, as well Hiſtorical as Critical.

Conceſſions of Mr. Hampden's Counſel.

It appears, that the Counſel for Mr. Hampden, as well as the Judges who argued on that Side, admitted, that his Majeſty had the ſole Power of the Militia; and, in Caſes of any ſudden Invaſion or Rebellion, might command them, and the reſt of his Subjects, to arm, and march in Defence of the Kingdom; and that his Majeſty was alſo ſole Judge of the Danger: But they denied, that the King could raiſe Money by way of Writ, or otherwiſe, to pay his Forces by Sea or Land, unleſs in a Parliamentary Way.

They inſiſted, that the Tenures by Knights Service, the Service of the Ports, Tonnage and Poundge, were intended to enable the King to defend the Nation: And if an Invaſion, or Inſurrection, was ſo ſudden and formidable, that the King could not reſiſt them with the Aſſiſtance of theſe; and that there was not Time to aſſemble a Parliament; then they did admit, that the King might command the Aſſiſtance, both of the Perſons and Eſtates of his Subjects, to ſave the Kingdom from ſuch apparent and imminent Danger: Adding that, in caſe of ſuch ſudden Danger, every Subject, as well as the King, might and would make uſe of the Goods and Property of one another, as well as his own, towards the Common Defence: And even By-Laws for the Common Defence, were good in ſuch Caſes, which were not warranted by Royal Authority.

The Arguments for Mr Hampden ſummed up.

But that if the King was empowered to tax his Subjects at Pleaſure, whenever he pleaſed to declare the Kingdom was in Danger, the Con-

1637. 13 Car. I.

Conſequence would be as miſchievous as an Inſurrection or Invaſion could be; for, this way, they might loſe the Property of their Lands and Goods, as well as by the other; the King, by the ſame Rule he took Part, might take the Whole, under a Pretence of Danger or Neceſſity.

They endeavoured to ſhew alſo, That whenever the Militia, or any of the King's Subjects were commanded to march out of their reſpective Counties, it was always at the King's Charge; and there was no Precedent of an Inland County's being commanded to provide a Ship for the Defence of the Sea: That Parliaments were held antiently twice a Year, or once at leaſt; and theſe great Councils would never fail to grant Supplies, where there was a real Neceſſity for it; and that there was Time enough for aſſembling a Parliament in this Caſe, the Rendezous of the Fleet being appointed ſeven Months after the Teſte of the Writs.

It was urged alſo, that the firſt Writ of the 4th of Auguſt did not declare any other Danger than what was to be apprehended from Pirates, and that the ordinary Guard of the Sea was ſufficient to ſuppreſs theſe: There could be no Occaſion to tax the Inland Counties towards it, and the Writ of Mittimus, that was iſſued a Year and an half after, declaring the Kingdom was in Danger, was not to be conſidered in this Caſe; for if there was no Danger expreſſed in the firſt Writ, there was no Reaſon then for levying ſuch an extraordinary Tax; the Subject could not foreſee what would be declared a Year and a half afterwards, and the Danger conſequently was not confeſſed by the Demurrer. The Command to the Sheriff to aſſeſs the County was alſo held to be illegal: It ought to have been done by a Jury; and it was ſtill more improper to levy the Money by Scire facias, when the Writ directed it to be levied by Diſtreſs or Impriſonment: Though the giving the Sheriff a Power to impriſon the Subject, and ſell his Goods for Non-payment, were alſo contrary to the Statutes, which confirmed the Property of the Subject in his Goods. That the directing the Scire facias to the late Sheriff, as well as the preſent Sheriff, alſo was irregular; and the not ſaying to whom the Money was to be paid, was ſuch an Error as could not be got over. And, laſtly, they obſerved, that it was agreed on all Hands, that if the Money had been made payable to the King's Uſe, and not for the common Defence, it was unwarrantable.

The Arguments for the King ſummed up.

On the other Hand, thoſe who argued for the King anſwered, That the Tenures by Knights Service, the Service of the Ports, Tonnage and Poundage, &c. were reſerved only for the Support of the Government, and the ordinary Defence of the Kingdom. Every one knew that theſe were not ſufficient for the Defence of the Kingdom, in Time of War and imminent Danger; and if they were not, the Subject was obliged to contribute further, rather than the Kingdom ſhould be loſt: That the Defendant's Council had confeſſed the Danger by their Demurrer, and had acknowledged alſo, that, in Time of common Danger, private Property muſt ceaſe: That ſince Magna Charta, and the other Acts made for the Security of the Subject's Property, Writs and Commiſſions had frequently been iſſued, requiring the Subject to provide for the Defence of the Kingdom by Sea and Land, at their own Charge; and even ſo lately as the Reigns of Queen Mary and Queen Elizabeth, on the Siege of Calais, and at the Spaniſh Invaſion in 1588, to which the Subject cheerfully contributed without murmuring; and conſequently the Statutes, which ſecured the Subject's Property, could never intend that he ſhould not be obliged to contribute to the Defence of the Kingdom in Caſe of imminent Danger: That ſuch Writs had been iſſued even during a Seſſions of Parliament, where Subſidies were given; and that it was in the King's Option, whether he would call a Parliament or not: It was a good way of raiſing Supplies by Parliament, but this was not the only way: Queen Elizabeth, though ſhe had a Year's Notice of the Spaniards Intentions againſt the Kingdom, called no Parliament, but raiſed Men and Money by an an Order of Council only; which was ſo far from being diſapproved of in the next Parliament, that ſhe received their Thanks for her provident Care and Circumſpection. That it was true a Parliament might have been called by his Majeſty; but he was too well acquainted with the Delays in their Proceedings, and the Temper they had ſhewn, to rely on their giving him Supplies; and therefore, rather than hazard the Security of the Kingdom, and the Loſs of the Dominion of the Sea, he had followed the Steps of his Predeceſſors, in providing againſt the Danger, without having recourſe to a Parliament.

The King was ſtill truſted with the walling of Towns for their Defence, and could impoſe a Tax for it, as was acknowledged by the other Side; and it was much more reaſonable he ſhould be entruſted with a Power of compelling the Subject to contribute towards the fitting out Ships, which were, in reality the Walls of the Kingdom.

That if the Danger was not confeſſed by the Defendant's Demurrer, there appeared ſufficient Danger in the firſt Writ, of the 4th of Auguſt, to warrant ſuch Preparations; for the Writ took notice of the Dangers ariſing from the neighbouring Powers, who had aſſembled great Fleets and Armies, and expreſſed the Danger there was of loſing the Dominion of the Sea, which, as we were an Iſland, and depended very much on our Trade, muſt be fatal to us. That former Kings, eſpecially during the Time of the Saxons, had always endeavoured to keep ſuch Fleets as might render them Maſters at Sea: King Edgar had a Navy of 3600 Ships, and commanded 3000 Ships to rendezvous every Year at Eaſter, and ſurround the Iſland. And Ethelred commanded every 310 Hides of Land throughout England to provide a Ship; which, it was computed, muſt raiſe upwards of eleven thouſand Ships. Of ſuch Conſequence the Dominion of the Sea was thought in thoſe Days; and it was not leſs at preſent, when our our foreign Trade was ſo much encreaſed, and other Nations attempted to rival us in it.

That it was not to be preſumed, the King would declare a Danger, where there was none: He was to get nothing by the Aſſeſſment: It was all to go towards the Charge of fitting out Ships 1637. 13 Car. I. Ships, and he was at a great Charge himſelf in fitting out a Royal Fleet beſides: That it was acknowledged he was entruſted with greater Matters than theſe; that he could command the Perſons of his Subjects in the Wars; that he could lay an Embargo upon all Ships, and command them into his Service; and had the Prerogatives of War and Peace, whereby he might bring Deſtruction on the whole Kingdom: But it was not to be preſumed he would, any more than that he would ſeize on all his Subjects Eſtates, becauſe he laid a trifling Charge on them, towards their common Defence; and if his Succeſſors ſhould hereafter lay unreaſonable Charges on their Subjects when there was no Neceſſity, this would not be a Precedent for it: Such unneceſſary Charges were acknowledged to be illegal.

And as to the taxing Inland Counties, they all conſtituted but one Kingdom; and it appeared every Hide of Land in the Kingdom had been taxed towards fitting out a Royal Fleet; and if the whole might be charged together, every County in particular might be charged towards it. Formerly the Maritime Counties undertook the Sea Service uſually, and the Militia of the Inland Counties marched to defend the Sea Coaſts; and if both the Inland and Maritime Counties were now charged together, towards the Defence of the whole Kingdom; this was as reaſonable as the charging the one with the Guard of the Sea, and the other with the Defence of their Country by Land.

That the Statutes made againſt taxing the Subject, muſt be underſtood of the ordinary Defence, or for foreign Wars: If an Act was made that the King ſhould not defend the Kingdom, in expreſs Words, or that the Subjects ſhould not contribute to their own Defence in Times of Danger, it would be a void Act. It was not to be ſuppoſed that any Laws could intend the Ruin of the Nation they were made to preſerve, and make the Subject acceſſary to his own Deſtruction; as ſuch Laws would be.

That it was abſurd to ſay, that the King alone was entruſted with the Militia, and the Defence of the Kingdom, and yet was deprived of the Means of raiſing Forces by Sea and Land; and if no Supplies could be raiſed but in Parliament, then the Parliament only was Judge of the Danger, and of the Neceſſity of the Defence: The King had nothing to do with it; ſince, if his Judgment was never ſo much relied on, or his Right to command the Militia never ſo often acknowledged, it would be impoſſible for him to raiſe or maintain Forces without Money. And, laſtly, they held, that the Writs were not defective, either as to Matter or Form; but ſuch as had been uſually iſſued in the like Caſes.

Remarks on the whole.

In moſt Diſputes both Parties are frequently in the wrong, in ſome inſtance or other, and both of them have often other Views than what they think fit to communicate to the World, or to one another. I look upon this, in Reality, to be a Trial of Skill between the Crown and a Faction. The King deſired no more than to preſerve thoſe Prerogatives that deſcended to him from his Anceſtors, though, it is very poſſible, he might think them more extenſive than they really were. The Faction, on the other hand, were aiming (it is evident from the Rebellion that ſucceeded) to make the King dependant on them, and, indeed, to uſurp Sovereign Power, and ſubvert the Government in Church and State; but induſtriouſly concealed their Views from the honeſt and diſintereſted Part of the Nation, pretending to be the great Patriots and Defenders of the People, againſt Popery and Arbitrary Power; which they had the Addreſs to inſinuate was breaking in upon them like a Flood. The King's Inclinations to Popery, they pleaded, were manifeſt from his marrying a Papiſt, ſuffering her Preiſt's and Officers about the Court, and encouraging and preferring thoſe who maintained, that Man was a free Agent, which they ſtiled Arminianiſm, and perſuaded the People, it was a Popiſh Tenet: And indeed Epiſcopacy itſelf, was looked upon by many of the Puritan Strain, as a Remnant of Popery; and his Majeſty's encouraging the Eſtabliſhed Church, an Evidence of his Intentions to bring in Popery. 1637. 13 Car. I.

And as to arbitrary Power, they inſtanced in the many extraordinary Ways the King had taken to raiſe Money, ſince his Acceſſion to the Crown; which were ſuch, indeed, as nothing but an abſolute Neceſſity could juſtify: But what Choice has a Prince left, after repeated Trials of his People's Duty in Parliament, and they peremptorily refuſe him Supplies, either for the neceſſary Support of his Houſhold, or the Defence of his Kingdom? Is he to throw up the Government, and abdicate his Throne, or endeavour to ſupport that, and his own Rights, by having Recourſe to extraordinary Means, till the People's Eyes are opened, and they are brought to a better Temper?

The King, it is evident, by calling three Parliaments, in the firſt four Years of his Reign, had much rather have received Supplies in a Parlimentary Way, than any other: Nay, he would never have taken any other; if he had not been aſſured the Parliament would grant him none: Till he ſaw them ſo infatuated and influenced by the Artifices of the Faction, that nothing leſs would content them, than the deſpoiling him of all his Prerogatives, and ſacrificing the Conſtitution, both Civil and Eccleſiaſtical, to their Fury. The Faction were ſo ſucceſsful, indeed, as to make the People believe, that the King choſe thoſe extraordinary Ways of raiſing Money, and that they proceeded from an innate Diſpoſition to render himſelf Arbitrary: Whereas it was, in Reality, the repeated Provocations he met with, at the beginning of his Reign, before they could ſee what his Adminiſtration would be, that reduced him to the Neceſſity of entring upon thoſe Meaſures: They were ſo far from giving him Supplies for the Support of the War they had drawn the Crown into, that they would not grant him the Cuſtoms his Anceſtors had enjoyed for many Generations for the ordinary Support of the Government. And it is but too manifeſt, that Abundance of Gentlemen, who were Friends both to the Monarchy and the eſtabliſhed Religion, did not in Time reflect, that it was the Undutifulneſs of the Commons that forced the King into thoſe Meaſures in his own Defence. They fixed their Eyes upon every Stretch of the Prerogative, and dwelt upon the Methods that were revived for raiſing Money; not diſcerning the 1637. 13 Car. I.

Faction, to throw all into Confuſion, in order to accompliſh their own ambitious Projects, to gratify their Revenge, or ſubvert the eſtabliſh'd Church: Whereas, had the Parliament made the King once eaſy in his Circumſtances, there is no doubt (as he is acknowledged by moſt Men to have been a wiſe, juſt, and virtuous Prince,) he would, at firſt, have given them any Security for their Liberties and Properties they could have demanded. There were ſome falſe Friends alſo, and thoſe in the greateſt Poſts at Court, it appears, that miſrepreſented his Majeſty to the People, and the People to him, or the Breach had ſoon been made up: It is evident, many Gentlemen, abuſed by the ſpecious Pretences of the Faction, endeavoured, for ſome Time, to depreſs the Crown, and bore a Part in the general Cry of Grievances, that repented of their Conduct, when it was too late; went over to the King, and laid down their Lives to reſcue the Crown, and the Conſtitution out of the Hands of its Enemies, who, if they had ſeen their Miſtake ſooner, might have prevented the Confuſion that followed.

Give me leave to obſerve further, That if Neceſſity would have rendered Ship-money legal, there was certainly, at that Time, too much Neceſſity for that, or ſome other, Supply, to aſſert our Dominion of the Sea: The Dutch had a little before barbarouſly diſpoſſeſſed the Engliſh of the Spice Iſlands; tortured and murdered our Factors at Amboyna, in the Eaſt Indies; ſeized their Effects, and taken the Company's Ships, though we were then in full Peace with that State: Our Merchants murmured that the Dutch were not yet called to Account, and made to reſtore the only valuable Branch of the India Trade, which they had thus robbed us of; and the Hollanders very well knew the King did not want Inclination to do the Nation Juſtice in this particular: They increaſed and ſtrengthened their Navy therefore, and entered into a Confederacy with France to deprive us of the Dominion of the Sea; and thus ſtrengthened and ſupported, they ventured to inſult the Coaſt of England, claiming a Right of fiſhing here, without our Leave; which was the true Reaſon of the King's fitting out the Grand Fleet at this Time, which had ſo good an Effect, that the Dutch were compelled to acknowledge our Sovereignty of the Seas, and yield to pay his Majeſty 30000 l. a Year by way of Tribute, or as a Conſideration for their fiſhing on our Coaſts; and he might have obliged them to reſtore the Spice Iſlands, if that crafty People had not joined the diſaffected here, and found him other Employment at home. From whence it appears that Ship-money was exceedingly well employed, how illegally ſoever it was raiſed; and it coſt the King twice the Money he received by it, to fit out thoſe Fleets that did this Service: So that the Nation was very far from being injured by that trifling Tax, which did not bring in much more than two hundred thouſand Pounds per Annum, and which would have been eſteemed as inconſiderable, as in Truth it was, if the Faction had not diſtracted the People with imaginary Fears, and inſinuated that the King had further Views, intending to render all their Properties precarious, and govern by Will and Pleaſure.

Nor was the King only diſtreſſed by the Faction at home and the Dutch; but the Scots were now upon the Point of throwing off their Allegiance, and breaking out into Rebellion, confederating themſelves with the Engliſh Malcontents, the Dutch, and French, againſt their Native Sovereign. His Majeſty, however, might have ſupported himſelf againſt all theſe, if he had not been ſurrounded by the moſt exquiſite Set of Hypocrites that ever appeared upon the Face of the Earth, who betrayed his Conncils while he was heaping Favours upon them.

As to the Judges who gave their Opinions in this great Cauſe of Ship-money; the Lord Chief Juſtice Finch fled from the Fury of the Faction into Holland, in the Year 1640. when he found there was no Safety for thoſe that durſt be loyal; and was impeached, as will be ſeen hereafter. Six more of the Judges were impeached alſo; but, notwithſtanding the Faction repreſented them as Men not worthy to live, they contented themſelves with extorting fifty or threeſcore thouſand Pounds from them, towards carrying on the Rebellion they had been ſo long plotting againſt their Sovereign; while others were permitted to hold their Places on Condition of doing their dirty Work, and aſſiſting in the Oppreſſion of their Fellow-Subjects: It was one of the Maſter-pieces of the Malcontents, to keep Men under the Terror of being declared Delinquents, to ſerve the Ends of them: This they frequently found of greater Advantage to their Cauſe than turning them out of their Offices, or expelling them the Houſe, as the noble Hiſtorian informs us: And, if the King had raiſed ſome trifling Sums, by extraordinary Means, the Faction raiſed a hundred Times more, by Ways and Means that were ſtill more extraordinary, invading the Subjects Liberties and Properties by wholeſale, and exerciſing every Artifice they could invent, to extort Money from the unhappy People they had deluded. It has been ſhewn already, that there was not one of thoſe extraordinary Ways King Charles made uſe of to raiſe Money, which had not been practiſed by his Predeceſſors, and for the Legality whereof he had not the Opinions of the Judges: And that Queen Elizabeth, in many other Inſtances, carried the Prerogative much higher than this King did, notwithſtanding what Rapin and his Fanatick Brethren, in their abundant Wiſdom, have aſſerted to the contrary. Thoſe, who are converſant in the Hiſtory of that Reign, know that ſhe would not ſuffer the Commons to enter into any Debates without her Direction concerning Religion, the Prerogative, or the Succeſſion of the Crown, and, if they were ſo hardy as to attempt it, ſhe committed the Members; that when Sir Edward Coke, the Speaker of the Commons, was directed to read a Bill that touched upon one theſe Articles, he anſwered he durſt not; the Queen had commanded the Contrary; and he accordingly refuſed to read it.

It appears alſo, that Queen Elizabeth granted above forty Patents for Monopolies, which were all in force at one Time; and ſome of them of thirty Years Continuance: That ſhe raiſed Money by Loans, Privy-Seals, and moſt of the other Ways ſo much clamoured againſt in the Reign of King Charles: That ſhe preſſed what Soldiers ſhe pleaſed into her Service; compelled the Country to raiſe great Bodies of Horſe and Foot, and to pay and clothe them at their own Expence, without aſking the Advice of her Parliament; and was, notwithſtanding, acknowledged to be one of the beſt and greateſt of our Princes: And yet King Charles, who did not half this, is charged by the Faction with aſſuming arbitrary Power, and deemed to have forfeited his Crown, though he redreſſed all their real and pretended Grievances; parted with many of his undoubted Prerogatives, and paſſed more Acts for ſecuring the Liberties and Properties of his Subjects, than had been paſſed in any Reign ſince the Conqueſt; inſomuch, that the very Parliament, that raiſed the Rebellion againſt him, once confeſſed, they had nothing more to demand for their Security.

It appears that the reſpective Parties in thoſe Days, as in ours, acted upon very different Principles, and were far from being agreed in Facts: The one looked upon the People, and the other on the Prince, as the Original of all lawful Power. The firſt held that every legal Government was conſtituted in the Univerſal Conſent of the People; that no one had a Right to aſſume any Dominion over another without his Leave; and that Monarchs and Magiſtrates were, or at leaſt ought to be, no more than the People's Officers and Subſtitutes, elected by them, to adminiſter Juſtice at home, or command the Armies in the Field, and were liable to be called to an Account and depoſed, whenever their Adminiſtration did not pleaſe their Maſters.

The other Party held, that in the Beginning the Patriarchal Form of Government obtained in every Part of the World; that Fathers were Monarchs in their reſpective Families, and by Nature were entitled to the Command of all their Deſcendants: That there never was a Time when Men were born under no Form of Government, and left at Liberty to chuſe their own Governors: That the greater Monarchies conſiſted of Families that united for their common Defence; or were founded in Conqueſt, ſome powerful Chief reducing his weaker Neighbours under his Power. 1637. 13 Car. I.

And from theſe ſeveral Principles and Notions of Government, the one were for reducing their King to the Condition of a Subject, and the other for maintaining his Prerogative; though the latter held alſo, that the King ought to govern according to ſuch Laws and Statutes as had been granted, or enacted by his Predeceſſors.

The one looked upon the King's Prerogatives only as Conceſſions of the People, and conferred on him for the publick Good; while the other held, our Princes were originally abſolute, limited by no Laws whatever; and that the Laws and Statutes of the Realm were only Grants that our Kings conſented to, at the Inſtance of their People; Or, in few Words, the one were for eſtabliſhing a Republican Form of Government, and the other for ſupporting the Monarchy. The latter were much the moſt numerous, and would have carried their Point, if the Republicans had not been ſupported by their Brethren of Scotland and Holland, who agreed exactly, both in Principles of Religion and Government, with our Malcontents at home. The Dutch and the French had alſo their Ends to ſerve, in fomenting our Diviſions; and all together found Means to ſubvert our antient Form of Government, though there were not One in Ten, of the Engliſh Nation, Enemies to Monarchy in thoſe Days, any more than they are at preſent.

Lilburn's Proſecution.

The Trial of JOHN LILBURN and JOHN WHARTON, for printing and publiſhing ſeditious Books, before the Court of Star-Chamber, 9 Feb. 1637. 13 Car. I.

1637. 13 Car. I.

Scarce any Appearance of a Trial.

I Am aſhamed to find between twenty and thirty Pages in Folio of ſuch wretched Stuff bound up with the State Trials. This ſeems to have been done purely to encreaſe the Bulk, and inhance the Price, of a Work too voluminous already; therefore I ſhall reduce theſe Proceedings into a very narrow Compaſs. The Editor indeed, is ſo good to tell us this Piece was written by Enthuſiaſtick John himſelf; but, if he had not, it is impoſſible any one could have thought otherwiſe.

Lilburn's own Account of his Proſecution.

John relates, that he was betrayed into a Meſſenger's Hands by a pretended Friend of his: That he was committed to the Gatehouſe, and then removed to the Fleet: That being brought before the Attorney-General, he was examined concerning his importing ſome of Doctor Baſtwick's ſeditious Books from Holland, of which one Chillington had accuſed him; and that he had a great deal of idle Diſcourſe afterwards with the Attorney's Clerk, who would have examined him about other Matters, foreign to the Purpoſe, but he refuſed to anſwer any further, or to ſet his Hand to what he had ſaid, and thereupon was remanded to the Fleet.

About ten Days after he was brought to the Star-Chamber Office, to enter his Appearance, and to be examined again; and required to take an Oath, That he ſhould true Anſwer make to all Things that were demanded of him; which he refuſed to take, or to pay the Fees for entering his Appearance; whereupon he was remanded to the Fleet again.

That he was afterwards had before the Court of Star-Chamber, and charged with refuſing to enter his Appearance, or take the Star-Chamber Oath: And the Affidavit of Edmund Chillington was read againſt him, and his Fellow-Priſoner, John Wharton; importing, that they had printed, at Rotterdam in Holland, Doctor Baſtwick's Anſwer, his Litany, and divers other ſcandalous Books,

1637. 13 Car. I.

Books, and conveyed them over to England. Then he was urged to take the Oath again; but he refuſed it, as an unlawful Oath. Old Wharton, his Fellow-Priſoner, alſo refuſed the Oath, exclaiming againſt the Cruelty of the Biſhops, and telling the Court they had five Times ſent him to Priſon, within two Years, for refuſing the like Oath: Then they were both committed to the Fleet again for their Contempt.

Both of them being brought before the Star-Chamber three or four Days after, they refuſed ſtill to take the Oath; and another Affidavit was read againſt them, importing, That they had ſent over ſeveral more ſeditious and libellous Books from Holland; which the Priſoners denyed, but would not ſwear it; and Wharton began to revile and rail at the Biſhops, both of them aſcribing this Proſecution to Epiſcopal Influence. Whereupon the Court proceeded to cenſure the Priſoners, and adjudged, That they ſhould be remanded to the Fleet, there to remain till they conformed themſelves to the Orders of the Court; that they ſhould, each of them, pay a Fine of 500*l.* and give Security for their good Behaviour before they were enlarged; that Lilburn ſhould be whipped from the Fleet to the Pillory; and that both of them ſhould be ſet in the Pillory, in ſuch Place as the Court ſhould direct, (which was afterwards ordered to be in New-Palace-Yard, Weſtminſter.)

Sentence againſt the Priſoners for their Contempt, in not anſwering the Court, &c.

Lilburn (according to his Sentence) ſays, he was whipped on the 18th of April, (being faſtned to a Cart) from the Fleet to Palace-Yard; and the Lords of the Star-Chamber, being then ſitting, ſent their Tipſtaff to him, to know if he would yet ſubmit; but he refuſed and gloried in his Suffering: Whereupon he was ſet in the Pillory for two Hours; where he gave the People an Account of his Sufferings, and the Hardſhip of his Caſe, applauding thoſe three living Martyrs, as he called them, Burton, Prynne, and Baſtwick, reviling the Biſhops, and telling the People they received their Power from the Devil, inſtead of having it from God, as they pretended; and that there was little or no Difference between Popery and the Church of England; and exhorted the People to withdraw their Necks from under that ſpiritual and antichriſtian Bondage; that they ſhould put on couragious Reſolutions, like valiant Soldiers of Jeſus Chriſt, and fight manfully his ſpiritual Battles. For his own Part, he ſaid, his Soul was filled ſo full of ſpiritual and heavenly Joy, while he ſtood in the Pillory, that he could not expreſs it with his Tongue. Then he took ſome of Baſtwick's Libels out of his Pocket, and threw them among the People; which the Court of Star-Chamber, that was ſitting in View of the Pillory, being acquainted with, ſent their Officers to order him to behave himſelf with more Decency, and ceaſe his Railing; but he anſwered, he would declare his Mind, if they hanged him up at the Hall Gate: Whereupon they ordered him to be gagged, which put an End to his ſeditious Harangue for the preſent; but being taken down from the Pillory and ungagged, he began again, and told the People, he was more than Conqueror through him that loved him. And ſuch was his Behaviour during the whole Time he was in the Hands of the Executioner, that the Court of Star-Chamber ordered him to be laid in Irons, and kept on the Common Side in the Fleet Priſon; where, he tells us, he ſhould have been ſtarved, if he had not been relieved by his Fellow-Priſoners, for his Friends were not ſuffered to come at him; and that the Hardſhips he underwent in Priſon twice threw him into a Fever, and endangered his Life.

Lilburn whipped and pilloried.

He exclaims againſt the Biſhops and the Church of England. Encourages Diviſions.

Diſperſes ſeditious Libels, while he ſtood in the Pillory.

This Man having done as much towards ſpiriting up the People to rebel againſt the Government, as any one of his Station, Reparation was ordered to be made him, for his Sufferings and Services, by the Parliament in 1641, on his Petition; and he was afterwards ordered three thouſand Pounds out of the Royaliſts Eſtates, that were confiſcated by the Rump: But he complains he never received but little of it, though he liſted himſelf in the Rebels Army, and behaved ſo well, that he was advanced to the Poſt of Lieutenant-Colonel of Dragoons. The Truth is, he grew as unquiet and mutinous under the Uſurpation, as he ever had been under his lawful Prince, and was proſecuted by the Saints, his Brethren, with more Violence than ever he was by the Star-Chamber or the Biſhops, as is evident from ſome of the ſucceeding Trials.

Remarks on Lilburn's Proſecution.

It ſeems the Saints of thoſe Days thought it their Duty to oppoſe and revile their Governors in Church and State; and, in any other Country but this, Lilburn would have been hanged, for flying in the Face of Authority, and inciting the People to Rebellion, even while he was under the Hand of the Executioner.

1638. 14 Car. I. Harriſon's Trial.

The Trial of THOMAS HARRISON, of Creek, in the County of Northampton, Clerk, for a Contempt in inſulting and ſlandering Mr. Juſtice HUTTON, one of the Judges of the Common-Pleas, as he ſat upon the Bench in Weſtminſter-Hall. Before the Court of King's-Bench, in Trinity Term. 1638. 14 Car. I.

1638. 14 Car. I.

The Indictment. THE Indictment was found by a grand Jury of Middleſex, and ſet forth that the Court of Common-Pleas was an ancient Court, and Mr. Juſtice Hutton one of the Judges thereof; and that the Defendant, Thomas Harriſon, being moved by Malice, and intending to bring the ſaid Mr. Juſtice Hutton under His Majeſty's high Diſpleaſure, to the Hazard of his Life and Eſtate, and intending to diſturb the Peace of the Kingdom, and the Courts of Juſtice then ſetting; did, on the 4th of May, then laſt paſt, audaciouſly and maliciouſly ruſh to the Bar of the ſaid Court of Common-Pleas, the ſaid Mr. Juſtice Hatton, and Mr. Juſtice Crawley, then ſetting on the Bench; and, with a loud Voice, ſaid, I do accuſe Mr. Juſtice Hutton of High-Treaſon, in contempt of His Majeſty, his Crown, and Dignity, and of the Courts of Juſtice then ſetting in Weſtminſter-Hall, &c.

His Confeſſion. The Evidence produced againſt the Defendant, was his own Examination and Confeſſion under his Hand, which he acknowledged to be true in open Court: In which Examination he confeſſed, That he came to the Bar of the Court of Common-Pleas, and there publickly charged Mr. Juſtice Hutton with High-Treaſon, with denying the King's Supremacy, and with moving the People to Sedition; and being asked the Reaſon of this Charge, he anſwered, That according to common Fame, the ſaid Judge on the Saturday preceding, had delivered his Opinion in the Exchequer-Chamber, That the King had no lawful Power to levy Ship-Money, and that the People thereupon grew more ſtubborn and averſe to the Payment of Ship-Money, and that this Judge's Opinion was contrary to the Opinion of all the Orthodox Divines in the Kingdom: That the ſaid Mr. Juſtice Hutton had in his Circuit encouraged the People in their Diſobedience; and being ask'd why he made choice of this publick Way of charging the Judge, he anſwer'd, becauſe he delivered his Opinion publickly.

The Offence contained in the Indictment being thus confeſs'd, in the Examination, which the Defendant acknowledged in Court to be true, and there needing no farther Evidence; the Attorney General, after he had enlarged on the Heniouſneſs of the Crime, demanded Judgment againſt him, and the following Sentence was pronounced, viz.

Sentence againſt him. The Fine ſhould be only 5000 l.

That the Defendant ſhould pay a Fine of 50000 l. be impriſon'd during the King's Pleaſure; and, with a Paper on his Forehead expreſſing his Offence, ſhould go to all the Courts in Weſtminſter-Hall, and make his Submiſſion in every Court.

Remarks on Harriſon's Trial. From this Proceeding we may gather how violently the two great Parties in the Nation were ſet againſt each other at this time, and that the Clergy were generally on the Side of the Court. It was certainly a very great Offence to charge a Judge upon the Bench with High-Treaſon, eſpecially when there was no other Foundation for it, but his differing in Opinion from his Brethren in the Caſe of Ship-money: But, on the other hand, conſidering the Defendant was but a private Clergyman, and acknowledged his Offence, the Fine ſeems very exorbitant. The Editor of this Collection of Trials, has made it fifty thouſand Pounds; but looking into Croke's Reports, I find he has ſet down forty five thouſand Pounds too much. However, five thouſand Pounds was much more than the Defendant would ever be ſuppoſed able to pay, and conſequently was contrary to Magna Charta, as the Party that proſecuted him uſed to urge, when it was the Fortune of any of their Brethren to be charged with ſuch heavy Fines.

1640. 16 Car. I.

The Proſecution of JOHN Lord FINCH, Baron of Fordwich, and Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, for High-Treaſon, 1640 16 Car. I.

He deſires to be heard by the Houſe of Commons. A Committee of the Houſe of Commons being appointed to prepare a Charge againſt the Lord Keeper Finch, on the 14th of December, he deſired to be heard by that Houſe, before they came to any Reſolution againſt him, which was granted; and on the 21ſt of the ſame Month, the L. Keeper came to the Houſe, where a Chair was ſet for him, and a Stool to lay the Purſe on, within the Bar. However, he would not ſit down, or put on his Hat, as the Speaker deſired him; but laying the Purſe on the Chair, he made a Speech ſtanding, bareheaded all the time, the Serjeant at Arms of the Houſe ſtanding on one Side of him, with his Mace upon his Shoulder.

1640. 16 Car. I.

His Speech to the House.

The Lord Keeper first thanked the House for the Favour of hearing him; which he did not desire, he said, to preserve himself or his Fortune, but to preserve the good Opinion of that Assembly, which he valued more than all the Honours and Fortunes he was capable of: Neither did he come thither to justify his Actions or Opinions, but to give a plain Narrative of his Case, and submit it to the Wisdom and Justice of the House.

His Affection for Religion he hoped no Man doubted of, having lived near thirty Years in the Society of Gray's-Inn, and his Education and Conversation so very well known to many of them: And tho' he had been fifteen Years of the King's Council, no Man could charge him with being the Author or Adviser, or even of consenting to any one Project. That his Majesty had, indeed undeservedly, preferred him to two great Posts, that of Lord Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, and that of Keeper of his great Seal; but without his seeking, and how he had incurred the Displeasure of that House, he could not conceive; but hoped he should manifest his Innocence to their Satisfaction.

He had once the Honour, (he observed) of sitting in that Place where Mr. Speaker did; and appealed to all that knew him, if he had not served the House with Candour, and received Testimonies of their Affection for him: and the last unhappy Day he sat there, he had a great Share, he said, in the Unhappiness of it. Many of the Members could witness that no Man within those Walls, expressed more Symptoms of Sorrow, Grief, and Distraction, than he did.

That His Majesty commanded him to deliver his Pleasure to the House, that they should adjourn; and, that upon his Allegiance, he should not put any Questions that should be proposed; but, upon the Delivery of the Message, return to him again: and he humbly besought them to consider, if it had been any other Man's Case, what he could have done between the Displeasure of a gracious King, and the ill Opinion of that honourable Assembly. As for his Part, he only acted according to the Commission he received from His Majesty. He was not the Author of that Council: on the contrary, he reasoned with His Majesty, and would gladly have been excus'd from executing that ungrateful Office, desiring they would lay all his Actions together from first to last, and he should submit them to their favourable Construction. That as to the Writs for Ship-money, he was as ignorant of the issuing them, as any Member of that House. He was neither the Authorn or Adviser of them, and they were even issued without his Privity.

That the Precedents for issuing them were, indeed, brought to the Lord Chief Justice of the King's-Bench, to the chief Baron and himself, to peruse; which they did, and returned them. That after this, His Majesty demanded of them, Whether, when the whole Kingdom was in Danger, and the Kingdom in general concerned, it were not according to Law and Reason, that the whole Kingdom should join in Defence thereof?

1640. 16 Car. I.

That in Michaelmas Term, 1634, His Majesty required him to demand the Opinion of every Judge in particular, and charge them upon their Allegiance, to keep it secret; assuring them, that these Opinions should not be binding, either to themselves or the rest of his Subjects; and that they might alter them upon better Information.

That the Judges being bound by their Oaths, to counsel the King, he thought they could not refuse giving him their Advice, when he required it. They did, therefore, obey his Commands. That they were neither promised nor threatned, but left to do as their Consciences directed them; and none of them made any Doubt when they submitted their several Opinions, unless Hutton and Crooke, and even Crooke declared it to be his Opinion, That, when the whole Kingdom was in Danger, the Defence ought to be borne by all. As to Justice Hutton, he did not at all subscribe to that private Opinion, neither was he pressed to do it. This Opinion was subscribed about December, 1635, and they heard no more on this Head, till February, 1636, when His Majesty sent one of the Secretaries of State, to all the Judges assembled at Gray's-Inn, and there were great Debates amongst them concerning it. After which they subscribed their general Opinion, and returned it to His Majesty. That he gave his Opinion according to his Conscience, and used the best Arguments he could for the support of it; and then it was, that the Justices Hutton and Crooke, doubted, If the King was sole Judge of the Danger, and they only subscribed in Compliance with the Majority. That this Opinion was soon after published by the then Lord Keeper in the Star-Chamber.

That when the Matter came to be argued in the Exchequer-Chamber, there was not one Judge who did not deliver his Opinion, that it must be in a Case of apparent Danger, when the King laid such a Charge on his Subjects: But the Danger was confessed by the Demurrer.

He then declared, he said, that the King ought to govern his People by Law, and that he could not alter the Laws, but by consent of Parliament. He further declared, that if this Contribution was intended to encrease the Revenue, or bring any particular Benefit to the King, or was designed for any Thing but the Defence of the Kingdom, in a Case of Necessity, their Judgment would not warrant the Charge; entreating them to believe that he had not the least Intention to subvert, or alter the common Law of the Kingdom, or to introduce any new Way of Government.

He had heard too, he said, that there had been some ill Opinions conceived of him, concerning his Opinion for settling the Bounds of the Forests: but he professed he had no Intention to enlarge them: he had, indeed, conferred with the Gentlemen of the County of Essex, concerning the Bounds of their Forests; and produced such Records, as he thought for His Majesty's Service, leaving them to discharge themselves as they might by Law, but he never went about to overthrow the Charter of the Forest, and submitted this, and whatever elſe he had done, to the Goodneſs and Juſtice of the Houſe.

The Houſe vote him a Traitor.

The Lord-Keeper was no ſooner withdrawn, but very bitter Speeches were made againſt him: It was ſaid, that the Nation had ſeen, and felt, and ſmarted under his Cruelty: That he had recorded that pernicious Judgment in the Caſe of Ship-Money in all the Courts of the Kingdom; and was not contented with enſlaving the preſent Generation, but would have entailed Slavery on their Poſterity: And ſhould they be ſo weak, when they had been thus injured and abuſed, to be cajoled with fair Words and Compliments? Some had ſaid, they ought to remember Mercy; but there was ſuch a Thing as fooliſh Pity, and there might be a a cruel Mercy: They ought to caſt their Eyes upon that deplorable State he had brought Great Britain into, and how his Majeſty and his Subjects had been abuſed and injured by ſuch wicked Inſtruments; and not prove mercileſs to the whole Kingdom, by ſparing this great Offender.

Then the Houſe proceeded to vote the Lord Keeper Finch a Traitor: 1. For refuſing to read the Remonſtrance againſt the Lord Treaſurer Weſton, when he was Speaker, and commanded by the Houſe to read it. 2. For perſuading the Judges to give their Opinion for levying Ship-money. 3. For his Opinions and Actions relating to the Bounds of the Foreſts; and 4. For the ill Offices he had done, in perſuading his Majeſty to diſſolve the laſt Parliament, and publiſhing the Declaration, with the Reaſons for doing it.

He is impeached.

And it was reſolved to ſend the Lord Falkland with a Meſſage to the Houſe of Lords, to impeach the ſaid John Lord Finch, Baron of Fordwich, and Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England, of High-Treaſon.

Goes to Holland.

Of which Reſolutions the Lord-Keeper having Notice, withdrew the next Morning, being the 22d of December, and went over to Holland in Diſguiſe.

However, the Commons proceeded in their Impeachment; and having drawn up Articles of Impeachment againſt him, ſent them up to the Lords about the Middle of January, 1640. being of the following Tenor:

The Articles of Impeachment.

1. That the ſaid John Lord Finch, Baron of Fordwich, Lord-Keeper, &c. had traiterouſly endeavoured to ſubvert the fundamental Laws, and introduce an arbitrary, tyrannical Government.

2. That, in purſuance of his traiterous Purpoſes, he did in the third or fourth Years of his Majeſty's Reign, being then Speaker of the Commons, and contrary to the Commands of that Houſe, deny, and hinder the reading of ſome Things relating to the Safety of the King and Kingdom, and the Preſervation of Religion, and did forbid all Members to ſpeak; and ſaid, if any of them offered to ſpeak, he would riſe and go away; and did offer to riſe and go away, endeavouring, as much in him lay, to ſubvert the antient and undoubted Rights and Courſe of Parliaments.

3. That, being one of his Majeſty's Council, he endeavoured to enlarge the Foreſts, particularly in Eſſex, beyond their due Bounds, &c.

1640. 16 Car. I.

4. That, being Chief Juſtice of the Common-Pleas in the Year 1635. he drew up the Queſtions and Opinions, concerning Ship-money, and ſolicited and procured the Judges to ſign them.

5. That he ſubſcribed an extrajudicial Opinion relating to Ship-money himſelf; and preſſed the Juſtices, Crooke and Hutton, to ſign them againſt their Conſciences.

6. That he delivered his Opinion againſt Mr. Hampden in the Exchequer Chamber, in the Caſe of Ship-money; and threatened the ſaid Judges, to induce them to deliver the like Opinion; and urged Baron Denham to retract the Opinion he had given for Mr. Hampden.

7. That he publiſhed in his Circuit, that his Majeſty's Right to Ship-money was ſo inherent in the Crown, that an Act of Parliament could not take it away; and threatened all ſuch as refuſed to pay it.

8. That he did moſt of the Buſineſs of the Common Pleas in his private Chamber, and ſent Warrants into ſeveral Counties to releaſe all Perſons arreſted on Outlawries, on paying forty Shillings Fees; whereas no ſuch Perſons ought to be bailed or releaſed without a Superſedeas under Seal, or Reverſal.

9. The ninth Article charges him with perverting Juſtice, while he was Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas.

10. That he endeavoured to incenſe his Majeſty againſt Parliaments; and framed and adviſed the publiſhing the Declaration, after the Diſſolution of the Parliament.

All which Treaſons and Miſdemeanors were ſaid to be committed contrary to his Allegiance; to ſcandalize his Majeſty's Government, and alienate the Hearts of his Subjects from him; to create Diviſions between them, and to ruin and deſtroy the Realm; for which they impeached him of High-Treaſon, and of the Miſdemeanors aforeſaid.

Theſe Articles were communicated to the Lords at a Conference between the two Houſes, when Mr. St. John, Mr. Whitlock, the Lord Falkland, and Mr. Hyde, made very warm Speeches on the Occaſion; for which they received Thanks of the Commons.

Lord Falkland's Speech, on carrying up the Articles.

My Lord Falkland had the following Expreſſions in his Speech: viz. Here are many and mighty Crimes: Crimes of Supererogation, High-Treaſon being but a Part of his Charge: He was a ſilent Speaker, an unjuſt Judge, and an unconſcionable Keeper: His Offence againſt the Parliament was aggravated by his inveighing againſt the Members, by ſcandalizing their Proceedings; by trampling on their Acts and Declarations; by uſurping and devolving the Right; by diminiſhing and abrogating the Power of that and other Parliaments, and making them, as much as in him lay, both uſeleſs and odious to his Majeſty: He purſued his hatred to that Fountain of Juſtice, by corrupting the Streams of it, the Laws; and perverting and corrupting the Judges who adminiſtred it: He endeavoured to annihilate the antient and notorious Perambulations of particular Foreſts, the better to prepare himſelf for annihilating the antient and notorious Perambulation of the whole Kingdom; the Metes and Boundaries between the Liberties of the Subject and Sovereign Power, to bring all Laws from his Majesty's Courts into his Majesty's Breast: He gave our Goods to the King, our Lands to the Deer, and our Liberties to the Sheriffs; so that there was no way, by which we had not been oppressed and destroyed, if his Power had been equal to his Will; or his Majesty's Will had been equal to his Power. This was the highest kind of Parliamentary Treason: A Treason that needed not an Accumulation of many several Actions, which alone were not Treason (as the Earl of Strafford was charged by Articles carried up against him about six Weeks before): But this was a Treason, of itself, as well against the King as the Kingdom: Which took from his Majesty the Ground of Rule, the Laws, and his greatest Honour of ruling over Freemen; a Power, much nobler than that of governing Slaves and Villains; depriving his Majesty thereby of the principal Support of his Government, the Hearts and Affections of his People; a better and stronger Wall about the King than the Sea was about the Kingdom: And, by begetting a mutual Distrust, and by that a mutual Disaffection between them, hazarded the Destruction of both.

And, as it was unreasonable to suspect their Lordships Justice in any Case, so more especially here, where their Interest was so nearly concerned: Their great Share of Possessions giving them at least an equal Concern for their Properties: The noble Care of their Ancestors, in Founding and Asserting their Common Liberties, rendering their just Defence of them their proper and peculiar Inheritance, and exciting them to oppose and extirpate all such Designs as would introduce and settle an arbitrary and intolerable Form of Government, that would have made their Lordships, and their Posterity, but RIGHT HONOURABLE SLAVES.

The Judges ordered to be examined against him.

On the 30th of January the Lords ordered that such of the Judges should be examined, against the Lord Finch, as the Commons should desire, and by the same Lords that were appointed to take the Examinations against the Earl of Strafford: And on the 15th of February, a Proclamation was published, at the Instance of the Lords, to summon the Lord Finch, late Lord Keeper, to appear personally before the Lords in Parliament, to answer the Impeachment of High-Treason preferred against him by the Commons: But his Lordship remaining on the other Side of the Water till their Fury was much abated, and the Parliament having some greater Sacrifices to make, I do not perceive there were any farther Proceedings against the Lord Finch. He lived in Exile about eight Years; after which it cost him about seven thousand Pounds, by way of Composition for his Estate with the Usurpers; and he lived, not only to see the detested Murder of his Royal Master, by the same pretended Patriots, but the joyful Restoration of his Son King Charles the Second.

He lived to see the Restoration.

Remarks on the Prosecution of Lord Finch, and the rest of the Judges.

An Impeachment is said, in some Particulars, to resemble a Bill in Chancery; where the Plaintiff charges the Defendant with every Thing he can suggest, true or false, in order to discover some Thing to his own Advantage: And there may be a further View, namely, to blacken and asperse the Person accused, and his Adherents, in order to render them as odious to the World, as they are in the Eyes of them who are at the Bottom of the Prosecution; by which they hope, perhaps, to serve the Interest of their own Party in general; to gratify their private Revenge, or promote their own ambitious Projects. 1640. 16 Car. I.

If the Person impeached is guilty of half the Crimes he is usually charged with, he ought not to be suffered to live: But we are sensible Prosecutors allow themselves a great Latitude in framing Charges of this Nature. They hold it sufficient to accuse any Man upon common Fame, or on the Suggestions of an Enemy, without examining the Credibility of the Facts; in which they apprehended they do the Party no Injustice, because the Proofs are afterwards to be weighed and considered by his proper Judges: But, surely, a Man may receive great Injustice from such a Charge, though there should not be a Tittle of it true; for he may not have his Proofs always at Hand to clear his Innocence: And, if he should be acquitted, and escape with his Life, it is ten to one but his Reputation suffers; for nothing is so sure as that, where a great deal of Dirt is thrown, some will stick; and all that hear the Calumny may not be acquainted with the Force of the Defence. A Person once charged with horrid Crimes at the Bar of Justice, will suffer in his Reputation, among some People at least, how innocent soever he may be in Reality; and therefore, these general Accusations, upon little or no Evidence, surely cannot be perfectly agreeable to the Rules of Justice.

We find also in this Case, that, notwithstanding the violent Prosecution of the Lord-Keeper, and the rest of the Judges, during their first Fury, the Party contented themselves with draining their Purses: Though none of the Judges withdrew, but the Lord Finch, they proceeded against none of them capitally, but compounded the matter even with Lord Finch himself, when he returned to England again; which, surely, they would not have done, if they had really thought them those execrable Traitors, and Enemies to their Country, they had represented them in the several Articles exhibited against them.

But what is most amazing is, That Gentlemen of sound Principles, and of such Penetration as the Lord Falkland and Mr. Hyde (afterwards Lord Clarendon) appear to have been, should be so long deluded by the specious Pretences of the Faction, as to join in the Common Cry, and assist in running down the Judges and Officers of the State, and even of the Administration itself; and thereby contribute in so high a Degree to the Subversion of that Government they afterwards so bravely and zealously endeavoured to defend and support against the Faction they had thus countenanced: The Lord Falkland, we know, died fighting in the Field for his Majesty and the Constitution; and no one served the Crown with greater Fidelity than Mr. Hyde did afterwards; though it must be acknowledged, they were both, for some time, engaged very deeply with the Malcontents. 1640. 16 Car. I.

It

1637. 13 Car. I.

It has been obſerved, That the diſaffected Party uſually have the Cunning to engage ſome of the moſt deſerving and popular Men among ourſelves, in carrying on their Deſigns: They are ſuch exquiſite Hypocrites, and know how to diſguiſe their Views ſo well, that they frequently deceive even the moſt Penetrating, and draw them in to ſerve their Purpoſes, till they have ſecured their Game: Without the Aſſiſtance of thoſe, who were looked upon to be ſincerely in the Intereſt of the Church and State, they could never hurt either. The Ruin of the Kingdom in 1641. may, in a great meaſure, be aſcribed to the Friends of the Conſtitution, who were over-reached by their Enemies, and ſaw their Error too late; and if ever it be deſtroy'd again, it will probably be effected in much the ſame manner. 1637. 13 Car. I.

As to the Judges in general, who fell thus under the Cenſure of that Rebel Parliament, they ſeem, moſt of them, to be Men of as great Probity and Learning as ever ſat upon the Bench. They were proſecuted, as the Lord Strafford, Archbiſhop Laud, and the reſt of the King's Miniſters and Officers were, in order to expoſe his Majeſty's Adminiſtration, and to ſubvert the Government at leaſt. Theſe were the Views of thoſe who were at the Bottom of theſe Proſecutions; the reſt were carried away with the Stream, not reflecting on the Conſequences of their Conduct.

Earl of Strafford's Trial.

The Trial of THOMAS Earl of STRAFFORD, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and Lieutenant-General of his Majeſty's Armies, on an Impeachment of the Houſe of Commons for High-Treaſon, which was carried up to the Lords, Nov. 11. 1640. 16 Car. 1640. 16 Car. I.

Pym moves the Impeachment.

THE Parliament, which began the Grand Rebellion againſt King Charles I. meeting on the 3d of November, 1640. Mr. Pym, one of the Chief of the Faction in the Houſe of Commons, moved on the eleventh of the ſame Month, That the Doors might immediately be locked up, for he had Matters of Importance, he told them, to communicate to the Houſe; which being agreed to, he made a moſt virulent Speech againſt the Earl of Strafford; declaring, he was the greateſt Enemy to their Liberties, and the greateſt Promoter of Tyranny and Arbitrary Power, that any Age had produced; and being ſeconded by ſome Gentlemen of the ſame Party, it was reſolved to impeach the Earl forthwith of High-Treaſon: And Mr. Pym was ordered to go himſelf to the Lords, and impeach him at their Bar; and to require he might be ſequeſtred from the Houſe, and committed to ſafe Cuſtody: Which Mr. Pym with great Alacrity executed, as ſoon as he received his Orders; and the Earl of Strafford being then in the Houſe of Peers, ſome Lords cry'd out with unuſual Clamour, that the Earl ſhould withdraw; inſomuch that it was with Difficulty he obtained leave to be heard firſt in his Place.

And carries it up.

In his Speech on this Occaſion, he declared his Innocence; and deſired he might not be reſtrained of his Liberty upon a general Charge, before any one Article was exhibited againſt him: However, they reſolved, after a very ſhort Debate, that he ſhould be committed to the Black-Rod: Then the Commons made an Order, that none of their Houſe ſhould viſit the Earl, in which they were imitated by the Peers: The Lords alſo, at the Deſire of the Commons, appointed a Committee, to take the Depoſitions of the Witneſſes againſt the Earl of Strafford, in the Preſence of another Committee of the Lower-Houſe; and it was agreed, that ſuch Peers as were Witneſſes ſhould be upon their Oaths: That Privy-Councillors might give Evidence againſt him; and, that the Examinations ſhould be kept private, till the Commons thought fit to make uſe of them; and on the 25th of November, Mr. Pym carried up nine Articles againſt the Earl, of the following Tenor, (viz.)

Nine General Articles againſt the Earl.

1. That he had traiterouſly endeavoured to deſtroy the Conſtitution, and introduce an arbitrary Government.

2. That he had aſſumed Regal Power, to the undoing of many.

3. That he had converted great Part of his Majeſty's Treaſure and Revenues to his own uſe.

4. That he had abuſed his Authority, by encouraging Papiſts.

5. That he had endeavoured to create a War between England and Holland.

6. That, being Lieutenant-General of his Majeſty's Armies, he had betrayed his Majeſty's Subjects to Death, and his Army to a ſhameful Defeat at Newborne by the Scots, and ſuffered New-Caſtle to fall into their Hands, to the End England might be engaged in an irreconcileable Quarrel with the Scots.

7. That he endeavoured to incenſe his Majeſty againſt Parliaments, thereby to create Diviſions between him and his People, and deſtroy theſe Kingdoms; for which they impeached him of High-Treaſon.

8. That he committed theſe Acts while he was Lord Deputy of Ireland, Lieutenant-General of the Armies of England and Ireland, Lord Preſident, and Lieutenant-General of the North.

9. The Commons, ſaving to themſelves the Liberty of exhibiting any other Accuſation, prayed, that the Earl might be brought to Juſtice, &c.

Theſe

1640. 16 Car. I.

These general Articles seem to be sent up with no other View, than that they might have a Pretence for his being committed to the Tower, while they should hammer out more particular Articles, and fish for Witnesses to support their Charge; for on the 30th of January 1640, they sent up twenty-eight special Articles against him, in which the former seem to be comprehended.

Twenty-eight special Articles against him.

1. They charge, That the Earl, being President of the North, did on the 21st of March, 8 Car. procure a Commission, with Instructions, directed to himself and others, empowering them to determine all Misdemeanors and Offences in the North; and particularly, they were appointed to proceed according to the Course of the Star-Chamber against divers Offences; and to proceed according to the Course of the Court of Chancery concerning Lands, and grant Injunctions to the Common Law Courts: And that he exercised those Powers over the Persons and Estates of several, deprived them of their Estates and Possessions, and fined and imprisoned them, to their utter Ruin; and particularly Sir Conyers Darcy and Sir John Bourchier: That he procured Directions, that no Prohibition should be granted; and that none should be discharged on a Habeas Corpus, till they had performed their Decrees: and that in the 13th of the King he caused the Commission to be renewed, with additional Instructions.

2. That, soon after his procuring the first Commission, he declared at the Assizes at York, that since some of the Justices of Peace were all for Law, they should find the King's little Finger heavier than the Loins of the Law, in order to terrify the said Justices, that they should not execute the Laws.

3. That, in a Speech to the Nobility of Ireland, and the Corporation of Dublin, the Earl declared Ireland was a conquered Kingdom; that the King might do what he pleased with them; their Charters were worth nothing, and bound the King no farther than he pleased.

4. That Richard Earl of Cork having commenced a Suit for the Recovery of his Possessions, of which he was dispossessed by an Order of Council, the Earl threatened to imprison him, if he did not surcease his Suit; and said he would have neither the Law nor Lawyers dispute his Orders; adding, That he would make the Earl of Cork and all Ireland know, that as long as he had the Government, an Act of State should be as binding to that Kingdom as an Act of Parliament.

5. And that he did accordingly exercise his Power on the Goods, Inheritances, Liberties, and Lives of the Subjects there, to the Subversion of the Laws of that Kingdom: Particularly, that he did, in Time of full Peace, cause the Lord Mountnorris to be condemned to Death by a Council of War; and caused Sentence of Death to be pronounced against another Person (whose Name was unknown) at Dublin, and he was executed in Pursuance of it.

6. That, on a Paper Petition, he caused the said Lord Mountnorris to be disseized of his Manor of Tymore.

7. That he caused The Case of Tenures on defective Titles to be drawn up; procuring the Resolutions of the Judges thereupon; by Colour of which he caused the Lord Thomas Dillon and divers others, to be dispossessed of their Freeholds, to the Ruin of many hundred Families.

8. That on the Petition of Sir John Gifford, he made an Order against Adam Viscount Loftus, Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and, under Pretence of Disobedience to the said Order, caused him to be imprisoned, and to surrender the Great-Seal: That he imprisoned the Earl of Kildare, in order to make him submit his Title to the Manor of Castle-Leigh to his Pleasure, and kept him in Prison a Year, refusing to enlarge him, though directed to do it by his Majesty's Letters: That he caused an Order of Council to be entered against Dame Mary Hibbots, although a major Part of the Council were for the Lady; and forced her to relinquish her Estate, which was soon after conveyed to Sir Robert Meredith, to the Use of the Earl of Strafford: And that he imprisoned several others, on Pretence of Disobedience to his Orders, for pretended Debts, Titles to Lands, &c. in an arbitrary extrajudicial Course, upon Paper Petitions.

9. That he granted a Commission to several Bishops, their respective Chancellors and Officers, to commit the meaner Sort of People to Prison, who should not obey their Decrees.

10. That he farmed the Customs of Ireland, and, to advance his Gain, caused the Native Commodities to be over-rated; and the Customs, which formerly were but a twentieth Part of the Value of the Goods, were now a fourth, a fifth, and some of them a third Part of the Value.

11. That he extorted great Sums from the Subject, for Licences to export divers Sorts of Goods.

12. That he issued a Proclamation against the Importation of Tobacco, and then caused great Quantities to be imported to his own Use; and would not permit the Merchants to vend their Tobacco, unless they would let him have it at his own Price: That he issued another Proclamation, commanding all Tobacco to be seized that was not sealed by his Agents; and those on whom unsealed Tobacco was found, were fined, whipped, imprisoned, or pilloried; by which Means he gained an hundred thousand Pounds; and though he raised the Customs in other Articles, he lessened them in this, from Six-pence to Three-pence a Pound, for his own Profit; and that, by the like undue Means, he constituted divers other Monopolies.

13. That he commanded the Irish, by Proclamation, to work their Flax and Yarn into Thread, in a Manner they were unskilled in; and seized the Flax that was otherwise wrought; whereby he gained the sole Sale of that Native Commodity.

14. That he imposed an unlawful Oath on the Owners and Masters of Ships, by Proclamation, requiring them to give an Account of their Lading, their Owners, from whence they came, and whither bound.

15. That, contriving to bring the Realm of Ireland under his Tyranny, he imposed great

1640. 16 Car. I.

Sums on the Town of Baltimore, and divers other Places, which he levied by Troops of Soldiers: That particularly he impowered Robert Savile, Serjeant at Arms, and ſeveral Captains, to quarter Soldiers on ſuch of the Inhabitants as would not be conformable to his Orders: That he diſpoſſeſſed Richard Butler, and above an hundred Families, of their Eſtates by a Military Force, impriſoning the Proprietors, till he compelled them to relinquiſh their reſpective Intereſts, levying War againſt his Majeſty, and his liege People of that Kingdom.

16. That, to continue his Oppreſſions of the Subjects of Ireland, he prevailed on his Majeſty, not to ſuffer any Complaints to be received in England; and iſſued a Proclamation, prohibiting all, who had any Eſtates or Offices in Ireland, to depart the Kingdom without Licence; and impriſoned ſeveral that came over to England to complain againſt him.

17. That he affirmed, his Majeſty was ſo well pleaſed with his Army in Ireland, and the Conſequences it produced, that he would make it a Pattern for all his three Kingdoms.

18. That, in order to make the Papiſts of England and Ireland to depend on him, he reſtored ſeveral Religious Houſes to their pretended Owners; particularly two in Dublin, which had been aſſigned to the Univerſity there, which were now employed in the Exerciſe of the Popiſh Religion. That he raiſed an Army, of which ſeven thouſand were Papiſts; and that, to engage this new Army to him, he paid them duely, and permitted them to exerciſe their Religion; whereas the old Army were kept without their Pay for a whole Year: And that being a Commiſſioner for compounding Forfeitures for Recuſancy, in the Northern Counties of England, he compounded with the Recuſants there at very low Rates, and diſcharged them from all Proceſs, in order to engage them to him.

19. That he impoſed an Oath on the Subjects of Ireland, requiring them to ſwear, that they would not proteſt againſt any of his Majeſty's Commands, but ſubmit obediently to them, fining, impriſoning, and baniſhing the Refuſers; and particularly that he fined Henry Steward and his Wife 5000*l.* a-piece, and impriſoned them for Nonpayment: That he declared the ſaid Oath did not only oblige them in Point of Allegiance, but to the Ceremonies and Government of the Church eſtabliſhed, or to be eſtabliſhed by his Majeſty; and gave out that thoſe who refuſed to take it, he would proſecute to Blood.

20. That he endeavoured to create in his Majeſty an ill Opinion of the Scots, and excited him to an offenſive War againſt them, ſince the Pacification: That he was the chief Incendiary, declaring that the Scots Demands in Parliament were a ſufficient Cauſe to make War upon them: That they were Rebels and Traitors; and, if his Majeſty pleaſed, he would root them out of Ireland, except they took the Oath in the preceding Article; and that he cauſed ſeveral Scotiſh Ships to be ſeized, to engage the Kingdoms in War.

21. That, having incited his Majeſty to carry on an offenſive War againſt Scotland, he adviſed him to call a Parliament; but that if they did not concur in the Earl's miſchievous Projects, they ſhould be diſſolved, and Money raiſed on the Subjects by Force; declaring in Council, That he would ſerve his Majeſty any other way, in Caſe the Parliament did not ſupply him.

22. That he procured the Parliament of Ireland to declare they would aſſiſt the King againſt the Scots; and conſpired with Sir George Ratcliffe to employ the Army of Iriſh Papiſts he had raiſed, to the Subverſion of the Government of England; declaring that, if the Parliament would not ſupply his Majeſty, he was at Liberty to uſe his Prerogative for what he needed; and that he would be acquitted both by God and Man for ſo doing.

23. That, the laſt Parliament taking the Grievances of the Kingdom into Conſideration, the Earl and Archbiſhop Laud adviſed his Majeſty, by ſeveral Speeches and Meſſages, to urge the Commons to grant a Supply for the War againſt Scotland, before they entered on their Grievances: And that a Demand being made by his Majeſty, of twelve Subſidies, in Lieu of Ship-money; while the Commons were debating on the Supply, the ſaid Earl and the Archbiſhop moved his Majeſty to diſſolve that Parliament, and the Earl then incenſed his Majeſty againſt the Members, telling him, they had denied to ſupply him; and that his Majeſty having tried the Affections of his People, and been refuſed, he was abſolved from all Rules of Government; and that he had an Army in Ireland, which he might employ to reduce this Kingdom.

24. That he falſly declared to others of the Privy-Council, that the Parliament having forſaken the King, and denied him a Supply, they had given him an Advantage to ſupply himſelf by ſuch other Ways as he ſaw fit; and that he was not to ſuffer himſelf to be maſtered by the Frowardneſs of his People. And that the Earl, the Archbiſhop, and the Lord-Keeper Finch, publiſhed a ſcandalous Book in his Majeſty's Name, entitled, The Cauſes that moved his Majeſty to diſſolve the laſt Parliament, full of bitter Invectives againſt the Commons.

25. That he adviſed the levying of Ship-money, and procured the Sheriffs to be proſecuted for not levying it, and ſeveral to be impriſoned for not paying it; and adviſed, that the Lord-Mayor of London, the Aldermen, &c. ſhould be ſummoned before the Council, to give an Account of their Proceedings in levying Ship-money, and concerning the Loan of an hundred thouſand Pounds demanded of them by the King; and on their refuſing to certify who were fit to lend, the Earl ſaid, they deſerved to be fined; there was no good to be done with them till they were laid by the Heels, and ſome of the Aldermen hanged up.

26. That he cauſed 130000*l.* belonging to his Majeſty's Subjects and Foreigners, to be ſeized in the Mint; and when it was repreſented what a Prejudice this would be to the Kingdom, ſaid, that the City had dealt undutifully, and were readier to help the Rebels than his Majeſty; and that it was the Practice of other Princes to uſe ſuch Money to ſerve their Occaſions: That the French King uſed to ſend Commiſſaries of Horſe to take Account of Men's Eſtates, and levy Money on them by Force; and, and, directing his Diſcourſe to the Lord Cottington, ſaid, this was a Courſe worthy to be conſidered by his Lordſhip.

1640. 16 Car. I.

27. That, being Lieutenant-General in the North, he impoſed a Tax of Eight-pence a Day for every Soldier of the Militia in that County, and levied it by Force, declaring, that thoſe who refuſed it, were guilty of little leſs than High-Treaſon.

28. That, receiving Advice of the Scotiſh Army's bending its March towards England, he did not provide for the Defence of Newcaſtle, but ſuffered it to fall into their Hands, to inceniſe the Engliſh againſt the Scots; and in order to engage the two Nations in a bloody War, he ordered the Lord Conway to fight the Scots at the Paſſage of the Tine; though he had repreſented, he had not Force ſufficient to encounter them; whereby he betrayed his Majeſty's Army to apparent Danger and Loſs: All which the Earl had done, with an Intent to create a Diviſion between his Majeſty and his People, and to deſtroy him and his Kingdoms; and for which they impeached him of High-Treaſon.

The Earl's Anſwer to the ſaid twenty-eight Articles was in Subſtance as follows:

The Earl's Anſwer.

1. TO the Firſt, the Earl anſwered, That the Commiſſion directed to him and others, to hear and determine Offences in the North, did not differ from former Commiſſions: That he believed Sir Conyers Darcy and Sir John Bouchier were legally fined; but he was then in Ireland; and denies that he did any Thing, but what he might legally do, by Virtue of that Commiſſion.

2. He denies he ſpoke the Words charged in the ſecond Articles, but had ſaid, The little Finger of the Law was heavier than the King's Loins.

3. He denies the Words charged in this Article, but might ſay, The Charters of Dublin did not bind his Majeſty.

4. That the Proceedings at the Council-Table of Ireland have ever been by Petitions, Anſwers, &c. and they have always puniſhed Contempts to their Orders by Fine and Impriſonment; and believes he might tell the Earl of Cork he would impriſon him, if he diſobeyed the Orders of the Council-Table.

5. That the Deputies and Generals of the Army have always executed Martial Law in Ireland; and the Army there was governed by printed Orders: And the Lord Mountnorris being a Captain in the Army, was ſentenced to Death by a Council of War, conſiſting of twenty Officers, for mutinous Words, and Breach of Orders; in which the Earl was no Judge, but afterwards procured his Pardon; and Lord Mountnorris ſuffered no perſonal Dammage, unleſs two Days Impriſonment.

6. To the ſixth he ſaith, That calling the Lord Chancellor and the Maſter of the Rolls to his Aſſiſtance, upon hearing the Cauſe mentioned in this Article, a Decree was made for the Plaintiff; and the Lord Mountnorris might thereupon be put out of Poſſeſſion.

7. To the ſeventh, That the Lord Dillon conſented to the ſtating of the Caſe mentioned in this Article, and the Judges delivered their Opinions thereupon; but that neither he, nor any one, were bound thereby, or put out of Poſſeſſion.

1640. 16 Car. I.

8. He ſays that a Decree was made by the Privy-Council of Ireland againſt the Lord Loftus; and, on an Appeal to the King and Privy-Council of England, that Decree was confirmed; and for Diſobedience to that Decree, and Continuance of his Contempt, he was committed cloſe Priſoner, and the Great-Seal delivered up by his Majeſty's Command. And that an Information being exhibited againſt the Lord Loftus, in the Star-Chamber, for his Oppreſſions, as Chancellor, he ſubmitted, deſiring he might be an Object of his Majeſty's Mercy. That the Earl of Kildare was committed for not performing an Award, made by King James, and an Award in Purſuance thereof by the Earl of Strafford; and a Letter being unduely obtained, he was not diſcharged thereupon; but upon another Letter, and making a Submiſſion, he was enlarged. That the Lady Hibbots, and Hoy her Son, having made a fraudulent Bargain with the Petitioner Hibbots, for Lands of great Value, was ordered by the Council to deliver up the Writings, no Aſſurances being made, or Money paid; and believes ſhe might be threatened to be committed, if ſhe diſobeyed that Order; but denies the Lands were conveyed to Sir Robert Meredith for his Uſe; or that any one had been impriſoned by an Order made by himſelf, in a Caſe of Freehold; though he admits they may have been for Debts and perſonal Things, as had been practiſed by his Predeceſſors.

9. That ſuch Warrants, or Commiſſions, as are mentioned in this Article, have been granted to Biſhops by his Predeceſſors; but that he never granted more than one, and finding it complained of, had recalled it.

10. To the Tenth he ſaith, That the Lord Treaſurer Portland offered the Farm of the Cuſtoms for 13000*l.* per Ann. and to the Earl had advanced them to 15500*l.* per Ann. beſides 8000*l.* Fine: That, by his Majeſty's Command, he became a Farmer at thoſe Rates, without Addition; that he diſſuaded the Advancement of the Rates, and it was declined: That the Rates of Hides and Wool were moderate, and the Trade of Shipping mightily encreaſed in his Time.

11. To the Eleventh, That his Majeſty, to reſtrain the Deſtruction of Timber, had laid a Duty of thirty Shillings, and afterwards of three Pounds, per Thouſand upon Pipe-Staves exported; which was paid to the King's Uſe, but the Earl had loſt 4 or 500*l.* per Ann. by it, which was paid to his Predeceſſors, for Licence to export them.

12. To the Twelfth he ſaith, That the Revenue of Ireland falling ſhort of the Expences of the Government, 24000*l.* per Ann. the Commons petitioned the Duties on Tobacco might be applied to the Encreaſe of the Revenue, which was conſented to: That the Earl had lent Money to forward the Buſineſs, and, by his Majeſty's Allowance, was a Partner, but had yet made no Advantage thereby; and knew no whipping, or other Puniſhment, for Non-payment of the Duties. That the Farms of the Cuſtoms were advanced 2000*l.* per Ann. and five Eights. That the Price of Tobacco

1640. 16 Car. I. was two Shillings and Four-pence per Pound; and he had not raiſed it, or countenanced any Monopoly.

13. To this Article, he ſaith, That he choſe to advance the Linnen Manufacture there, rather than the Woollen, becauſe the latter might prejudice England: That he imported great Quantities of Flax, and ſold it without any Profit, to encourage the Natives, the Soil being very proper for it: That he had ſet up abundance of Looms, and ſold a great deal of Cloth to Loſs; but, when they would not be brought to change the old Way of working their Flax for a better, that Manufacture declined.

14. That the Proclamation mentioned in this Article, was ſet forth by the Council of State, to prevent Frauds in the King's Duties; and the Oath enjoined, was approved by the Judges.

15. That the Iriſh Agents in the Time of his Predeceſſors, had agreed to pay 120,000 l. towards the Maintenance of the Army, and that the Money ſhould be levied by Captains, by Paper Aſſignments, upon Warrants from the ſaid Deputy; but this was continued only part of a Year in his Time, and he was confident no Force was uſed in levying it; and that neither Richard Butler, or any other Family, were evicted from their Eſtates.

16. To the Sixteenth, he ſays, That, by the Laws of Ireland, none can depart that Kingdom without Licence: However, he had denied his Licence but to three, and that upon very good Reaſons.

17. To the Seventeenth, That he might ſay to the Soldiers of the old Iriſh Army, that the King was ſo well pleaſed with the Exerciſe of their Arms, that he would make them a Pattern for others to imitate.

18. To the Eighteenth, That when the Earl of Cork was one of the Lords Juſtices, he ſeized ſome Houſes in Dublin, on pretence of their belonging to Jeſuits and Friars, without legal Proceſs; and that Suits being commenced for them at the Council Board, they were reſtored to the Owners; but how they had been employed ſince, the Earl knew not: That he left the Care of raiſing the 8000 Men, mentioned in that Article, to the Earl of Ormonde, and believed they could not be raiſed without many Papiſts among them, though moſt of the Officers were Proteſtants; and in the old Army he never made one Officer that was not a Proteſtant; and gave Directions that the common Soldiers ſhould be all ſuch, and he believes they have been duely paid. And the new raiſed Men exerciſed their Religion in no other Manner than was practiſed in the Times of his Predeceſſors. That in his Compoſitions with the Recuſants in the North of England, he brought their Forfeitures from 2300 l. to 12000 l. per Annum within four Years; and that they had no other Privileges than what they had formerly.

19. To the Nineteenth, he ſaith, he admits that an Oath was tendered to the Scots in Ulſter, who were near an hundred thouſand Men; it being ſuſpected they would join their Brethren the Covenanters; and that it was taken by all of that Nation in Ireland, ſome few excepted, who were cenſured for their Refuſal; but that there was nothing in it relating to the Government of the Church. 1640. 16 Car. I.

20. To the Twentieth, he ſaith, he acknowledges he thought it convenient an Army ſhould be raiſed againſt the Covenanters, but adviſed the conſulting the Parliament in it: That the Scots Demands being conſidered by the Council, before the Parliament met, it was unanimouſly agreed, That they were ſuch as might not in Honour, or Safety be granted; and that, if they could not be reduced otherwiſe, His Majeſty might do it by Force; and His Majeſty was adviced to borrow 200,000 l. till the Parliament ſat; and he might ſay, that thoſe who raiſed Forces in that Kingdom, were no better than Traitors and Rebels; and that he ſeized ſeveral Scots Ships by Warrant from the Lord Admiral, in order to bring them to Terms of Accommodation.

21. To the Twenty-firſt, That the Pacification was broken before he came into England; and that he moved for the calling a Parliament, in order to procure a good Underſtanding between the King and his People, and not with the Intent this Article ſuggeſts; and he might ſay, If the Parliament refuſed a Supply, he would ſerve his Majeſty in any other lawful Way.

22. He denies the Words charged in this Article; but ſays, he did repreſent the State of his Majeſty's Affairs to the Parliament of Ireland, and they readily gave him four Subſidies: That he alſo raiſed eight thouſand Men, by his Majeſty's Orders, who were ſent to ſecure Ulſter, or land in Scotland, to divert the Earl of Argyle, in caſe he declared for the Covenanters.

23. To this Article he ſaith, He admits, that it being debated in Council, what might move the Parliament to grant a Supply, he did adviſe, that his Majeſty ſhould lay down Ship-money, and promiſe never to demand it again and to redreſs their other Grievances; and that he adviſed his Majeſty to accept eight Subſidies: That the Earl drew up a Meſſage of this Tenor in Writing, and it was given to Sir Henry Vane, to deliver to the Houſe of Commons, but he did no know whether Sir Henry delivered it or not: But that, the Houſe having debated the Supply two Days, and come to no Reſolution, his Majeſty called a Council the Fifth of May; to which the Earl coming in late, was informed the King had declared his Reſolution of diſſolving the Parliament; and Sir Henry Vane declaring there was no Hopes the Parliament would give the King a Penny; the Earl ſuppoſing the aboveſaid Meſſage had been delivered to the Commons, did, in his Turn, give his Vote for diſſolving the Parliament, as Sir Henry Vane, and the reſt of the Lords of the Council, had done, to the Number of Twenty, (two or three excepted.) That the Parliament being diſſolved, and the King demanding of the Council how Money might be raiſed, now the Scots were upon the Point of entring the Kingdom, the Earl declared, he was of Opinion, That in a Caſe of abſolute Neceſſity, His Majeſty was abſolved from ordinary Rules, and might uſe all moderate Ways and Means for the Defence of himſelf and the Kingdom; for he conceived, in ſuch Extremity, Salus populi was Suprema Lex: That he gave his Opinion, as he was bound to do by his Oath of a Privy-Councillor, and not officiouſly; neither did he ſpeak the Words mentioned in this Article, or any other to that Effect.

1640. 16 Car. I.

24. To the Twenty-fourth he ſaith, He gave his Opinion with the Reſtrictions mentioned in the laſt Article: That he had no ill Intentions towards the Parliament, or knew of the publiſhing the Book mentioned in this Article.

25. To the Twenty-fifth, That Ship-money was adjudged and levied before his coming to England; nor did he promote the Proſecuting the Refuſers in the Star-Chamber; that he had ſaid at the Council-Board, that the Sheriffs ought to be fined for not executing the King's Writs; which was done with an Intention to quicken them, and not with a Deſign they ſhould be proſecuted: And denies the reſt of the Words mentioned in this Article.

26. To the Twenty-ſixth he ſaith, He adviſed neither of the Projects mentioned in this Article. That the Merchants deſiring him to move his Majeſty to releaſe the Bullion, he refuſed to meddle with it; telling them, they might thank themſelves, if, by denying the King the Loan of a 100,000*l.* in that Time of Danger, they had compelled him to ſeize the Bullion; and that the Earl of Leiceſter obſerving, that Commiſſioners were appointed to inſpect the Merchants Shop-Books at Paris, and tax every Man according to his Ability, he did ſay, They might bleſs God they were not ſubject to ſuch a King in England: But denies ſpeaking the Words ſpecified in this Article, expreſſing his Concern, that his Words ſhould conſtantly be miſrepreſented.

27. To this Article he ſays, That the Gentry of Yorkſhire agreed to allow the Trained-Bands a Month's Pay; and it was ordered, by his Majeſty and the great Council of Peers, when any of thoſe Regiments were permitted to return home, they that ſent them out ſhould contribute to the Charge of the reſt; and this was levied by Warrants from the Earl and his Deputy-Lieutenants, and leſſened the Charge of the County: And denied the reſt of the Charge in this Article.

28. To the laſt Article he anſwered, That he was Lieutenant-General to the Earl of Northumberland, and that the Lord Conway having twelve thouſand Foot and two thouſand Horſe under his Command, near Newcaſtle, and his Majeſty having given Orders for oppoſing the Paſſage of the Scots over the Tine, the Earl ſent the Lord Conway a Letter from York the 27th of Auguſt, adviſing him to march with eight thouſand Foot, and all his Horſe and Artillery, and defend that Paſſage; but before the Lord Conway had received that Letter, he had placed himſelf there with only fifteen hundred Foot and Part of the Horſe: That the Earl had no Charge of the Army; till the 30th of Auguſt, when he brought it to York, and deſigned to have remained there with the Army, had he not received Advice from ſeveral Hands, that there was a Deſign to proſecute him in Parliament, which induced him to leave the Army under the Lord Conway, and come to London; adding, that Newcaſtle was not under his Care: And as to the reſt of the Matters contained in the ſaid Articles, he was not guilty; praying he might have Time to produce his Proofs and Vouchers in his Defence.

1640. 16 Car. I.

This Anſwer being delivered in the 23d of February, and communicated to the Commons, they reſolved not to reply, but join Iſſue on the Anſwer: Whereupon it was reſolved by the Lords, that the Trial ſhould be on the 22d of March, in Weſtminſter-Hall; and the Commons appointed the following Members to be their Managers, (viz.) George Lord Digby, John Hampden, John Pym, Oliver St. John, Jeoffry Palmer, John Maynard, John Glyn, Eſquires, and Sir Walter Earle, Knight.

Iſſue joined.

Managers appointed.

The Lords coming down from their Houſe to the Court erected in Weſtminſter-Hall, on Monday 22. March 1640. the Earl of Strafford was brought to the Bar by Sir William Balfour, Lieutenant of the Tower: After which the Twenty-eight ſpecial Articles, and the Earl's Anſwer to them, were read.

The Trial begins.

Then Mr. Pym opened the Charge againſt the Earl, acquainting their Lordſhips, that he was appointed to take off thoſe Vizards and Appearances of Truth, which were contained in the Preamble of the Priſoner's Anſwer. (But it is obſervable that Mr. Ruſhworth, that partial Collector, from whom this Trial is taken, has omitted that Preamble; and the Faction were ſo induſtrious to ſuppreſs it, that it never could be recovered, any more than the Speech the Earl made in his Defence, of which Mr. Ruſhworth gives no more than an Abſtract, though he omits nothing of the Charge; and the Speech alſo is now irrecoverably loſt. We muſt be content, therefore, with ſo much of his Defence as his Enemies have been pleaſed to communicate to us. But to proceed.)

Mr. Pym opens the Charge.

Mr. Pym having endeavoured to anſwer the Preamble to the Earl's Anſwer, the Witneſſes were produced, to prove the Facts, the Earl aſſerted therein, were not true; and firſt Sir Pierce Crosby was ſworn, to whoſe Teſtimony the Earl objected that he had been cenſured in the Star-Chamber, for endeavouring to ſubborn Witneſſes againſt him (the Earl): That he broke out of the Fleet Priſon, to which he was committed, and never appeared publickly till now, when he was brought to give Evidence againſt him, or rather againſt the Court of Star-Chamber that cenſured him: Whereupon, ſome of the Lords moving to adjourn the Managers, agreed to wave his Teſtimony for the preſent; but ſaid, they would bring him again another Day; for they did not apprehend that he was charged with any thing that could invalidate his Teſtimony.

The Witneſſes produced.

Sir John Clotworthy was ſworn next, and depoſed, That, having voted againſt a Bill in the Houſe of Commons, in Ireland, Sir George Ratcliffe, a Relation of the Earl's, threatned to deprive him of a Leaſe he was poſſeſſed of; and that Sir Pierce Crosby alſo having ſpoken againſt a Bill, Sir George Ratcliffe ſaid to him, That was not Privy-Councillor like.

Lord Ranelagh depoſed, That Sir Pierce Crosby having voted againſt a Bill, tranſmitted by the Deputy and Council, was ſequeſtred from the Council, by the Advice of that Board, and did not know but this might proceed from the ſaid Deputy's Motion, it being moſt proper for him.

Lord Mountnorris depoſed, That Sir Pierce was ſequeſtred from the Council Table, on a Complaint made by Sir George Ratcliffe, touching his voting; and it was done by a Majority of the Council, of whom the Lord Deputy was one.

Sir Nicholas Barnwell depoſed, that he, (the Deponent,) voting for the old Boroughs, which had been ſequeſtred from the Houſe on Account of a Judgment againſt them in the Exchequer-Chamber, Sir George Ratcliffe threatned to quarter 5000 Men upon him; but the Lord Deputy was not then in the Kingdom.

Mr. Egor depoſed, That the City of Dublin was compelled to pay 55 l. a Month to be exempted from quartering of Horſe, which was thought a Grievance, and contrary to their Charter: But, being asked if the Lord Deputy's Horſe and Foot-Guards were not billeted there before his Time, he anſwered, That the Foot were, but the Horſe only for a Month at a Time, or ſo; and it was never drawn into a Matter of Money.

A Remonſtrance of the Houſe of Lords of Ireland was produced next, to prove that the Earl had endeavoured to ſubvert the Laws, and corrupt the Adminiſtration of Juſtice: To which the Earl objected, That this was a Matter fallen out ſince his Impeachment; and that it was procured by a Faction, as he ſhould ſhew hereafter. The Managers replied, he ought not to be allowed to charge the Commons with Faction and Conſpiracy, and demanded their Lordſhip's Juſtice. The Earl, thereupon, ſaid, he had no Intention to reflect on the Commons of England, or Ireland; but upon ſome that were not Members of either Houſe.

Upon reading the Remonſtrance, the Managers obſerved, That all the Earl's glorious Declarations of his own Merits, were confuted, and Sir Edward Warder was next produced, to prove that Ireland bore its own Charges, before the Earl's Adminiſtration; and the Lord Mountnorris, and Sir Robert Pye, gave Evidence in order, to the ſame Effect.

Whereupon the Earl demanded, if the conſtant Charge of the Government did not exceed the conſtant Revenue when he came thither? The Managers admitted it did; but ſaid, that Deficiency was ſupplied by a Loan of 120,000 l. from that County; ſo that nothing went from England: To which the Earl replied, That, notwithſtanding that Loan, the Crown was indebted near 100,000 l. when he went thither.

Sir Adam Loftus, the Vice-Treaſurer, was ſworn next, and depoſed, That the Earl made uſe of 24000 l. of the King's Money, notwithſtanding His Majeſty's Neceſſities, but that it was repaid about three Months ſince; which, the Managers obſerved, was ſince this Proſecution began: And they inſiſted, that if the Earl would anſwer any Thing that had been alledged againſt him, he ſhould do it preſently. To which the Earl ſaid, That the Remonſtrance, and ſome other Things, having been produced in Evidence againſt him, which he did not expect, he deſired he might have Time to recollect himſelf; but was told, the Commons did not preſs theſe Things as Matter of Crime, but to confute the Untruths in the Preamble to his Anſwer; and therefore, there needed no farther Time to anſwer theſe Particulars. 1640. 16 Car. I.

Whereupon, the Earl entered immediately on the Defence of the Preamble to his Anſwer: And firſt, as to that Part of it, which ſhewed that many good Laws had been made in Ireland, by his Means, he obſerved, that was not denied directly, only it had been retorted upon him, that good Laws were of no uſe where an arbitrary Government was ſet up againſt the Laws; but, as this was part of the enſuing Charge, he ſhould ſpeak to it hereafter. The Earl defends the Preamble to his Anſwer.

And though it was objected there had been but two Parliaments in his Time, it was evident there had not been ſo many in fifty Years before: And he ſtill inſiſted, he had never been concerned in any Monopolies, but always diſcouraged them: And it was ſufficiently evident now, that his Commiſſion was not more extenſive than his Predeceſſors.

It appeared alſo, that the Revenue of Ireland fell ſhort; and there was a Neceſſity of a Contribution, to ſupply the Deficiencies: That the Crown was 100,000 l. in Debt when he went thither; and he left 100,000 l. in the King's Coffers when he came away, having laid out conſiderable Sums beſides in Purchaſes for the Crown: (Indeed, the Commons acknowledged that the Revenue had been encreaſed; but ſuggeſted that it had been done by indirect Means.) And they ſaid it was not true, that Ireland did not ſupport itſelf when he came thither; for, what was deficient in the Revenue, it appeared, was raiſed by Contributions in that Kingdom: To which the Earl replied, That what he meant, was, that the conſtant Revenue was not ſufficient then; whereas it was now, though 600 Horſe were added to the Army.

And, as to his uſing 24000 l. of the King's Money, he had the King's Warrant to make uſe of 40000 l. for three Years at a Time, when there was a Surpluſage of 100,000 l. in the Treaſury; and that it appeared he had repaid it before the Time appointed: And that, while he had it, there was the Value of 40,000 l. left in the Comptroller's Hands, as a Security, purſuant to the Warrant. However, by an Order from the Commons of Ireland, (by what Law he knew not) his Magazines were ſeized, his Goods taken away, and given to others, to ſell at their own Price; and his Servants and People impriſoned, as if he had been already convicted of Treaſon.

That he had not only cauſed the Goods and Poſſeſſions of the Church to be reſtored, as he affirmed in the Preamble to his Anſwer; but procured an Act of Parliament to prevent their being waſted or embezzled for the Future: Nor was there any Proof of his cauſing theſe Reſtitutions to be made by illegal Methods, as had been ſuggeſted. He ſtill inſiſted, he had prefered many deſerving Men in the Church; and, that the Number of Proteſtants was greatly encreaſed in Dublin, ſince his Adminiſtration; which which the Managers did not now controvert.

He obſerved further, that it ſeemed to be admitted he had preferred none but Proteſtant Officers: And as to the quartering of Soldiers in Dublin, it appeared that former Deputies had their Guards quartered there.

It was manifeſt alſo, that the Shipping of Ireland was vaſtly encreaſed; there being now an hundred Tons to one there was when he arrived there; and the Cuſtoms were advanced from thirteen to forty thouſand Pounds per Annum.

He admitted Sentences had paſſed againſt ſome Jurors in the Star-Chamber, for going contrary to plain Evidence; however, he had but one Voice there, and thoſe Sentences appeared to be founded upon the greateſt Reaſon; for, unleſs a ſtrict Hand were kept over the Natives, their Prieſts would lead them as they pleaſed; it is plain they did not, or rather would not, underſtand the Evidence.

That as to what had been ſuggeſted of his wronging his Majeſty of 5 or 6000*l. per Ann.* in the Cuſtoms, he ſhould make it appear, when he came to anſwer that Article, that he had made a very advantageous Bargain for the Crown. And thus having gone through the Preamble to his Anſwer, he obſerved, that the Evidence of Sir John Clotworthy and the Lord Ranelagh did not concern him; that the Evidence of other Witneſſes, related to what had been ſpoken when he was out of the Kingdom; and, indeed, that Sir George Ratcliffe, and not he, was affected by their Teſtimony.

That he had Witneſſes to prove, that the Preamble to the Act for the four Subſidies, was the general Vote of the Houſe of Commons, and never excepted to till he was impeached; and the Reaſon of excluding Sir Pierce Crosby from the Board, was, his having voted for the Bill in Council, and ſet his Hand to the Tranſmiſſion, and afterwards voted againſt it in the Houſe.

The Managers, in their Reply to the Earl, ſeemed to admit a great deal of what he had affirmed, in the Defence of the Preamble to his Anſwer, to be true; but obſerved, That if the Charge ſtill remained in Force, as they conceived it did, the Services he had done could not mitigate his Crimes; that if it were true, that he himſelf had not encroached on the Privileges of Parliament; yet if, under his Government, thoſe Privileges had been invaded by others, he could lay no great Claim to Merit: And as to the Earl's Obſervation, that many Things were not proved, they only deferred producing that Part of their Evidence till they came to the Articles: That if he had oppoſed Monopolies, he might do it for ſiniſter Ends; and doing his Duty in one Inſtance would not compenſate for his Neglect of it in another. They concluded, that what they had forborne to reply to in the Preamble, would be made good in the Charge; and then the Court adjourned.

Art. 1. The Peers being aſſembled again in Weſtminſter-Hall, the 24th of March, and the Earl brought to the Bar, Mr. Serjeant Maynard opened the firſt Article of the Impeachment, relating to the Alteration of his Commiſſion, as Lord-Preſident of the North; to prove which ſeveral Parts of the Commiſſion was read: And afterwards John Gore was ſworn, who depoſed, that in November 1632, his Father, Sir Thomas Gore, was arreſted at London, by a Serjeant at Arms, for a Contempt to the Court of the Preſident and Council of York; and he appealing to the Privy-Council, the Earl of Strafford fell on his Knees, and beſought the King, that if he had not Power to bring in a Delinquent, who affronted the Court, upon his ſtepping out of the Precincts of its Juriſdiction, he might leave that Service, and lay his Bones in his own Cottage; and that his Father was afterwards detained eighteen Weeks in Cuſtody.

1640. 16 Car. I.

Other Witneſſes depoſed, that the Earl would not ſuffer Prohibitions in the North; and cauſed ſuch Perſons as brought them to be ſummoned before the Preſident and Council there, and committed to Priſon.

The Managers having finiſhed their Evidence on this Article, and the Earl being ordered to proceed in his Defence, he deſired he might retire and peruſe his Notes; but they would only give him leave to look over them at the Bar; which the Managers told him was a Favour. The Earl anſwered, the Caſe was different where a Man was impeached for a known Treaſon, and where he was to anſwer ſuch a mixed Charge; and he thought it very ſtrange that when a Thouſand Miſdemeanors would not make one Felony, twenty-eight Miſdemeanors ſhould amount to High-Treaſon. As they were acknowledged ſeparately to be but Miſdemeanors, he ought to have had the Benefit of Counſel, and his Witneſſes examined upon Oath: But he, under Pretence that theſe Miſdemeanors amounted to Treaſon together, was debarred of thoſe Privileges, and had not been ſuffered to ſummon his Witneſſes till the Friday before; though the Facts he was charged with were, great Part of them, ſaid to be done in Ireland.

And, in Anſwer to this Article, he ſhewed he did not procure the Clauſes they found fault with in the Commiſſion; but that the King's Council, on receiving the Commiſſion, uſually inſerted what they conceived might conduce to his Majeſty's Service; and it was approved by the Lord-Chancellor before it was ſealed. And as to the Execution of it, he had never done one Act in Purſuance of it, ſince it was made, being moſt of the Time abſent in Ireland; however, the Preſident and Council of York, from the firſt Inſtitution of that Court, had both a Star-Chamber and Chancery Power.

As to the Evidence of Gore, it related to a Tranſaction before the Date of the Commiſſion, with which he was not charged, and conſequently he was not obliged to give any Anſwer to it; and neither he, nor any other, he obſerved, pretended to prove that the Earl procured the Clauſes in the ſaid Commiſſion; and that the reſt of the Evidence in this Article conſiſted of Hearſays. Then he produced his Witneſſes, to ſhew he was abſent in Ireland moſt Part of the Time, between July 1633 and 1639; and that he never acted as Preſident of York, ſince that Commiſſion was renewed in the eighth Year of the King: Concluding, that, as he was charged only with procuring and executing this Commiſion, he conceived he had given a full Anſwer to both.

The

1640. 16 Car. I.

The Managers repiied, That what Gore had depoſed ſhewed the Reaſon of the enlarging the Commiſſion, (viz.) the Earl's falling upon his Knees before his Majeſty, when his Father was arreſted; and that, from what the other Witneſſes depoſed, it was probable he was privy to the Alteration of the Commiſſion; and though this alone was not Treaſon, yet the whole Charge together, amounting to the Subverſion of the Laws, was Treaſon, and this was one Evidence of it.

Then the Managers proceeded to the ſecond Article, which charged the Earl with ſaying, at York Aſſizes, That ſome of the Judges were all for Law, but they ſhould find, that the King's Little Finger ſhould be heavier than the Loins of the Law.

Theſe Words were atteſted by Sir Thomas Leyton, Sheriff of Yorkſhire, and ſeveral other Gentlemen, who depoſed, That they were ſpoken at the Summer Aſſizes, at York, in the Year 1632, or 1633.

To this the Earl anſwered, That it appeared he was in Ireland at thoſe Times, and conſequently the Witneſſes were miſtaken. He acknowledged indeed, he had ſaid at another Aſſizes, That the Little Finger of the Law, was heavier than the Loins of the King; and produced Dr. Duncombe, and Sir William Pennyman, as Witneſſes of his ſaying them; but abſolutely denied his ſaying the Words he was charged with in this Article.

The Managers replied, Though their Witneſſes were miſtaken in the Time, yet their Evidence, in the main, might be true: Whereupon, the Earl obſerved, If it were true, the Facts did not amount to High-Treaſon; and deſired his Counſel might be heard to that Point, at a proper Time.

On the Fourth Day of the hearing, viz. the 25th of March, 1641, the Managers proceeded to prove the third Article, which charged the Earl with ſaying, That Ireland was a conquered Nation, and the King might do what he pleaſed with them. And Robert Kennyday being produced as a Witneſs of theſe Words, the Earl objected to his Teſtimony, that he had been convicted of Extortion, and other Miſdemeanors, and bore a particular Grudge againſt him; obſerving that it was a great Hardſhip that ſuch Men were produced to give Evidence againſt him, as had been convicted of notorious Crimes during his Adminiſtration, and could not be ſuppoſed backward in aſperſing him: But all his Exceptions of this Kind were overruled, and Kennyday permitted to teſtify the Earl's ſpeaking the Words charged in this Article. Richard Earl of Cork alſo atteſted the Earl ſpoke the Words, to whoſe Teſtimony the Priſoner objected that he was a prejudiced Perſon, having been compelled by the Government of Ireland, to pay 15000 l. as a Compoſition for his Miſdemeanors.

The Lords Gormanſton and Killmalloch, depoſed, That the Earl, in the Preſence of both Houſes of Parliament in Ireland, declared, That Ireland was a conquered Nation; and, therefore, muſt expect Laws as from a Conqueror: And Sir Pierce Crosby atteſted the ſame Words.

1640. 16 Car. I.

To this, the Earl anſwered, that the Natives of Ireland had ever appeared prejudiced againſt their Engliſh Governours; that they had occaſioned Proſecutions againſt many of them, who had manifeſted their Innocence, and ſhewn that they deſerved rather to be applauded than cenſured, when the firſt Heat was over, and Matters came to be calmly conſidered; that in the Adminiſtration of Juſtice, many Perſons muſt neceſſarily be offended. However, there was nothing in this Article that amounted to High Treaſon; and, as it could be no more than a Miſdemeanor, he ought to have been allowed Counſel, and his Witneſſes examined upon Oath; which Advantages he was deprived of, by their involving all under the general Charge of Treaſon.

He deſired their Lordſhips alſo, to reflect on the Hardſhips of his Caſe again; That he had no Opportunity given him, of preparing for his Defence, till the Friday before; and it was impoſſible in ſo ſhort a Time to fetch his Witneſſes from Ireland, and produce his other Proofs: That in all other Courts, where the Defendant puts in his Anſwer, and it is not replied to; nor the Party allowed to prove his Anſwer; it is admitted to be true; and ſo it ought to be in this Caſe: That according to the Statute of Ed. VI. he ought not to be proſecuted for Words above thirty Days after they were ſpoken, and popular Actions were to be preſented within a Year or two at fartheſt; but here he was proſecuted for Words, ſuppoſed to have been ſpoken ſix or ſeven Years before. He deſired alſo, it might be conſidered, that the Laws and Cuſtoms of Ireland, were different from thoſe of England; and hoped their Lordſhip's would diſtinguiſh therefore, and not judge him by thoſe of this Kingdom, where the Matter related to Ireland.

And, as to what had been teſtified to ſupport this Article, he acknowledged he was ſtill of Opinion, that Ireland was a conquered Kingdom, as it was recited to be ſo ſeveral Times, in a Statute of XI. Elizabeth, relating to the Attainder of that Famous Rebel, Shan O Neal; and as the Words atteſted were not intended to upbraid that Nation, but to ſhew how much they were obliged to the Kings of England, for ſuffering them to be governed by the Laws of England, and not treating them as a conquered Nation; he did not ſee how they could be taken amiſs; and, in Fact, no Man appeared offended with them, when they were ſpoken; and it muſt be admitted, that the Conqueror might have impoſed on them what Laws he pleaſed.

Then he called Sir Henry Slingsby as a Witneſs for him, who depoſed, That the Earl's deſign in that Speech appeared to be, to reconcile that People to His Majeſty's Government: That he knew they were very well taken by ſeveral, and particularly by the Mayor of Dublin, who invited him to Dinner that Day; when both he and the principal Citizens expreſſed themſelves extremely well ſatisfied with what the Earl had ſaid.

As to what the Witneſſes teſtified, relating to their Charters, viz. That he ſaid, they were nothing worth, and the King might do as he

pleaſed

1641. 17 Car. I.

pleaſed with them: He did not controvert his ſaying them, for that the Charters of Dublin were forfeited, by their making ſeveral By-Laws, contrary to the Common-Law; and their neglecting ſeveral Duties they were obliged to perform by thoſe Charters, which had been complained of, both in the Council-Chamber, and the Parliament: He obſerved alſo, that the greateſt Part of the Aldermen were Recuſants, and ſtood upon their Charters, refuſing to obey the Order of the Council-board.

Then the Lord Dillon was called as a Witneſs for the Earl, who depoſed, That, five or ſix Years before the Charters of Dublin being brought to the Council-board, the King's Counſel ſhewed, that the City exerciſed By-Laws, contrary to the Common-Law; and that the like Complaints were made by ſeveral Members of the Houſe of Commons; particularly, that they hindered Engliſh Tradeſmen, from ſetting up Manufactures there.

This was one of the Reaſons, the Earl obſerved, of his Queſtioning their Charters; and averred that, at his going over thither, the Natives, being Papiſts, engroſſed the Manufactures to themſelves, and depreſſed the Engliſh; but that now, there were three Proteſtants in Dublin for one, that was there when he went over; and he preſumed that what had chiefly incenſed that People ſo much againſt him was, his interpoſing ſo effectually in theſe Matters: However he had never gone about in a Judicial Way to deprive them of their Charters, but they ſtill enjoyed them in their full Latitude. All that he deſigned by theſe Repreſentations, was, to keep them within ſome Bounds: That as to his ſaying, they muſt expect Laws from the King, as a Conqueror, they were no Part of the Charge, and conſequently, he was not obliged to anſwer them: However, he never ſpoke them, which Sir George Wentworth atteſted from a Copy of that Speech he had by him.

To this the Managers ſaid, that they had averred their Charge to be true, though they had not replied to the Earl's Anſwer; and therefore the Anſwer was not to be taken pro confeſſo; nor would it avail him, that Ireland was governed by other Laws; for the Words he had ſpoken, tended to the Subverſion of all Laws; and they could ſhew they were deeply reſented, though the Mayor durſt not tell the Earl ſo then: Then they produced ſeveral Witneſſes, who depoſed, That they believed the Words charged, were in another Speech, and not in that taken by Sir George Wentworth; and that they were highly reſented when they were ſpoken.

They inſiſted alſo, that the Common-Law was the ſame in England as in Ireland; and, by a Statute there, Cauſes were reſtrained to their proper Courts; and the Lord Deputy and Council could not meddle in Cauſes between Party and Party; and if the Earl could not produce a Statute that authorized him, as Governor, to take Cognizance of private Cauſes, it muſt be admitted, he had erected an arbitrary Power, as would appear farther in the following Article.

Then the Managers proceeded to the fourth Article, which charges that he ſaid, in a Cauſe of the Earl of Cork's, He would have neither Law, nor Lawyers, diſpute his Orders; and that he would make the Earl of Cork, and all Ireland know, that an Act of State, was as binding in Ireland, as an Act of Parliament. To prove the Charge in this Article, the Earl of Cork was produced, and depoſed, That he was deſſeized of an Impropriate Rectory, on a Paper Petition to the Council; and that no Decrees were ever made there, concerning Lands, before the Earl of Strafford's Time: But it being demanded, if he himſelf, as Preſident of Connaught, had not, on Paper Petitions, done the ſame Thing, the Commons inſiſted that the Witneſs need not anſwer the Queſtion, becauſe it tended to make him accuſe himſelf; and of this Opinion were the Lords. Then the Lord Cork depoſed farther, That having brought his Action, and repreſented to the Earl of Strafford the Hardſhip of being deprived of his Poſſeſſion, on a Paper Petition, without a Trial at Law, he anſwered, Call in your Witneſſes, or, if you will not, I will clap you up in the Caſtle; for I tell you, I will not have my Orders diſputed by Law, nor Lawyers: That the Deponent being proſecuted in the Star-Chamber, for making a long Leaſe of a Parſonage, contrary to an Act of State; and repreſenting that he was not apprized of that Act, and therefore it was hard he ſhould be proſecuted for it; the Earl of Strafford ſaid, I tell you, my Lords, as great as you are, I will make you, and all the Subjects of Ireland know, that any Act of State, made, or to be made, ſhall be as binding to you, and the Subjects of Ireland, during my Government, as an Act of Parliament.

1641. 17 Car. I.

The Lord Ranelagh depoſed, That no Decrees concerning Lands, were ever made by the Council, before the Earl of Strafford's Time. John Waldron depoſed, That, in a Cauſe between the Merchants of Galloway, and others, concerning a Leaſe at the Council Table, Mr. Martin, the Merchant's Counſel, inſiſting on an Act of Parliament in behalf of his Clients, the Earl of Strafford ſaid, He would make him know, that an Act of that Board ſhould be as good as a Statute, or to that Effect. Some other Witneſſes alſo depoſed, That they heard the Earl ſay the ſame Words, at the Council-Table, four or five Years before.

Sir Pierce Crosby, depoſed, That the Earl of Strafford being at Dinner at the Deponent's Houſe, ſoon after his coming to Ireland, the Earl ſaid, If he lived, he would make an Act of State, equal to an Act of Parliament; adding, that Ireland was a Conquered Nation, and the Conqueror ſhould give the Law.

To the Charge in this Article, the Earl anſwered, that the Council-board in Ireland, was a Court of Record, where they proceeded by Bill and Anſwer, &c. that his Care to preſerve the Authority of that Court, could not be conſtrued a Subverſion of the Laws, the Law being only adminiſtred in another Channel, according to the Conſtitution of that Kingdom; and that this was the proper Court for the Protection of the Engliſh Planters, and the proteſtant Clergy.

The Lord Dillon, being called as a Witneſs for the Earl, depoſed, That, as long as he remembred, in all Cauſes of Plantation and the Church, the Lord Deputy and Council proceeded as in other Courts of Equity; and that upon Contempts of Acts of State, or Proclamations, the Parties were attached and brought before that Board, and ſometimes fined and Impriſoned, and he had heard their Judges ſay, that Acts of State in Ireland, were a kind of Temporary Laws: Sir Adam Loftus depoſed to the ſame Effect; but both of them declared, that none ever were fined for contempt, in Caſe of particular or private Rights; and it ſeems, the Managers admitted, that the Council-Table there had Cognizance of Cauſes relating to Plantations and the Church, and of ſuch Cauſes as were recommended by the King to the Council; but would not admit the Council to be a Court of Record.

Upon this Evidence, the Earl of Strafford obſerved, that the Council-board in Ireland had another Conſtitution than it had here: That the Lord Cork's Caſe related to the Church, of which they had Cognizance, and deſired their Lordſhips would hear his Counſel upon the Statute of 28 Hen. 6. for remitting Cauſes to their proper Courts, by the laſt Clauſe whereof the King's Prerogative was ſaved: And as to the Words, he obſerved bare Words, of a higher Nature, would not have amounted to Treaſon, and ought to have been proſecuted within a ſhorter Time, according to the Statute of 1 Ed. VI. c. 12. And further, That in the Caſe of the Lord Cork, where the Sentence was juſt and honourable, he might, without Offence, ſay, That neither Law nor Lawyers ſhould diſpute his Orders; though it was very improbable he ſhould ſay thoſe Words, when that very Order referred the Matter to a Determination at Law. As to his ſaying that an Act of State was equal to an Act of Parliament, my Lord Cork muſt have a very good Memory, to make his Evidence agree ſo exactly with the Words of the Charge: However, as he had done no Act, in Purſuance of ſuch a Declaration, it could not amount to High Treaſon; and he did not ſee but, where an Act of State was made agreeable to, or in purſuance of, an Act of Parliament, and the fundamental Laws of the Realm, and to prevent ſome preſent Miſchief, till the Parliament might provide againſt it; ſuch an Act might be as binding, for the Time, as an Act of Parliament: And he accepted againſt Sir Pierce Crosby and ſome other Witneſſes, as prejudiced Perſons.

The Managers replied, That the Lord Cork's Impropriation, was a Lay-fee, and no Church Matter; and therefore the Council had not Cognizance of it: That the Priſoner's Government appeared to have been arbitrary, by his threatning to lay the Lord Cork by the Heels, if he went to Law; and it was not material, whether the Order was juſt or not; and that, though Acts of State were a temporary Proviſion till Acts of Parliament could be made; yet, when Things were propounded and rejected in Parliament, they ought not to be ſupplied by Acts of State; and called one Lotts to prove, that the Commons having rejected ſome Bills; particularly one, which would have made it Felony for a private Perſon to have Gunpowder in his Houſe; the Lord Strafford told them, that notwithſtanding they had voted againſt theſe Bills, he could make them Acts of State, which would do as well: ——— The Earl objected to this Evidence as irregular, being produced after the Reply; but the Lords, however, admitted it: Whereupon the Lord Strafford ſaid, he had received particular Directions concerning the truſting Gunpowder in unſafe Hands, which he ſhould forbear to open, as it tended neither to his Acquittal or Condemnation.

1641. 17 Car. I.

The Managers, on the 27th of March, 1641, went upon the fifth Article, which charges, that the Earl, in Purſuance of the aforeſaid Speeches, exerciſed an arbitrary Power over the Goods, Inheritances, Lives, and Liberties of the Subject; and, particularly, procured Sentence of Death to be paſſed on the Lord Mountnorris, and another Man, by a Council of War, in time of Peace. Art. 5

Then the Sentence againſt the Lord Mountnorris was read, whereby he was condemned by a Council of War, to be ſhot, or loſe his Head, for ſome Speeches, expreſſing a Deſign of being revenged on the Lord Deputy, for an Affront he had received from him: And the Lord Mountnorris himſelf, being produced as an Evidence of the Proceedings of the Council of War againſt him, depoſed, That, on the 11th of December, 1635, he was ſummoned to attend the Lord Deputy, at a Council of War the next Morning; and that the Deponent having taken his Place in the Council as Vice Treaſurer, the Lord Deputy charged him with ſome Words, ſpoken three or four Days after the riſing of the preceding Parliament, and read the Words out of a Paper he held in his Hand: And the Deponent deſiring he might be tried as a Peer, and an Officer of the Crown, and not by a Council of War, it was refuſed, and demanded of him, if he would confeſs or deny the Charge; and His Majeſty's Letter was read, directing him to be proceeded againſt in a Council of War, which put him into ſome Confuſion; and the Lord Deputy gave him ſuch Language as was not fit to be uſed to a meaner Man: And the Paper, containing the Words he was charged with, was atteſted by the Lord Moore, and Sir Adam Loftus; but the Deponent denied the Words, declaring they were ſpoken by another Perſon, as he could prove, if he was permitted to ſend for his Witneſſes; but this alſo was denied him. That the Lord Moore, who was one of the Witneſſes againſt him, was ordered to ſit as one of his Judges, and the Deponent, being withdrawn about an Hour, was called in again, and the Sentence pronounced againſt him; when the Lord Deputy made a ſevere Speech upon the Occaſion, and ſaid, There remained now no more (if he pleaſed) but to cauſe the Provoſt-Martial to do Execution: However, he ſhould ſupplicate his Majeſty as to his Life, and ſaid, he would ſooner loſe his Hand, than the Deponent ſhould loſe his Head, and the Deponent was then commanded to Priſon; but not having his Health, he was ſuffered to reſide for the moſt Part at his own Houſe.

The Lord Dillon depoſed, That he was at the ſaid Council of War; and that every Member, on giving his Vote, declared that he gave it, in confidence that Mercy ſhould be extended to the Lord Mountnorris; and that, when the Votes were given, the Lord Strafford ſaid, he had rather loſe his right Arm, than the Lord Mountnorris ſhould loſe a Hair of his Head; and he would write to His Majeſty to ſupplicate his Mercy:

1641. 17 Car. I.

Mercy: That while the Lord Mountnorris was withdrawn, the Lord Strafford gave no Vote, or ſpoke one Word to incline them one Way or other; and the Lord Ranelagh gave much the ſame Evidence; only he added, That the Lord Deputy ſaid, as he had complained to the King, he expected that Honour from the Board, that his Cauſe ſhould be taken into Conſideration, and ſuch Redreſs given as was fit, demanding Juſtice on the Articles: And though he ſaid he would depend on their Judgment, yet he would hold them to the Point of the Articles, and not give them a Latitude of proceeding to make him Reparation according to the King's Letter: But, after the Council fell into the Debate of the Matter, the Lord Strafford ſaid not one Word, or gave them any Interruption; and had declared before, if there was not a Neceſſity of his Preſence, he would withdraw.

Other Witneſſes depoſed, That one Thomas Denewit was hanged by Martial Law, for Theft and Deſertion.

To the Charge contained in the fifth Article, the Earl anſwered, That there were twenty Officers preſent at the Sentence againſt the Lord Mountnorris, wherein he was no Judge, but became a Suitor to His Majeſty for him, ſo that he only ſuffered a few Days Impriſonment; and that, by his Commiſſion (which was read) it appeared he was impowered to exerciſe Martial Law.

Then he called the Lord Wilmot, who depoſed, that Martial Law had been exerciſed in Ireland, ever ſince he remembred, without being complained of, either by the Common Lawyers, or by the Parliament; but that, in time of Peace, it had only been exerciſed againſt Traitors and Outlaws. Sir Adam Loftus, and the Lord Robert Dillon, alſo depoſed, That they had known ſeveral Rebels, and Outlaws executed by Martial Law, but no others, in time of Peace.

Sir Robert Farrer, and Sir George Wentworth depoſed, That the Lord Strafford ſat as a Suitor, and not as a Judge, at the Trial of the Lord Mountnorris, and did not vote or intermeddle in it himſelf; nor would ſuffer the ſaid Sir George Wentworth to give his Vote, becauſe he was his Brother.

The Lord Strafford ſaid, he left the Matter wholly to the Council, and the Lord Mountnorris only ſuffered two Days Impriſonment; the proceeding being intended only for Diſcipline, to teach him to govern his Speech with more Modeſty: That he thought the Sentence againſt Denewit, was juſt, being condemned for ſtealing a quarter of Beef, and runniug away from his Colours, the latter being Death by Statute-Law; and that he had been burnt in the Hand before.

The Managers replied, that the Earl's Intention to ſubvert the Laws was evident; and it appeared that he procured the Sentence againſt the Lord Mountnorris, if he did not vote in the Caſe: That his Commiſſion only impowered him to exerciſe Martial Law when there was a Neceſſity for it, which muſt be underſtood of a Time of War; and none of the Witneſſes had proved that it was ever exerciſed in Time of Peace, unleſs upon Traitors and Outlaws, that fled from Juſtice: That the Statute that made Deſertion Felony, directed, the Priſoner ſhould be tried by the Common Law, and then he would have had his Clergy. And the Inſtructions given to the Lord Falkland were read, importing, That ſuch as might be brought to a Trial at Law, ſhould not be tried by Martial-Law, unleſs in Time of War and Rebellion: And one of the Managers obſerved, that the Earl of Strafford did not ſo much deſire the Blood of the Lord Mountnorris, as to have the Peers under his Girdle.

1641. 17 Car. I.

On the twenty-ninth of March the Managers went upon the ſixth Article, which charges the Earl with diſſeizing the Lord Mountnorris of his Freehold, on a Paper Petition. Art. 6.

To prove which, a Decree was read, whereby the Lord Deputy, aſſiſted by the Chief-Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, decreed Henry Rolſton to be put into Poſſeſſion of the Lord Mountnorris's Lands; and that Lord depoſed, that he was actually put out of Poſſeſſion of thoſe Lands accordingly, by a Warrant of the Earl of Strafford's; and Mr. Anſlow depoſed to the ſame Effect.

The Earl anſwered, that the Decree was juſt; that his Commiſſion authorized him to determine ſuch Cauſes, and his Predeceſſors had exerciſed the like Authority upon Petitions made to them; and produced the Lord Robert Dillon, and ſeveral other Witneſſes, to prove that former Deputies had made the like Decrees; and that the Provincial Courts, which derived their Authority from him, did the ſame: That the Decree was for the Relief of a poor Man the Lord Norris had violently diſpoſſeſſed of Lands of 200*l. per Ann.* That it was neceſſary to relieve the poorer Sort of People this Way, who could not undergo the Expence of legal Proceedings; and that he received his Majeſty's Orders to relieve them as former Deputies had done: That he had obſerved the Rules that guided other Courts of Equity; and though the ſame Thing might be illegal here, it was according to the Laws and Cuſtoms of Ireland, by which he ought to be adjudged in this Caſe. Nor did he underſtand how the Enlargement of a Juriſdiction, (if it had been ſo) could be ſtrained up to Treaſon: This was of the Nature of a Court of Requeſts, and did not intrench on the Juriſdiction of the Courts of Law.

The Managers replied, that no Deputy had ever determined the Poſſeſſion of Lands before, unleſs in Plantation Caſes; nor did his Majeſty's Letter warrant his doing of it. And the Earl of Cork, Lord Ranelagh, and other Witneſſes depoſed, that no former Deputy ever determined Matters relating to Lands, in Equity, or otherwiſe.

A Petition of the Lord Mountnorris, for a Warrant for a Pardon under the Great-Seal, and the Lord Strafford's Anſwer, alſo were read, importing, that when the Petitioner ſhould acknowledge the Juſtice of his Sentence his Requeſt ſhould be conſidered. The Lady Mountnorris's Petition to his Majeſty, and the King's Reference of the Matter to the Lord Deputy, alſo were read; wherein his Majeſty directs, that, upon ſuch a Submiſſion as the Lord Deputy ſhould approve, the Lord Mountnorris ſhould have Liberty to come to England; and Mr.

1641. 17 Car. I.

Anſlow depoſed, that when the Lady Mountnorris petitioned the Deputy, he refuſed to receive the Petition.

Evidence was produced alſo, where the Lord Deputy had decreed the Poſſeſſion of other Lands: But he ſhewed, that was done by the Conſent of the Parties, and that the Poſſeſſion was not altered; and ſaid, he would make it appear, if they would ſuffer him to give the Lord Falkland's Book of Entries in Evidence, that there were Hearings between Party and Party, Injunctions to the Judges, and Warrants to the Sheriffs, to give Poſſeſſion of Lands, to be found in them: And that my Lord Mountnorris might thank himſelf for his Reſtraint, not making his Submiſſion as his Majeſty directed: That the Lady Mountnorris brought him only the Copy of a Petition to his Majeſty, and he told her he could do nothing on a Copy.

One of the Managers replied, that the Lord Strafford's Cruelty exceeded that of other Tyrants, for he kept the Lord Mountnorris in Priſon, till he ſhould acknowledge the Juſtice of a Sentence which he knew to be unjuſt. Other Tyrants ſometimes found out falſe Witneſſes; but to make a Man a falſe Witneſs againſt himſelf was much more tyrannical: And they conceived the Charge ſtill remained, That the Earl of Strafford had determined Cauſes, which his Commiſſion, or the Authority he had received from his Majeſty, did not warrant.

Art. 8. The next Day, being the 30th of March, they opened the eighth Article; which charges the Deputy with impriſoning Adam Lord Viſcount Loftus Lord Chancellor of Ireland, George Earl of Kildare, and the Lady Hibbots, on Pretence of Diſobedience to his Orders: But the Managers inſiſted only on the Buſineſs of the Lady Hibbots, and dropped the reſt. They endeavoured to prove, that the Order was made contrary to the Opinion of a Majority of the Council; and that the Lord Deputy was guilty of Corruption, in procuring Part of the Eſtate in Queſtion to be ſold to his Agents, in Truſt for himſelf.

The Earl of Strafford, in his Defence, brought ſome of the Council to teſtify, that a Majority ſigned the Order, and that no Member at the Board took any Exception to the ſigning of it; and, as to the commanding the Lady to perform the Order, on Pain of being fined and impriſoned, he obſerved, that it would be to no purpoſe to make Orders, if they could not enforce Obedience to them: He denied that the Lands were conveyed to his Uſe, and obſerved there was only Hearſay Evidence of it.

The Managers replied, that the Council had nothing to do with Freehold, unleſs it concerned Plantations, or the Church, or was ſpecially recommended to them; and though that was not Treaſon of it ſelf, yet it conduced to prove their general Charge, that he ſubverted the Laws.

Art. 9. Then they proceeded to the 9th Article, which charges his giving Warrants to the Biſhop of Downe and Connor, and his Officers, to impriſon the poorer ſort of People, who refuſed to obey Eccleſiaſtical Decrees or Orders, and produced a Copy of the Warrant to prove it; and, when the Earl objected that the Copy was not proved, the Lords were ſatisfied with the Depoſition of Sir James Montgomery, who ſaid he believed it to be a true Copy: Sir James alſo depoſed, That he had ſeen ſeveral Warrants, under the Hand of the Biſhop of Downe's Chancellor, directed ſometimes to Conſtables, ſometimes to Apparitors, for apprehending Perſons, (twenty or thirty in a Warrant), and known them executed with great Cruelty, wounding, beating, and impriſoning the Parties; and that he himſelf was charged to be aſſiſting in the Execution of ſuch Warrants: Whereupon the Managers obſerved that his Acts of State, exceeded Acts of Parliament, for none could be puniſhed on the Statute, till a Writ de excommunicato capiendo iſſued; but by Lord Strafford's Warrant, People were impriſoned, that appeared not on a Citation; and that he did not only aſſume this Power himſelf, but conferred it upon others; and therefore it appeared high time to charge him with ſubverting the Laws of Ireland.

1641. 17 Car. I.

But the Earl produced Witneſſes to prove that former Deputies had iſſued the like Warrants, and that this to the Biſhop of Downe, was the only Warrant he iſſued of this Kind; and ſaid, if he had not acted altogether agreeable to Law, he hoped every Miſtake of the Law did not amount to High Treaſon; for if it did, there would be more Proſecutions for Treaſon than Treſpaſs. The Managers replied, as before, that though this ſingle Act was not Treaſon, it was a ſtrong Evidence to prove his Subverting the Laws.

Art. 10. On Wedneſday March the 31*ſt*, the Managers proceeded to the 10th Article, which charges him with raiſing the Cuſtoms for his own Benefit, having firſt taken a Leaſe of them.

But he ſhewed that they were raiſed before his Time, and that he was in a manner obliged by his Majeſty, to take a Share of the Leaſe, and that a greater Rent and Fine was given by him and his Partners, than former Farmers paid; However, he obſerved that there could be no Treaſon in this Tranſaction: He acknowledged that the Cuſtoms were greatly encreaſed by a flouriſhing Trade, which ſhewed the Falſity of the Remonſtrance procured from Ireland, relating to the Decay of Trade.

Art. 12. Then they went upon the twelfth Article, which charged the Earl with monopolizing Tobacco: They urged, that the Farmers of it were only his Agents and Servants; that he had publiſhed Proclamations, prohibiting all Perſons importing it but his Patentees, or ſelling any that was not ſealed, and laying a Duty of two Shillings a Pound on all Tobacco imported by others; inſomuch that Tobacco, that was ſold formerly for ſix or ſeven Pence a Pound, was now ſold at two and three Shillings a Pound. To which the Earl anſwered, that the Parliament of Ireland had petitioned that the Duties on Tobacco might be applied to the encreaſing the Revenue, and they were ſo applied accordingly. That Eighteen-pence a Pound had been laid on Tobacco in King James's Time; and that the Proclamations complained of were iſſued by his preſent Majeſty's Direction, and were of the ſame Nature with that publiſhed in England concerning Tobacco.

That

1641. 17 Car. I. That he was not privy to the ſelling Tobacco at unreaſonable Rates, and the Contractors ſtood upon their Juſtification, but had been ſhut up in Priſon by an arbitrary Order of the the Commons of Ireland; and their Tobacco ſeized and ſold, as he proved, by the very Orders of the Iriſh Houſe of Commons, which the Managers oppoſed the reading of a great while, but at length, they were permitted to be read: And the Earl obſerved that, the Perſons employed being thus impriſoned, and their Effects ſeized on, he was rendered incapable of giving a more particular Account of that matter; that whether they had a good Bargain or not, was not material; but at the Time of the Contract, thoſe that now complained of it, had ſo little Notion of the Advantage of it, that they refuſed to become Partners in it: However, were the Bargain never ſo good, it was not treaſonable.

The Managers replyed, His Majeſty's Letter and Orders had been obtained on the Miſinformations of the Lord Strafford; and that there being the like Monopoly in England, could not juſtify that in Ireland; that the Lord Strafford had the ſole Benefit of the Matter, and the Perſons named in the Contract were but his Servants; that a Proclamation could not make a temporary Law, and take away the Subject's Goods: That this was a great Breach on the Property of the Subjects; and if a Grant of the ſole Emption was ſuffered in this Inſtance, it might be extended to every thing elſe: That if the Commons were deſirous, the King's Revenue ſhould be encreaſed, they did not intend that others ſhould feed upon him, while he was in Want himſelf: That the Earl was guilty of a double Treaſon; Firſt, In arbitrarily laying a Tax upon the Subjects: Secondly, In depriving the King of his Revenue, under a Colour of advancing it: And that his daring to reflect upon the Parliament of Ireland, as Arbitrary and Tyrannical, ſhewed what he would do, and ſay of an Engliſh Parliament, in time of a Receſs.

Art 13. On the firſt of April, the Managers proceeded to the 13*th* Article, which charges his Ingroſſing all the Flax in the Kingdom, ordering it to be wrought in ſuch a Manner, as the Natives were unpractiſed in, and ſeizing what was wrought contrary to his Directions.

As Evidence of this, a Proclamation and Warrant were read, commanding the Juſtices of Peace to aſſiſt the Officers, in ſearching for, and Seizing the Yarn prohibited by the Proclamation; and Proof was made of the Seizing one Cart-load in Connaught.

Sir John Clotworthy depoſed, That the Officers ordered to ſearch and ſeize the Yarn, abuſed their Authority, of which he acquainted the Lord Deputy, and was threatened by his Secretary; for being too officious that upon ſending out thoſe Officers, the Markets were deſerted, and then the Officers by the Juſtices Warrants, broke open the Peoples Cheſts, and Multitudes of the People were ſtarved by this means; and Part of the Iriſh Remonſtrance was read, which ſaid the People died by thouſands, by reaſon of theſe Oppreſſions.

The Earl of Strafford anſwered, that the Intent of thoſe Proclamations was certainly good, being to reform an Abuſe, and promote the Trade and Welfare of the Kingdom. That they were ſigned by the Lord Chancellor Loftus, the Lord Primate, the Archbiſhop of Dublin, the Chief Juſtices, and other Privy-Counſellors, though they were aſcribed only to him: That other abuſes had been reformed by Proclamation before; ſuch as the drawing by Horſe Tails, burning the Straw to ſeparate the Grain from it, &c. and that this was to render this Manufacture valuable, which, as it was managed, was worth nothing: That he had a particular regard to the Engliſh Nation, in promoting this Manufacture; obſerving the Woollen and Cloathing Trade very much encreaſed there, which would in Time be very prejudicial to England, if they were not diverted from it by a good Linnen Manufacture; and that, in attempting this, he had loſt three thouſand Pounds. That if the Officers had been guilty of any Abuſe, they muſt anſwer for it, though the moſt obnoxious Officer had been produced as a Witneſs againſt him, and upon complaint of thoſe abuſes, the Warrants were recalled: That there was Proof only of the Seizure of one Cart-load of Yarn; and it was ſtrange that this ſhould ſtarve thouſands: And indeed this Fact had no other Proof to ſupport it but common Fame, and had been raiſed and propagated by his Enemies; and that the whole Value of the Linnen Cloth, made in his Looms, did not amount to fifteen hundred Pounds, which could not occaſion the Starving of thouſands: And, Laſtly, that Actions tending to Oppreſſion, if they had been proved could not amount to Treaſon.

1641. 17 Car. I.

The Managers replied, that a good Intention would not juſtify ſuch Oppreſſions as the ſeizing of Men's Goods, and breaking open their Houſes by Proclamation: But this ſufficiently ſupported their Charge, That he endeavoured to erect a Government that ſhould depend upon mere Will and Pleaſure; and it was no Extenuation of his Crime, that he had drawn in others to be Partakers of his Crimes; and that he was anſwerable for the Actions of his Agents, who ſeized the Goods for his Uſe.

Then the Managers proceeded to the 15th Article, which charges him with levying Money on the People, by a Military Force; and this is ſtiled a levying War againſt his Majeſty and his People. Art. 15.

To ſupport this Charge, Saviel, the Serjeant at Arms was produced as a Witneſs, who depoſed, That he received a Warrant from the Lord Deputy's Secretary, under his Lordſhip's Hand, by which he laid Soldiers on Delinquents Lands: That the Method was this; when a Complaint was made to the Lord Deputy, he iſſued his Command to the Party, to appear and anſwer it: And on Oath made, that it was ſerved on the Party, and he refuſed to obey the Order, a Warrant was given to a Meſſenger to apprehend him; and if he could not be found, or was reſcued out of the Hands of the Meſſenger, a Warrant was given to the Serjeant at Arms, who went in Perſon, or ſent his Deputy, four or five times to the Party's Dwelling; and if he could not be had, the Serjeant applied himſelf to the chief Officer of the next Garriſon, and ſhewed him the Lord Deputy's Warrant, who thereupon ſent an Officer, and four or five Soldiers, with their Arms, to his Aſſiſtance; and they lived at free Quarter at the Party's Houſe till he complied, or Satisfaction was made: That the Deponent had laid Soldiers in this Manner on ſeveral Perſons; that the greateſt Number he had ever laid was five, and an Officer; and he generally laid but two or three, uſually Foot-Soldiers.

Other Witneſſes depoſed, that they had ſeen ſuch Warrants ſigned by the Lord Deputy, and that Soldiers had been laid, in Purſuance of them, for not giving Obedience to the Lord Deputy's Orders.

Edmund Berne depoſed, That an Officer, and ten of the Lord Deputy's Guards, were quartered in his Houſe, about twelve Miles from Dublin, in the Year 1639. That they threſhed out his Corn, and ſold it; ſpent all his Proviſions, and treated their Women with them; plundered his Tenants, and ſeveral of the Neighbours, and did him 500 l. Dammage; inſomuch that he was forced to break up Houſe, and ſerve as a Soldier in Flanders: That this was for a Debt he refuſed to pay, and might have compounded for five Pounds; and that the Soldiers were quartered upon him, after the Lord Deputy went to England.

The Lord Strafford's Secretary, Mr. Little, being examined if ever he made out ſuch Warrant for laying Soldiers on Berne, by the Lord Strafford's Orders, declared, he never knew or heard of any ſuch Warrant.

The Lord Ranelagh depoſed, That before the Lord Strafford's Time, it was uſual to lay Soldiers on the Relievers of Rebels; and in caſe of Delinquency, and for levying Contribution-Money, and the King's Rents; but he did not remember any Soldiers had been laid to compel Obedience in Civil Caſes, between Party and Party before.

The Managers ſtill urged, That the Lord Strafford's compelling the Subjects by Acts of Hoſtility to obey his Orders, was levying War againſt the King, and this was Treaſon by 25 Ed. III. And by an Iriſh Statute of 18 Hen. VI. this very Fact of ſeſſing Soldiers, by Lords or others, on the King's People, was Treaſon.

To this the Earl anſwered, That what had been opened to be ſo extraordinary, was very frequent and ordinary in the Kingdom of Ireland: That in all Times, the Officers and Soldiers of the Army had been the chief Inſtruments in executing all the Juſtice of the Kingdom; and indeed the King's Writs could not be executed there, but by their Power and Aſſiſtance. And the Earl calling Sir Arthur Tyrringham, and ſome other Witneſſes, they depoſed, that they had known Warrants in the Time of former Deputies, for laying Soldiers in Caſes of Debt, as well as on the Relievers of Rebels, for Contribution-money, and for the King's Rents. And the Lord Strafford obſerved, that by Traitors and Rebels in Ireland, were meant only idle pilfering Fellows, ſuch as in England would be apprehended by a Conſtable; and that it was the Practice of the Deputy and Council to quarter Soldiers, not only on the Party himſelf, but on the Septs (Clans or whole Kindred) of the Rebels. And the Managers admitted, that it was uſual to lay Soldiers on the Septs of ſuch Traitors and Rebels as abſconded, or refuſed to ſubmit to Juſtice; but added, that Uſage would not juſtify it, the Statute of 22 Eliz. providing, that if any ſtood out, as Traitors or Rebels, five of the Sept, that bore the Surname, ſhould be fined by the Council-Chamber.

1641. 17 Car. I

The Lord Ranelagh depoſed, that in the Time of former Deputies, when the King's Rents were ſlowly paid, Acquittances were given out of the Exchequer, uſually to the Officers of the Army, who quartered Soldiers on the Defaulters till the Money was paid. Whereupon the Earl obſerved, that though it was now proved, and even admitted, that Contribution-money was levied eight Years before his Government, they had made this, Part of the Charge, of his having traiterouſly and wickedly deviſed to ſubdue the Subjects of that Realm, by levying that Money upon them. And, having produced the Lord Falkland's Inſtructions, authorizing him to quarter Soldiers on ſuch as did not pay the King's Rents, he obſerved further, that the aſſeſſing or quartering Soldiers had never been interpreted Treaſon in the Chief Governor of Ireland; that it was a uſual Thing, both for levying Exchequer Rents, in Caſes of Debt, for Contribution-money, and for Contempts and Diſobedience to the Courts of Juſtice; and he produced a Proclamation, from whence it appeared, that he did not introduce this Cuſtom, but found it in Ireland.

As to the Miſdemeanours of the Soldiers in Berne's Caſe, he could not be anſwerable for it, ſince he was not in Ireland; neither did it appear the Serjeant had the Warrant from him: And, as to the Warrant given to Savile, it would be very hard to make this a Foundation for a Charge of High-Treaſon, without producing the original Warrant, or an atteſted Copy, which might have ſhewn the Limitations and Reſtrictions with which it was granted; and it was ſome Conſolation to him, he ſaid, to ſee this terrible War, which he was charged with levying againſt the King and his Subjects, dwindled to a ſingle Inſtance of quartering three or four Soldiers on one Man. It muſt be a very great Strain that could heighten this Act to High-Treaſon, and make it a levying War upon the King and his Subjects; eſpecially, when it had never been complained of till now.

That the Serjeant at Arms was a publick Officer, and his Warrant run in general Terms; not for laying Soldiers on one particular Man, but thereby to enforce the Decrees and Judgments of the King's Courts of Juſtice.

Then he called Henry Dillon as a Witneſs, who depoſed, that the Serjeant at Arms executed the laſt Proceſs of Contempt, both in the Courts of Chancery and the Exchequer; and that this was done, as well in Caſes between Party and Party, as where the King was concerned.

After which the Earl proceeded in his Defence, and ſaid, he hoped their Lordſhips would not adjudge him a Traitor for laying (or quartering) two or three Soldiers on ſome refractory Perſons, to bring them to Juſtice, it being the uſual Practice of that Country; and eſpecially, ſince it did not appear to have been done with a treaſonable or corrupt Intention: That, as his

Majeſty's

1641. 17 Car. I.

Majesty's Deputy, he was authorized, in a more than ordinary Manner, to make use of the King's Troops for pursuing Rebels, and securing the publick Peace, according to his Discretion; and had there been no Precedent for such a Warrant, it could not be charged on him as a Crime; for by his Commission, he was empowered to govern according to the Customs of that Realm: That the Power of making War and Peace was given to the Lieutenant, by the 10 Hen. VII. cap 17. which was after the Statute of 18 Hen. VI. they had cited: And further, that as the King was never concluded by any Statute where he was not named, so neither was the Deputy, who acted in his stead. That the Statute of 18 Hen. VI. said, No Lord, or any other, should, &c. But this could not affect the chief Governor, who was above the Condition of a Lord: That it expressed also the bringing of Rebels, &c. which could never be extended to the King's Forces, who came to attach refractory Persons; and, notwithstanding that Statute, the chief Governors had always assessed, or quartered Soldiers, in Cases of Disobedience and Contempt, without any Imputation of Treason; and constant Practice was ever held the best Interpreter of the Laws: And if the Fact had been Treason by the Statute-Laws of Ireland, it was not triable in England. It was very hard also, he conceived, that obsolete and antiquated Statutes should now be sought out and revived, only to destroy him and his Posterity, after so long and continued a Practice to the contrary.

He observed farther, that the Statute of 18 Hen. VI. was repealed by the 8th of Edw. IV. which enacts, that all the Statutes of England shall be in Force in Ireland; (among which is the 1 Hen. IV. which says, That nothing shall be adjudged Treason, but what is specified in the 25 Edw. III.) He cited also the 11th Eliz. c. 7. which impowers the Deputy to assess Soldiers; from whence he inferred, that it could not be Treason. There remained nothing more therefore, for him to clear, he said, but that the Fact was not within the Meaning of 25 Edw. III. which makes it Treason to levy War against the King within his Realm; and he appealed to their Lordships Justice, Whether the laying of two or three Soldiers in this Manner, in order to bring a refractory Person to Justice, could, by any Construction, be deemed a levying War against the King and his People; it being done for the Maintenance of the King's Authority, Honour, and Justice, and not as an Enemy to him.

The Managers replied, that no Usage could give a Man Authority to commit Treason; and besides, the Precedents he had cited did not come up to his Case: That though he might have a Power to resist Rebels, and make Peace and War, this did not give him Power to send Soldiers to make War on his Majesty's peaceable Subjects, whom he ought to protect: And his alledging, that the Statute of 18 Edw. VI. did not extend to him, because it did not extend to the King, was such a Reason as the Commons did not expect to hear: That this was to assume a Power above Law, and make himself equal to his Sovereign: And he was under a great Mistake in thinking, he could not be tried in England for the Breach of an Irish Statute. As to the Repeal of that Statute by the English Statute, which provided that nothing should be Treason, which was not contained in the 25th of Edw. III. they confessed they were not prepared to speak to that Point yet, but left it to those who should be appointed to give their Lordships Satisfaction in Point of Law. 1641. 17 Car. I.

And as to his Intent; though he had no Design against the King's Person, yet if it was against his People, such a levying War was High Treason: Then the Earl desiring a Recess for one Day, it was granted, and the House adjourned to Saturday the 3d of April.

The Peers being assembled on the 3d of April, and the Earl brought to the Bar, the Managers proceeded to the sixteenth Article; which charges him with restraining the Subjects from going out of the Kingdom, in order to prevent their petitioning against his Oppressions and tyrannical Administration. Art. 16.

For the Proof of which, they produced certain Propositions made by the Earl to the Council-Board in England; and particularly one dated 17 Febr. 1631. of the following Tenor, viz. That no Complaint of Injustice or Oppression, be admitted here against any, unless it appeared the Party first made his Address to the Deputy; and a Proclamation issued by the Deputy and Council, and dated 17 Sept. 11 Car. was read, which required all Noblemen, Undertakers, and others, who held Estates and Offices in Ireland, to reside there, and not depart the Kingdom without Licence from the Deputy.

Then Richard Wade deposed, that the Lord Esmond petitioned the Deputy to go to England, to defend a Cause wherein the Deputy was Plantiff; and he refused to grant the Petition, though he had obtained the King's Letter, signifying his Majesty's Consent to it.

The Lord Roche also deposed, that the Deputy refused him a Licence, to come over to defend himself against an Information in the Star-Chamber, which, he thought, was promoted by the Lord Deputy.

Henry Parry deposed, that in April 1638, his Master, the Lord Chancellor Ely, was committed to the Castle of Dublin by the Deputy and Council; and his Lord sending the Deponent over to England to solicit for his Enlargement, the Deponent was apprehended by a Warrant of Mr. Secretary Cook's, and forced to give Bond to return to Ireland, which he did; and appearing before the Deputy and Council in Ireland, was fined 500*l.* and committed Prisoner to the Castle, where he remained till he was utterly ruined; but was never put to answer any Complaint in Writing, neither was there any Petition against him; but that his Fine was afterwards reduced to 250*l.* of which he had actually paid 184.

Mr. Fitzgerald deposed, That the Commons of Ireland, in the Beginning of November then last passed, drew up a Remonstrance of their Grievances, and presented to the Lord Deputy Wain;ford; and seeing they should be dissolved thereupon, constituted a Committee to repair to England, with a Particular of their Grievances; and, on the 12th of the same Month, they were prorogued, without any Redress of the Things complained of: That the next Day the Committee was summoned before the Council-Board,

1641. 17 Car. I.

Board, and avowing their Deſign of repairing to England, the Lord Deputy Wainsford bid them take Notice, that there was a Proclamation iſſued, to reſtrain the Subjects of Ireland from repairing to England, and charged them on their Allegiance, not to depart, till his Majeſty's Pleaſure was known. A Clauſe of the Iriſh Remonſtrance alſo was read in Evidence againſt the Earl, complaining of the Proclamation reſtraining the Subjects of Ireland from coming to England, and having Acceſs to his Majeſty, in order to procure a Redreſs of their Grievances, as their Anceſtors uſed to do.

To the Charge in this Article, the Earl anſwered, That, notwithſtanding he was accuſed of ſubverting the Laws of Ireland, the Law never had ſo free a Paſſage as in his Time: And as to that Part of the Charge, concerning the Inſtructions he procured to prevent all Complaints of Injuſtice and Oppreſſion, he thought it reaſonable the Deputy ſhould be apprized of the Complaint before it was brought over: It muſt be very diſcouraging to the Miniſtry, and very inconvenient for the Subject, to be drawn over hither on every little Complaint, for which they might have Redreſs at Home; and it appeared from the Inſtructions themſelves, that theſe were the Motives, on which they were founded, and not any Deſign in him, to aſſume a greater Authority than became him: That the Proclamation, reſtraining the Subjects of Ireland to go abroad without Licence, was warranted by the Statutes of that Kingdom.

Then he produced a Petition to his Majeſty, from Ireland, in the Year 1628, ſhewing that, in Reſpect of the Non-reſidence of many of the great Men of that Kingdom, who ſpent their Eſtates abroad, the Nation was impoveriſhed; and therefore they pray, that ſome Order might be taken, that both they, and all Undertakers, who had Eſtates beſtowed on them, for the Improvement and Support of the Kingdom, might make their Reſidence in Ireland, one half of the Year at leaſt, and not depart without Licenſe.

Then he produced his Majeſty's Anſwer and Orders on the ſaid Petition; the Inſtructions to the Lord Falkland of the like Tenor, and his Majeſty's Letter for iſſuing the Proclamation complained of (That none ſhould depart the Kingdom without Licence.)

Upon this Evidence, the Earl obſerved, That the Proclamation was iſſued by the whole Council, the two Chief Juſtices being preſent, to whom Matters of Law were always referred; and that indeed, he was reſtrained by his Commiſſion from publiſhing this, or any Proclamation, without the Concurrence of the Council. He obſerved alſo, that it was upwards of a Year; after his Majeſty's Letter, that this Proclamation was iſſued, and then it appeared abſolutely neceſſary to reſtrain O Neal and Tirconnel, who had great Influence over the Iriſh Septs, and had Regiments in the Spaniſh Service, from going over, and carrying his Majeſty's Subjects into foreign Countries; as alſo to reſtrain the Popiſh Noblemen, from going or ſending over their Children and Dependants to Duoay, St. Omers, and other Popiſh Seminaries; and without ſuch an Authority, it was impoſſible for the Deputy to take Meaſures for the Security of the Kingdom.

1641. 17 Car. I.

He obſerved alſo, that many Things were now now alledged againſt him, which were no Part of the Charge, and which he could not be ſuppoſed prepared to anſwer, not being apprized of them before.

That the fouleſt Thing he was accuſed of, ſeemed to be, his defaming the Lord Eſmond, to the Prejudice of his Cauſe; but, though that Lord was reſtrained from coming over for ſome Time, for very juſtifiable Reaſons, he proved, that he was ſuffered to come over Time enough to defend his Cauſe, to join in the Commiſſion, and examine his Witneſſes; and that the Lord Eſmond actually deferred his coming over, half a Year, after he had obtained a Licence, which ſhewed he was in no great Haſte.

That he was unwilling to remember what the Lord Roche was charged with in the Star-Chamber; but the detaining this Lord was no Part of the Charge, and therefore he was not obliged to anſwer it; and as for others, they were only reſtrained from going to Douay, St. Omers, and other Popiſh Seminaries; and ſome had been cenſured by the Council-Board for other Contempts, and not for departing the Realm without Licence, as had been charged: And as many of theſe Things were done by the Authority of the whole Council, he conceived, they ought not to be charged ſingly upon him: He obſerved alſo, that the Criminals themſelves, who had been cenſured, were produced as Witneſſes againſt him; but if the Judge was to be condemned on the Teſtimony of the Party puniſhed, no Man would venture on the Office of a Judge.

The Earl then called the Lord Robert Dillon, as a Witneſs, who depoſed, That it being ſuſpected the Lord Eſmond, had employed ſome Aſſaſſins to cut off Sir Walſingham Coke, the Council reſtrained him from going over, till the Judges had determined whether the Fact was Treaſon or not; and the Earl demanding, if the Lord Dillon remembred the Sentence againſt Parry, the Managers inſiſted, his Lordſhip might not be examined as to that, becauſe he was one of the Council, and it was asking the Judge whether the Sentence was juſt. To which the Earl anſwered, that it was as equitable to examine the Judge as the Delinquent; but he was not ſuffered to be examined, however, as to this.

Sir Adam Loftus alſo depoſed, that the Lord Eſmond was detained on the Evidence of a Rebel in Dublin Caſtle, who charged that Lord with employing certain Rebels and Out-laws, to lie in Ambuſh for Sir Walgnſiham Coke, near his Houſe; but the other Witneſſes not ſupporting his Teſtimony, the Lord Eſmond was diſmiſſed as ſoon as the Examination was finiſhed, which laſted about three Weeks or a Month.

The Earl concluded his Defence to the Charge in this Article with obſerving, as on the reſt, that there was no Treaſon in it: And as to the Matter of Miſdemeanor, he ſaid, he hoped their Lordſhips would give him Time to examine his Witneſſes, and that his Counſel might be heard, and then he did not doubt but he ſhould acquit himſelf, as became him.

The

1641. 17 Car. I.

The Managers replied, It appeared the Earl had taken Cauſes from the ordinary Juriſdiction, and brought them before him: And that he had procured Inſtructions to debar the Subject of all Acceſs to his Majeſty with Complaints of his Injuſtice and Oppreſſion, and not to prevent their reſorting to Popiſh Seminaries: That what was applicable to Reſidence for the Defence of the Kingdom, he had made a Reaſon for reſtraining all Reſort to England. And as to the Earl's Obſervation, that there was no Treaſon in the Matter, they gave the ſame Anſwer as before; that the Multiplication of Acts, all tending to an Arbitrary Power, made the Treaſon.

Art. 19. Then the Managers proceeded to the nineteenth Article; which charges the Earl with framing a new and unlawful Oath, and impoſing it on the Scots in Ireland: To prove which Sir James Montgomery depoſed, that the Earl ſent for the Scots Nobility and Gentry in Ireland, and propoſed to them their petitioning that an Oath might be adminiſtered to them, as a Teſt of their Loyalty; and that, thereupon, the Biſhop of Rapho was appointed to draw up a Petition, and it was drawn up accordingly; in which the Scots were made to expreſs their Deteſtation of the Rebellion in Scotland, and of their entering into an unlawful Covenant, and to deſire the Deputy to adminiſter an Oath to them, whereby they might have an Opportunity of vindicating themſelves; and the Petition being preſented to the Deputy and Council, an Act of State was made for framing an Oath, and tendring it to all thoſe of the Scotiſh Nation in Ireland. By this Oath they ſwear to obey the King, and defend his Regal Power; that they will not bear Arms againſt him, or proteſt againſt his lawful Commands; and that they will not enter into any Covenant, Oath, or Bond of mutual Defence, without his Majeſty's legal Authority.

That the Lord Deputy himſelf adminiſtered the Oath to all the Nobility and Gentry that were preſent; and, in May following, Commiſſions were ſent into the Country, to adminiſter the Oath to all of that Nation, above ſixteen Years of Age, Men, Women, and Children, and to certify the Names of the Refuſers: That Meſſengers were diſpatched to apprehend thoſe who refuſed the Oath; that many fled into Scotland thereupon, and others abſconded, leaving their Goods, their Houſes, and the Corn growing on their Lands: And Sir John Clotworthy depoſed to the ſame Effect.

Richard Salmon, School-Maſter, depoſed, that Mr. Stuart being proſecuted in the Court of Star-Chamber, in Octob. 1639. for not taking the ſaid Oath, ſaid, he ſcrupled taking the Oath, becauſe it ſeemed to bind him not only in Point of Allegiance, but in Point of Eccleſiaſtical Duties; and the Earl replied, he made a right Judgment, for the Oath was deſigned to bind him to be obedient to the Eccleſiaſtical Ceremonies of the Church eſtabliſhed by his Majeſty; and that, whoever would not be obedient to them, he would proſecute them to Blood.

That the Earl ſaid at the ſame Time, Theſe People almoſt made him mad, and cauſed him to forget himſelf; that they were Traitors and Rebels; and if his Majeſty would ſend him back to that Government, he would eradicate, Root and Branch, even all that Nation out of the Kingdom of Ireland, ſaving ſuch Lords and others that had taken the Oath. That a Fine of 5000*l.* was impoſed on Mr. Stuart and his Wife, 3000*l.* on each of his Daughters, and 3000*l.* on Mr. James Gray, who was not worth an hundred Pounds; John Loftus gave the ſame Evidence of the Sentence in the Star-Chamber, and that the Deputy ſaid, he wanted Words to expreſs the Heinouſneſs of the Cauſe: That he was to leave his Sword, but if it pleaſed his Majeſty to return him thither again, he hoped to root up, Stock and Branch, ſuch as would not conform themſelves to the Diſcipline of the Church.

1641. 17 Car. I.

To the Charge in this Article, the Earl anſwered, Their Lordſhips would obſerve in what a dangerous Poſture the King's Affairs were, when the Proclamation iſſued for taking this Oath, in May 1639. that the Council of State in Ireland were apprehenſive the Scots in that Kingdom, who were not fewer than an hundred thouſand Men, might join with the Covenanters; for one of them was found to be in a Plot to deliver up the Caſtle of Knock-fergus to them, of which he was convicted and executed: And the Lord Robert Dillon, being called as a Witneſs, depoſed, that about the Time above-mentioned, Intelligence was brought from the North of a Conſpiracy among the Scots; whereupon it was concluded at the Board, to adminiſter an Oath to that Nation, to prevent their treating with the Covenanters; and the Scots Gentlemen being ſent for, they did not expreſs any Reluctance at taking the Oath when it was tendered them, which Sir Adam Loftus atteſted.

The Earl added, that none but Sir James Montgomery, who was produced as a Witneſs againſt him, made any Scruple about taking it when it was propoſed; and that the like Oath was tendered in England about the ſame Time: And he ſubmitted it to their Lordſhips Wiſdom, what Offence this could be in a Deputy of Ireland, in ſuch an Exigency, to tender this Oath, in order to ſecure the Subject's Allegiance, and the publick Peace of the Kingdom, and eſpecially when he had a Letter from his Majeſty, authorizing him to make a Trial of the Fidelity of the Scots in Ireland, by adminiſtering to them an Oath of the aforeſaid Tenor: That he never diſcovered this Letter before; but he apprehended it to be a full Vindication for him; nor did he know that none might adminiſter an Oath but by Authority of Parliament; and if he had offended ignorantly, as it was in Obedience to his Majeſty, he hoped he ſhould not be puniſhed for it; however, were it to do again, being informed as he then was, he muſt obey, and had rather ſuffer by obeying his Majeſty, than diſpute his Commands of that Kind. As to the Sentence againſt Mr. Stuart's Family, the whole Court of Star-Chamber were unanimous in it, and the Fines were ſet before he came to vote, though he concurred with the reſt; that though the Fines were but ſuitable to the Offence, very little was paid or required of them, and they might have been pardoned next Day on ſubmitting to take the Oathh: That the Refuſers of the Oath of Allegiance, which differed but little 1641. 17 Car. I. from this, incurred a Præmunire, being the Loſs of Liberty and all they had in the World; ſo that the Fines could not be deemed exceſſive, and the Oath had no View to Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, as ſome of the Witneſſes had erroneouſly ſworn.

Nor did he ever ſay, that the Scotiſh Nation were Rebels, and he would extirpate them, &c. he had too great a Regard for that Kingdom, his Majeſty's native Country, and it was an Expreſſion only fit for a Man that was out of his Wits: He never received a perſonal Wrong from any of that Nation, or had any Animoſity againſt them; and would produce ſome Witneſſes to ſhew that he did not uſe any ſuch Expreſſions, but ſpoke, even of the Faction in Scotland, in milder Terms.

Then Sir Philip Manwaring depoſed, That he ſat in the Star-Chamber, the Day the Sentence paſſed on Stuart, &c. and that the Earl told him, ſince he carried that Name, he was ſorry he ſhould be almoſt the only Man that ſhewed himſelf diſobedient to His Majeſty; adding that he knew there were, among the Scotiſh Nation, many gallant and worthy Perſons, and had great Experience of their Loyalty; but there was a Faction amongſt them, that he ſhould endeavour to reduce to the Obedience they owed their Sovereign: And that he heard none of thoſe Words, Root and Branch, or Stock and Branch. Sir Adam Loftus alſo depoſed, That he was preſent at the Cenſure of Stuart, and heard none of thoſe Words, though Lord Strafford was charged with reflecting on the Scotiſh Nation. And that, being at Dinner with the Lord Deputy, and ſeveral Perſons of Honour that Day, he heard Mr. Wainsford, Maſter of the Rolls, expreſs his Satisfaction to the Lord Deputy, in that he had uſed ſo much Caution in his Speech on that Occaſion; and had avoided all ſuch Words as might caſt any Reflection on the Scotiſh Nation in general, and only cenſured the Faction in that Kingdom. And the Earl concluding his Defence to this Article, ſaid, He hoped his Intentions to ſerve His Majeſty in this Inſtance, would procure an eaſier Judgment from their Lordſhips, than that of High-Treaſon.

The Managers replied, that the Earl, in juſtifying his Offence, and ſaying he would do it again, if he had the ſame Command, though he had been told in that great Preſence that it was contrary to Law, was a high Aggravation of his Crimes: That a new Oath could not be impoſed, but by Parliament, and the Oath of Allegiance would have been a ſufficient Security in this Caſe; though nothing would content this Lord, but framing new Oaths, and maintaining his Authority was equal to an Act of Parliament; and although his Majeſty would not command any thing contrary to Law, it appeared that the Lord Strafford his Miniſter, had publiſhed ſuch Commands, in the King's Name, as were not juſtifiable by Law; which gave the Scots ſufficient Reaſon to be cautious in ſwearing they would ſubmit to all the King's Royal Commands; and the Lord Strafford's miſinforming his Majeſty, and thereby procuring that Letter to authorize him to adminiſter the Oath, was but an Aggravation of the Offence: That he had alſo exceeded the Power given him by his Majeſty's Letter, by ſetting Fines on the Refuſers. 1641. 17 Car. I.

Then the Managers demanded of Sir John Clotworthy, if he could give any Inſtances of Perſons flying from their Habitations to avoid the Oath; and Sir John mentioned about half a Dozen, and ſuggeſted there was no real Plot to betray Knockfergus Caſtle; it was a State Trick: The Miniſtry wheedled the Fellow to write that Letter concerning it, for which he was hanged.

Then the Managers concluded their Reply to this Article, with their former Obſervation; That as the Earl had threatned to make an Act of State equal to an Act of Parliament, he was now as good as his Word; for no Authority could impoſe an Oath, without the Concurrence of the three Eſtates. This Day's Hearing being over, the Earl repreſented to their Lordſhips, that all he had in the World was ſeized on; he had no Money to ſubſiſt on, but what he borrowed; and how his Wife and Family found Bread in Ireland, he could not tell: He moved their Lordſhips therefore, to take this Caſe into their Conſideration, that the reſt of the Peerage might not ſuffer by this Uſage of him; for he thought it ſtrange that a Peer ſhould be in a worſe Condition than the meaneſt Man would have been in, in ſuch a Caſe; under pretence of charging him with Treaſon, which it ſeemed to be admitted could not be made out but by ſtrained Conſtructions.

To which Sir John Clotworthy replied, That the Earl had ſtill a fair Eſtate in Ireland of a thouſand Pounds per Annum, which the Commons had not ſeized. The Earl anſwered, he had but a thouſand Pounds a Year there in all; and he had a Family of two hundred and ſixty People, who could not eaſily be maintained out of it: Whereupon their Lordſhips directed the Earl to petition them.

Thus far the Commons went upon one Article at a Time; but ſaid, for the future they ſhould take the Liberty to conſider them together, as they related to one another, and not in the Order they lay; which the Earl oppoſed ſtrenuouſly; but was over-ruled by the Lords, who told him, the Commons were at Liberty to proceed on them promiſcuouſly, or in what Method they pleaſed.

On Monday, the fifth of April, the Commons proceeded to maintain the 20th, 21ſt, 22d, 23d, and 24th Articles. Art. 20, 21, 22, 23, 24.

In theſe five Articles the Earl is charged with inciting his Majeſty to make War on the Scots; with perſuading his Majeſty to call a Parliament, in order to break with them, and raiſe Supplies by Force on his Subjects, for the Maintenance of the Scotiſh War; with procuring the Parliament of Ireland to declare they would aſſiſt in the War againſt the Scots; and with raiſing a Popiſh Army there for the Deſtruction of England. He is charged alſo with falſly telling his Majeſty the Parliament refuſed to ſupply him, and thereby procuring a Diſſolution; and with ſaying to his Majeſty, that, having tried the Affections of his People, he was abſolved from all Rules of Government, and might do every thing that Power would admit; and with declaring, that the Parliament had forſaken the King, and given him Advantage to ſupply himſelf himſelf another Way; and that he was not to ſuffer himſelf to be maſtered by the Frowardneſs of the People.

1641. 17 Car. I.

Mr. Whitlock, the Manager, opened theſe five Articles, and obſerved, that they were now about to prove the Earl's Deſign of ſubverting the Government both of England and Scotland, and of bringing in an Army upon them to force them to ſubmit to arbitrary Power; and that they ſhould begin firſt with Scotland.

Then the Earl of Traquair was ſworn, and depoſed, that the Lord Strafford ſaid before his Majeſty, That the unreaſonable Demands of Subjects in Parliament was a Ground for the King to put himſelf in a Poſture of War, or to that Effect. And the Managers demanding, that this Lord's Examination before the Committee, might be read, the Lord Strafford oppoſed it; for that an Examination was never known to be read where the Witneſs was preſent. Then the Managers produced the Examination of the Earl of Morton, who was ſuch; and the Lord Strafford objected to the reading it, becauſe he ought to be examined viva voce, and he had no Way of croſs-examining him this Way: But the Lord High Steward determined, that where the Witneſſes could be produced, they ſhould give their Evidence viva voce; but where they could not, their Examinations ſhould be read.

Then Earl Morton's Examination before the Committee was read; wherein he depoſed, that the Earl of Strafford ſaid, the Night before the great Meeting of the Peers at York, that the unreaſonable and exorbitant Demands made by the Scots in their Parliament, was a ſufficient Ground to make War upon them; and that the King need not ſeek for any other Grounds for it; and that on the Earl of Traquair's firſt relating the Scots Demands to the King, the Lord Strafford ſaid, thoſe Demands were not Matter of Religion, but ſuch as did ſtrike at the Root of Government, and ſuch as he thought were fit for his Majeſty to puniſh by Force, or to that Effect.

Sir Henry Vane depoſed, That ſoon after the laſt Parliament, the Lord Strafford delivered his Opinion for an offenſive War. Then the Earl of Northumberland's Examination was read, importing, that the Lord Strafford adviſed the King to go on vigorouſly with an offenſive War againſt the Scots.

The Biſhop of London depoſed, That his Majeſty obſerving that ſome of the Scots Demands were prejudicial to that Crown, the Lord Strafford, and the other Lords of the Council, adviſed, that if the Scots inſiſted on thoſe Demands, and would not recede from them, his Majeſty ſhould prepare to reduce them by Force; and that the whole Council giving their Opinion for an offenſive War, the Lord Strafford was for carrying the War into Scotland: And though there was ſome Difference of Opinion, as to the Method of carrying it on, they all agreed in the main.

Sir Nicholas Barnwell, depoſed, That Sir Robert Loftus ſeized ſome Scotiſh Ships in Ireland, and the Deponent heard him ſay, he had a Warrant for it, but he could not ſwear the Warrant was from the Lord Strafford.

Thus the Managers concluded their Evidence of the Earl's Deſign of ſubverting the Government of Scotland, and then produced Witneſſes, to ſhew he had the ſame Deſign as to England.

1641. 17 Car. I.

Then the Examination of the Lord Primate of Ireland, was read, who depoſed, That diſcourſing with, the Lord Strafford, concerning the levying Money on the Subject, his Lordſhip ſaid, he agreed with thoſe in England, who thought that in Caſes of imminent Neceſſity, the King might make Uſe of his Prerogative, to levy what Money he needed; but his Majeſty was firſt to try his Parliament, and if they ſupplied him not, then he might uſe his Prerogative, or to that Effect.

The Lord Conway depoſed, that diſcourſing with Lord Strafford, how the Forces ſhould be paid, he ſaid, he made no doubt but the Parliament would ſupply the King, and give him twelve Subſidies; but if they ſhould not, the Cauſe was very juſt; and if the Parliament would not ſupply the King, he was juſtified before God and Man, if he fought means to help himſelf, though it were againſt their Wills, or to that Effect.

Sir Henry Vane depoſed, That he heard Lord Strafford ſay, that if the Parliament ſhould not ſucceed, he would be ready to aſſiſt his Majeſty any other Way, or to that Effect.

Then they proceeded to give Evidence of what the Lord Strafford's Friends had been heard to ſay.

Sir Robert King depoſed, That diſcourſing of the Scotiſh War, with Sir George Ratcliffe, Sir George ſaid, the King could not want Money, for he had an Army of 30000 Men, and 400,000*l.* in his Purſe, and a Sword by his Side; and if he would want Money, who could pity him? The Lord Ranelagh depoſed, That he heard Sir George Ratcliffe ſay the ſame Words; and the Deponent objecting the Difficulty of raiſing Money, while the Scotiſh Army was on Foot, Sir George anſwered, We can make Peace with the Scots when we liſt; but that is the worſt of Evils.

Sir Thomas Barrington depoſed, That he heard Sir George Wentworth ſay, this Common-Wealth is ſick of Peace, and will not be well, till it is conquered again.

The Earl of Briſtol depoſed, That Diſcourſing with the Lord Strafford, of the Diſtractions of the Times, and propoſing the Summoning a Parliament, his Lordſhip ſaid, he did not diſlike the Propoſal; but it was not adviſable at that Time, for the preſent Dangers of the Kingdom were ſo preſſing, they would not admit of ſo ſlow and uncertain a Remedy as a Parliament was. That the Parliament had in the great Diſtreſs of the King and Kingdom, refuſed a Supply; and therefore the King muſt provide for the Safety of the Kingdom, by ſuch Ways as he in his Wiſdom ſhould think fit, repeating that Maxim, Salus Reipublicæ ſuprema lex; adding, that the King was not to ſuffer himſelf to be maſtered by the Diſaffection and Stubbornneſs of ſome particular Men, and he conceived he meant Members of Parliament.

Another Part of the Earl of Northumberland's Examination was read, wherein he confirms what ſome of the former Witneſſes had ſaid, and adds, that the Forces, which were to come out of Ireland, were to land in the Weſt of Scotland, as the Lord Strafford declared in the King's

1641. 17 Car. I.

King's Preſence; but he never heard that thoſe Forces, or any other, were to be employed in this Kingdom, to compell or awe the Subjects of this Realm, to yield to ſuch Taxes or Charges as ſhould be impoſed on them by his Majeſty; but he believed, by ſome Diſcourſes of the Lord Strafford's to the King, that it was intended to raiſe Money by extraordinary Ways.

Sir Henry Vane depoſed, That when the Scotiſh War was under Debate before his Majeſty, the Lord Strafford ſaid, Your Majeſty having tried all Ways and been refuſed; in a Caſe of this extreme neceſſity, and for the Safety of the Kingdom, you are acquitted before God and Man: You have an Army in Ireland; you may employ it to reduce this Kingdom: Which Words were ſpoken at a Committee for Scotiſh Affairs; but whether they were meant of England or Scotland, he would not pretend to ſay.

Upon this Evidence, the Managers obſerved, that no other Kingdom could be intended but England; the Words being ſpoken here, and he having juſt before ſpoken of the King's trying his Subjects here, and their having refuſed him; concluding that they conceived the Charge in theſe Articles fully made out.

The Earl anſwered, that it appeared from their own Evidence, that he delivered the ſame Opinion, in relation to the Scotiſh War, as the reſt of the Council did; and, if it was neceſſary, he could ſhew that he gave no Vote at all, but only delivered the Senſe of the Board: And as to thoſe Words that the unreaſonable Demands of Subjects in Parliament, was a Ground for the King to put himſelf in a poſture of War; this could be no great Crime, after it had been reſolved in the Council of England; and for that other Expreſſion, that it was not matter of Religion that was the Buſineſs, but they ſtruck at the Root of Government, and were to be reduced by Force, he believed every Man was of Opinion, that if they ſtruck at the Root of Government, they ought to be reduced by Force; nor did he think it any Crime, to ſay the King might uſe that Prerogative the Law had conferred on him, any more than his ſaying, If the King was denied in juſt and lawful Things, he might juſtify his ſeeking Means to help himſelf, though it were againſt their Will; nor did he think himſelf, or Mr. Treaſurer, who appeared as Evidence againſt him, to blame, for ſaying, that if the Parliament ſhould not ſucceed, they would be ready to aſſiſt his Majeſty any other Way, becauſe it muſt be preſumed a Lawful Way, or his Majeſty would not require it.

That the Parliament of Ireland went very readily into the Supply for the Scotiſh War, and needed not his Influence to bring them into it: And as to his conſpiring to employ the Iriſh Army, for the Deſtruction of England, he had as little Inclination to enſlave himſelf, and his Poſterity, as another Man; and the Proof they brought of it, was the weakeſt that ever was offered, namely, the Sayings of other Men, that had no Relation to any thing he had ſaid, or done.

Then he deſired that Part of the Lord Northumberland's Examination, might be read again; where he ſays, The Iriſh Army was deſigned for Scotland, and not for England.

The Marquiſs of Hamilton alſo depoſed, That the Iriſh Army was to land near Ayre, in Scotland; and that he never heard there was any Deſign of bringing them to England at all. And ſeveral other general Officers depoſed to the ſame Effect; and, that the Magazines were intended to be made on the Borders of Scotland. 1641. 17 Car. I.

The Earl obſerved, on the Evidence that had been produced, That they had examined and ſifted his neareſt Relations and Domeſticks. His Houſe, his Table, and every Place, had been ſearched for Evidence againſt him: And he was charged with the Speeches of his Brother, and others, for which he could not be anſwerable. But he belived, if they would ſuffer his Brother to be examined, he could clear himſelf of what they charged him with: But Sir George Wentworth offering to ſpeak, and the Managers objecting againſt it, the Lords ruled that he ſhould not.

The Earl ſaid, he was ſtill of Opinion that, in Caſes of extreme Neceſſity, and, where there was not Time to call a Parliament, the King, as the common Parent of the Country, might uſe what Power God had given him to preſerve himſelf and his People; but that this was very different from ordinary Caſes, to which the Managers applied the Words.

As to thoſe Words, that the Parliament, having denied the King, had given him an Advantage to ſupply himſelf other Ways; he did not apprehend any Thing amiſs in them, if by Ways were meant juſt and lawful Ways, as it was to be preſumed he intended.

And, for his ſaying His Majeſty had an Army in Ireland, which he might employ to reduce this Kingdom, he deſired the Lord Treaſurer might be examined again, if ever he heard him ſay this to the King? To which he anſwered, he never heard him ſay any Thing like it. And, being asked by the Managers, if he never heard the Lord Strafford ſay, the King was looſe, and abſolved from all Rules of Government, he anſwered, he did not remember any Thing of it.

The ſame Queſtions being put to the Lord Cottington, he anſwered, he never heard the Earl uſe either of thoſe Expreſſions; but he had heard him ſay, The King ought to ſeek out all due and legal Ways, and employ his Power and Prerogative, caſte & candide.

Then the Earl obſerved, that only Sir Henry Vane atteſted theſe Words, That His Majeſty had an Army in Ireland, which he might employ to reduce this Kingdom; and, that it was highly probable he was miſtaken, becauſe all the reſt of the Committee for Scotch Affairs, had been examined, and they remembred nothing like them, and he proteſted he never ſpoke them: And, Sir Harry being a ſingle Witneſs, could not convict him of Treaſon, if he had ſpoken them: He deſired alſo, the Earl of Northumberland's Examination might be read again, where he ſays, The Lord Strafford declared, that his Majeſty might uſe his Power when the Kingdom was in Danger, or on unavoidable Neceſſity; and that he often ſaid, Power was to be uſed caſte & candide; and an Account thereof ſhould be given to the Parliament, that they might ſee it was only employed to that Uſe, and that this Kingdom could not be happy, but by a good Agreement

17 Car. I. 1641. between the King and his People in Parliament.

The Earl then obſerved, that theſe Words were not ſpoken wantonly, or unneceſſarily, but in full Council; where he was by the Duty of his Oath obliged to ſpeak according to his Conſcience: And, if he had forborne to ſpeak what he apprehended to be for the Advantage of the King and his People, as he conceived this to be, he had been perjured; though he was charged now as a Traitor, for ſpeaking them. In theſe Circumſtances he was not afraid of them that could kill the Body, he thanked God; and, if he muſt offend God or Man, he ſhould ſoon determine his Choice: And, whatever ſhould befall him from popular Rage, or his own Weakneſs, he ſhould ſubmit to the Will of the Almighty; and, to their Lordſhips Honour and Juſtice. —— Then he obſerved further, that he was charged only with delivering an Opinion; and, though Opinion might make an Heretick, he ſaid, he never heard before that it would make a Traitor: That if it were once admitted, that a Privy-Councillor, delivering his Opinion under an Oath of Secrecy, and Faithfulneſs at the Council-Table, ſhould, upon a Miſtake of the Law, be tried for Treaſon, and himſelf, and his Poſterity, attainted and ruined; no Perſon of any Quality or Fortune would venture to be a Privy-Councillor, on ſuch unſafe Terms; and entreated their Lordſhips ſo to judge of his Caſe, as not to bring any Inconveniences on themſelves: That, if they would weigh the Words with which he was charged, there was nothing but what was loyal, juſt, and honeſt in them; if they were not ſo diſcreet as they ought to have been.

The Managers replied, That the Scots Demands did not ſtrike at the Root of Government; for, they had ſince been enacted by the Parliament of Scotland, and His Majeſty: That his repreſenting they ſtruck at the Root of Government, when they did not, was what he was charged with: And that Words, adviſing and counſelling the Deſtruction of the King and Kingdom, were Treaſon, though nothing was done in Purſuance of them.

Then the Earl deſiring he might have a Day's Reſpite to recover himſelf, being much fatigued with continuing his Defence this Day, from Eight in the Morning to Five in the Evening, their Lordſhips adjourned to Wedneſday, the 7th of April.

The Court ſitting again the 7th of April, and the Earl brought to the Bar, the Managers went upon the 25th Article, which charges him with Art. 25. adviſing His Majeſty to levy Ship-Money vigorouſly, with threatning the Sheriffs, and the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London, for not levying it; and with threatning the Lord Mayor and Aldermen to lay them by the Heels, and hang ſome of them for refuſing to lend the King Money.

The Lord Treaſurer depoſed, That the Earl adviſed the going on vigorouſly to levy Ship-Money, after the laſt Parliament broke up; and Mr. Wiſeman depoſed, That he ſaid to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, they would never do their Duties till they were put to Fine and Ranſom: And that he ſaid to his Majeſty, you will have no good of this Man, meaning the Lord Mayor, till he is laid by the Heels. 1641. 17 Car. I.

The Earl of Berkſhire depoſed, That the King propoſing to the Aldermen the City's lending him a Sum of Money on good Security, at 8 per Cent, and commanding them to give in the Names of ſuch as were able to lend, they refuſed: Whereupon the Lord Strafford ſaid, Gentlemen, in my Opinion, you may be liable to Fine and Ranſom.

Garaway, the Lord Mayor, depoſed, that having repreſented the Difficulty of levying Ship-money to His Majeſty, it was ill taken; and the Lord Strafford ſaid, Sir, you will never do good on this Man, till you have made him an Example; unleſs you commit him, you will do no good upon him; And, that waiting on His Majeſty again about the Loan, the Lord Strafford ſaid, Sir, you will never do any good on theſe Citizens of London, till you have made Examples of ſome of the Aldermen. —— Unleſs you hang up ſome of them, you will do no good upon them.

The Earl anſwered, that he acknowledged his adviſing and levying Ship-money, which had been levied ſeveral Years before, and adjudged legal by the Judges; and that he did ſay, the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen were liable to be fined for refuſing to lend His Majeſty Money on good Security, and ſuch an Exigency of the State; but denied he ever ſaid, there will be no good done on the Citizens, till you have hanged ſome of them up; and there was only Garaway's Teſtimony, a ſingle Witneſs, and a prejudiced Perſon; and it was ſtrange that neither His Majeſty, nor any of the Council, ſhould remember any thing of them: And laſtly, if he did ſpeak them, they fell very ſhort of Treaſon.

The Managers replied, They hoped their Lordſhips would not paſs by thoſe haſty Words, which were conformable to his Actions for many Years; and as to the Objection of a ſingle Teſtimony, ſeveral Circumſtances indeed were proved by ſeveral Witneſſes; but they had all a Tendency to the ſame End, and made good the general Charge.

Then they proceeded to the 26th Article, Art 26. which charges the Earl with adviſing his Majeſty to ſeize the Money in the Mint, and debaſe the Coin; and that he procured 180,000 l. to be ſeized; and when the ill Conſequences of this Conduct were repreſented to the Lord Strafford, he ſaid, the City had dealt unduti-fully with his Majeſty, and were more ready to help the Rebels than the King, and they might thank themſelves for it.

The Evidence to ſupport this Article, was Robert Edwards, who depoſed, That deſiring the Earl to be a Means for reſtoring the Money that was ſeized in the Mint, he anſwered, if they did ſpeed amiſs, they might thank themſelves; they were more ready to hold with Rebels, than to give his Majeſty the 14000 l. that was due to him for Ship-Money; that they dealt very unthankfully and undutifully with the King; and though this ſeemed a ſtrange Buſineſs here, it was uſual beyond Sea, for People to have their Goods taken from them by Command.

1641. 17 Car. I.

Anthony Palmer deposed, That waiting on the Earl with some other Officers of the Mint, to represent the ill Effects of debasing the Coin, he was dissuaded from it; but he read Part of a Letter from France, shewing that the French King had appointed Officers to inspect People's Books of Accounts and Estates there, that the King might know what to demand of them; and those who refused to pay the Sum demanded, were made to pay it by Force: And the Deponent thought the Earl mentioned it as a Precedent for England.

To this Part of the Charge, the Earl answered, that they had produced no Proof of his advising the Debasing the Coin, or Seizing the Money in the Mint; on the contrary, their own Witnesses had proved that he agreed not to debase the Coin; but he acknowledged he said the City dealt undutifully by his Majesty, who residing amongst them, and having conferred so many Favours on them, yet they refused him the Loan of 100,000 l. on good Security; and since they charged him chiefly with Words that expressed his Zeal for his Majesty's Service, he looked upon it as an Argument of his Innocence; and that they had nothing worse to accuse him of.

That he never had any thoughts of making the Practice in France, of levying Money by Force, a Precedent for England: And Palmer, who testified he spoke to that Effect, could not remember the Words; and he appealed to their Lordships, if he ought to be condemned for Words, which the Witness could not remember particularly, and who might be mistaken in the Sense of them, as he averred he was in this Case; for the Words he spoke, on reading the Letter from Paris, were, God be thanked they had a pious King, that thought of no such Methods, and that he said no more: And lastly, that there was but a single Witness of the Words.

The Managers replied, that the Lord Strafford's retorting upon the Citizens in that Manner, when they only desired their Money out of the Mint, was a great Grievance, and not to be slighted; and that his Lordship had given no answer to those Words, that the City was more ready to help the Rebels, than his Majesty. And though his Lordship looked upon it as an Argument of his Innocence, that he was only charged with hasty Words; some Words might amount to Treason, and be of more pernicious Consequence than Actions; that his advising his Majesty to bring over an Army of Irish, was destructive both of King and People; and while he incited his Prince by false Insinuations, to tyrannize over his Subjects, he did not only abuse his Goodness for the present, but make him the Instrument of Ruining their Posterity: Nor did the Earl rest in Words, for four of the Aldermen were committed that very Day they gave their Answer about the Loan; and it was easy to conjecture by whose Advice it was done.

Art. 27. The next Article they proceeded upon, was the 27th, which charges the Earl with Imposing a Tax of Eightpence a Day, for the maintenance of every Soldier of the Trained-bands, in the County of York.

To prove this Charge, they produced a Warrant from the Vice-President of York, to Sir Edward Osborn, reciting, that the Scots having taken New-Castle, and being on their March to York, he was required by his Majesty's special Command, to raise by the Port Constable, or otherwise, twenty Shillings and Eightpence for each common Soldier belonging to certain Towns, and send the same to York, to be delivered to the Colonel, for the Payment of the said Soldiers; and likewise to charge and command all, and every Person, who were to find private Arms, to contribute thereto forthwith, and to send the like Sum to York, to be disposed as aforesaid; and in Case any of them refused to contribute, he was commanded to certify the Names of such Refusers, that they might be brought to York to serve in Person, and be severely punished, according to the Quality of so high an Offence; seeing the Safety of his Majesty's Person, and the Safety of the Kingdom, depended on it; and this he was not to fail exercising, on Peril of his Life. 1641. 17 Car.

Sir Henry Cholmley deposed, That he heard the Lord Strafford say, in the Presence-Chamber at York, it had always been the Custom, that the private Men should serve in Person, or maintain the Charge of those that served for them; and addressing himself to his Majesty, added, Sir, if you please, Mr. Vice-President may send out Warrants to that Purpose.

William Dowsen deposed, That Mr. Yatworth, Serjeant-Major to Sir William Pennyman, came with four Musqueteers to the Lordship of Egton, and gave a Warrant to the Constables for collecting the Money assessed; and that the Musqueteers went with the Constables from Place to Place to levy the Money; and that the Deponent was forced to serve in Person in Sir William Pennyman's Regiment, because he did not pay the Sum required.

Sir William Ingram deposed, that the Lord Strafford said, the private Men must maintain their Soldiers after the Rate of Eight-pence a Day; and if they did not, he would commit them, and it should be raised out of their Estates: That the Earl ordered the Deponent to speak to the Constables to make the Assessments; and if any refused to pay the Eightpence a Day, he would have them know they were guilty of little less than Treason.

Sir Henry Griffin deposed, That the Lord Strafford granted Warrants to the Constables, for levying the Arrears of a Month's Pay for his Regiment, and it was paid thereupon: But it being demanded, if it were not paid voluntarily, he answered, it might for ought he knew.

And because the Lord Strafford had said, That the Gentlemen of the County themselves agreed, that the Money for the Militia should be raised in this Manner; they brought three or four Gentlemen, who deposed, that they did not agree to it, because the Lord Strafford refused to present their Petition for calling a Parliament.

The Earl answered, that he did not approve of the Clause in their Petition for calling a Parliament, because he knew the King intended to call one before, with which he had acquainted the Gentlemen tlemen before; and he thought it improper the King ſhould be preſſed to it, when it was an Act of his own mere Grace: That the Tax was levied by their own Conſent; and of two or three hundred Gentlemen that were preſent, not above three or four diſſented from it, and thoſe were the Perſons that had been examined before their Lordſhips.

Then Sir Paul Neal was called, who depoſed; That it was agreed by the County to advance the Month's Pay, or Eight-pence a Day, with which the Earl was charged with levying by his own Authority; that there were two hundred Gentlemen in the Town-Hall of York at that Time, and he believed not above four or five diſſented; but he could ſwear there were not above half a Score negative Voices. Sir Edward Oſborne depoſed to the ſame Effect, adding, that they all attended the Earl when he delivered the Meſſage to his Majeſty, offering to advance a Month's Pay; and that he thought there might be three hundred in the Hall when the Meſſage was agreed on.

Sir William Pennyman and Sir William Savile confirmed the Teſtimony of the former, and added, that in that Part of the Country where they lived, it was cheerfully paid, and no Complaint made; and Sir Edward Oſborne ſaid, he knew of no forceible Means uſed: Others confirmed this, and ſaid, if there were any Differences about it, it was where the People thought themſelves aſſeſſed above their Proportion.

Then his Lordſhip obſerved, that as to the Warrant that had been produced for levying this Money, directed to Sir Edward Oſborne, wherein the Money was ordered to be paid on Peril of their Lives, he declared he never iſſued any ſuch Warrant; and unleſs they produced ſuch a one under his Hand, he hoped their Lordſhips would acquit him of it: That the Money was, in Truth, voluntarily offered and paid, and no Force uſed; and ſince no ſuch Warrant appeared to be iſſued by him, he thought he muſt be adjudged clear of the Matter charged in this Article.

He obſerved farther, That his Commiſſion would bear him out, if he had no other Authority, for what he did; for by that he was empowered to command all Lieutenants and Deputy-Lieutenants, to ſend out ſuch able-bodied Men for the War as he ſhould appoint, ſufficiently armed; and that he did not ſend to them to raiſe Money, but Men; and if they found it for their Eaſe, they might be at the Charge of ſending others, and not ſerve in Perſon themſelves; and his Commiſſion indemnified him for what he ſhould do in the Premiſes; However, if he had erred in the Execution of his Commiſſion, he was juſtified by the Statute of 11 Hen. VII. cap. 1. which declared, that it was againſt Law and Conſcience, that Perſons executing the King's Commands in Time of War, ſhould loſe or forfeit any Thing; and therefore enacted, that all who ſerved the King in his Wars, ſhould not, for ſo doing their Duty, be proſecuted for Treaſon, or any other Offence, whereby they ſhould forfeit Lands or Goods; but ſhould be utterly diſcharged from all Vexation, &c.

The Managers replied, That if a Majority of the Gentlemen did agree to raiſe a Month's Pay, they could not lay a Tax upon the reſt of the County, or bind thoſe that diſſented: That the raiſing Money by ſuch Warrants was not legal, much leſs the levying Money by Force.

1641. 17 Car. I.

That his Lordſhip's Commiſſion gave him no Power to levy Money, nor was the Statute he mentioned to his Purpoſe; for That only ſaid, when Men were doing their Duty, according to their Allegiance, they ſhould not be attainted of Treaſon: But this did not juſtify the levying of Money on the Subject in an unlawful Way, nor did the Warrants require the Subject to ſerve or pay Money in Lieu of it; but if they refuſed to pay ſuch a Sum of Money, then they were obliged to ſerve.

And though the Lord Strafford objected that the Warrants did not concern him, becauſe they were not under his Hand; it appeared they were under the Hand of the Vice-Preſident, who was ſuppoſed to have a Warrant from him.

That this Juſtification of the Priſoner's, in the Face of the Parliament, was ſufficient to condemn him: To ſay, becauſe he was Lieutenant-General of the Army, he might iſſue his Warrants, and tax the Subject, was to aſſume a Parliamentary Power, without which no Tax could be laid. —— Here the Earl interrupted the Manager, and ſaid, the commanding Men to perform their Duty in Defence of their King and Country, was very different from a Power of impoſing Taxes, which he never pretended to.

The Managers replied, he had maintained, that by the Authority of his Commiſſion he could juſtify what he had done: That he gave Warrants to levy Money, which was levied by Force; and conſequently he had aſſumed a Power of levying Money by Force: That it did not follow, becauſe a Man was bound to ſerve in Perſon, therefore Money might be required of him; and if he refuſed it, he muſt be forced into the Service, on pain of Death, according to the Tenor of Sir Edward Oſborne's Warrant.

The Managers drop ſeveral Articles.

The Managers not thinking fit to ſay any thing to the 28th Article, (and having dropped ſeveral others before,) the 12th of April was appointed for ſumming up the Evidence on both Sides; when the Peers being aſſembled, and the Earl brought to the Bar, the Lord High Steward directed him to ſum up the Charge and his Defence as clearly and ſuccinctly as he could.

Whereupon the Earl addreſſed himſelf, to recapitulate what had been offered on either Side: But Ruſhworth has thought fit to give us only an Abſtract of this Speech in his Defence; though he omitted nothing that was ſaid or ſuggeſted on the other Side againſt him.

It is needleſs to mention any thing of this Recapitulation on either Side, which has been ſaid before, becauſe the Reader may turn back, and have Recourſe to the Evidence and Arguments; but if there be any Remarks or Obſervations that have not been made already, it may be proper to touch upon them.

The Earl obſerved that, in the Management of this Cauſe, the Managers had averred, that ſeveral ſeveral Articles were fully proved, of which no manner of Proof had been made.

1641. 17 Car. I.

The Earl sums up the Evidence, and Arguments on either Side.

That as they went on, Article by Article, the Managers had admitted that none of them were Treaſon ſingly; but urged that every one conduced to prove the Treaſon they charged him with: But he had watched all along to the laſt, to ſee if he could find that poiſoned Arrow that ſhould envenom all the reſt; that deadly Cup of Wine that ſhould intoxicate; a few alledged Inconveniencies and Miſdemeanors, to run them up to High-Treaſon; but could diſcover nothing of this kind.

It ſeemed ſtrange to him that, ſince there were ſuch eſſential Differences between Miſdemeanors, Felonies, and Treaſons, any Number of Miſdemeanors ſhould make a Felony, or an hundred Felonies make a Treaſon.

That many Things had been urged againſt him, as conducing to Treaſon; but, unleſs it appeared that ſome Treaſon had been actually committed, this could not effect him.

That the Managers endeavoured to ſhew, there were two Sorts of Treaſon; namely, Treaſon by the Statute, and Treaſon by the Common Law; and that the latter were conſtructive and arbitrary Treaſons; but conſtructive Treaſons, he obſerved, had been a great while Strangers to this Commonwealth; and he truſted, by their Lordſhips Wiſdom and Juſtice, would be ſo ſtill.

Then his Lordſhip, having gone through the twenty-eight Articles, and the Evidence on both Sides, with the Obſervations that had been made on them; ſaid, He did not find that either the Statute or Common Law had declared an Endeavour to ſubvert the fundamental Laws to be High-Treaſon; or that thoſe Things were Treaſon accumulatively, that were not ſo apart; and he thought it very hard, his Life and Honour ſhould be brought in Queſtion on a Law that was not extant, and which no Man could ſhew; concluding, according to Ruſhworth, in theſe Words: "Jeſu! my Lords, where has this "Fire lain all this while, ſo many hundred "Years together, that no Smoke ſhould ap"pear, till it burſt out now, to conſume me "and my Children: Hard it is! extreme hard, "in my Opinion, that the Puniſhment ſhould "precede the Promulgation of the Law: That "I ſhould be puniſhed by a Law ſubſequent to "the Act done. I moſt humbly beſeech your "Lordſhips, take that into Conſideration; for "certainly it were better a great deal to live "under no Law but the Will of Man, and "conform ourſelves in human Wiſdom as well "as we can, and to comply with that Will, "than to live under the Protection of a Law, "as we think; and then a Law be made to "puniſh us for a Crime precedent to that Law: "I conceive no Man living can be ſafe, if "that is to be admitted: Where no Token, "no Admonition is given, to beware of the "Offence, what human Prudence can prevent "a Man's Deſtruction, and that inſtantly?—— "May your Lordſhips have that Regard for "the Peerage of England, as never to ſuffer "yourſelves to be put upon thoſe moot Points, "upon ſuch Conſtructions and Interpretations "as theſe are, when the Law is not clear or "known. —— If there muſt be a Trial of "Wits, I beſeech your Lordſhips the Subject "may be of ſomething elſe than of your Lives "and Honours: It will be your Lordſhips "Wiſdom to caſt from you thoſe bloody and "myſterious Volumes of conſtructive and ar"bitrary Treaſons, and to betake yourſelves "to the plain Letter of the Statute, which tells "you where the Crime is, that ſo you may a"void it: And let us not, my Lords, be "ambitious to be more learned, in thoſe kill"ing Arts, than our Forefathers were. My "Lords, it is now full two hundred and forty "Years ſince any Man has been touched to "this Height upon this Crime, till I was ſin"gled out: Let us be content with what our "Forefathers left us, and not awake thoſe "ſleepy Lions to our own Deſtruction, by "raiſing up a Company of Records, that have "lain ſo many Ages by the Walls, forgotten "and neglected.

1641. 17 Car. I.

"My Lords, it troubles me extremely, to "reflect that my Misfortunes may be made a "Precedent to the Diſadvantage of the whole "Kingdom: I beſeech your Lordſhips, there"fore, to conſider my particular Caſe, that "you do not, through me, wound the Intereſt "of the Commonwealth; for though the Gen"tlemen Managers ſay they ſpeak for the Com"monwealth, I believe in this Particular I "ſpeak for the Commonwealth too; and that "the Miſeries that will follow upon this will "be ſuch, that in a few Years it will come to "that which is expreſſed in the Act of Hen"ry IV: That no Man will know what to do, or "what to ſay.

"Do not, my Lords, put thoſe Difficulties "on the Miniſters, but that they may, with "Cheerfulneſs, ſerve the King and the State; "leſt it come to this, That no Man will med"dle with Affairs of State that hath Wiſdom, "and Honour, and Fortune to loſe.

"I have troubled your Lordſhips longer "than I ſhould have done, were it not for "the Intereſt of thoſe Pledges that a Saint in "Heaven left me. I would be loth, my "Lords,——— [Here he wept, and pauſed.] "What I forfeit for myſelf is nothing; but I "confeſs, that my Indiſcretion ſhould forfeit "for them, it wounds me very deeply. Par"don my Infirmity; ſomething I ſhould have "ſaid, but I ſee I ſhall not be able. And now, "my Lords, for myſelf, I thank God, I have been "taught, that the Afflictions of this preſent "Life are not to be compared with that eter"nal Weight of Glory that ſhall be revealed "hereafter. And ſo my Lords, with all Hu"mility and Tranquility of Mind, I ſubmit "myſelf clearly and freely to your Judgments; "and, whether that righteous Judgment ſhall "be to Life or Death,

TE DEUM LAUDAMUS: TE DOMINUM CONFITEMUR.

The Managers ſum up the Reply to the Earl.

To this Speech of the Earl's, Mr. Glynn, the Manager, replied, that notwithſtanding his Lordſhip had often obſerved that many of the Articles were proved but by one Witneſs, and that the Statute of Ed. VI. required two, this was a Fallacy, known to his own Breaſt; for the Treaſon laid to his Charge was, The ſubverting the Laws; and though ſome one Fact might be

be proved only by one Witneſs; yet put the Witneſſes together, and there were an Hundred to the whole, which abundantly ſatisfied the Intention of the Statute. That his Lordſhip had aſperſed the Managers, by ſaying they had affirmed Things to be proved which were not proved; but they ſhould retort upon him, That he had been that Day guilty in the higheſt Degree, of what he moſt unjuſtly laid to their Charge.

As to his Lordſhip's Objection, that there had been no Treaſon committed: The very Intention of killing the King was Treaſon, and it was the Intention of the Death of the Law that was in Queſtion, it had been too late to queſtion him after the Law had been actually killed. The Law could not have adjudged him guilty of Treaſon, when the Law itſelf had been ſubverted. That Guy Faux had a fairer Excuſe than my Lord Strafford, for he only diſcovered Intentions of blowing up the King and State; but his Lordſhip by his Councils and Actions had expreſſed a Deſign of deſtroying the whole Kingdom, and the King's Claim by Law, and by Deſcent. (And, having ſummed up the Evidence for the Commons, he ſaid) If this Lion, now he is chained and muzzled, and under a Proſecution for High-Treaſon, would dare to vent ſuch Language, and expreſs ſo much Malignity, as he had done in his Defence, how would he deſtroy if he was unchained? The Lord Strafford was queſtioned for High-Treaſon, in going about to ſubvert the Laws of both Kingdoms, in Defence whereof their Lordſhips noble Anceſtors had ſpent their Blood; and as they were the Sons of thoſe Fathers, and the ſame noble Blood run in their Veins, he was confident they would not think that Man fit to live, who would deſtroy that which protected their Lives, Liberties, and Eſtates.

That their Lordſhips had the Complaints of three Kingdoms preſented before them againſt this great Man, whereby they might obſerve a mighty Storm was raiſed, that threatned their Ruin and Deſtruction: That the Commons had diſcovered this Jonas who occaſioned the Tempeſt, and as much as in them lay would diſcharge their Conſciences, and throw him out of the Ship to allay the Tempeſt; and they expected, and were confident their Lordſhips would finiſh the Work, and that with Expedition, leſt by the Continuance of the Storm, the Ship, Tackling and Mariners, both Church and Common-Wealth, ſhould be ruined and deſtroyed.

Mr. Pym, another of the Managers (uſually ſtiled in thoſe Days King Pym, from his Influence on that Factious Houſe of Commons, and the Mob) ſeconded Mr. Glynn, and averred that it was clearly proved, the Earl of Strafford had endeavoured, by his Words, Actions, and Councils, to ſubvert the fundamental Laws of England and Ireland, and introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical Government: That this was the envenomed Arrow for which he enquired; this was the intoxicating Cup that had tainted his Judgment, and poiſoned his Heart; and from thence was infuſed that ſpecifical Difference which turned his Speeches, Actions, and Councils into Treaſon, not Cumulative, as his Lordſhip expreſſed it, as if many Miſdemeanors could make one Treaſon, but formally and eſſentially; for it was the End that made the ſpecifick Difference: Even indifferent Words and Actions might be Treaſon, being done and ſpoken with a treaſonable Intention.

1641. 17 Car. I.

Then he ſhewed the great Benefits both the King and the Subject received from the Laws, and the Miſchiefs that would follow from that Subverſion of them, which the Earl had conſpired, and endeavoured to bring about: That as to the Earl's Objection, that he ought not to be queſtioned for what he had adviſed as a Privy-Counſellor, according to his Conſcience; his being a Privy-Counſellor made his Fault the more heinous, as being committed againſt ſo great a Truſt, and endeavouring, under the Character of a Privy-Counſellor, to infect and poiſon his Majeſty with ſuch wicked Principles and Deſigns.

As to that other Plea, That whatever he had ſaid was with a good Intention: Where the Matters propounded were Evil in their own Nature, as theſe were, they could never be juſtified by any Intentions: And as to what he had urged of the Neceſſity of the Caſe; if there was a Neceſſity, it was of his own making: He had brought the King under this Neceſſity, and muſt not make that a Ground of his Juſtification, which aggravated his Offence: That though he alledged they had proved nothing but Words, and no Effect followed, the miſerable Diſtempers into which he had brought all the three Kingdoms, was a ſufficient Evidence of the miſchievous Effects of his Councils: That to alter the Frame and Conſtitution of Government was Treaſon in any State; and the Laws would be very defective, if they had not a Power to ſecure and preſerve themſelves.

That Life, Honour, and Eſtate, it was true, were all forfeited by Treaſon; but this Priſoner had committed ſo many Treaſons, that, though he paid all theſe Forfeitures, he would ſtill remain a Debtor to the State: And nothing could be more equal than that he ſhould periſh by the Juſtice of that Law he would have ſubverted. Neither was this a new way of Blood, but this Law might be traced to the very Original of the Kingdom. If, as he alledged, it had not been put in Execution theſe Two Hundred and Forty Years, it was becauſe, in all that Time, there had not been found a Man bold enough to commit ſuch Crimes as theſe.

Mr. Lane's argument for the Earl, as to Matter of Law.

Then Mr. Lane, Attorney-General to the Prince, being permitted to argue the Points of Law in behalf of the Earl of Strafford, obſerved, That it was admitted the Earl was not within the Letter of the Statute of 25 Ed. III. and proceeded to ſhew that he was not within the Meaning of it; for that, 1. It was a Declarative Law, and ſuch were not to be taken by Conſequence, Equity, or Conſtruction, but by the Letter only; and, 2. It was a Penal Law, and if their Grounds (as yet unqueſtioned) held good, ſuch Laws admitted of no Conſtructions or Inferences: That by the Statute of 21 Edw. III. it was made Treaſon for a Servant to kill his Maſter; and in the 23d 1641. 17 Car. I. of the ſame Reign, one was proſecuted for Treaſon, in killing his Father, grounded on that Argument, a majore ad minus; but it was reſolved that it could not be Treaſon, becauſe the 25th of Edw. III. had ſpecified what Facts ſhould be Treaſon, ſince which nothing could be conſtrued Treaſon that was not ſo by the Letter of that Act.

That one or more Acts of Injuſtice could in no Senſe be termed a Subverſion of the Laws; for, if ſo, we might have as many Traytors as Judges, theſe being all Men ſubject to Error, and might one Time or other have given erroneous Judgments.

That in the 28th of Hen. VI. John de la Pole, Duke of Suffolk, was charged by the Houſe of Commons with Articles of High-Treaſon, not unlike theſe; as that he had given bad Advice, that he had debaſed the Coin, ſeſſed Men of War, made ſummary Decrees, impoſed Taxes, corrupted the Fountains of Juſtice, perſuaded the King to an unneceſſary War, and to relinquiſh Anjou; but theſe Articles being debated by the Lords, they reſolved they were Felony, but not Treaſon: Another Perſon was charged with ſubverting the Laws in the Reign of Hen. VIII. and it was held not to be Treaſon; and this was the Caſe alſo of Richard Larkes.

Nor was the Earl charged here with ſubverting the Fundamental Laws, but with an Intention to ſubvert them; and an Intention was only Treaſon, when the Life of the King, or Queen, or of their Children, was deſigned: In other Treaſons, the Fact muſt be actually committed, as well as intended, by the 25th of Edw. III. as killing the Chancellor, Counterfeiting the Broad Seal, the Coin, &c.

And if ſuch an Intention was not Treaſon by the Statute, ſo neither was it by the Common Law; for all Treaſons were aboliſhed which were not ſpecified in the 25 Edw. III. and this was not to be found in that Statute.

As to the Saving in this Statute, that reſerved a Power to the Parliament to declare what ſhould be Treaſon for the Time to come: That Proviſo was repealed by a Statute made in the Reign of Hen. IV. and it was further enacted thereby, That nothing ſhould be deemed Treaſon, but what was literally contained in the 25th of Edw. III. whereupon the Record ſays, there was great Joy at the making this Act; for the drawn Sword, hanging over every Man's Head by this ſlender Thread of a Conſequence or Illation, was removed by that Act. And by the Statute of the 1ſt of Mary alſo it is declared, That none ſhall be puniſhed in Life or Eſtate as a Traytor, but for a Crime contained in the 25th of Edw. III. and no Mention is there made of the Salvo. That the Earl of Northumberland's Caſe, in the Reign of Hen. IV. came the neareſt to this; and that was declared to be but Felony, though it would have been conſtrued Treaſon, if it had not been for the Statute of 1 Hen. IV. whereby that Proviſo was repealed. And he was confident, ſince that Act not one Man had ever been declared a Traytor, either by the King or Parliament, except it were upon the 25 Edw. III. or ſome other Statute literally and declaratively taken.

The Trial being over, and the Faction pretty well aſſured that a Majority of the Lords were of Opinion, that there was no Treaſon in the Articles preferred by the Commons, and that the Earl was in a fair way of being acquitted by his Peers, they did not think fit to rely on their Judgment, but immediately brought a Bill into the Houſe of Commons, to attaint the Earl of High-Treaſon, being reſolved, if there was no Law in being that would deſtroy him, they would make a Law on Purpoſe, and force the Royal Aſſent to it, as well as the Compliance of the Upper Houſe, by their Rebellious Mob.

1641. 17 Car. I. The Commons neglect to demand Judgment, and bring in a Bill of Attainder.

Upon bringing in the Bill of Attainder, the Lord Digby, who had been one of the Managers of the Commons, being now fully convinced of the Malice and Fury with which this Proſecution was carried on, made a Speech upon the Occaſion, wherein he ſaid, He muſt put the Houſe in Mind of the Difference between Proſecutors and Judges; how unbecoming that Fervour was in them, now they were Judges, which perhaps might be commendable in them as Proſecutors: That it was honeſt and noble to be zealous for the Diſcovery of Truth; but when that was brought to Light, their Judgment thereupon ought to be calm and cautious: That the Grounds on which he delivered his Opinion to the Houſe, that the Earl ought to be proſecuted for High-Treaſon, were vaniſhed; and, for that Reaſon, he begged Leave to alter his Opinion.

Lord Digby's Speech on this Occaſion.

Before he gave his Conſent to the Accuſation, he was aſſured it would be proved, that the Earl had adviſed the King to employ the Army of Ireland to reduce England. That Mr. Secretary Vane's Notes, from which this was ſaid to be proved, appeared to be but diſjointed Fragments, which no Man could make any thing of: And none of the Council, but Sir H. Vane, heard any ſuch Words, and he varied in his Teſtimony. That the firſt Time the Secretary was examined, concerning the Army in Ireland, he ſaid poſitively, I can not charge him with That; and being examined another Time, he anſwered, I can ſay nothing to That. And yet at a third Examination he depoſed, that the Earl of Strafford ſaid to the King, You have an Army in Ireland, which you may employ here to reduce this Kingdom. Theſe Circumſtances induced his Lordſhip to diſcard that Grand Article, concerning his deſperate Advice to the King, of employing the Iriſh Army to reduce England.

Had this been proved, he could have condemned the Earl with Innocence, as he had proſecuted him with Earneſtneſs; but, as the Caſe ſtood, he could not ſatisfy his Conſcience in doing it.

That this Deſign of Force not appearing, his other wicked Practices could not amount to ſo high a Crime; there were more natural Sources to derive his other Crimes from, than a Deſire of bringing in Tyranny to enſlave them and his own Poſterity, namely, Pride, Revenge, Avarice, Paſſion, and Inſolence of Nature; but, had this of the Iriſh Army been proved, it would have diffuſed a Complexion of Treaſon over all.

That

1641. 17 Car. I.

That his Crimes might perhaps render him worthier to die than many Traytors: And there might be Reaſon to Enact they ſhould be Treaſon for the future: But God forbid he ſhould give Judgment of Death on any Man, and ruin his Poſterity, upon a Law made a poſteriori.

The Parliament had a judicial and a legiſlative Power; the Meaſure of the one was what was legally Juſt, of the other, what was prudentially and politically fit for the Good and Preſervation of the whole; but theſe were not to be confounded in Judgment: They muſt not piece up want of Legality with Matter of Convenience. Beſides, he was aſſured neither the King, nor the Lords would paſs the Bill, and that it would cauſe great Diviſions in the State; he adviſed them, therefore, to lay aſide this Bill of Attainder, and think of another, which might ſpare his Life, and yet ſecure the State againſt the Lord Strafford, without endangering it as much by a Diviſion concerning his Puniſhment, as the Earl had endangered it by his Practices.

Every Man ought to lay his Hand upon his Heart, and conſider what they were about to do; Whether Juſtice, or Murder. And whether the putting this Lord to Death would not be Murder, with the higheſt Aggravation; Murder under a Colour of Juſtice. —— The beſt Lawyers were in a diametrical Oppoſition, as to the Nature of the Offence: They would do well, therefore, to diveſt themſelves of all Paſſion and perſonal Animoſity, as well as of all other unjuſtifiable Conſiderations, before they paſſed Judgment. —— Neither an Apprehenſion that the People would be incenſed, if this Lord's Blood was ſpared, or that it was not fit that one, who was accuſed by the Commons of High-Treaſon, ſhould eſcape with Life, were ſufficient Reaſons for condemning him: Of all ſuch corrupt Motives his Lordſhip did before God diſcharge himſelf, and waſh his Hands of the Earl of Strafford's Blood.

The Bill of Attainder paſſed by the Commons, and ſent up to the Lords.

The Bill being read a third Time the ſame Day, it was carried by 204 againſt 59; after which it was ſent up to the Lords, by Mr. Pym, the great Promoter of it, with Orders to acquaint their Lordſhips, That it was a Bill which highly concerned the Common-Wealth, eſpecially the expediting of it: And Mr. Pym being returned; reported that he had delivered the Bill of Attainder to the Lords, and acquainted them, that the Commons were ready to juſtify the Legality of the Bill.

The Houſe of Peers having appointed the 23d of April, and afterwards the 29th of April, to hear the Points of Law argued, in Maintainance of the Bill of Attainder; Mr. Solicitor St. John was aſſign'd by the Commons for this Service, and Mr. Glynn, and Mr. Maynard, ordered to be his Aſſiſtants. In the mean Time, the Commons took Exceptions to the Lord Digby's Speech, which he was obliged to explain with ſome qualifying Expreſſions: And Petitions were preferred to both Houſes, by the Citizens of London, ſaid to be ſigned by twenty thouſand Citizens, requiring, that Juſtice might be done upon the Earl of Strafford, and other Incendiaries; without which, the Petitioners declared, That neither their Lives, Liberties, or Eſtates, could be ſecured: And the Commons ſent another Meſſage to the Lords, to expedite the Bill of Attainder; requiring alſo, that the Lord Strafford might be cloſe confined, becauſe they feared he would eſcape: And on the 29th of April Mr. St. John addreſſed himſelf, to make good the Legality of the Bill of Attainder, before the Lords in Weſtminſter-Hall, the Earl then ſtanding at the Bar.

1641. 17 Car. I.

Mr. St. John obſerved, That in ſeveral Countries, there were different Meaſures of Puniſhment inflicted for the ſame Offence; and that in England, the ſame Law which enabled inferiour Courts to judge according to the Laws already made, empowered the Parliament to make New Laws: However, they did not intend to make a new Treaſon, and condemn the Lord Strafford for it; they were moved by other Conſiderations. He held that in former Ages, when Doubts in Law aroſe of great and general Concernment, the Parliament was uſually conſulted; which was the Reaſon that many Acts were declarative of the Old, and not introductive of any New Law. Secondly, They proceeded this way, to obviate thoſe Scruples and Delays, which through a Diſuſe of Proceedings of this Nature might ariſe; and becauſe ſome Doubts had been ſtarted, as if the Declaratory Power of Parliaments was taken away. Thirdly, In reſpect of the Proofs; for if it ſhould happen, that the whole Evidence given was not contained in the Charge, yet ſuch Evidence might be made uſe of by this way of Bill; it not being neceſſary, in this way of Proceeding, that there ſhould be any Articles or Charge at all: And ſo in the Caſe of double Teſtimony, though two Witneſſes might be required, by I. Edw. 6. in the Courts of Law; yet on a Bill of Attainder in Parliament, private Satisfaction to each Man's Conſcience, was ſufficient; although no Evidence at all was given. That theſe Proceedings by Way of Bill, was not to decline their Lordſhips Juſtice in the Judicial Way, but to husband Time in theſe Exigencies of State, and ſilence all Doubts.

St. John's Argument for the Bill of Attainder.

Then he endeavoured to ſhew, that the Earl was guilty of Treaſon, within the 25 Edw. III. But theſe Arguments having been urged before, and unanſwerably confuted by the Earl, I omit the Repetition of them; and he ſeems to have been conſcious there was very little in his Arguments on this Head: For he proceeds to tell their Lordſhips, that the Commons had given him Command, to offer further Reaſons, for their reſorting to their legiſlative Power; as firſt, from the Nature of the Earl's Offence, in endeavouring to overthrow the Laws; and ſecondly, from the Frame and Conſtitution of the Parliament, which comprehended the whole Body Politick, and conſequently had Power over every individual Member, for the Preſervation of the whole. And as to what had been ſo often inculcated, That the Law ought to precede the Puniſhment: Why ſhould the Earl expect any Benefit from the Law, that would take it from others? They allowed Law indeed to Hares and Deer, but it was never accounted foul Play to knock Foxes and Wolves on the Head: That the Earl's, was an Offence againſt the Light of Nature, againſt the Dictates of the dulleſt Conſcience: That he well knew he had offended the promulged and ordinary Rules of Law. That Crimes againſt Law had been proved and confeſſed; ſo that the Queſtion was not de culpa, ſed de pœna; and though his Lordſhip had aſſerted, that twenty Felonies could not make a Treaſon, they muſt differ from him, if he meant it in the Uſe of the legiſlative Power; for he that deſerved Death for one of thoſe Felonies, deſerved a more painful and ignominious Death for all together, and cited ſome Precedents, where the uſual Puniſhment had been increaſed, on Account of the heinous Circumſtances the Facts were attended with, as in the Caſe of the Biſhop of Rocheſter's Cook who poiſoned the Broth, which was the Death of a great many People; the Cook was attainted of Treaſon, and it was enacted, that he ſhould be boiled to death.

The Lords refuſe to hear the Earl's Counſel, on the Bill of Attainder.

They next Day, being the 30th of April, the Earl petitioned that his Counſel might be heard, as to the Legality and Equity of a Bill of Attainder in this Caſe, where he was taken out of the ordinary Courſe of Juſtice, and a Law propoſed on Purpoſe to deſtroy him: But he was refuſed this Favour.

Thus far RUSHWORTH.

The King's Speech, acquitting the Earl of the Charge.

The King going to the Houſe of Peers the 1ſt of May, declared from the Throne, that he could not in Conſcience condemn the Earl of Strafford of High Treaſon, and that he would acquaint them with three great Truths. Firſt, That he never had any Intention to bring over the Iriſh Army into England, nor was ever adviſed by any one to do it. Secondly, That there never was any Debate before him, of the Diſaffection of his Engliſh Subjects, neither had he any Suſpicion of them. Thirdly, Neither was he adviſed by any one, to alter the leaſt of the Engliſh Laws. He did admit the Earl had been guilty of ſome Miſdemeanors, and ſuch as rendered him unfit to ſerve himſelf, or the Commonwealth, in any Place of Truſt: But he hoped there might be ſome Expedient found out, to ſatisfy Juſtice and their own Fears, without oppreſſing his Conſcience.

The Commons exclaim againſt the King's Speech, as a Breach of Privilege.

The Commons being acquainted with this Speech, exclaimed againſt it as a Breach of the Privileges of Parliament; and ſaid, it was a prejudging of their Councils, an Obſtruction to Juſtice, &c. and the next Day, they drew down five or ſix thouſand of the City Mob, armed with Swords and Clubs, to Weſtminſter, who having filled the Palace-Yards, and every other Avenue to the Parliament-Houſe, ſtopped the Members Coaches, crying out, Juſtice, Juſtice! Execution, Execution! Nor would they ſuffer ſome of the Lords to paſs, till they had promiſed to Vote for the Attainder and Execution of the Earl of Strafford. The ſame Rabble, with Cornelius Burgeſs the Puritan Preacher at their Head, broke into Weſtminſter-Abbey, plundered the Church of the Furniture and ſacred Veſtments; and then in a hoſtile Manner, marched to the Palace of Whitehall, where they inſulted and abuſed his Majeſty, who adviſed them to return Home and mind their Buſineſs.

1641. 17 Car. I. They inſult the King and Royal Family at Whitehall.

Nothing is more evident than that the Commons abetted and encouraged theſe Tumults, not only from their threatning the Lords with them; but from their impriſoning thoſe Juſtices of Peace, who endeavoured to diſperſe the Rabble, and declaring, it was free for all Men to petition the Parliament in this hoſtile Manner: Nor were theſe People only an undiſciplined Multitude; they were formed into regular Bodies, and had Arms given them; and every Profeſſion of Mechanicks, Taylors, Tinkers, Shoemakers, Weavers, Porters, and Watermen, had their particular Captains and Leaders, whom they obeyed implicitly: Theſe poſted up at Weſtminſter-hall Gate, and all publick Places about Town, the Names of the Commons, who voted againſt the Earl of Strafford's Attainder, denominating them STRAFFORDIANS, and Enemies to their Country; but ſtill the Attainder was in danger of being rejected by the Houſe of Peers: Whereupon the Faction, to facilitate the paſſing it, pretended they had diſcovered a Plot, between the Court and the Army, for reſcuing the Earl of Strafford, and putting a Force upon the Parliament; which was worked up with ſuch Art, that both Houſes appeared in the utmoſt Conſternation, and entered into a ſolemn Proteſtation, to defend themſelves and their Privileges, againſt all Perſons whatever, which they impoſed on their Fellow-Subjects, by the Authority of their own Votes, without the King's Leave; and that having harraſſed and frightened the Lords with their Plots and their Mobs, they compelled them in a manner to paſs the Bill of Attainder on the 8th of May; there being twenty-five Lords Content, and nineteen Not content; ſo that the Bill was carried but by a Majority of ſix Voices.

A pretended Plot to facilitate the paſſing the Attainder.

The ſame Day, (viz.) Saturday the 8th of May, both Houſes attended his Majeſty, importuning him to give the Royal Aſſent to the Bill; but could get no other Anſwer from him, than that they ſhould know his Mind the Monday following: Whereupon they ſent down the Rabble to Whitehall, who cried out, as they were taught, Juſtice! Juſtice! threatning the Deſtruction of the King, Queen, and Royal Family, unleſs his Majeſty conſented to Strafford's Death: At which, it is ſaid, the Queen was ſo terrified, being conſcious of the Rage of the People againſt her, on Account of her Religion, that ſhe begged the King to yeild to their Demands, for the Preſervation of themſelves and their Children: But he was not to be moved by her Intreaties, to give up ſo brave and faithful a Servant. He ſummoned the Privy Council, the Judges, and five of the Biſhops therefore, and required their Advice, how to extricate himſelf out of the Difficulties that ſurrounded him. The five Biſhops that attended him, were Arch-Biſhop Uſher, Dr. Morton Biſhop of Durham, Dr. Williams Biſhop of Lincoln, Dr. Potter Biſhop of Carliſle, and Dr. Juxton Biſhop of London: But he could receive little Satisfaction from any

I. any of them, only Biſhop Juxton had the Honeſty and Courage to tell him, he ought to do nothing againſt his Conſcience, for any Conſiderative whatever; while ſome of the reſt of the Biſhops ſcandalouſly inſinuated, it is ſaid, that the King had a publick and a private Conſcience, and that he ought to diſtinguiſh between the one, and the other. And how Innocent ſoever he might believe the Earl in his private Opinion, he ought to be governed by the Opinion of the two Houſes of Parliament, and the Judges, who had declared the Earl guilty of High-Treaſon.

Still his Majeſty ſeemed determined not to give up this Great Man to the Malice of his Enemies; but the Earl, being informed of the Diſtreſs the King was in, and that the Ruin of the Royal Family was threatened, if he did not give the Royal Aſſent to the Bill, generouſly wrote to his Majeſty, not to hazard the Safety of his Family, and the Peace of the Kingdom, for his Sake, but paſs the Bill; adding, that his Conſent would acquit his Majeſty in the Eye of Heaven, and he ſhould reſign his Life with all the Chearfulneſs imaginable, as an Acknowledgment of the Favours he had received from his Sovereign. And this, it is ſaid, went a great way in determining his Majeſty's Reſolution: After he had ſpent two Days and Nights, therefore, in the utmoſt Perplexity, he ſigned a Commiſſion to the Earl of Arundel, and two other Noblemen, to paſs this Bill, with another, no leſs fatal to himſelf and the Kingdom, namely, The Bill to make the Parliament perpetual, unleſs they conſented to their own Diſſolution. This Bill was hurried on, and paſſed both Houſes in a Day or two, under Pretence, that they could borrow no Money for the Service of the State, unleſs the People had an Aſſurance that the Parliament ſhould not be diſſolved; and it was contrived to offer it to the King at this Time, when his Thoughts were entirely taken up with the Earl of Strafford's Caſe, and he could not be ſuppoſed at Leiſure to examine into Conſequences of ſuch a Conceſſion.

The Earl himſelf adviſes the King to paſs the Bill.

The King gives his Aſſent to the Attainder, and to the Bill to perpetuate the Parliament.

The Commons were over-joyed at th epaſſing theſe two Bills, and returned his Majeſty their Thanks for his extraordinary Condeſcenſion, aſſuring him, THEY WOULD MAKE HIM A GLORIOUS KING, AND RICHER THAN ANY OF HIS PREDECESSORS: But, whatever they then deſigned to make him, certain it is, he became from that Hour Dependant on the Parliament, and by giving the Royal Aſſent to thoſe two Acts, reſigned his Authority and Influence over his People. No Man durſt ſerve him, after they ſaw this Great Miniſter ſacrificed to his Enemies; the Parliament perpetuated, and aſſuming a Power of compelling the King to yield to whatever they demanded. The giving up Lord Strafford to their Fury, therefore, was ſo far from reſtoring Peace and Tranquility to the Common-wealth, or Safety to the Royal Family, that it inſpired the Faction with ſtill more Inſolence, made them look upon the King and Peers as their Vaſſals, and uſe them for the future as if they really had no other Authority than what they derived from the People, whoſe Repreſentatives the Commons were.

The King, too late ſenſible of his Error, wrote to the Houſe of Peers, by the Prince his Son, to entreat that Mercy might be ſhewn the Earl: That they would be content with his perpetual Impriſonment; and endeavour to obtain a Conference with the Houſe of Commons, and bring them into the ſame Sentiments, adding, by way of Poſtſcript, That if he muſt die, it were Charity to reprieve him 'till Saturday. But ſo little Influence had the Prayers and Entreaties of their once Dread Sovereign, that the Lords let his Majeſty know, neither of his Intentions could be complied with, pretending that the Queen and their Children would be in Danger, if they ſhould conſent to either.

Wedneſday the 12th of May, therefore, being appointed for the Execution of the Earl, he deſired the Lieutenant of the Tower, the Evening before, to let him ſpeak with the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, his Fellow-Priſoner; but the Lieutenant anſwered, he durſt not permit him, without an Order of Parliament: Whereupon the Earl related to Archbiſhop Uſher, who was then at his Lordſhip's Lodgings in the Tower, what he intended to have ſaid, if he had been permitted to ſee Archbiſhop Laud, namely, That he would have deſired his Grace to aſſiſt him with his Prayers that Night, and give him his Bleſſing when he went to the Scaffold the next Day; he deſired alſo he would be at his Window, that he might thank him for all his Favours; and Archbiſhop Uſher delivering the Meſſage to Archbiſhop Laud that Evening, his Grace of Canterbury appeared at his Window next Morning, as the Earl paſſed by, when the Earl looking up, and demanding his Prayers, and his Bleſſing, his Grace lifted up his Hands, and gave him both; then the Earl, making a ſubmiſſive Bow, ſaid, God protect your Innocency, and moved on towards the Scaffold, which was erected on Tower-Hill. The Lieutenant deſired he would take Coach, for fear the Mob ſhould ruſh on him as he walked, and pull him to Pieces: But the Earl anſwered, No; he was not afraid to look Death in the Face, and the People too. Have you a Care, ſays the Earl, that I don't eſcape; and whether I die by the Hands of the Executioner, or the Fury of the People, to me is perfectly indifferent.

The Execution appointed.

The Earl takes his Leave of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Having mounted the Scaffold, he ſaluted the Gentlemen he found there, and began to take his laſt Leave of his Friends, who appeared much more concerned than himſelf, and obſerving his Brother, Sir George Wentworth, to weep: Brother (ſaid he chearfully) What do you ſee in me to deſerve theſe Tears? Does any indecent Fear betray in me any Guilt, or my innocent Aſſurance any Atheiſm? Think now that you are accompanying me the third Time to my Marriage Bed: Never did I throw off my Cloaths with greater Freedom and Content, than in this Preparation to my Grave. That Stock (pointing to the Block) muſt be my Pillow: Here ſhall I reſt from all my Labours: No envious Thoughts, no Dreams of Treaſon, Jealouſies, or Cares for the King, the State, or myſelf, ſhall interrupt this eaſy Sleep: Therefore, Brother, pity with me thoſe Men, who, contrary to their Intention, have made me happy. Rejoice in my Happineſs, Rejoice in my Innocence. Then kneeling down, he made this Proteſtation: I hope, Gentlemen, you think that neither the Fear of Loſs, or Love of Reputation, will ſuffer me to belie God and my own Conſcience at this Time. I am now in the very Door going out, and my next Step muſt be be from Time to Eternity, either of Peace or Pain. To clear myſelf before you all, I do here ſolemnly call God to Witneſs, I am not guilty, ſo far as I can underſtand, of the great Crime laid to my Charge; nor have ever had the leaſt Inclination or Intention to damnify or prejudice the King, the State, the Laws, or Religion of this Kingdom; but with my beſt Endeavours to ſerve all, and to ſupport all, ſo may God be merciful to my Soul.

His Proteſtation of his Innocence.

His Speech to the People.

Then riſing up he ſaid, My Lord Primate of Ireland, and my Lords, and the reſt of theſe noble Gentlemen, It is a great Comfort to me to have your Lordſhips by me this Day, becauſe I have been known to you a long Time. I come here, by the good Will and Pleaſure of God, to pay that laſt Debt I owe to Sin, which is Death; and by the Bleſſing of that God, I truſt to riſe again, through the Merits of Jeſus Chriſt, to Righteouſneſs and Life Eternal.

I ſubmit to the Judgment, that has paſſed on me, with a quiet and contented Mind. I thank God I freely forgive all the World from my very Heart; there is not a diſpleaſing Thought ariſing in me towards any Man living; and my Conſcience bears me Witneſs, that in all my Employments, ſince I had the Honour to ſerve his Majeſty, I never had any Thing in the Purpoſe of my Heart, but what tended to the joint and individual Proſperity of King and People, although it hath been my ill Fortune to be miſunderſtood.

I am not the firſt that hath ſuffered in this kind; it is the common Portion of us all, while we are in this Life, to err: Righteous Judgment we muſt wait for in another Place; for here we are very ſubject to be misjudged one of another. There is one Thing I deſire to free myſelf of, and I am very confident I ſhall obtain your Chriſtian Charity in the Belief of it. I was ſo far from being againſt Parliaments, that I always thought the Parliaments of England, were the moſt happy Conſtitutions that any Kingdom or Nation ever lived under, and the beſt Means under God, to make both King and People happy.

My Lord Primate, it is a great Comfort to me, that his Majeſty conceives me not meriting ſo ſevere and heavy a Puniſhment. I do infinitely rejoice in this Mercy of his, and I beſeech God to return it into his own Boſom, that he may find Mercy when he ſtands moſt in Need of it.

I wiſh this Kingdom all the Proſperity and Happineſs in the World: I did it living, and now dying it is my Wiſh. I do moſt humbly recommend this to every Man who hears me; but deſire they would lay their Hands upon their Hearts, and ſeriouſly conſider, Whether the Beginning of the Happineſs and Reformation of a Kingdom ſhould be written in Letters of Blood; and may I never be ſo unhappy as that the leaſt Drop of my Blood ſhould riſe up in Judgment againſt any one of you; but I fear you are in a wrong way.

1641. 17 Car. I.

My Lords, I have but one Word more: I profeſs I die a true and obedient Son to the Church of England, wherein I was born, and in which I was bred; Peace and Proſperity be ever to it. It has been objected, but it is an Objection ſcarce worth anſwering, that I have been inclined to Popery, though I can truly ſay, that from the Time I was One and Twenty Years of Age, to this preſent, going now upon Forty-Nine, I never had it in my Heart to doubt of the Religion of the Church of England, nor ever had any Man the Boldneſs to ſuggeſt any ſuch Thing to me. And now, being reconciled by the Merits of Jeſus Chriſt my Saviour, into whoſe Boſom I hope I ſhall ſhortly be gathered, to thoſe eternal Happineſſes which ſhall never have an End, I deſire heartily the Forgiveneſs of every Man for any raſh or unadviſed Words, or any Thing done amiſs. And ſo, my Lords and Gentlemen, farewell! farewell all Things of this World!

I deſire you will now join with me in Prayer, and I truſt in God we ſhall all meet, and live eternally in Heaven, there to receive the accompliſhment of all Happineſs, where every Tear ſhall be wiped away from our Eyes, and every ſad Thought from our Hearts: And now God bleſs this Kingdom, and Jeſus have Mercy on my Soul!

Then he ſaluted the Noblemen, and other Perſons of Diſtinction upon the Scaffold; after which he ſaid again, Gentlemen, I entreat you all to pray with me, and for me; and his Chaplain, having laid the Book of Common-Prayer before him, he kneel'd down, and prayed out of it a Quarter of an Hour, and as long without Book, concluding with the Lord's-Prayer.

Then ſtanding up, he ſaid (to Sir George Wentworth) Brother, we muſt part.— Remember me to my Siſter, and to my Wife, and carry my Bleſſing to my Son: Charge him that he fear God, and continue an obedient Son to the Church of England; warn him that he bear no private Grudge, or Revenge towards any Man concerning me. And bid him beware he meddle not with Church Livings; for that will prove a Moth and Canker to him in his Eſtate: And wiſh him to be a Servant to his Country, without aiming at high Preferment.

Carry my Bleſſing alſo to my Daughters Anne and Arabella: Charge them to ſerve and fear God, and he will bleſs them; not forgetting my little Infant, which yet knows neither Good nor Evil.

The Earl beheaded.

While he was undreſſing, he ſaid, I as chearfully put off my Cloaths at this Time, as ever I did when I went to Bed; and putting on a white Cap, he tuck'd up his Hair under it: Then having prayed again, and ſubmitted to the Block, his Head was ſevered from his Body at one Blow.

Inſtructions the Earl left his Son.

By the written Inſtructions the Earl left his Son, he commanded him to be obedient to the Governors he had appointed him; and charged him, as he would anſwer it at the laſt Day, not to enter upon any publick Employment, ment, 'till he ſhould be Thirty Years of Age; and then, if his Prince ſhould call him to publick Service, he ſhould readily undertake it, and be ſincere and faithful to his Maſter, though he ſhould come to the ſame End he did himſelf. And laſtly, that he ſhould never lay his Hands upon any Thing that belonged to the Church. He foreſaw that her Revenues would be ſeized, and conjectured they would be diſtributed among the Nobility and Gentry; and again, charged his Son, therefore, not to meddle with them, for the Curſe of God would follow thoſe, he held, that meddled with ſuch Things.

His Family and Character.

Thomas Earl of Strafford, was the Son and Heir of Sir William Wentworth, of Wentworth-Woodhouſe, in the County of York, Bart. He was a popular and weighty Speaker in Parliament, and oppoſed ſome of thoſe extraordinary Methods that were taken for raiſing Money in the Beginning of this Reign; but afterwards coming over to the Court, he was called to the Council-Board, and by Letters Patent, dated the 22d of July, in the fourth Year of this King, he was created Baron Wentworth, of Wentworth-Woodhouſe; and the 10th of December following, he was made Viſcount Wentworth, and conſtituted Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. On the 12th of January, the Title of Baron Raby was conferred on him, being deſcended from the Family of Nevil, heretofore Lords of Raby-Caſtle (which was however at this Time the Inheritance of Sir Henry Vane, who expected the Title) and laſtly, he was created Earl of Strafford, and elected one of the Knights Companions of the moſt Noble Order of the Garter.

This Nobleman, according to a late excellent Writer, was a Perſon of extraordinary natural Parts, improved by Education and Buſineſs. He had a lively and penetrating Genius, and his Manner of delivering himſelf was clear and moving. He was, without Queſtion, an accompliſhed Stateſman; and as he was happy in the deſigning Part, ſo he wanted no Courage to go through and execute: And as for Loyalty and Affection to the King, no Man poſſeſſed that Quality in a higher Degree; neither was he only thus well furniſhed for the Publick Service, but his private Life was likewiſe regular and unblemiſh'd. He was undone by his Zeal for his Maſter, and the Weight of his Merit ſunk him. Had his Advice been taken, the Scotiſh Invaſion muſt in all likelihood have miſcarried. This made the Covenanters implacable, and never give over, till they had purſued him to the Scaffold. Had he been falſe or indifferent to the Crown, theſe few Irregularities of his Government would probably have been overlooked, and he might have lived to the End of his Conſtitution: But he was too great a Terror to Rebellion to be endured at that Juncture.

The Senſe of both Houſes of Parliament (in relation to this Proſecution) after the Reſtoration, when they were no longer under the Influence of a Rebellious Faction, is ſufficiently manifeſted from the Act that paſſed in the 14th Year of Charles II. For Reverſing the Attainder of the Earl of Strafford. This Act recites, That whereas Thomas Earl of Strafford was impeached of High-Treaſon, upon Pretence of endeavouring to ſubvert the Fundamental Laws, and called to a publick and ſolemn Arraignment, and Trial, before the Peers in Parliament, where he made a particular Defence to every Article objected againſt him; inſomuch, that the turbulent Party, then ſeeing no Hopes to effect their unjuſt Deſigns by any Ordinary way of Proceeding, did at laſt reſolve to attempt the Deſtruction and Attainder of the ſaid Earl, by an Act of Parliament, purpoſely made to condemn him for Accumulative Treaſon, none of the pretended Crimes being Treaſon apart, and ſo could not be in the whole, if they had been proved, as they were not; and alſo judged him guilty of Conſtructive Treaſon, that is of levying War againſt the King, though it was only the commanding an Order of the Council-Board in Ireland to be executed by a Serjeant at Arms and three or four Soldiers, which was the conſtant Practice of the Deputies there for a long Time: To which End, having firſt preſented a Bill to the Houſe of Commons, and finding there more Oppoſition than they expected, they cauſed a Multitude of tumultuous Perſons to come down to Weſtminſter, armed with Swords and Staves, and to fill both the Palace-Yards, and all the Approaches to both Houſes of Parliament, with Fury and Clamour, and to require Juſtice, ſpeedy Juſtice, againſt the Earl of Strafford: And having, by theſe and other undue Practices, obtained that Bill to paſs the Houſe of Commons, they cauſed the Names of thoſe reſolute Gentlemen, who, in a Caſe of innocent Blood, had freely diſcharged their Conſciences, being Nine and Fifty, to be poſted upon ſeveral Places about the Cities of London and Weſtminſter, and ſtiled them STRAFFORDIANS, and Enemies to their Country, hoping thereby to deliver them up to the Fury of the People, whom they had endeavoured to incenſe againſt them; and then procured the ſaid Bill to be ſent up to the Houſe of Peers, where it having ſome Time reſted, under great Deliberation; at laſt, at a Time when great Part of the Peers were abſent, by Reaſon of the Tumults, and many of thoſe who were preſent proteſted againſt it, the ſaid Bill paſſed in the Houſe of Peers, and at length his late Majeſty, King Charles I. granted a Commiſſion for giving his Royal Aſſent thereto, which nevertheleſs was done by his ſaid Majeſty, with exceeding great Sorrow then, and ever remembred by him with inexpreſſible Grief of Heart, and out of his Majeſty's great Piety he did publickly expreſs it, when his own Sacred Life was taken away by the moſt deteſtable Traytors that ever were:

The Attainder of the Earl of Strafford reverſed.

For all which Cauſes, it was enacted, That the Act for the Attainder of the ſaid Thomas Earl of Strafford ſhould be reverſed, and all Records and Proceedings relating thereto, be cancelled and taken off the File, or otherwiſe defaced, to the End the ſame might never be brought into Example, to the Prejudice of any Perſon whatſoever.

1641. 17 Car. I. Remarks on the Trial of the Earl of Strafford.

This Act of Parliament is ſo juſt a Comment on the Proſecution of the Earl, and his Remarks ſo full and comprehenſive at the Hearing, that there remains ſcarce any Obſervations to be made on this Trial: I ſhall only juſt touch upon ſome Particulars therefore, and leave the reſt to the Reader's own Reflections, now he has ſeen the Caſe ſo thoroughly examined.

1. And firſt, it is evident that the Faction which accuſed the Earl of High-Treaſon were themſelves guilty of the moſt notorious and deſtructive Treaſons againſt their King and Country, in inviting the Scots to invade the Kingdom, and joining with them in the Ruin of the Conſtitution, both in Church and State; and the principal Inducement to this Proſecution, next to the ſaving their own Heads, which they had juſtly forfeited, was their Deſpair of ever ſubverting the Eſtabliſhment, and introducing Presbytery, and a Republican Form of Government, while this conſummate Stateſman guarded the Throne from their rude and inſolent Attacks.

2. As the Earl was the only Perſon that ever was taken out of the Hands of a Court of Juſtice, after a Trial, wherein he had made a full Defence to every Part of the Charge, and murdered by a Statute made on Purpoſe; ſo never any Tranſaction reflected more Diſhonour on the Peerage, than their being made Tools in this Manner, to the Malice and Revenge of a Faction, who had refuſed to ſubmit to their Judgment in a legal Way. 1641. 17 Car.

3. That all the Miſeries the King hoped to avoid, by ſubmitting to give the Royal Aſſent to this Act of Injuſtice, were probably brought upon himſelf, the Nation, and his Poſterity, by this very Compliance.

4. We may obſerve, that thoſe brave Men that had the Courage to reſiſt the Torrent of the Times, and were marked out, under the Name of STRAFFORDIANS, to be ſacrificed to popular Fury, notwithſtanding all the Practices and Artifice of the Faction, eſcaped their Rage, and have rendered their Memories Immortal, by the noble Oppoſition they made to that Act of Injuſtice.

5. That ſome of his beſt Actions, and ſuch as conduced moſt to the Welfare and Proſperity both of England and Ireland, were made part of the Charge of High-Treaſon againſt him; among which we may reckon his eſtabliſhing the Linnen-Manufacture in Ireland, from which both Nations reap ſuch Advantages at this Day, and for which he ought to have his Statue erected in the Capital of each Kingdom; but, as it has been juſtly obſerved already, his Merit was his greateſt Crime in the Eyes of the Saints.

1643. 19 Car. I. Fiennes's Trial.

The Trial of Colonel NATHANIEL FIENNES, for Cowardice, before a Council of War at St. Albans. 14 Dec. 1643. 19 Car. I.

1643. 19 Car. I.

THE Articles were exhibited, firſt to the Houſe of Commons, and then to the Council of War at St. Albans, where the Commons ordered the Trial to be, by Clement Walker and William Prynn, Eſqs; Members of the Lower Houſe, in the behalf of the Common-Wealth of England.

The Articles. 1. The firſt Article ſet forth, That the ſaid Colonel Nathaniel Fiennes did ſuddenly apprehend, impriſon and remove Colonel Thomas Eſſex, late Governor of the City and Caſtle of Briſtol, upon Pretence that he intended to deliver up the ſame into the Hands of the common Enemies of the Kingdom and Parliament; and that thereupon the ſaid Colonel Fiennes, obtained the Government of the ſaid City and Caſtle for himſelf, and undertook to defend the ſame againſt the ſaid Enemy, for the Uſe of the King and Parliament.

2. That ſoon after he became Governor of Briſtol, he did, by Martial Law, condemn and execute ſome of the principal Citizens, namely, Yeomans, Bouchier and others, only for intending to deliver up the ſame to Prince Rupert.

3. That he put the Parliament and Kingdom to great Expence in fortifying, garriſoning and furniſhing the ſaid City and Caſtle with Ammunition and Proviſions for three Months, and undertook to defend them for that Space, in caſe they ſhould be Beſieged.

4. That, notwithſtanding the Premiſſes, when the Enemy came before the ſaid City and Caſtle with a ſmall Force, and had not beſieged it three Days, he did, before they had taken any of the Works, erected a Battery, or aſſaulted the Walls, moſt diſhonourably, cowardly, and traiterouſly deliver up the ſaid City and Caſtle, with the Cannon, Ammunition, ſmall Arms, Proviſions, Colours, and all his Priſoners, againſt the Conſent of the Parliament and the General, into the Hands of Prince Rupert, and other Enemies of the Kingdom and Parliament, to the Loſs of moſt of the Weſtern Parts of England.

5. That he beat a Parley without the Privity or Conſent of any general Council of War; or when divers of his Officers and Soldiers adviſed and perſuaded the contrary, and could have defended the ſaid City and Caſtle.

The other five Articles were not very material, only the 7th charges him with an Intention to deliver up the Place to the Enemy before they beſieged it; and the 9th charges him with preſuming to juſtify this cowardly Surrender before the Houſe of Commons in Perſon, and before the whole Kingdom in printed Relations, wherein he endeavoured to diſgrace disgrace both the honourable Houses of Parliament, and the Earl of Essex, their Lieutenant-General, by publishing that, if he had held out the said City and Castle to the last Extremity, he could not have expected any Relief from them in Eight Weeks.

1643. 19 Car. I.

The Answer of Col. Fiennes.

To the first Article Fiennes answered, That Colonel Thomas Essex was never Governor of Bristol, but only commanded a Regiment there, and that he apprehended him, and sent him to the General, by his Order; nor did he ever seek the Government of Bristol, but endeavoured to be freed from that Employment; and denies he ever undertook to defend the City and Castle: On the contrary he declared, that they were not tenable, in the Condition they were in; and that they must fall into the Hands of the Enemy, unless better Provision were made for their Defence.

2. To the second he says, That soon after his sending away Colonel Essex, he discovered and defeated a Conspiracy, between the Inhabitants of Bristol, and some of the Officers of Essex's Regiment, to deliver up the City to Prince Rupert; and that by apprehending several of the Conspirators, he disappointed the Designs of the Enemy: That he afterwards called a Council of War, by a Commission from the General, where divers of the Conspirators were condemned, and afterwards executed; but the Execution was stayed till the General was acquainted with the Proceedings.

3. To the Third he answered, That by his own Industry, and unwearied Application, he had endeavoured to furnish the Town, and put it in a Posture of Defence, without troubling the Parliament, and had well nigh finished a Line, or Rampart of Earth, about the Town; but denied that he could raise a sufficient Garrison to defend the City against all the Power of the Enemy for three Months, or that he undertook to keep it so long, in Case it should be besieged.

4. To the Fourth, He denies that he delivered up Bristol against the Consent of the Parliament, or the General; or delivered it up traiterously, or cowardly, or contrary to his Trust; but says, he did defend the same to the utmost of his Power, and that he surrendered it upon honourable Terms, in respect to the State he was in: For that the Enemy had entered the Line, or Rampart, which was not finished; and, the City having no Wall on that Side, it was impossible to prevent their possessing themselves of the Place.

5. To the Fifth, That he did not parley with the Enemy, when he was dissuaded from it by his Officers; but, on the contrary, he was advised to the Treaty by far the major Part, if not by the unanimous Consent of the whole Council of War, and the Gentlemen present. 1643. 19 Car. I.

He denied that he had any Intention to deliver up the Town before it was besieged, as he is charged in the 7th Article; or that he said any Thing untruly in his Justification of the Surrender of Bristol, as he is charged in the 9th Article: But says, that it was with great Difficulty and Hazard he held out four Days, considering the Condition the Place was in.

Mr. Prynne, the Prosecutor, who was fond of hearing himself talk, and would hold forth everlastingly upon any Subject almost, has filled fifty or threescore Folio Pages, with his Speeches and wise Harrangues at this Trial; but I believe my Readers, who know the Character of the Man, will gladly excuse the Repetition of them, and think it sufficient, in such a Case as this, to take Notice, That the Council of War being of Opinion, that Colonel Fiennes had surrendered Bristol sooner, and upon more dishonourable Terms, than a brave Man ought to have done, passed the following Sentence, which their Clerk read to him out of a Paper, in hæc verba.

Sentence on Fiennes.

Colonel Nathaniel Fiennes, you have been arraigned and convicted before this honourable Council, for surrendering and delivering up the Town and Castle of Bristol, with the Forts, Magazines, Arms, Ammunition, Victuals, and other Things thereunto belonging; and for not having held the same to the utmost Extremity, according as by your Duty you ought to have done; for which Offence this honourable Council hath adjudged you to be executed, according to the Articles of War, by having your Head cut off. God have Mercy on your Soul.

Pardoned.

But, notwithstanding this Sentence, the Usurpers thought fit to pardon him; for no Man had shewn more Zeal in the House of Commons, for ruining both Church and State, than this Gentleman; though it appeared he had but a very moderate Share of Military Skill, or Bravery, when he took up Arms in Defence of the Good Old Cause. He was Son to the Lord Say, and seemed to inherit his Father's Malice to the Crown; for though he chose to go Abroad, to avoid the Reproach of Cowardice at Home, he remained as unshaken in his Rebellious Principles, after this Disgrace, as he was before, and never attempted to reconcile himself to his injured Sovereign.

Impeached of High-Treaſon. &c.

THE Commons impeached his Grace of High-Treaſon, and other High Crimes and Miſdemeanors, at the Bar of the Houſe of Lords, the 18th of December, 1640, deſiring he might be committed to ſafe Cuſtody; whereupon he was delivered to the Black-Rod, till the Commons ſhould proceed in their Impeachment; and on Friday the 26th of February following, fourteen general Articles were ſent up to the Lords againſt him.

Committed to the Black-Rod.

The Articles againſt him.

1. The firſt charged, That he had traiterouſly endeavoured to ſubvert the Laws, and introduce Arbitrary Government.

2. He had denied the Authority of Parliaments, eſtabliſhing an abſolute Power, not only in the King, but in himſelf and other Biſhops, above and againſt Law.

3. That by Threats and Promiſes to the Judges, he had perverted the Courſe of Juſtice, and deprived the King's Subjects of their Rights.

4. That in his own Courts he had ſold Juſtice, and taken Bribes.

5. That he had cauſed divers Canons to be made, contrary to the King's Prerogative, and the Laws; eſtabliſhed an unlawful Authority in himſelf, and Succeſſors; and endeavoured to confirm his exorbitant Power by a wicked Oath.

6. That he had aſſumed a papal and tyrannical Power.

7. That he endeavoured to ſubvert the true Religion, and introduce Popiſh Superſtition.

8. That he abuſed the Truſt his Majeſty repoſed in him, procuring the Nomination of Perſons to Eccleſiaſtical Preferments, which belonged to others, and preferring Perſons that were popiſhly affected.

9. That his own Chaplains, to whom he committed the licenſing of Books, were Popiſhly affected, which had occaſioned the publiſhing of divers ſuperſtitious Books.

10. That he endeavoured the reconciling the Churches of England and Rome, and countenanced the eſtabliſhing a Popiſh Hierarchy in the Kingdom.

11. That he had cauſed ſeveral Orthodox Miniſters to be ſilenced, and deprived, and many Loyal Subjects to forſake the Kingdom.

12. That he had abrogated the Privileges granted the French and Dutch Churches in this Kingdom, endeavouring to cauſe Diſcord between the Church of England, and other Reformed Churches.

13. That he had laboured to bring divers Popiſh Innovations into the Kingdom of Scotland, in order to create a War between the Kingdoms of England and Scotland, and adviſed his Majeſty to ſubdue the Scots, forcing the Engliſh Clergy to contribute to that War: That he had cenſured the Pacification as diſhonourable, and ſo inceniſed his Majeſty, that he entered into an Offenſive War with the Scots.

14. That, to prevent his being queſtioned for theſe traiterous Proceedings, he endeavoured to ſubvert the Rights of Parliament, and to cauſe Diviſions between his Majeſty and his People; for which they impeached him of High-Treaſon.

Committed to the Tower.

Two or three Days after the ſending up theſe Articles, his Grace was committed to the Tower, where he remained from the 29th of Feb. 1640-1, to the 24th of Oct. 1643, when he received Ten additional Articles, together with an Order from the Lords, to put in his Anſwer in writing before the 30th of the ſame Month.

Ten additional Articles ſent him above two Years after his Impriſonment.

1. The firſt additional Article charges, that in the 3d and 4th Year of the King, he cauſed the Parliament to be diſſolved, and aſperſed the Members, affirming they were factious Puritans, and commended the Papiſts.

2. That for ten Years paſt he had endeavoured to advance the Power of the Council-Table, the Canons of the Church, and the King's Prerogative, above the Laws.

3. That to advance the Eccleſiaſtical Power, he had hindred the granting Writs of Prohibition to the Eccleſiſtical Courts.

4. That a Judgment being given againſt one Burley, a Parſon, for Non-reſidency, he had ſtayed Execution by applying to the Judges, and ſaid, He would never ſuffer a Judgment to paſs againſt a Clergyman, by nihil dicit.

5. That he had cauſed Sir John Corbet, a Juſtice of Peace, to be impriſoned, for cauſing the Petition of Right to be read at the Seſſions of the Peace; and, during his Impriſonment, granted away part of the Glebe Lands of Alderly, belonging to the ſaid Sir John; had prevented the Execution of a Judgment, which Sir John had obtained, and procured him to be committed by the Council-Table, till he ſubmitted to their Order.

6. That divers Sums being given for purchaſing Impropriations, he had cauſed the ſame to be overthrown in the Court of Exchequer.

7. That he had harboured and relieved Popiſh Prieſts, who had traduced the 39 Articles.

8. That he had ſaid, A Blow muſt be given to the Church, before it could be brought to Conformity.

9. That in May, 1640, he cauſed the Convocation to be held, after the Diſſolution of the Parliament, where Canons were made, contrary to Law and the Privilege of Parliament, and a dangerous and illegal Oath formed, approving the Doctrine and Diſcipline of the Eſtabliſhed Church, and promiſing not to conſent

1643. 19 Car. I. consent to any Alteration in the Government of the Church by Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Deans, Archdeacons, &c. Which Oath he had taken himſelf, and cauſed other Miniſters to take; and impriſoned the Biſhop of Glouceſter, for refuſing to ſubſcribe the ſaid Canons, and take the Oath, till he ſubmitted.

10. That a Reſolution being taken at the Council-Table for aſſiſting the King by extraordinary Means, if the Parliament ſhould prove peeviſh, the Archbiſhop wickedly adviſed his Majeſty to diſſolve the Parliament in 1640, and it was thereupon diſſolved; and ſoon after he told his Majeſty, That he was now abſolved from all Rules of Government, and at Liberty to uſe extraordinary Ways for a Supply.

He petitions for Money out of his Eſtate,

Upon receipt of theſe Articles, and the aboveſaid Order from the Lords, his Grace petitioned he might be allowed ſomething out of his Eſtate, which they had ſeized and ſequeſtred, to bear the Charges of his Trial:

for his Papers, Counſel, &c.

That his Papers might be reſtored him, that he might be enabled to prepare for his Defence; and that he might have Counſel, a Sollicitor, and ſome Servants to attend his Buſineſs: And upon a ſecond Petition, Mr. Dell, his Grace's Secretary, was aſſigned him for a Sollicitor; Mr. Hearne, Mr. Chute, Mr. Hales, and Mr. Gerard, were aſſigned him for Counſel; but they would not allow him a Penny out of his Eſtate, Glynn telling them he might proceed in forma pauperis: However, they made him pay even for the Copies of his own Papers.

and that they would diſtinguiſh between the Treaſons and Miſdemeanors he was charged with.

His Grace petitioned the Lords alſo, That they would diſtinguiſh the Treaſon from the Miſdemeanors in the Articles; for the Crimes were ſo interwoven and connected in the Concluſion, that they might all refer to Treaſon, and conſequently his Council would not be permitted to give him any Advice in Matters of Fact; but neither the Lords nor Commons would make any Diſtinction, though Application was made to them reſpectively: However, the Lords were ſo gracious to give him further Time to put in his Anſwer, till the 13th of November, when his Grace appeared at their Lordſhips Bar, and put in his Anſwer in writing to the laſt Article, viz. That he was not guilty in ſuch Manner and Form as the ſaid Articles of Impeachment charged.

His Anſwer put in

But his Grace appearing at the Lord's Bar again, the 16th of January, 1643-4, It was obſerved, there was no Anſwer put in to the firſt Articles, or any Iſſue joined; and thereupon his Grace was ordered to put in his Anſwer to the Original Articles the 22d of January.

Then his Grace petitioned that his Anſwer to the laſt Articles might be taken off the File, and that they would diſtinguiſh between Treaſon and Miſdemeanors, that he might give a particular Anſwer to both; and that they would give his Counſel leave to ſpeak to the Generality and Uncertainty of the Articles, which they declared no Man living could prepare an Anſwer to, as the Caſe ſtood; but his Grace was not indulged in any of theſe Particulars, and therefore found himſelf under a Neceſſity of putting in the ſame general Anſwer he had done before (viz.) That he was not guilty: Only as to the 13th Original Article, and the reſt of them that related to Scotland, he pleaded the late Act of Indemnity. 1643-4. 19 Car. I.

He is brought to his Trial.

His Grace, having received an Order to prepare for his Trial the 12th of March, 1643-4, was brought to the Bar of the Houſe of Lords that Day; where he found a Committee of the Commons, conſiſting of Serjeant Wilde, Mr. Brown, Mr. Maynard, Mr. Nicholas, and Mr. Hill, appointed to manage the Evidence againſt him; and Prynne acted as their Solicitor, having Grice and Beck to aſſiſt him. His Grace alſo obſerves, that Prynne, during the Trial, kept an Office, where he inſtructed and tampered with the Witneſſes.

Firſt Day's Hearing.

Wilde opens the Impeachment.

Mr. Serjeant Wilde opened the Charge, by a moſt ſcandalous and virulent Invective againſt this great Prelate; wherein he ſays, If the Memory of all the pernicious Practices, which had been from Time to Time attempted againſt our Religion and Laws were loſt, here they would find them revived: That had the Faults of this Man been no other than thoſe of common Frailty and Inadvertency, they would gladly have thrown a Veil over them; but, being wilful, deſtructive, and comprehenſive of all Evils, the Sin would lie on their own Heads, if they did not call for Juſtice. That here was Treaſon in the higheſt Pitch and Altitude; even the betraying the whole Realm, and the Subverſion of the very Foundations. That theſe Crimes, of themſelves ſo heinous, were aggravated by the Quality of the Offender, who had been advanced to the moſt eminent Stations in Church and State, and was endowed with many great Gifts of Nature: But all theſe Advantages he had preverted to the Deſtruction of the Publick.

A General Calumny on the Clergy.

That Churchmen in all Ages, were the archeſt Seedsmen of Miſchief, and the principal Actors in all the great Diſtractions that had happened; and as they meddled with temporal Things, heterogeneal to their Calling, God was pleaſed to ſmite them with Blindneſs, and infatuate their Councils, of which this Prelate was an Inſtance; who, employing his Time in State Affairs, became the Author of all the illegal and tyrannical Proceedings and Innovations in Religion and Government, and indeed, of all the Concuſſions and Deſtractions, that had happened in Church and State.

And when by the Magnanimity of former Princes, and the Wiſdom of their Anceſtors, they had ſhaken off the Antichriſtian Yoke; and when they had ſeen ſuch bloody Maſſacres, Plots, and Proſecutions at Home and Abroad, in order to introduce it again: That this Man ſhould go about to reduce them to thoſe rotten Principles of Error and Darkneſs again: It could not be expected but the People ſhould be ready to ſtone him. He concluded, That though Naaman was a great Man, yet he was a Leper: And this Man's Leproſy had ſo infected all, that there remained no Cure, but the Sword of Juſtice; which they doubted not but their Lordſhips would apply, that the Commonwealth might live again and flouriſh.

His

1643-4. 19 Car. I.

The Arch-Biſhop permitted to reply to the Manager.

His Grace having obtained Leave to ſpeak in his Defence, ſaid,——— That it was a great Affliction to him to appear at this Bar as a Criminal, though he ſhould be acquitted; but he was not very ſolicitous about his Sentence, for he thanked God he had ſpent his Time ſo, that he was neither aſhamed to live, nor afraid to die; nor could the World be more weary of him, than he was of it: But if none of theſe Things whereof theſe Men accuſed him, merited Death by Law, though he might not in this Caſe appeal to Cæſar, yet he might, and did, to their Lordſhip's Juſtice; not doubting but God would protect his Innocence.

The Charge againſt him, he obſerved, was divided into two principal Heads, (viz.) His endeavouring to ſubvert the Laws, and, The Religion by thoſe Laws eſtabliſhed.

As to the Laws, he ſaid he had been a ſtrict Obſerver of them all his Life; and ſince he had any Share in the Adminiſtration, no Man had been more guided by them than himſelf, as the learned Counſel preſent, who had attended the Council-Table, could teſtify: Nay, he had ever held, that human Laws bind the Conſcience; and this Doctrine he conſtantly preached. That he looked upon an Endeavour to ſubvert the Law a greater Crime than to break any particular Law: And this they might obſerve was his Judgment, by the Book he wrote againſt Fiſher; out of which he read a Paſſage to this Purpoſe:

" As to Religion, he was born and bred " up in the Church of England, and by the " Bleſſing of God, and the Favour of his " Prince, grown up to the Years that were " then upon him, and to that Place of Pre- " ferment which he did yet bear; and in this " Church, by the Grace of God, he was re- " ſolved to die: That he had ever continued " ſteady to his Profeſſion and Principles, with- " out any Regard to worldly Views; though " if his Conſcience would have given him " Leave to ſhift his Tenets as Time and Oc- " caſion ſerved, he might have eaſily ſlid " through all the Difficulties of this Sort that " had preſſed him: That he had always en- " deavoured, that the publick Worſhip of " God, which was too much ſlighted, might " be preſerved, and that with as much De- " cency and Uniformity as might be: For he " was ſtill of Opinion, that Unity could not " long continue in the Church, without Uni- " formity. He ſaw that the Neglect of the " Publick Worſhip, and the Places dedicated " to that Service, had caſt a Damp upon the " true, and inward Worſhip of God; which, " while we live in the Body, needs external " Helps, and all little enough to keep it in " any Vigour: But, though he had endeavour- " ed to redreſs Things according to the Law " and Canons, he did not know he had ever " done it, but with the Conſent of the " People.

" That he was innocent, as well in Thought " as Practice, of any Deſign to alter Religion " and introduce Popery; and, if nothing but " Truth were ſpoken, he challenged what- " ever was between Heaven and Hell to ſay " their worſt againſt him, in Point of Reli- " gion, in which he ever hated Diſſimulation; " and though he might have procured his " Safety by it, he thought it no way became " a Chriſtian Biſhop to halt with God. 1643-4 19 Car I.

" Laſtly he ſaid, It was ſtrange, if he de- " ſigned to introduce Popery, he ſhould have " laboured ſo much to reduce thoſe who " were going, or had gone over to it; and " inſtanced in two and twenty Perſons, moſt " of them Men of Condition, whom he had " brought over to, or confirmed in the Pro- " teſtant Religion; and challenged any Cler- " gyman to give a better Proof of his Zeal to " the Eſtabliſhed Church; not doubting, but " he ſhould be able to anſwer, whatever " ſhould be more particularly objected a- " gainſt him.

The Archbiſhop being brought to the Bar again on the 13th of March, the Managers proceeded to make good the firſt and ſecond Original Articles; and the ſecond additional Article relating to the Subverſion of the Laws, introducing arbitrary Power, queſtioning the Authority of Parliaments, advancing the Power of the Council-Table, &c. The ſecond Day The Managers proceed to make good the Articles againſt him.

To prove this Part of the Charge, Mr. Maynard read the following Words out of his Grace's Diary, (viz.) the 5th of December, 1639. The King declared his Reſolution for a Parliament, in caſe of the Scotiſh Rebellion: The firſt Movers of it were my Lord Deputy of Ireland, the Lord Marquiſs of Hamilton, and myſelf; and a Reſolution voted at the Board, to aſſiſt the King in extraordinary Ways, if the Parliament ſhould prove peeviſh and refuſe. From whence it was urged, he had beſtowed the Epithet of Peeviſh on the Parliament; and that the Vote to aſſiſt the King by extraordinary Ways, proceeded from his Advice. The Evidence of Sir Henry Vane, the elder, alſo was inſiſted on; who depoſed, that his Grace ſaid to the King, after the riſing of the laſt Parliament, Now he might uſe his Power. His Diary made Evidence againſt him. Sir Henry Vane.

Alderman Atkins depoſed, that when he was brought before the Council about Ship-Money, none was ſo violent againſt him as his Grace.

It was objected to him, that he had aſſerted the King's Proclamations were of the ſame Force as a Statute; and, ſpeaking of the King's Power, he had ſaid, Whoſoever falls upon it ſhall be broken; but upon whomſoever it falls, it ſhall grind him to Powder.

And that, ſpeaking of an Act of Parliament, he ſaid, That he ſaw nothing would down with them but Acts of Parliament: No Regard at all to the Canons of the Church; and that he would reſcind all Acts that were againſt the Canons; and hoped ſhortly, to ſee the Canons and the King's Prerogative of equal Force with an Act of Parliament.

He was alſo charged with giving the King Subſidies in Convocation, without Conſent of Parliament; and with ſome other Matters of leſs Moment, to ſupport the three Articles above mentioned.

To this his Grace anſwered, That he believed the Word Peeviſh had been put into his Diary, ſince it was taken from him; and if not, he thought it was not impoſſible, that a Parliament ſhould prove Peeviſh. His Defence to the Charge of the ſecond Day.

Third and fourth Day's Trial.

That

1643-4. 19 Car. I. That it was not ſaid in his Diary, that the Vote to aſſiſt the King by extraordinary Ways, was his Advice, but that there was ſuch a General Vote of the Council; and beſides, this appeared by the ſame Diary, to be for the Scotiſh Buſineſs, which was within the Act of Oblivion.

That he never ſaid, The King might uſe his Power, or any other Words to that Effect; and if he had, they were not Treaſon; and if they were, there was but one Witneſs of them, and the Law required two in Treaſon: However this alſo related to Scotland, and was therefore within the Act of Oblivion.

That as to his preſſing the Payment of Ship-Money, this was after the Judges had given their Opinions of the Legality of it; and beſides, it was the Act of the whole Council, and could not be aſcribed to him in Particular; and it was ſtrange this ſhould be accounted High-Treaſon in him, and not in the reſt. As to the Words, Whoever falls on that Stone ſhall be broken, &c. Two of the Witneſſes were Soap-Boilers and Parties, and were ſentenced by the Star-Chamber for their Contempt: That the Words were ſaid to be ſpoken above twelve Years ſince, and he believed none of the Managers could think him ſo weak to have ſaid them: However, they were not Treaſon, and he was not anſwerable for every Thing the Star-Chamber had done. As to his ſaying, Nothing would down with them but Acts of Parliament, &c. this was proved but by a ſingle Witneſs, who was a Party; and though a great Regard ought to be had to Acts of Parliament, yet ſome ought to be paid to the Canons. And as to the giving the Subſidies in Convocation, it was the Act of that whole Body; and the Grant was no other, nor in other manner, than had been granted to Queen Elizabeth; and that the Clergy ever had a Power of granting Subſidies.

This Days Hearing being over, his Grace was ordered to appear again on Saturday the 16th of March, and a Note given him by the Committee, that they intended to proceed next on Part of the ſecond Additional Article, the third Original Article, and the third and fifth Additional Articles, which related to The Advancing the Power of the Council-Table, The Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, &c. But the Hearing was put off to Monday the 18th of March, when his Grace being brought to the Bar of the Houſe of Lords again, he was charged with cauſing ſeveral Houſes about St. Paul's, to be demoliſhed; to prove which, his Diary was produced; wherein he expreſſes a Deſign of getting that antient Fabrick repaired: Then three Orders of Council were produced, for compounding with the Tenants, and pulling down their Houſes if they refuſed to compound.

Third and fourth Day's Trial.

It was further objected, That his Hand was to another Order of Council, for the Goldſmiths to provide themſelves with Houſes in Cheapſide and Lombard-Street: And one Burtley, a Stationer, who had been put out of his Houſe to make Room for the Goldſmiths, was produced as an Evidence againſt him.

He was charged alſo with forcing People to lend Money for the Repairing of St. Paul's, and with the Impriſonment of one Vaſſal by the Council-Board; who conceived his Grace to be the Author of it. The Impriſonment of Sir John Corbet by the Council-Board, was alſo imputed to him. His projecting to give the Miniſters of London ſome Aſſiſtance as to their Tythes, was urged as another Offence, and his Diary produced as an Evidence of it. 1643-4. 19 Car. I.

The Impriſoning Burton, Prynne, and Baſtwick, alſo was laid to his Charge; and particularly the cenſuring Prynne for Libelling: And laſtly, he was charged with being inſtrumental in removing two Brew-Houſes, that were a Nuſance to the Palace of St. James's.

His Defence to the Charge of the 3d and 4th Day.

To the third and fourth Day's Charge his Grace anſwered, That when he came to the Biſhoprick of London, he thought himſelf obliged to endeavour the Repair of St. Paul's, which was then ready to ſink into its Ruins, and eſpecially the Body of it; which, by the Local Statutes, the Biſhop was to repair while he enjoyed the Lands that belonged to the Church; and which very well enabled him to do ſo, till ſome ſacrilegious Hands deſpoiled that Biſhoprick of them: And as to the demoliſhing the Houſes that were built upon the Church-Yard, they ſtood ſo near the Church, that the Repairing of it was impracticable, till they were pulled down; and therefore eight or nine thouſand Pounds had been raiſed to compound with the Inhabitants, for taking down thoſe Houſes, though they had no Right to ſtand there: That he could not be charged with miſapplying any of the Money that had been raiſed for the Repairs; and he had indeed contributed twelve hundred Pounds out of his own Pocket towards the Work; nor had he done any thing in Relation to theſe Repairs, without the Approbation and Order of his Majeſty, or the Lords of the Council; and therefore this ought not to be imputed to him in Particular.

As to obliging the Goldſmiths to keep their Shops in Lombard-Street and Cheapſide, this alſo was done by Order of Council, and not to be aſcribed to him; and was however very far from High-Treaſon: And for his ſaying in this Caſe, That the Council-Board was not ſo weak, but it might command ſuch Things, he does not remember he ſaid ſo then; but he thought the Council-Table muſt be very weak indeed, if it could not command in things of Decency.

His forcing People to lend Money for the Repair of St. Paul's, he had no Occaſion to ſpeak to, becauſe they did not attempt to prove it.

As to the Impriſonment of Mr. Vaſſal, that was alſo an Act of the Council-Board; and Vaſſal's ſaying, He conceived his Grace to be the Occaſion of it, was no Proof of it.

The Impriſonment of Sir John Corbet alſo was the Act of the Council-Board.

And as to his contriving ſome Support for the London Miniſters, he ſhould have been to blame if he had not, when he was their Biſhop; and their Caſe was indeed very hard,

1643-4 19 Car. I.

all their Dues being ſhrunk into a poor Eaſter Book; and all that he had done in this Buſineſs was, to ſollicit the Citizens voluntarily to yeild ſome reaſonable Addition, where Right and Neceſſity appeared.

And as to the Cenſure of Prynne, that was the Act of the Court of Star-Chamber, and he did not ſo much as give his Vote for that Cenſure.

The Complaint of removing the Brew-Houſes, was very frivilous, conſiſting of ſome little Stories, that ſcarce deſerved mentioning in this Proſecution; or elſe they were of ſome Order of the Council-Board, that could not be charged on him in Particular: And if the Whole had been true, it was but Treaſon againſt a Brew-Houſe. Laſtly, his Grace deſired their Lordſhips to obſerve, That this Day there had been no leſs than thirteen Witneſſes examined againſt him in their own Cauſes; and although many Things had been urged, that concerned the Star-Chamber and Council-Table, the Act for taking away the one, and regulating the other, had no Reſpect to what was paſſed; and yet here Things that were paſſed, and were the joint Acts of the Council or Star-Chamber, and not his, were urged as treaſonable: Whereas the Proviſion made by the late Statute, againſt thoſe who ſhould offend for the future, only made ſuch Offences Miſdemeanors.

5th Day.

His Grace being brought before the Lords again on Friday the 22d of March, it was repreſented by the Committee, That Mr. Newcommen of Colcheſter, refuſed to adminiſter the Sacrament any where but at the Rails; that Burroughs, the Witneſs, indicting him for it, his Bill was thrown out, and he was afterwards called before the High-Commiſſion Court for it, by a Warrant from his Grace; that the Mayor would not obey a habeas corpus, but ſaid he would obey his Grace's Warrant, before the King's Writ; and that a Letter was ſent to Judge Crawley, and ſhewed to Judge Hutton.

One Aſk depoſed, That his Grace protected ſome Players, that were found at a Tavern at an unſeaſonable Time of Night: That there was a Plot to make the Deponent an Inſtrument, about receiving the Sacrament at the Rails: That Letters Miſſive were ſent him by the High Commiſſion, and that applying to his Grace, he told the Deponent, If he was ſo ſtrict againſt Churchmen, he muſt expect to be dealt with as ſtrictly by the High Commiſſion; and that the Deponent went to Holland, to avoid the Oath ex officio.

He was charged alſo with the Cenſure of the Inhabitants of Beckington in Somerſetſhire, for refuſing to place the Communion-Table at the upper End of the Church, North and South, according to the Biſhop's Order; which was ſaid to be an Innovation.

Grafton, a Browniſt, alſo depoſed, That he was impriſoned twelve Years ago, and fined 50 l. and believed he might have been ſet at Liberty ſooner, if it had not been for the Archbiſhop.

The Excommunication of one Adams, was aſcribed to his Grace; who had written over the Place where the Commiſſaries Court was kept in the Church, My Houſe ſhall be called the Houſe of Prayer, but ye have made it a Den of Thieves.

1644 19 Car. I.

He was charged alſo with complaining to the King of Mr. Bagſhaw, the Reader of the Middle-Temple, and threatening to proſecute him in the High-Commiſſion Court, for aſſerting, That a Parliament might be held without Biſhops; and that Biſhops might not meddle in Civil Affairs.

And the laſt Charge of this Day was, that he had cauſed Chief Juſtice Richardſon to be checked, for putting down Wakes, and his Orders to be reverſed.

His Defence to the Charge of the 5th Day.

To this Part of the Charge his Grace anſwered, That it was not proved Mr. Newcommen had any Directions from him for refuſing the Sacrament, but at the Rails: That Burroughs was taken up by a Warrant from the High Commiſſion; and that if the Mayor had ſpoken indiſcreet Words, he was not anſwerable for them.

That his Grace knew nothing of any Players, as Mr. Aſk depoſed: That the Letters Miſſive were the Act of the High Commiſſion, and could not be charged on him. That the Oath ex officio was the legal way of proceeding in that Court; and he could not help the tendering it to Aſk, who was a Separatiſt, and knowing himſelf guilty, durſt not appear.

As to placing the Communion-Table of Beckington, at the upper End of the Chancel, North and South, this was no Innovation; Queen Elizabeth having placed it ſo in her own Chapel; and that if the Church-Wardens were excommunicated for their Contempt, in not obeying their own Biſhop, this was none of his Act.

That Grafton, the Browniſt, was fined and impriſoned by the High-Commiſſion Court, and he was not then a Commiſſioner, nor was there any Proof of his being detained in Priſon by his Grace's Means.

That the Excommunication of Adams was no Act of his; but he thought he well deſerved to be excommunicated: And he acknowledged he did complain of Bagſhaw, and ſhould have been to blame if he had not, as the Conſtitution then was; and if he did tell him he ſhould anſwer it in the High-Commiſſion Court, This was no Treaſon.

And laſtly, It was the Lord-Keeper Coventry that commanded the Chief Juſtice's Order about Wakes to be revoked, which not being complied with, there was an Order of Council for the Chief Juſtice's revoking it; but this could not affect the Archbiſhop, who was of Opinion however, That, though theſe Wakes and Feaſts of Dedication were ſometimes abuſed, this was not a ſufficient Reaſon for taking them away.

6th Day.

Thus ended the 5th Day's Hearing, and his Grace being brought to the Bar again, on Thurſday the 28th of March, was charged with the Cenſure, Deprivation, and Impriſonment of Mr. Huntley, a Clergyman, and telling his Attorney he deſerved to be laid by the Heels.

That his Grace threatened and impriſoned thoſe who brought Prohibitions; and when Prynne brought a Prohibition, he ſaid that he would lay him by the Heels that brought the next:

1644. 19 Car. I.

next: That he wondered who durſt grant Prohibitions, the High-Commiſſion Court being above all.

The next Charge was that of Bribery, and his obliging Sir Edward Greſham to give half the Penalty of a Bond of 200 l. which the Court aſſigned him, to the Repair of St. Paul's. That the Cheſter Men being fined 1000 l. for feaſting of Prynne, his Grace, for a Bribe of two Hogſheads of Sack, procured the Fine to be leſſened to 200 l. And his Secretary received 150 l. to get his Hand to a Petition to the Lord Keeper.

That he made uſe of the Name of St. Paul's to procure himſelf Money illegally, and that he had illegally applied the Money given to the Repair of St. Paul's.

His Defence to the Charge of the 6th Day.

To this Charge of the 6th Day his Grace anſwered, That what had been done againſt Huntley, was done by the High Commiſſion, and that this Proſecution was in Archbiſhop Abbot's Time: That his Attorney deſerved to be committed, for his contemptuous Behaviour, and was committed by the Lords of the Council for it. And here his Grace took leave to remind their Lordſhips, that there had been nothing tranſacted at the Council-Table, the Star-Chamber, or High Commiſſion, but ſuch Cauſes as had been determined there in the Reigns of Queen Elizabeth and King James; and that no Man had been ſo much as accuſed of a Miſdemeanor for what had been done there hitherto, much leſs of High-Treaſon.

He ſaid he thought it no Offence to complain to the King, who was the Fountain of Juſtice in both Courts, when Prohibitions were unjuſtly granted: And if he threatned to lay him by the Heels that brought the next, it was but a haſty Expreſſion, and not done; nor had any Perſons been committed for bringing Prohibitions, though they might ſometimes for their contemptuous Behaviour: There had been as many Prohibitions allowed in his ſeven Years, as in any ſeven Years of his Predeceſſors: That there was a great Difference between Prohibitions now, and in the Times before the Reformation; for then they were granted to reſtrain a foreign Juriſdiction, but now they were both the King's Courts, and there could not be that Reaſon for them as formerly: However, all that he had done was to endeavour that ſome Bounds might be ſet to each Court, that the Subject might not, to his great Trouble and Expence, be hurried from one Court to another; and took Notice, that Archbiſhop Parker, in the Beginning of the Reformation, had ſhewn that great Wrong was done to the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction by Prohibitions.

As to the Corruption he was charged with, in the Caſe of Sir Edward Greſham's Son, who married againſt his Conſent: That he had voted for greater Damages to Sir Edward, but it was given againſt him: That the Bond mentioned was entirely in his Grace's Power, and he might have applied the whole to charitable Uſes, and therefore there was no Colour to charge him with Corruption in that Matter: That indeed he did get the Cheſter Men's Fine abated from 1000 l. to 200 l. and that afterwards Mr. Stone did ſend him two Hogſheads of Sack, which he was very unwillingly prevailed on by Mr. Wheat (Mr. Stone's Son-in-Law) to receive as a Teſtimony of their Gratitude, and this Mr. Wheat atteſted in Court.

1644. 19 Car. I.

As to his Secretary's receiving 150 l. he ſaid he muſt anſwer for it, who thereupon called a Witneſs, and very handſomely cleared himſelf of the Aſperſion.

He denied his raiſing Money illegally for St. Paul's; but ſaid his Majeſty had given him the Fines of the High Commiſſion towards thoſe Repairs; and that it was as lawful to commute in that Court as another; and it had been the Practice to commute, where the Offenders were Men of Quality.

Laſtly, as to his having illegally applied the Money given for the Repair of St. Paul's, this he ſhewed to be entirely a Miſtake. After which his Grace was ordered to appear again, the 4th of April, and received a Note from the Committee, that they intended to proceed on the 5th and 6th Original Articles, and on the 9th Additional Articles, which charge his making Canons contrary to the King's Prerogative, and the Laws, and eſtabliſhing in himſelf and his Succeſſors an unlawful Authority: With his aſſuming a papal and tyrannical Power, in Matters Eccleſiaſtical and Temporal, denying his Eccleſiaſtical Power to be derived from the Crown, and framing an unlawful Oath.

7th Day.

His Grace being brought to the Bar again the 16th of April, was charged with the making Canons in Convocation, after the Parliament was diſſolved, &c. And to prove he had aſſumed Papal Power, ſome Letters from the Univerſity of Oxford were produced, wherein his Grace is ſtiled, Sanctitas tua, and Spiritu ſancto effuſiſſime plenus, Summus Pontifex, &c. That he had ſaid, The Clergy were now debaſed; that heretofore it was otherwiſe, and he hoped to ſee it ſo again. And laſtly, that he brought Sir Richard Samuel into the High Commiſſion, for doing his Office of Juſtice of Peace upon ſome Clergymen; and that one of the Articles againſt him was, His being an Enemy to the Clergy.

His Defence to the Charge of the 7th Day.

To this his Grace anſwered, That the Convocation might legally ſit after the Diſſolution of the Parliament, being called by a different Writ from that which called the Biſhops to Parliament, nor could they riſe 'till his Majeſty ſent another Writ to diſcharge them: That it was not at the Deſire of his Grace they continued ſitting; however, the Judges had given their Opinions they might legally ſit: That as to the Biſhop of Glouceſter's being committed for refuſing the Oath, it was done by an Order of Council; and the principal Obſtacle to his ſubſcribing, was the Canon made againſt the Growth of Popery: And a to the Oath, the Canons in King James's Time had enjoined ſeveral Oaths to be taken by Church-Wardens, and others, and yet neither thoſe Canons, or Oaths, had ever been declared illegal by any enſuing Parliament, or the Makers of them accuſed of any Crime, much leſs Treaſon; and his Grace was about to ſhew that there was nothing in theſe laſt Canons contrary to Law: But their Lordſhips would not ſuffer him to contradict what both

Houſes

1644. 19 Car. I. Houſes had voted; to which his Grace replied, That he conceived the Lords were as much concerned in Honour, as he was in Point of Safety, that no Charge ſhould be brought againſt him which he ſhould not be at Liberty to anſwer; and inſiſted, that theſe Canons, being made in full Convocation, could not be aſcribed to him in particular, whatever Conſtruction was put upon them.

As to his aſſuming Papal Power, and the Proof that was brought of it, The Univerſity of Oxford's giving him the Papal Titles, he ſaid, the Title Sanctitas tua was not appropriated to the Pope, but frequently given to other Biſhops, both Greek and Latin; and as to the Stile of Summus Pontifex, this was no unuſual Stile of the chief Prelate of any Nation; and that theſe Titles were given him by others, who muſt be anſwerable for them; they were never aſſumed by him: Beſides, he thought it one Thing to aſſume a Papal Title, and another to aſſume Papal Power.

He did not remember he had ever ſaid, he hoped to ſee the Clergy exempted from the Civil Magiſtrate; but if he had, he could only mean it of an Exemption from Oppreſſion: He might ſay indeed, That the Clergy were now debaſed; that heretofore it was otherwiſe, and he hoped to ſee it ſo again; and he thought there was no great Hurt in that. He was alſo charged, he obſerved, with procuring ſome Clergymen to be made Juſtices of Peace, and with recommending Biſhop Juxon to be Lord Treaſurer; but he did not apprehend there was any Crime in this, much leſs High-Treaſon, as he aimed at the Service of the King, and the Good of the Church in it.

As to his proſecuting Sir Richard Samuel, for doing his Office of Juſtice of Peace on ſome Clergymen, he obſerved this was proved only by Sir Richard, who was a Witneſs in his own Cauſe; and beſides, the Proſecution was by the High Commiſſion, or the Council-Table, and ſo not chargeable on his Grace; and it did appear he oppreſſed the poor Clergymen, his Neighbours, which was not a genteel Part of a Man in Power.

This Day's Hearing being over, the Archbiſhop was ordered to attend again, the 22d of April, which he did, but was ſent back, and nothing done any more, than on the 25th and 30th of April, when he attended likewiſe, at the Expence of ſeven or eight Pounds a Day.

8th Day. On Saturday, May the 4th, his Grace was brought to the Bar again, when Mr. Nicholas, the Manager, again reproached him with the high Titles he had ſuffered the Univerſity of Oxford, and others, to confer upon him, and then proceeded to enforce that Part of the Charge, in Relation to his endeavouring to exempt the Clergy from the Civil Power; for Proof whereof they cited Part of a Speech of his Grace's in the Star-Chamber, wherein he adviſes them to take Care not to cauſe the Laws of the Church, and the Kingdom, to claſh: Another Proof was a Suggeſtion that he cauſed ſome Juſtices of the Peace to be ſummoned before the High-Commiſſion, for keeping their Seſſions at Tewksbury in a Part of the Church; and as a further Evidence of this Charge, they ſaid, When the Mayor of Oxford had ſet the Watch, they were diſturbed by the Proctors, and a Conſtable impriſoned, and that his Grace refuſed to refer the Matter: That he had alſo formed a Project to aboliſh all Impropriations: That he had introduced ſeveral new and exorbitant Clauſes into the High Commiſſion: And laſtly, That he had illegally extorted a Patent from the King, for the Fines in the High Commiſſion, towards repairing St. Paul's. 1644. 19 Car. I.

To this his Grace anſwered, That he did not think it amiſs to adviſe that the Laws of the Church, and the State, ſhould not claſh; which might well ſtand together, if ſome did not ſet them at odds; and as for the Juſtices of Peace being called before the High Commiſſion, for keeping their Seſſions in a Church, he thought it a great Profanation; though Men in this Age were grown ſo bold with Churches, as if the Profanation of them was no Fault at all: However, there was no Proof of his cauſing this Proſecution. His Defence to the Charge of the 8th Day.

That as to the Oxford Watch, It was an antient Privilege of that Univerſity; but being lately diſputed by the Townſmen, they applied to his Grace, as their Chancellor, and he did agree to refer it to the Judge of the Circuit; but his Troubles coming on, they refuſed to ſtand to the Award, and would have had another Reference: As to his Project of buying in Impropriations, or prevailing with his Majeſty to give ſuch as were in his Power, to the Support of the Church of Ireland, and which were daily begged by private Perſons; This he did not think needed a Defence, any more than his propoſing to ſettle ſome fixed Commendams on the ſmaller Biſhopricks, which was made another Article againſt him.

As to the Clauſes that were ſaid to be added in the High Commiſſion, his Grace ſhewed, that they were in the former Commiſſion; and whatever Power that Court exerciſed, it was not aſſumed, but granted by his Majeſty; and though the Manager had compared his Grace to Pope Boniface VIII. as if he took on him the Power of both Swords, the Caſe was widely different; for that the Pope claimed them as originally due to him, and theſe Commiſſioners under the Prince, and by his Authority.

And laſtly, as to his having illegally extorted a Patent from the King, for the Fines in the High Commiſſion, his Majeſty's Piety was ſo forward in that Matter, that nothing need be extorted from him: And his Grace ſhould always look upon his Endeavours to have St. Paul's repaired, as honeſt and honourable; neither could any Man, after the ſtricteſt Search, charge him with miſapplying a Penny of the Money.

This Hearing being ended, he was ordered to appear again the 9th, and then the 13th of May, both which Days he attended, and ſtood expoſed to the Scorn and Laughter of the Mob, and was at length diſmiſſed unheard, though not without a conſiderable Expence.

His Grace being brought to the Bar again, 9th Day. the 16th of May, was charged with preſenting a blind Man to a Living of Sir Arthur Haſlerigs, which was an Impropriation, and a Lay Fee, and with ſaying, If he lived, no Man ſhould ſtand upon his Lay Fee: That he had had illegally deprived one Fautrye for Simony, the High Commiſſion having no Power over Freeholds: That he had altered the Statutes of the Univerſity of Oxford, taking upon himſelf to be an Univerſal Law-giver: That he had illegally made new Statutes for Cathedral Churches; and ordered that nothing ſhould be done on thoſe Statutes, without adviſing with him. His Injunctions for the Viſitation of Winton alſo were complained of, requiring the pulling down ſeveral Houſes that were upon conſecrated Ground; and his Intention of viſiting the two Univerſities: Then he was charged with the Cenſure of Baſtwick, for a Book he wrote againſt Biſhops; and with ſaying, That Chriſtian Biſhops, were before Chriſtian Kings.

His Defence to the Charge of the 9th Day.

His Grace anſwered, That the Living he preſented to, (ſaid to be Sir Arthur Haſelrig's) was not a Lay Fee; and his Words were, That no Man ſhould make a Preſentative Benefice a Lay Fee: That Fautrye was legally cenſured and deprived by the High Commiſſion, which had a Power of Deprivation, by the expreſs Words of the 1 Eliz. cap. 1. That as to the Statutes of the Univerſity of Oxford, they lay in a miſerable Confuſion; and it was the great Neceſſity of it that put him upon that Work; neither had he done any Thing in it, but by the Conſent of the Univerſity; and thought, he deſerved rather the Thanks of the Publick, than to be proſecuted for it: That there were no illegal Innovations introduced, as had been ſuggeſted, nothing but what had been put in Practice, and approved before his Time: That theſe Statutes were confirmed by the Broad Seal, made by the King's Power, and not by any Papal Power he had aſſumed, as was urged againſt him. That the Statutes of ſome Cathedral Churches alſo required great Alteration; and there was Reaſon he ſhould be conſulted about them, as his Majeſty had entruſted his Grace chiefly with that Matter, and expected an Account from him. That the Houſes ordered to be demoliſhed at Winton, were new erections upon conſecrated Ground, and were not to be taken down, till the Leaſes were expired; and this was to be done according to the Statutes of the Kingdom, and not otherwiſe.

As to his Intention of viſiting the Univerſities, it would not have been unlawful, as he had the King's Warrant for it; and it appeared, that three of his Predeceſſors did actually viſit the Univerſities.

That Mr. Baſtwick was cenſured by the High Commiſſion, which could not affect him in Particular; and that no body doubted, but Chriſtian Biſhops were before Chriſtian Kings: And whereas he was charged with ſaying, No Biſhop, no King; that was an Expreſſion of King James's: And though he had affirmed, the Order and Calling of a Biſhop, to be from God and Chriſt, and by Apoſtolical Right; yet he held this Juriſdiction might not be exerciſed, but by the Leave and Power of the King, within whoſe Dominions they were.

th Day. His Grace attending again the 20th of May, the Committee proceeded on the 6th and 7th

Original Articles; which charge, That his Grace had traiterouſly endeavoured to alter, and ſubvert God's true Religion; which they endeavoured to prove by ſome Alterations he had made in his Chapel at Lambeth; as his turning the Table North and South, repairing the Windows with coloured Glaſs, and imitating the Pictures in the Maſs Book; that he uſed Bowings at his coming into the Chapel, and going up to the Altar; and the Organs, Candleſticks, the Hiſtory Piece at the Back of the Altar, and the wearing Copes at Communions and Conſecrations, were brought in, to ſupport the Charge. Another Inſtance produced, to ſhew his Intentions of altering Religion, was, his conſecrating the Communion Plate. A Bible that was found in his Study, with the five Wounds of our Saviour wrought on the Cover; a Miſſal, and other Books relating to the Popiſh Liturgy, and his own Prayer-Book, where the Times of Prayer were appointed at Canonical Hours, were held to be ſufficient Evidence of his Deſign to introduce Popery. The Pictures of the Fathers in the Gallery, and a Dove over one of them, (which they ſaid ſtood for the Holy Ghoſt) and an ecce homo, or Pilate bringing forth Chriſt, were all looked upon as Proofs of his Popery.

1644. 19 Car. I.

His Defence to the Charge of the 10th Day.

His Grace anſwered, as to the Alterations in his Chapel, that it lay before in a very indecent Manner; that he had ſet the Table North and South, according to Queen Elizabeth's Injunctions, and they were guilty of Innovations who ſet it otherwiſe; that the Windows were miſerably patched; and he did, by the Aſſiſtance of his Secretary, diſcover the Story by what remained, and got them repaired, but not by the Miſſal, as was ſuggeſted; they contained the whole Story from the Creation, to the Day of Judgment; and he did not believe this was in the Miſſal: And even Calvin was of Opinion, that Pictures and Images might be of Uſe to inſtruct the People; and that both in King Edward's and Queen Elizabeth's Reign, ſuch Pictures were allowed; that Bowings alſo were uſual in Queen Elizabeth's Time, and if he muſt bow to Men, in either Houſe of Parliament, muſt he not bow and worſhip God in his own Houſe, though there were neither Altar or Communion-Table in it? That Organs, &c. were in the Royal Chapels in the laſt Reigns; and that in all Ages of the Church, the conſecrating the ſacred Veſſels, as well as Churches, had been uſed. And if there can be no Dedication of theſe Things to God, no Separation of them from common Uſes, then neither the Things or Place were Holy; and there would be no ſuch Thing as Sacriledge, no Difference between a Church and a common Houſe, between holy Tables and ordinary Tables: That St. Paul's Queſtion puts the Matter Home, if they would conſider it, Thou which abhorreſt Idols, doſt thou commit Sacriledge? Thou who abhorreſt Idols to the very defacing of Church Windows, doſt thou of all others commit Sacriledge, which the very Worſhippers of Idols puniſh? As to his Prayer of Dedication, this was not taken from the Miſſal, but from one uſed by Biſhop Andrews. The

1644. 19 Car. I.

Bible mentioned, was a preſent from a Proteſtant Lady, and never ſeen out of his Study, by any who might be offended at it: That he had alſo a Miſſal and other Popiſh Books, but more of the Greek Liturgies than the Roman; and he did not know how he ſhould anſwer their Errors, if he might not have them. That he had alſo the Alcoran in divers Copies, and they might by the ſame Rule, conclude him a Mahometan. And as to their expoſing his private Prayers, he thought this was not to be paralleled in any Heathen Nation. If he had enjoined, himſelf, his Prayers, at Canonical Hours, he hoped there was no Sin in it; and if his Prayer at the Conſecration of Hammerſmith Chapel might be read, no Offence could be taken at it. If he had been ſo addicted to Popery as they ſuggeſted, It was a wonder the diligent Mr. Prynne had found no Prayers to the Bleſſed Virgin, and the Saints, among his Papers.

That as to the Dove, repreſenting the Holy Ghoſt, this was more than the Witneſs could depoſe; and as to that and the ecce homo he anſwered out of Calvin, That it was lawful to make a Picture of any Thing that might be ſeen. And laſtly, theſe Pictures had remained in the Gallery, ever ſince the Reign of Queen Mary; nor had any of his Predeceſſors, during the Time of Queen Elizabeth, or King James, thought fit to remove them. And as to the Bowings he was reproached with, he was ſorry any Reverence in God's Houſe could be thought too much; but it was the Devil's Cunning, when he ſaw Superſtition thrown out of the Church, to bring in Irreverence and Prophaneſs. As to the Crucifix in the Altar-piece, there had been one in the old Hangings for thirty Years before, which had never given Offence.

After this Hearing was ended, his Grace was ordered to attend another Day, when nothing was done; but he was ſo fortunate, at laſt, to get an Order to the Committee of Sequeſtrations, to receive 200*l.* out of his own Eſtate; which was all they ſuffered him to take out of the Profits, in the two Years it was under Sequeſtration.

11th Day. At another Hearing on May the 27th, they renewed their Charge againſt the Windows in Lambeth Chapel; particularly they obſerved, that there was a Picture of God the Father in them; and Prynne depoſed, that his Grace had a Book of Pictures, containing the Hiſtory of our Saviour. They alſo urged, that the Ceremonies uſed at the Coronation were ſuperſtitious; and that he had taken upon him to alter the Coronation Oath. That his Grace ſuffered the Picture of the Bleſſed Virgin, to be painted on the Church Door of St. Mary's in Oxford; and that Copes, Bowings, Pictures, and Candleſticks, were uſed at Oxford, and in ſeveral Pariſh Churches, and the Communion-Table placed Altar-wiſe; which they held to be ſufficient Evidence of his introducing Popery.

His Defence to the Charge of the 11th Day. To this his Grace anſwered, That the Picture of God the Father, ſaid to be in Lambeth Windows, appeared to be a Miſtake from their own Witneſſes: And for the Pictures in his Book, it was neceſſary he ſhould have them, there being ſome Things to be diſcovered from the Pictures the Papiſts allowed their People, which their Writings did not, or perhaps durſt not avow. And as to the Ceremonies uſed at the Coronation, and the Coronation Oath, he ſhewed they were the ſame as in the preceding Reign; adding, that his Predeceſſor was then Archbiſhop, and performed the Solemnity.

1644. 19 Car. I.

As to the Virgin Mary's Picture at Oxford, he neither ordered it, or knew of it till it was done; nor had he heard of any Abuſe or Diſlike of it ſince: And as to the Buſineſs of the Communion-Table, Copes, Bowings, Candleſticks, &c. he had already anſwered that Part of the Charge.

His Grace being brought to the Bar again 12th Day. the 6th of June, great Part of the Charge of the Day before was repeated, and they accuſed him of promoting ſeveral ſevere Sentences in the High Commiſſion; and particularly one againſt Mr. Workman, for preaching againſt Images; and another againſt Mr. Sherfield, for defacing a Church Window at Saliſbury; wherein was the Picture of God the Father: And that his Chaplain Dr. Bragge, refuſed to licenſe Dr. Featley's Sermons, till a Paſſage againſt Images was ſtruck out.

To this his Grace anſwered, That Mr. Workman was not cenſured for preaching againſt Images, but for affirming, That the Election of Miniſters was in the People; for preaching conſtantly againſt the Government of the Church; praying for the States of Holland, and the King of Sweden, before his Majeſty; and raiſing ſuch a Faction in Glouceſter, that the High Commiſſion did not think it proper he ſhould remain any longer there. His Defence to the Charge of the 12th Day.

As to Mr. Sherfield's defacing the Church Window, it did not appear there was any Picture of God the Father in it; and if there had, It was not for private Men to demoliſh Churches or Church-Windows; but if there was any ſuperſtitious Pictures in them, they ought to complain to Authority: And beſides, theſe Cenſures were the Acts of the High Commiſſion, and could not be charged upon his Grace.

And as to the refuſing to licenſe Dr. Featley's Sermons, till a Paſſage againſt Images were ſtruck out, he left the Care of the Preſs to his Chaplains, as his Predeceſſors had done: Whether ſuch a Paſſage was expunged, he knew not; but there were Paſſages as full againſt Images and Popery, left in Dr. Featley's Sermons, as any that could be ſtruck out; where he ſtiles the Papiſts Idolaters, as groſs as the Baaliſts; and calls the Pope Antichriſt, and the Whore of Babylon.

At the Concluſion of this Hearing, his Grace complained of a Paper called The Diurnal, wherein he was ſcandalouſly abuſed; and obſerved, that it had been affirmed, in this and other Papers, that the whole Charge had been proved againſt him, which their Lordſhips knew to be falſe: But his Complaints were very little regarded.

His Grace being brought to the Bar again, 13th Day. the 11th of June, the Managers proceeded to give Evidence of his Attempts to ſubvert the Eſtabliſhed Religion, of which his Conſecration tion of two Churches, viz. St. Katherine Creechurch, and St. Giles's in the Fields, were ſaid to be Inſtances. The Witneſſes depoſed, that he came in a pompous Manner to perform the Ceremony, and at his Approach to the Church Doot, cauſed the following Paſſage out of the Pſalms to be read, (viz.) Lift up your Heads O ye Gates, and be ye lift up ye everlaſting Doors, and the King of Glory ſhall come in. That he kneeled down at his coming in, and uſed many Bowings and Cringes, threw Duſt into the Air, and uſed ſeveral Curſes in Imitation of the Pontifical, taking alſo one of his Prayers from thence; and at laſt pronounced the Place Holy. He was charged alſo with the Conſecration of Chapels, and giving the Name of St. John to his own Chapel; and a Paper was read, ſaid to be a Liſt of his Chapel Furniture, wherein Wafers were mentioned inſtead of conſecrated Bread.

The publiſhing the Book of Sports was alſo urged as a Piece of Popery, and his puniſhing ſeveral of his Clergy for not reading it, as another Offence. Sir Henry Mildmay, and Anthony Mildmay depoſed, that his Grace was hated by one Faction at Rome, and loved by another; and, though he was but an obſcure Man, they obſerved, within theſe 15 Years, there was a ſtrong Opinion of a Reconciliation between the Churches of Rome and England ſince his Advancement.

His Defence to the Charge of the 13th Day.

To the Charge of this Day his Grace anſwered, That, as to the Pomp of the Conſecrations mentioned, he was only attended by ſome few Officers of the Arches, who uſually attended their Dioceſan: And though the Managers frequently repeated thoſe Words, Lift up your Heads, &c. that the King of Glory may come in, as if he had applied them to his own Perſon: It was a Paſſage antiently uſed at Conſecrations, and related to God Almighty, the true King of Glory; who, at the Dedication, took Poſſeſſion of the Place, by his Servant the Biſhop: And as to his Bowing and Kneeling, he looked upon this as his Duty, let them call it what they would: That there was no throwing Duſt in the Air, or Curſes uſed: And he obſerved, that one of the Witneſſes depoſed, That this Ceremony was performed at the Beginning, and the other, at the End of the Service; and therefore their Evidence was inconſiſtent. That he did not follow the Pontifical, but a Copy left by Biſhop Andrews, which he had ready to produce: That there were ſeveral Prayers in the Miſſal, the ſame with our Collects; which were, notwithſtanding, confirmed by our Laws; for though we had ſeparated the Chaff, we ought not to throw away the good Grain; and wiſhed only, that true Religion might remain, till it was overthrown by the Conſecration of Churches: That there was the ſame Reaſon for the Conſecration of Chapels as Churches; and theſe were things uſed long before the Times of Popery: Nor did he apprehend there was any Crime in giving a Chapel the Name of ſome Saint or Angel, for Diſtinction Sake, and in Honour to their Memories: This was a very antient Cuſtom, as appeared from St. Auſtin, and other Fathers: And as to the Paper that had been read, as a Liſt of his Chapel Furniture, this was the Model of Biſhop Andrews's Chapel, and nothing of it his Grace's own Hand, but the Indorſement; though Prynne had ſworn it to be a Particular of the Furniture of the Archbiſhop's Chapel in his own Hand: And indeed, he never gave, or received the Communion in any Thing but common Bread.

1644. 19 Car. I.

As to publiſhing the Book of Sports and Recreations on Sundays, this was done by the King's Authority; that he was always for keeping the Day Holy, but free from a ſuperſtitious Holineſs: That Recreations were not allowed, till after Evening-Service; and then, only to thoſe, who had been at Divine Service Morning and Evening: And if Recreations were not lawful after Divine Service, why were they allowed and encouraged at Geneva, where the elder Men went to Bowls, and the younger to the Exerciſe of their Arms: And Calvin gave it as one Reaſon of Inſtituting the Sabbath, That Servants might have a Day of Reſt and Remiſſion from their Labour: And what Manner of Reſt was that, where able young Men might uſe no Recreations? That ſome had indeed been ſuſpended ab officio, for not reading the Book, when his Majeſty required it; but none had their Livings ſequeſtred on that Account. Wilſon, one of the Witneſſes, was ſequeſtred for Delapidations, and not on Account of his refuſing to read the Book; and Culmer, the other Witneſs, for Piſſing in the Body of the Cathedral at Canterbury. Beſides, theſe Men were ſequeſtered by the High Commiſſion, and not by himſelf: And laſtly, it was an Obſervation of Calvin's, that thoſe Men, who ſtood ſo ſtrictly for the Morality of the Sabbath, did, by groſs and carnal Sabbatization, thrice out-go the Superſtition of the Jews.

As to Sir Henry Mildmay's Depoſition, he obſerved, that he had formerly declared, That his Grace was the moſt hated at Rome, of any one that had ſat in the See of Canterbury, ſince the Reformation: And as for his being an obſcure Perſon till within theſe fifteen Years; he had been a Biſhop twenty-three Years, and it was eighteen ſince he was made Dean of his Majeſty's Chapel; and, if a Character given him by his Enemies, either maliciouſly or ignorantly, was ſufficient to ground a Charge of this Nature upon, it might lie in the Power of two or three Jeſuits, to deſtroy any Biſhop in England: And, after all, he much queſtioned, Whether Sir Henry Mildmay, had ever been at Rome.

At another Hearing the 17th of June, he was accuſed as being the Occaſion of Dam-port's leaving his Benefice, and retiring to Holland; and with ſaying, (when he heard he was in New-England) That his Arm ſhould reach him there. 14th Day.

That one Nathaniel Wickens had been impriſoned nine Weeks, only for being a Servant to Mr. Prynne; that upon his refuſing the Oath ex officio, his Grace ſaid, The Charge ſhould be taken pro confeſſo; and that his Friends were refuſed a Sight of the Articles againſt him.

His Grace was alſo charged with ſtopping Books at the Preſs, and expunging Paſſages out out of them; and particularly the Engliſh Bible with Geneva Notes: And that he had uſed his Power, to ſuppreſs ſome Books in Holland: That he ſuppreſſed an Almanack, that left out the Apoſtles and Saints, and inſerted the Martyrs of Queen Mary's Reign in their Stead.

1644. 19 Car. I.

His Defence to the Charge of the 14th Day.

His Grace anſwered, as to Dawport the Clergyman's leaving his Benefice and flying to Holland, it appeared by the Evidence, That he went away upon a Summons from the High Commiſſion; that his Grace had prevented a Proſecution againſt him once, but he was not obliged to do it always; and that he was a dangerous and factious Man, nor was it fit the Plantations ſhould protect ſuch.

That as to Prynne's Man, he was impriſoned for refuſing the Oath ex officio; and it was the conſtant Practice of the High Commiſſion, the Star-Chamber, and the Chancery, to take the Charge pro confeſſo, where the Party refuſed to anſwer upon Oath; nor did the High Commiſſion ever grant a Copy of the Articles, till the Party took the Oath ex officio.

That as to his ſtopping the Bibles with Geneva Notes, thoſe Notes were very partial, ſeditious, and dangerous, and of late uſed to very ill Purpoſes; for which Reaſon the High Commiſſion had been more ſevere againſt them than formerly; That they had alſo reſtrained the Importing Bibles from Holland, becauſe it was a great Diſcouragement to the Engliſh Printers; and that the States were prevailed on to ſuppreſs ſome ſeditious Libels againſt the State and Church of England, that had been printed in Holland.

15th Day.

His Grace being brought from the Tower to Weſtminſter every Day to his Trial, relates, that at his landing, he was generally ſaluted with reproachful Language, and particularly by one Quarterman, who this Day cried out, What do the Lords mean to be troubled ſo often with this baſe Fellow? They would do well to hang him out of the Way. Nor was Nicholas the Manager leſs ſcurrilous, when his Grace appeared at the Bar, giving him worſe Language, than a Man of any Education would have given to his Slave.

To prove the Charge of Popery againſt him this Day, they produced a Letter, found in his Grace's Study, that had been written from a Jeſuit to his Superior; wherein the Jeſuit ſaid, That Arminianiſm was their Drug, and their Plot againſt the Proteſtants: And urged, That his Grace was the great Supporter of the Arminians; that he diſcouraged Lecturers who preached againſt it; and that he had taken upon him to alter the Prayers for the 5th of November: And laſtly, That his Grace had refuſed to licenſe a Book of Sir Anth. Hungerford's, and referred him to one of his Chaplains.

His Defence to the Charge of the 15th Day.

The Archbiſhop anſwered, If it was a Crime for a Miniſter of State, to ſeize the Jeſuits Letters, how ſhould they detect their Plots againſt Religion: That the Letter was not directed to him; and he did not ſee how he could be charged with any Thing the Jeſuits ſaid in their Letters: That it could never be for the Peace of the Church, to allow factious and humourſome Lectures: And if he had altered the Prayers for the 5th of November in ſome little Matters, his Accuſers ought to remember, they had not only altered, but taken away, this and the whole Liturgy of the Church of England, which had been ſo long eſtabliſhed by Act of Parliament; and aboliſhed Epiſcopacy, which had continued in the Church of Chriſt above ſixteen hundred Years. 1644. 19 Car. I.

As to his refuſing to licenſe Sir Anth. Hungerford's Book, he left theſe things to his Chaplains, as his Predeceſſors had always done: It was impoſſible they ſhould peruſe every Book themſelves

16th Day.

On the 27th of June his Grace was charged with the following Paſſages out of a Speech he made in the Star-Chamber; from whence the Managers ſaid, it was evident he held Tranſubſtantiation, (viz.) The Altar is the greateſt Place of God's Reſidence on Earth, greater than the Pulpit; for there it is, hoc eſt corpus meum, This is my Body, but in the other it is at moſt, hoc eſt verbum meum, This is my Word; and a greater Reverence is due to the Body, than to the Word of God.

He was alſo charged again, with licenſing Popiſh and Arminian Books, and ſuffering his Chaplains to preach and print Arminian Doctrines.

His Defence to the Charge of the 16th Day.

To this his Grace anſwered, That Mr. Nicholas the Manager, confounded Tranſubſtantiation with the Real Preſence: That Calvin, who was an Enemy to Tranſubſtantiation, yet held a real and true Preſence: That St. Paul obſerves a great Sin was committed in his Time, In not diſcerning the Lord's Body, when unworthy Communicants received: That this was at the Holy Table or Altar, St. Paul ſays, they received, yet did not diſcern the Lord's Body; and yet he did not think St. Paul maintained Tranſubſtantiation: That the Communion was ever held to be the Touchſtone of Religion. All Divines agreed with what our Saviour taught, Matt. xxvi. 26. That the Paſſion of Chriſt, and this bleſſed Sacrament, have the ſame Effect, where the latter is worthily received.

He ſaid, he did not know his Chaplains preached or printed Popiſh or Arminian Doctrines, or licenſed any Book that maintained them; but if they did, they were anſwerable for it.

This Day an Order was made for removing all the Archbiſhop's Books from Lambeth; and it is ſaid, they were given to the infamous Hugh Peters, Cromwell's Chaplain.

17th Day.

The next Thing inſiſted on, was, his Grace's preferring none but Men Popiſhly affected; or thoſe, who promoted Ceremonies and the Arminian Doctrine; inſtancing in Archbiſhop Neile, Dr. Bray, Dr. Pierce, and other celebrated Clergymen.

Then they charged him with cauſing many pious and learned Divines to be ſilenced, deprived, &c. according to the eleventh Original Article. They alſo went upon the ſixth Additional Article, which charges him with hindering and buying in of Impropriations.

His Defence to the Charge of the 17th Day.

To theſe Articles his Grace anſwered, That moſt of the Clergymen, mentioned to be preferred by him, were preferred by others; neither did he know they held Popiſh or Arminian Doctrines: That none were ſilenced or deprived, but factious Preachers and Lecturers, and theſe moſt of them by other Biſhops or the High Commiſſion; for which he was not not answerable. That the Design of buying in Impropriations, was a Project to undermine the Church: The twelve Men who were made the Trustees in this Matter, took upon them, without any Authority, to dispose of this Charity, (as it was called) to whom they saw fit; and bestowed it only on Men disaffected to the Church, to School-Masters and Students of the University, to breed them up in Opposition to the Church; and disposed of none of it to the present Incumbents, to whom the Tythes were due, unless they appeared to be of their factious Principles; and by these Means they would, in a short Time, have brought great Part of the Clergy to depend on them: Whereupon, Mr. Attorney advising, that the Project was illegal, the Matter was tried and adjudged to be so in the Court of Exchequer; but that no Man had been more zealous for purchasing Impropriations, than himself, where they might be applied to their proper Use.

18*th Day.* His Grace being brought to the Bar again on the 17th of June, was charged with making a Division between the Church of England and the foreign reformed Churches, by depriving the foreign Churches here, of their Privileges; and that Passage in his Book against Fisher, (viz.) No Bishop, no Church, was urged as a further Proof of his Intention: A Passage in Bishop Montagu's Book also was cited against his Grace, (viz.) That none but a Bishop could ordain, unless in case of Necessity: And a third Thing insisted on was, his advising Bishop Hall, not to affirm positively, That the Pope was Antichrist: Another Offence was, his having asserted, That Church Government by Bishops was not alterable by Human Laws.

Then the 13th Original Article, and the 7th Additional Article were proceeded on, which charge him with traiterously endeavouring to reconcile the Church of England to the Church of Rome; to maintain which, Dr. Featley deposed, That about thirty Years since his Grace was reported to be Popishly affected at Oxford; and one Harris deposed, that he was told, his Grace would leave the Church of England: And a Letter or two, found in his Grace's Study from the Pope to some other Persons, were looked upon as a further Evidence of his Grace's being in a horrid Plot, to reconcile the Church of England to Rome; which was said to be confirmed by his intimate Acquaintance with the Duke of Buckingham; by the Favour he was in with the Queen; and by Papers sent him by one Habernfield, about a Plot; and lastly, his having been offered a Cardinal's Cap.

His Defence to the Charge of the 18th Day. His Grace's Answer to this Part of the Charge was, That the Inference No Bishop, no Church, was St. Jerome's; and if they were offended at it, they would do well to answer him; that it was the Opinion also of many learned and moderate Divines, that none but a Bishop could ordain, unless in case of Necessity; and whether the foreign Churches were under that Necessity, might deserve Consideration: That he did indeed advise Bishop Hall, not to assert positively, the Pope was Antichrist; and observed what King James said, when he was reflected on for saying, the Pope was Antichrist, (viz.) I maintain it not as a Point of Faith, but as a probable Opinion; for which, I have more Grounds, than the Pope has for his Challenge of temporal Power over Princes: Let him recall this Opinion, and I will recall that; adding, he did not believe the calling the Pope Antichrist ever converted one understanding Papist: Nor had Gabriel Powel done the Church of England much Service abroad, by affirming, That he was as certain the Pope was Antichrist, as that Jesus Christ was the Son of God, and the Redeemer of the World: However he said, He left People to think as their Judgments guided them; as appeared by his licensing Dr. Featley's Sermons, where he endeavours to prove the Pope Antichrist, and the Whore of Babylon.

1644. 19 Car. I.

To which Nicholas replyed, in a Flood of abusive Language, and concluded, That the Archbishop was Pander to the Whore of Babylon. Whereupon his Grace said, If they did not think fit to treat him as an Archbishop, he hoped he should be used as a Christian; and, were it not for the Duty he owed to God and his own Innocence, he would desert his Defence, rather than endure such Language: And the Lords were so good as to express some Dislike, at the abusive Language that had been given him.

Then his Grace proceeded in his Defence and said, Though he had asserted the Government of the Church by Bishops, was not alterable by Human Laws; yet he held, That Bishops might be restrained and limited by Human Laws, in those things which were but Incidents to their Calling; but their Calling, so far as it was by Divine Right, could not be taken away, which was the Judgment of the Church of England; as appeared by the Preface to the Book of Ordination, which says, From the Apostles Time there have been three Orders of Ministers in the Church of Christ, Bishops, Priests, and Deacons; and that this Book was confirmed by the Statute of the 8 Eliz. cap. 1. observing, That it was a little absurd in them, to cry out of Innovations, who had thrown Bishops out of the Church, after they had continued in it sixteen hundred Years.

As to his being Popishly affected, he observed, these were but Reports, and the Witnesses had not instanced in one Popish Opinion held by him, except it was, his asserting the Necessity of Baptism, in the Divinity-School at Oxford. As to their inferring that he was Popishly affected, from some of the Pope's Letters found in his Study, and directed to other People, this was not at all concluding; for his Predecessor had many such Letters by him, without any such Imputation; nor did his Intimacy with the Duke of Buckingham, prove him to be for a Popish Match, either with Spain or France, or discover his Inclination to Popery, any more than her Majesty's Favour.

As to Habernfield's Plot, his Grace shewed, he sent the Papers to the King, immediately after his receiving them: And by those it appeared, There was a Conspir-y against his 1644. 19 Car. I. own Life: He wondered therefore with what Colour they could produce thoſe Papers againſt him.

He did acknowledge, that a Perſon belonging to a certain Ambaſſador, did offer him a Cardinal's Hat, but he immediately acquainted his Majeſty with it; and they ought to have done him the Juſtice to have mentioned his Anſwer to the Offer, (viz.) That ſomewhat dwelt in him, which would not ſuffer him to accept that, till Rome was altered; But as to any other Offer by Signior Con, as his Enemies had ſuggeſted, he knew nothing of it; neither did he ſuffer Con to come near him, though great Application was made to him that he would: Concluding, That if the Offer of a Cardinal's Hat, would make a Man a Traitor, then any Papiſt might bring a Biſhop within the Danger of High Treaſon.

19th Day. On the 24th of July, the Managers went upon the ſame Articles they did at the preceding Hearing, and repeated a great deal of the ſame Matter: They charged him alſo with ſaying, That the Church of Rome and ours, was all one; that we did not differ in Fundamentals, but in Circumſtances; that Rome was a true Church, &c. That he favoured Papiſts and releaſed them out of Priſon; entertained and harboured Sir Toby Matthew, and ſeveral Popiſh Prieſts, refuſed to commit Fiſher the Jeſuit; and was very intimate with Secretary Windebank, who uſed to diſmiſs Popiſh Prieſts, when the Meſſengers had taken them: That the Prieſts had the beſt Lodgings in Newgate, and the Liberty of walking the Streets: That he would not ſuffer Popiſh Books that were taken to be deſtroyed, but frequently returned them to the Owners; and that he had ſaid in the Preface to his Book againſt Fiſher, That to his Remembrance, he had not given him or his, any coarſe Language.

His Defence to the Charge of the 19th Day. His Grace anſwered, as to the Churches of England and Rome being all one, That his Words were, Nor do the Church of Rome and the Proteſtants ſet up a different Religion, for the Chriſtian Religion is the ſame in both; and he obſerved, That unleſs they maintained Papiſts were no Chriſtians, they could make nothing of this Paſſage: And as to his ſaying, We did not differ in Fundamentals; Calvin himſelf had affirmed, That in Deſpight of Antichriſt the Foundations of the Church remained in the Papacy itſelf, that the Church might not wholly periſh.

As to his being intimate with Mr. Secretary Windebank, he was an old Friend, and he thought him a Man of Worth, but, if he was deceived, the Secretary was living, and muſt anſwer for himſelf. He acknowledged he ſent four Pounds to releaſe Fludd out of Priſon; it having been repreſented to him, That he was a Convert from Popery, and his Impriſonment occaſioned on that Account; of which he produced a Witneſs: He alſo brought the Servants that attended him conſtantly, who depoſed, They never ſaw Sir Toby Matthew with his Grace, or any Popiſh Prieſt entertained by him: And as to Fiſher the Jeſuit, he did not think it proper to act in that Matter, leaſt it ſhould be ſaid, he deſtroyed himſelf becauſe he could not anſwer him.

1644. 19 Car. I. As to Popiſh Books, he ſaid, it was the conſtant Courſe of the High Commiſſion to give them to their Regiſter, to lay up in his Office, and when they had a good Number of them, then to burn them; and if any were re-delivered to the Owners, it was, when they were not found Dangerous.

He thought it very hard they ſhould charge him with the Confinement or Liberty given to the Priſoners in Newgate; they did not ſure deſign to make the Archbiſhop Keeper of Newgate. And Laſtly, as to his not calling Names and giving Fiſher and the Pope ill Language, when he wrote againſt them, he was ſtill of Opinion that ill Language added very little weight to an Argument.

His Grace being brought to the Bar again, 20th Day. the 29th of July, the Managers went upon the 14th Original Article, (viz.) That to prevent his being queſtioned for theſe and other his Traiterous Proceedings, he had endeavoured to ſubvert the Rights of Parliament, and create a Diviſion between his Majeſty and his People, and ruin his Kingdoms; for which, they impeached him of High Treaſon.

The Evidence, to ſupport this Charge was, That he had aſſiſted the Duke of Buckingham in making two Speeches, when he was impeached by the Houſe of Commons; and that he had drawn up two of the Kings Speeches to the Parliament, in which were ſome four Paſſages; and Sir Sackville Crowe depoſed, that his Grace ſhewed him a Paper, in which were ſeveral Aſperſions on the Parliament, and that the Paper was ſubſcribed W. Laud: A Paſſage out of his Diary alſo was read, to ſhew his enmity to Parliaments (viz.) June 15, 1626. Poſt multas agitatione privata malitiain Ducem Buckinghamiæſuperavit & ſuffo. avit omnia publica negotia; nihil actum eſt, ſed Parliamentum ſolutum: Wherein it was obſerved he charged the Parliament with Malice. Another evidence of his Averſion to Parliaments, was ſaid to be, his aſſiſting in drawing up the Proclamation for ſuppreſſing the (Rebellious) Remonſtrance; a Paper alſo was produced, called his Grace's Reaſons againſt Parliaments, ſaid to be of his own Hand-writing: And the following Words were read out of his Diary againſt him, (viz.) The Parliament which was diſſolved 10 March, 1628, ſought my Ruin; as alſo ſome Notes on Sir Benjamin Rudyard's Speech in Parliament.

Another Paſſage in his Diary was read, purely to expoſe him, (viz) 27 October, 1640. Going into my upper Study to ſend away ſome Manuſcripts to Oxford, I found my Picture fallen down upon the Face, and lying on the Floor: I am almoſt every Day threatned with Ruin, God grant this be no Omen of it. Another Paſſage half burnt out, which the Managers ſupplyed out of their own Invention, was read; wherein they make him ſay, that Magna Charta had an obſcure Birth, and was foſtered by an ill Nurſe: And concluded with part of a Dream, the Earl of Pembroke depoſed, that his Grace related to him, (viz.) That he ſhould come to greater Preferment in the Church, and Power in the State, than any Man of his Birth and Calling, had done before; but in the End he ſhould be hanged.

Where-

1644. 19 Car. I.

Whereupon, Nicholas the Manager ſaid, the firſt Part of his Dream had proved true, to the great Hurt both of Church and State; and he hoped their Lordſhips would now make good the latter, and hang him.

His Defence to the Charge of the 20th Day.

To the Charge of this Day his Grace anſwered, That there were no particular Faults found with the Speeches he made, or corrected, for the Duke of Buckingham; and it was not Criminal for one Friend to aſſiſt another: And as to the King's Speeches, he acknowledged he drew them, but he followed his Inſtructions cloſe, and could not imagine that ever this ſhould have been made a Foundation for a Charge of High-Treaſon.

He proteſted he never gave Sir Sackville Crowe any ſuch Paper as was mentioned, and the Truth of it was very much to be ſuſpected, in as much, as it was ſaid to be Signed W. Laud, and he was then Biſhop of St. Davids, and always ſubſcribed himſelf Guil. Meneven. while he held that See: That the Teſtimony of Bland was Inconſiſtent; for he depoſed firſt, That the Propoſitions in that Paper, were the Occaſion of the Diſſolution of the Parliament; and within three Lines he ſays, they were delivered to the Duke of Buckingham after the Parliament was diſſolved ——That the Words privata malitia in his Diary, could not relate to the Parliament, but to ſome private Men in that Parliament: And as to the Paper called, Reaſons againſt Parliaments: It appeared to contain ſome Hopes and Fears, which were conceived of a Parliament, and not Reaſons againſt them. That his Grace was not the Author of thoſe Hopes and Fears, but only gave his Advice as a Privy Counſellor, when it was demanded; and this was his duty: However, thoſe Hopes and Fears related but to the ſucceeding Parliament and their hopes prevailing the Parliament ſat. ——As to the Note in his Diary, That a certain Parliament ſought his Ruin, this was a much better Argument to prove the Parliament Enemies to him, than he to them: And he thought his diſliking a Paſſage in Sir Benjamin Rudyard's Speech, would never prove him an Enemy to Parliaments: That as to his drawing the Proclamation, containing an Anſwer to the Remonſtrance, he did it by Command, and agreeable to his Inſtructions; and what the Remonſtrance tended to, all the World were convinced by this time: That there was no Proof of that Paſſage that Magna Charta had an obſcure Birth, and indeed the Expreſſion was not to be found in ſeveral Law Books.——As to his pretended Dream, though the Earl of Pembroke had avered the Truth of it upon his Honour, he never had any ſuch Dream: He ſaid he had not forgotten the Prediction of our Saviour, That in the World we ſhould be ſure to meet with Affliction. Nor his Prayer, Father forgive them, for they know not what they do: And concluded his Defence with a Prayer, That God would bleſs both King and People, ſubmitting himſelf to his Divine Will.

Then his Grace moved, that a Day might be aſſigned him to make a Recapitulation of the whole Proceedings, and that his Council might ſpeak to the Points of Law, which was granted, after their Lordſhips had conſulted the Commons; and Monday the 2d of September was appointed for the Recapitulation.

1644. 19 Car. I.

His Graces Recapitulation.

His Grace appearing at the Bar the 2d of September, ſaw that every Lord had a ſmall Folio in his Hand, which he found to be his Diary in print, with Prynne's Remarks upon it: Before he entred on his Recapitulation, he obſerved, That his Tryal began the 12th of March 1643---4, and ended the 29th of July following; during which Time their Lordſhips had heard him twenty Days, and twelve Days they had ſent him back without hearing; and the Intervals had been taken up, in finding and managing the Evidence againſt him. He deſired their Lordſhips would conſider his Function, his great Age, his long Impriſonment, the Loſs of his Eſtate, and the Reſignation with which he had borne theſe Afflictions: That they would alſo obſerve the Generality and Uncertainty of every Article, which made his Defence extremely Difficult: That the uſe of his Study, his Books and Papers had been taken from him, and of twenty three Parcels of Papers prepared for his Defence, and taken from him in the Tower, by Mr. Prynne, but three were returned again: That his very Pockets were ſearched, and even his Diary and Prayer-Book taken from him; and made uſe of, not to prove, but to Frame a Charge againſt him. But thus far theſe Hardſhips had been an Advantage to him; that their Lordſhips by his Diary had ſeen the Paſſages of his Life; and by his Prayer-Book, the greateſt Secrets between God and his Soul: And though theſe had been thoroughly ſearched, he thanked God, they could find no Diſloyalty in the one, or Popery in the other: That all the Council Books, thoſe of the Star-Chamber, High-Commiſſion, Signet-Office, Regiſter's of Oxford and Cambridge, had all been diligently ſearched for matter againſt him; yet he was ſuffered to have no Aſſiſtance from any of them, towards making his Defence.

That even his Actions, that tended to the Publick Good, and the Honour of the Church and Kingdom, and in which he had been at great Pains and Expences, ſuch as the Repairing St. Paul's, and ſettling the Statutes of the Univerſity of Oxford, had been objected to him as Crimes: That moſt of the Witneſſes produced againſt him, had been exaſperated Sectaries, or Separatiſts, whom the Laws had been put in Execution againſt: But by the Civil Law, no Schiſmatick was to be admitted a Witneſs againſt his Biſhop: That theſe Men were made Witneſſes in their own Cauſes; and the Judgments of the Star Chamber, High Commiſſion and Council Table, were here on a ſudden overthrown, by the Teſtimony of the Parties themſelves; nor was it poſſible for one, who had ſat as Judge in ſo many ſeveral Cauſes, to give an Account of the reſpective Motives that directed his Conſcience in every one of them, after ſo many Years elapſed: That what he had done was, to the beſt of his Underſtanding, conducive to the Peace and Welfare of the Kingdom, and the Maintenance of the Doctrines and Diſcipline of the Church Eſtabliſhed by Law: And obſerved that, while he was in the Adminiſtration, God had been pleaſed to bleſs this State with ſuch Peace and Plenty, that the Neighbouring Nations looked on

on us with Admiration. What the Overthrow of this Conſtitution might produce, God only knew; but he prayed God to avert it.

He obſerved alſo, That every haſty Expreſſion to which he had been urged by any Provocation, had been inſiſted on to aggravate the Charge; but he hoped their Lordſhips would impute them to human Frailty: That he was in many Inſtances criminally charged with the Actions of other Men, and even with the Acts of the Star Chamber, Council Table, High Commiſſion and Convocation, where he had but a ſingle Vote; and in ſome of theſe Courts, there ſat with him Men of the greateſt Honour, Learning and Experience; and it was hard, that the ſame Facts ſhould be conſtrued Treaſon in him, which were not cenſured as Miſdemeanors in any of the reſt. —— That there had been no Proof of his ſoliciting any Man to concur with him, nor could his Vote influence others, becauſe it was always given laſt.

That as to what had been ſo ſtrenuouſly urged againſt him, That he aſcribed that Power to the Church which belonged to the Parliament; he conceived, the Parliament could not as the Law ſtood, determine the Truth of Doctrines, without the Aſſent of the Church in Convocation; that the firſt Clauſe in Magna Charta, eſtabliſhes the Church in all her Rights, of which, the Power of Determining in Matters of Doctrine, and Diſcipline was one, at that Time; nor had this Right of the Clergy been limited by any Law ſince, but by that Clauſe of 1 Eliz. cap. 1. which impowers the Parliament with the Aſſent of the Convocation, to judge of Hereſy, &c. and ſtill he held, thatthe judging of the Truth or Falſhood of any Doctrine was in the Church; though the Power of puniſhing Offenders was in the Parliament, with the Aſſent of the Clergy.

That it was true the King and Parliament might, by their abſolute Power, change Chriſtianity into Mahometiſm; and thoſe who could not obey, muſt either fly, or endure the Penalties inflicted for their Diſobedience; but both King and Parliament, muſt Anſwer for the abuſe of their Power to God: And though it had been objected, that if the Parliament would not have meddled with Religion without the Convocation, there had been no Reformation: Yet the Articles of Religion were ſettled by a Synod of the Clergy, at the Reformation; and confirmed by Parliament, with the Aſſent of the Clergy, in Convocation.

And whereas, his Accuſers had not been able to charge any one of his Actions as Treaſonable; and yet had notwithſtanding, urged that the Reſult of them all together amounted to Treaſon. He beged leave to obſerve, that the Reſult muſt be of the ſame Nature and Species with the Particulars, from which it ariſes: And as this Rule held in Nature and Morality, ſo it did in Law; for where there were never ſo many Crimes heaped together, yet there was no Law that made the Reſult of different Crimes, Treaſon, where none of the Particulars were Treaſon by Law: That the Statute of the 25 Edw. III. had determined what ſhould be deemed Treaſon, and what not; and unleſs this Reſult was ſomething within that Statute, it could not be Treaſon: But I refer to the preceeding Tryal for the reſt of the Arguments, in his Grace's Speech, as well as the Arguments of Mr. Brown the Manager, who replyed to his Recapitulation; there being ſcarce any thing in either, but what was inſiſted on more at large, in the ſeveral Hearings already recited. 1644. 19 Car. I.

His Grace afterwards moved, that his Counſel might be heard to the following Points, (viz.) whether all, or any of the Articles amounted to High-Treaſon: Secondly, whether the Charge contained in them, was made with that Certainty the Law required: But theſe Points being communicated to the Commons, they would not ſuffer the Counſel to argue any more than the firſt; with whom their Lordſhips (now in a Manner ſubject to the Commons) agreed; and Mr. Hern, was pitched upon, to deliver his own, and the Arguments of the reſt of his Grace's Counſel, at the Bar of the Houſe, the 11th of October. Wherein, beſides what his Grace had already inſiſted on, they obſerve, that as nothing is Treaſon by the Law of England, but what is made ſo by the 25 Edw. III ſo that Act ought not to be conſtrued by Equity or Inference: 1. Becauſe it is a Declarative Law, and no Declaration ought to be ſurcharged with another Declaration. 2. This Law was provided for a Security in Life, Liberty, and Eſtate: But to admit Conſtructions and Inferences upon it, muſt by Conſequence deſtroy the Intent and Force of the Proviſion. 3. It has been held in Parliament and judicial Debates, that this Act ſhall be literally conſtrued, and not ſtretched to Inferences. The Arguments of his Grace's Counſel, as to Points of Law.

Then they proceed to ſhew, that no Part of the Charge contains any of the Treaſons declared by the 25 Edw. III. or any ſubſequent Statute: That an endeavour to ſubvert the Fundamental Laws is not Treaſon by any Law. 1. Becauſe it is not comprized within any of the Words of the 25 Edw. III. nor can be brought within it, by any Conſtruction or Inference. 2. Becauſe an endeavour to ſubvert Laws, is of ſo great a Latitude and Uncertainty, that every Action not warranted by Law, might by this means be ſtrained to Treaſon; and to corroborate their Argument, cited the following Caſe out of Sir Edw. Coke, (viz.) 'A Con-'veyance was made in Tail, with a Proviſo, 'that if the Tenant did go about or attempt, 'to diſcontinue the Entail, the ſame ſhould be 'void; and it was reſolved by the Judges, that 'the Proviſo was void, becauſe the Words 'attempt, or go about, are uncertain Terms: And the Reporter adds, God defend that Inheritances and Eſtates of Men ſhould depend upon ſuch uncertainties. Miſera eſt ſervitus, ubi jus eſt vagum, & quod non definitur in jure quid ſit Conatus. And therefore the Rule of Law decides this Point; Non efficit conatus niſi ſequitur effectus, the Law rejects conations and goings about, as things uncertain, that cannot be put in Iſſue: And his Grace's Counſel urged, that if Eſtates were thus well guarded, it was preſumed this Reaſoning would hold much ſtronger in Caſes of Life.

Then they ſingled out two Particulars, that ſeemed to have been urged with the greateſt Force againſt the Archbiſhop.

1. That

1644. 19 Car. I.

1. That he had traiterously endeavoured to reconcile the Church of England to the Church of Rome. But if this was Treason, they observed it must be so by the 5th Eliz. cap. 4. which enacts, That if any Man shall put in Practice, to reconcile any of his Majesty's Subjects to the Pope or See of Rome, he shall incur the Forfeitures of Treason. But first, the Article only charges an Endeavour, whereas the Statute mentions a putting in Practice. Secondly, the Article charges an Endeavour of reconciling the Church of England with the Church of Rome; whereas the Statute mentions the reconciling His Majesty's Subjects with the See of Rome.

The other Particular is in the 7th Additional Article; in which, the Archbishop is charged, with wittingly and willingly receiving and harbouring divers Popish Priests and Jesuits, and particularly, Sancta Clara and Mons. St. Giles: But they observed, that the harbouring Priests and Jesuits was Felony, and not Treason; and that the Statute extends only to Priests born within the English Dominions, which Sancta Clara and St. Giles were not.

They urged also several things which his Grace had insisted on before; and in the whole Argument confined themselves to the Nature and Degree of the Crimes exhibited in the Articles, without touching on Matter of Fact, or enquiring whether the Particulars of the Charge were proved or not.

A Petition for executing Delinquents.

The Hearing being over, a Petition was handed about London, for bringing Delinquents to Justice; and several Preachers did all that lay in their Power to inflame the People; telling them, that nothing could conduce more to the Glory of God, than the Execution of Delinquents: And by these Means, a Multitude of Hands were procured to the Petition, which was delivered to the Commons the 28th of October, none being named in it but the Archbishop, and the Bishop of Ely.

The Lords shew no Inclination to convict his Grace. He is heard at the Bar of the House of Commons.

And now the Commons finding that the Lords would not do their Business, and convict the Archbishop of High-Treason, resolved to destroy him by a Bill of Attainder, which they were so gracious to acquaint the Archbishop with, and ordered him to be brought to their Bar the first of November; where Mr. Brown, one of their Managers, gave them a Summary of the Proceedings, before the House of Lords, and his Grace was permitted to answer it, the 11th of the same Month; wherein he observed that, though Mr. Brown was a very able Man, and had with a great deal of Art summed up the Evidence, yet the Commons had not heard the Witnesses themselves, as the Lords had done; and that what had been represented to them, was but the Collection of one Man's Judgment, who related what he conceived had been proved: But his Opinion possibly might differ widely from the Opinion of the Judges themselves, who heard the Evidence at large: And besides, Mr. Brown had been absent several Days, when his Grace was heard; and of those Days, he could only report what had been reported to him: And he thought, never any Jurors, who were Tryers of Facts, either in Criminal or Civil Cases, founded their Verdict upon Evidence only reported to them, which they did not hear themselves: He offered it to their Consideration also, Whether it were just and honourable, to judge him in that House, when he had been impeached by them, and pleaded, and Issue joined, and Evidence given in upon Oath, in another Place: Whether, after this, they would think fit to judge him in their own House, only upon a Report or Hear-say, without any Oath made before them.

1644. 19 Car. I.

On the 14th of November, his Grace was brought to the Bar of the House of Commons again, to hear Mr. Brown's Reply, but was not suffered to speak afterwards; and within two Days they passed the Ordinance, or Bill of Attainder, and sent it up to the Lords; who were still of Opinion, That the Facts his Grace was charged with, did not amount to High-Treason: But the Commons sending them a Message, That they would do well to pass the Ordinance, or the Multitude would come down and force them to it; and giving them to understand also, that they would be soon voted useless, if they did not comply; a small Remnant of the Lords (not above fourteen, at most, present in the House) passed the Ordinance for the Archbishop's Attainder, on the 4th of January; and on the 6th, an Order of both Houses, was made for his Execution on the 10th of the same Month. Some Historians relate there were only seven Lords present at the passing the Bill of Attainder, and give us the Names of six of them, (viz.) the Earls of Kent, Pembroke, Salisbury, and Bolingbroke, the Lord North, and the Lord Grey of Werk.

An Ordinance, or Bill of Attainder, passes the Commons.

They threaten the Lords, to make them pass the Ordinance.

But seven present at the passing the Ordinance. Their Names.

The Archbishop afterwards acquainted the Houses, that he had his Majesty's Pardon; but this would not avail him. First, because it was granted before Conviction, they said; and secondly, that if it had been subsequent, yet in a Case of Treason, against the Kingdom, (as they termed it) it could be of no Force. However they indulged his Grace so far, as to remit all the rest of the Sentence, but the Beheading.

The A. Bp. pleads the King's Pardon; but it is disallowed.

This Heroick Confessor being brought to the Scaffold on Tower-Hill the 10th of January, mounted it with an Air of great Resolution and Chearfulness, beginning his Speech with the following Text of Scripture, (viz.) Let us run with Patience the Race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus, &c. And among other Things he said, That he was well assured, God was able to deliver him from this Violence, as he did the three Children from the Furnace; and that by our Saviour's Assistance, his Resolution was the same with theirs: They refused to worship the Image the King had set up; neither would he idolize the Imaginations of the People, nor forsake the Temple and Truth of God, to follow the Bleating of Jeroboam's Calves. As for the People, he observed, they were miserably misled; the Blind led the Blind, and if they went on, they would both certainly fall into the Ditch. Then he observed, that he was not only the first Archbishop, but the first Man, that ever died by an Ordinance of Parliament; and hoped his Cause would appear in Heaven, with a different Complection from what was put upon it here: That his Caſe, as foul as it was repreſented, looked ſomething like that of St. Paul's, who was accuſed as a great Criminal againſt the Law and the Temple; and St. Stephen's, who was arraigned for breaking the Ordinances that Moſes had delivered; that is, for endeavouring the Subverſion of the Laws and Religion of his Country.

Then he proceeded to clear the King of being Popiſhly affected; a Calumny, which he ſaid he knew him to be as free from, as any Man living; for he held him to be as ſound a Proteſtant, (according to the Religion by Law eſtabliſhed) as any Man in the Kingdom; and that he would venture his Life as far and as freely for it. He complained of the riotous Tumults of the People, and their clamouring for Juſtice at the Parliament Houſe: This was the way he ſaid, to draw the Guilt of Blood upon their Heads; and theſe mutinous Diſorders he obſerved, were not reſtrained by the Magiſtracy. He lamented the calamitous Condition of the Church of England: She was become he ſaid, like an Oak, cleft in Pieces with Wedges made of her own Body, while Iniquity and Profaneneſs triumphed under the Pretence of Godlineſs: That the Subſtance of Religion was loſt; and that Church, which ſtood firm againſt the Attacks of the Jeſuits, was terribly battered by her own Party.

As to his Religion, he declared himſelf of the Communion of the Church of England, eſtabliſhed by Law; and in this Perſuaſion, he ſaid he had always lived, notwithſtanding the unreaſonable Clamours raiſed againſt him. He declared himſelf alſo a Friend to the Conſtitution, and particularly to Parliaments; but the beſt things, he obſerved, were often corrupted, and became the worſt: Thus the Parliament being the higheſt Court, the laſt Reſort, from which there was no Appeal, when this laſt Reſort was miſinformed or miſgoverned, it turned to be the moſt fatal Grievance; for in ſuch Caſes the Subject was left without Remedy.

After this Speech, the Archbiſhop performed his Devotions with great Fervency, and then moving towards the Block, found the Scaffold ſo crowded with his Enemies that came to triumph, that he was forced to entreat them to make Way, and give him Room to die: But Sir John Clotworthy, who endeavoured to give him all the Diſturbance he could in his laſt Moments, ſtill ſtood in his Way, and demanded, What Text of Scripture was moſt comfortable to a dying Man: To which his Grace anſwered, Cupio diſſolvi, & eſſe cum Chriſto: But Sir John replied, there muſt be an Aſſurance to found that Deſire upon: And Sir John continuing this barbarous Treatment, the Archbiſhop could find no other way to get rid of the impertinent Zealot, than by bidding the Executioner do his Office, who ſeparated his Head from his Body at one Blow.

His Character.

A late Eccleſiaſtical Writer ſays, He was of a lively and penetrating Genius; of a ſociable Temper, and innocently pleaſant upon Occaſion: And if we conſider his Function, he had paſſed through almoſt all the Employments of a Churchman; and how much he was a Maſter of his Profeſſion, is ſufficiently evident from his Book againſt Fiſher. He was a Perſon of unblemiſhed Integrity: Money had no Share in his Inclination; for, notwithſtanding the Largeneſs of his Revenues, his Fortune was almoſt exhauſted, in his Benefactions to Oxford, Reading, St. Pauls, &c. His Piety was no leſs exemplary and diſtinguiſhed: He was conſtant at his Chapel, and private Devotions: His warm Loyalty, and Zeal for Uniformity, brought him to this tragical End. The Earl of Clarendon obſerves, that he was ſomewhat Paſſionate; that he failed in a plauſible Application; neglected Addreſs, and believed bare Honeſty, and a vigorous Purſuit, ſufficient to carry him through. However the Noble Hiſtorian ſays, he was eminent for his Learning and Piety; that he behaved himſelf with great Courage and Magnanimity upon the Scaffold: That his good Qualities were attained by very few, and the greateſt of his Infirmities common to the beſt of Men. He was put to Death in the 72d Year of his Age. He was a great Benefactor to the Church; annexed Commendams to ſeveral ſmall Biſhopricks, particularly to Briſtol, Peterborough, St. Aſaph, Cheſter, and Oxford. He procured a Charter, to confirm the antient Privileges of the Univerſity of Oxford, and enlarge them to an equal Extent, with thoſe granted to Cambridge. He ſettled two hundred Pounds per Annum upon an Hoſpital at Reading in Berkſhire. (His Father was a Clothier, of good Subſtance in this Town, and here he was born. He founded the Arabick Lecture at Oxford; procured a new Charter, and a Body of Statutes, for the College of Dublin. He was endeavouring to provide a Fund for the Augmentation of poor Vicarages, and for ſettling the Tythes of London between the Clergy and City; and indeed his principal Views were, the rendering the Church of England, the Monarchy, and the Kingdom happy and flouriſhing; which were the real Crimes for which he was made a Sacrifice: Neither the Fanatick or Republican could be ſatisfied, till they had ſpilled the Blood of a Prelate, that had ſo nobly oppoſed their Schemes. He was buried in Barking Church near the Tower, with the Office appointed by the Liturgy: And it is ſomething extraordinary, that the ſame Day the Lords agreed to the Archbiſhop's Attainder, they paſſed an Ordinance, That the Book of Common-Prayer ſhould be laid aſide, and the Directory uſed inſtead of it; and his Grace is ſaid to be the laſt Man, that was buried, according to the Rites of the Church of England, in London, during thoſe Times.

Remarks on Archbiſhop Laud's Trial.

What goes under the Name of Archbiſhop Laud's Trial, may properly be looked upon, as the Trial of the Conſtitution in Church and State, by the Presbyterians and other Republicans, its moſt inveterate Enemies: And what would be the Reſult of a Trial, where Rebels ſat in Judgment on the Laws, and on their Sovereign and his Miniſters, whoſe Buſineſs it was to ſee them put in Execution, was not difficult to conjecture: It was natural to believe they would paſs a ſevere Sentence againſt

1644. 19 Car. I.

againſt thoſe Laws, and that Adminiſtration which declared them Traitors and Rebels: That they would turn the Tables on their Sovereign and his loyal Subjects; call Uſurpation and Rebellion, the Conſtitution; and make all thoſe Rebels and Traytors, who oppoſed them.

It is manifeſt, the Star-Chamber, the High-Commiſſion, the Convocation, and Council-Table, were all tried and cenſured, by this corrupt Remnant of a Parliament, and included in the Sentence or Attainder, that paſſed on the Archbiſhop; for he was condemned for voting in the Proceedings of all theſe High Courts, and for the Decrees they made.

The Sum of the Charge againſt his Grace was, That he had endeavoured the Subverſion of our Religion, and Civil Government. But by Religion, it is evident they meant the Presbyterian; and by Government, they meant the Republican Form.

For as to Religion, they charge him with affirming, That without a Biſhop there could be no Church; and that only Biſhops could Ordain, unleſs in Caſes of Neceſſity. They accuſed him alſo of maintaining Arminianiſm; by which they meant the Freedom of the human Mind, or, that Man is a free Agent, (and not under a fatal Neceſſity of being damned, as the Presbyterians maintain.) Theſe Points were held to be down-right Popery, by the Puritans of thoſe Days; though they are generally looked upon as orthodox Opinions, by our Church. They cavilled alſo with him about leſſer Matters; ſuch as placing the Communion Table North and South; the kneeling at the Sacrament; the Conſecration of Churches, and ſacred Utenſils, and endeavouring to guard them from Prophanation; and even his repairing the Cathedral of St. Paul's, was made Part of an Impeachment for High Treaſon.

Then as to the State, his advancing the Prerogative and Power of the Star-Chamber, High-Commiſſion, Council-Table, and the Convocation, were the Treaſons chiefly inſiſted on; which part of the Charge was fully anſwered, by ſhewing that thoſe Courts acted more Arbitrarily in the preceeding Reigns than in this; and if they did not, he was not anſwerable for their Determinations: But it is evident, from the whole Tenor of the Tryal, that they intended to place the laſt Reſort, in one or both Houſes of Parliament; and to eſtabliſh it for a Maxim, That not only thoſe Courts, but his Majeſty and his Miniſters were ſubject to their Reſolutions; and that a Vote of the Houſes might abrogate, or ſuſpend our Laws; and that they uſurped a more unlimited Power themſelves, than ever the Crown or Miniſtry, were charged with aſſuming: And if this were not demonſtrable from this Tryal, their ſubſequent Conduct abundantly manifeſted, that the Religion they were afraid, ſhould be ſubverted, was the Presbyterian, not the Eſtabliſhed Church; and the Government they charged him with conſpiring againſt, was the Republican Form, which they were reſolved to maintain, to the Deſtruction of the Monarchy.

It is acknowledged however that, at firſt, the Members of both Houſes were generally of the eſtabliſhed Church, even in the Parliament of 1641, that deſtroyed both Monarchy and Epiſcopacy: Nor had the greateſt Part of them any thoughts of altering the Conſtitution. But it has been obſerved by the Lord Clarendon and others, that, beſides the profeſſed Presbyterians and Republicans, there were a great many others who out of Ambition, Avarice, or Revenge, joined themſelves with that Party, and were inſenſibly led into their Meaſures; till at length there was no Retreating: They had been drawn into down-right Rebellion, and were glad to Unite themſelves afterwards with any ſett of Men, that might prevent the Return of their Sovereign to his Throne: Or, the Reſtoration of thoſe Laws, that would puniſh their Diſloyalty.

1644. 19 Car I.

There were a great many Gentlemen alſo, that thought the Eccleſiaſtical Government laid too ſevere Reſtraints upon the Liberties of Free-born Engliſhmen: They did not approve of it, becauſe they, or their Friends, were ſometimes called to an Account, and puniſhed for Vice or Profaneneſs: And they thought the readieſt way, to throw off that Tyranny, as they ſtiled it, was to join the Presbyterians: Not that they ever deſired to ſee that Sect uppermoſt, for they knew their Diſcipline was much more unſupportable, then that of the Church; but they hoped by theſe means, ſo to ballance the two Parties, that neither of them ſhould be able to exerciſe any Eccleſiaſtical Authority over them. We find that the Nation afterwards, became more uneaſy, under the Presbyterian Yoke, than ever it had been under Epiſcopacy; and at length, proceeded to renounce all Eccleſiaſtical Authority. Every Man did what was Right in his own Eyes: Which ſeems to be the Liberty that moſt of the Rebels fought for.

To mention the Hardſhips the Archbiſhop underwent in this Proceeding, when the whole was one continued Act of Tyranny, Injuſtice and Oppreſſion, ſeems unneceſſary: But that the Faction may have no Colour to Clamour, for the future at the uſage their Friends met with in any Trials, or Proſecutions for Treaſon, or Rebellion, in the ſucceeding Reigns, I ſhall give ſome Inſtances of their Humanity towards this Great Man.

And firſt, he was Impeached and Committed to the Black Rod, above two Months before any Articles were exhibited againſt him; then he was kept, between two and three Years more, a cloſe Priſoner in the Tower, before he was brought to his Tryal: All his Eſtate Real and Perſonal; Books and Papers, were Seized, on his Commitment; his very Pockets ſearched, and the Writings he had prepared for his Defence taken from him; by what Law, or Colour of Law, God only knows.

When he was firſt carried to the Tower, the Mob was ſpirited up to revile and reproach him; they were even taught, that it would be meritorious to kill him, and only reſtrained from pulling him to Pieces, that his Suffering might be prolonged, and they might in a more Solemn Manner, ſatiate their Thirſt of Blood.

Every Day, when he landed at Weſtminſter, ſome of the Faction ſtood ready to curſe, and revile him; the Managers of the Commons, ſpoke to him, and off him, as the moſt infamous Malefactor; and his Judges treated him with the utmoſt Scorn. One of the Noble Peers, who ſat in Judgment upon him, namely, the Earl of Pembroke, deſcended ſo low as to call the Greateſt Subject in England, Raſcal, and Villain. He was brought to Weſtminſter, Twelve ſeveral Days, only to be expoſed to the Scorn and Laughter of his Enemies, and ſent back again without being heard; though they put him to the Expence of Seven or Eight Pounds a Day; but it muſt be acknowledged, they were ſo good as to allow him Two Hundred Pounds, out of the Profits of his own Eſtate, after they had Sequeſtred it for three Years; the reſt was applyed to the Support of the Rebellion, againſt their Sovereign, as was the Money his Grace had collected for the Repairs of St. Paul's: And when the Peers could find no Treaſon in the Archbiſhop, unleſs Loyalty to his Prince was deemed ſuch, how Arbitrarily did the Commons ſend for his Grace before them, and of Accuſers become his Judges; paſſing an Ordinance for his Condemnation; which they forced through the little Remnant of the Lords Houſe, by their Mobs and Threats to lock up their Doors! And when the Ordinance was paſſed for his Murder, and they had rejected the King's Pardon, which he pleaded; how cruelly, did they deny him his own Chaplains to attend him, in his laſt Moments! And Laſtly, when he came to the Scaffold, how did their Malice purſue him thither; Clotworthy, and the Fanatick Crew, Reviling and Perſecuting him even there, and not ſuffering him to Die in quiet! Theſe are ſuch Flagrant Inſtances of Presbyterian Humanity, and Moderation, as I am confident no Tory Adminiſtration can parallel: Nor can the Presbyterians excuſe themſelves, by throwing the blame on the inferiour Sectaries; for this was long before the Independants had the Power in their Hands.

1644. 19 Car. I.

1644. 20 Car. I. The Tryal of CONNOR Lord MACGUIRE, in the Court of King's-Bench, (as the Uſurpers ſtill called it,) for High-Treaſon, the 10*th*, of Feb. 1644-5. 20 Car. I.

Lord Macguire's Tryal.

Arraigned as a Commoner.

CONNOR Lord MACGUIRE, a Peer of Ireland, was arraigned at the King's Bench Bar in England, as a Commoner, for High-Treaſon committed in Ireland.

The charge. The Indictment charges the Priſoner with Compaſſing and Imagining the Death of the King, Conſpiring to raiſe a Rebellion, and inviting over foreign Forces to invade the Realm of Ireland, and particularly, with a Deſign of ſeizing the Caſtle of Dublin, and other Forts and Magazines in that Kingdom. It Charges him alſo, with Levying open War againſt his Majeſty; ſurprizing the Caſtles of Charlemont, Cragan, &c. and murdering the Lord Calfield, and other Proteſtants in Ireland.

Plea of Peerage The Priſoner pleaded his Peerage; ſhewing, that by the Statute of Magna Charta, every one ought to be tried by his Peers, and that by the 10 Hen. VII. the Statutes of England were made part of the Laws of Ireland.

Over-ruled. The Council for the Parliament, demurring to this Plea, Mr. Juſtice Bacon over ruled it; declaring that a Baron of Ireland was triable by a Jury of Commoners in England; and of this Opinion it ſeems were both Houſes of that Parliament: Whereupon, the Priſoner pleaded Not Guilty, and deſired time to bring his Witneſſes from Ireland; but this was denied him: Then the Jury were called over, and he challenged Twenty-three peremptorily, which were all that appeared but one: Whereupon a Tales was granted, and he was brought to the Bar again the next Day by the Lieutenant of the Tower, when he challenged as many of the Tales as, with thoſe challenged before, amounted to Thirty-five; and at length, a Jury being ſworn, the Council for the Parliament produced their Evidence.

His Challenges.

A Tales awarded for want of Jurors.

The Evidence. And Firſt, they brought Witneſſes that deposed, the Priſoner was a Papiſt, and was very inquiſitive about the Condition of the Magazines of Arms and Ammunition in Dublin.

A Depoſition read as Evidence. Then the Depoſition of John Woodcock the Sheriff of Dublin was read, who depoſed, that he apprehended the Lord Macguire and ſeveral of his Accomplices at Dublin, on the Twenty ſecond of October 1641, (being the Day before the Inſurrection of the Papiſts in Ireland.) That it was then late at Night, and the Priſoners had Arms about them, and ſeveral Petards for breaking open Doors; and that he carried them before the Lords Juſtices.

The Priſoner's Examination read againſt him. The Priſoner's Examination alſo was read, who confeſſed before the Lords Juſtice's, that he was engaged in a Conſpiracy to raiſe an Inſurrection, in order to reſtore the Catholick Religion in that Kingdom, and recover their Lands from the Proteſtants. He acknowledged alſo, that they intended to have ſurpriſed the Caſtle of Dublin; that he came to Dublin for that purpoſe, and that he ſhould have attempted the Caſtle the next Morning, (the 23d of October, 1641.) if they had not been apprehended: But he knew of no Letters or Meſſages from England, to countenance the Attempt.

Other Witneſſes depoſed, that there was to have been a General Inſurrection in Ireland, the 23d October; that it was intended to ſeize all the Caſtles and ſtrong Places in the Kingdom, and to Maſſacre the Proteſtants.

Above an hundred Thouſand Proteſtants ſaid to be murdered in one Province. It was alſo proved, that the Iriſh broke out into an actual Rebellion, on the ſaid 23d of October and ſurpriſed the Caſtle of Charlemont, where they murdered the Lord Calfield; that they alſo ſeized ſeveral other Fortreſſes, and murdered the Proteſtant Inhabitants: And Sir Charles Coote posed, that upwards of an Hundred Thousand Protestants were massacred in the Province of Ulster only, (which were a great many more than the whole Province contained.) He deposed also, that the Irish Papists set up a New Form of Government, by a supreme Council, constituted Judges and Magistrates, and coined Money.

1644. 19 Car. I.

The Pope's Indulgence to the Rebels.

A Bull of Pope Urban's VIII. also was read in Evidence, whereby he grants a plenary Indulgence and absolute remission of all Sins to such Irish Catholicks as should make War upon the Heretick Protestants, and endeavour to extirpate them. Dated at Rome, the 25th of May 1643, in the 20th Year of his Pontificate.

The Prisoners defence.

To this Charge and Evidence the Lord Maguire answered, that he knew of no such Examinations as had been produced against him, but insinuated they were forged, and observed that it was impossible the Testimony of Coote, and others, as to the Number of Protestants sworn to be murdered, could be true, because there were not so many Protestants in that Kingdom: And, if there had been several murders and Outrages committed by others, that did not affect him. He knew nothing of the Plot but by Hearsay, but the Jury giving little credit to the Prisoner's Asseverations found him Guilty: And it being demanded, What he had to say, why Judgment should not be pronounced, he insisted again on his Peerage; he objected also, that the Judges had no legal Commissions, as they acted only by the Power of the Parliament, without any Authority from the King; to which one of the Judges answered, that he was made a Judge by the Old Seal, and continued by the Parliament: Then Sentence was passed upon the Prisoner as a Traitor. He afterwards petitioned the Commons, that he might have the Favour of being beheaded, but his Petition was rejected, and he was hanged drawn and quartered, on the 20th of Feb. according to his Sentence.

Objections to the Jurisdiction of the Court.

Remarks on Maguire's Trial.

It is generally held, that a Peer of Ireland may be tryed by a Jury of Commoners in England, for a Fact committed in England: But I do not see how an Irish Peer could be legally tryed here, for a Fact committed in Ireland; because, at this rate he loses his Privilege of Peerage; and there is this further Objection to it, that every Treason must be laid and proved, to be committed in some County of England; and here all the Proof was, of Facts committed in Ireland only: They also read the Deposition of the Sheriff of Dublin against him, though the Sheriff was in England just before the Trial, and ought to have given his Evidence Personally in Court: The Prisoner very justly objected, that the Judges who tryed him had no lawful Commission from the King for trying him: For, though one of them had formerly a Commission from his Majesty, they did not sit by the King's Authority at this time; but derived their Power from a body of Men in actual Rebellion against the Crown, and consequently the Bench were no less Traytors than the Prisoner at the Bar: But it is no new thing to see Criminals sit in Judgment on their Brethren in iniquity, there is not much Doubt to be made of the Lord Maguire's Guilt; but yet the putting him to Death by those Usurpers, who could have no Legal Authority to try or condemn him, was Murder in them. It is observeable also, that the Commons made use of Coote, and other Tools to aggravate matters and testifie that there were Ten times more Protestants murdered in Ireland than there really were; and this with an Intention to render the King odious to his Subjects, whom they charged with countenancing the Irish Rebellion, though nothing could be more false and unjust: And here we find them tampering with Maguire, to acknowledge a Correspondence between the Irish Rebels, and the English Royalists; but he had the Grace to acquit the King's Party of having any Share in that Insurrection, though he might possibly have saved his Life, if he would have humoured the Parliament in this particular. He was long detained in Prison, in order to extort something out of him to the prejudice of the Royal Party; and one while had so much liberty allowed him in the Tower, that he made his Escape from thence: He was afterwards indeed retaken; and, when they found he would not answer their purpose, they put him to Death by Forms of Law.

1648-9. 24 Car. I. Proceedings against King Charles I.

The Proceedings of the Uſurpers againſt their Sovereign King CHARLES I. under the Mock Form of a Trial, in the Month of January, in the 24th Year of his Reign, Anno Domini, 1648-9.

An Ordinance for his Trial.

THE Commons began the Year 1648-9, with framing an Ordinance for the Trial of the King, which they ſent to the Houſe of Peers for their Concurrence; but the Lords rejected it, and, that they might not be preſſed any more upon that Head, adjourned for nine Days. Whereupon ſome Members of the Commons moved, that the Lords might be impeached of High-Treaſon, in favouring the grand Delinquent (their King;) however, they contented themſelves with making the following Reſolutions. 1. That the People were, under God, the Original of all juſt Power. 2. That the Commons of England being choſen by, and repreſenting the People, were the Supreme Power of the Nation. And 3. That whatever was enacted or declared to be Law, by the Houſe of Commons aſſembled in Parliament, had the force of a Law, though the conſent of the King, and the Houſe of Peers was not had thereto: And thus, having Voted the King and Houſe of Lords uſeleſs, they proceeded to finiſh their Ordinance for the pretended Trial, in the Preamble whereof they recite. "That the King, not being contented "with the many Encroachments made by his "Predeceſſors on the Peoples Rights, but deſigning totally to ſubvert the Conſtitution, "and introduce an Arbitrary Government, "had levyed War againſt the Parliament, "whereby infinite Miſchiefs had enſued; for "which High and Treaſonable Offences; and "to the End, no chief Officer or Magiſtrate "might preſume for the future to attempt the "enſlaving and deſtruction of the Nation with "Impunity; they did Ordain and Enact, "that Thomas Lord Fairfax, Oliver Cromwell, "Henry Ireton, (and an Hundred and Thirty "more, of whom upwards of Fifty never "acted) ſhould be Commiſſioners and "Judges for the Trying of the King: And "the Lord Fairfax, and all other Officers, Civil and Military, were required to be aiding "and aſſiſting to them in the Execution of "their Commiſſion; and it was provided that "this Act ſhould remain in force for one "Month and no longer.

Reſolutions of the Commons.

The Judges conſtituted to try the King.

Bradſhaw Preſident. John Bradſhaw, Serjeant at Law, was appointed their Preſident, Mr. Steel, was made their Attorney General, and Mr. Cook, their Solicitor, to manage the Evidence: A Court alſo was erected at the upper End of Weſtminſter-Hall, and the King brought to Cotton-Houſe, that he might be near their Mock Tribunal.

Reſolutions concerning the Tryal. Theſe pretended Judges, ſitting in private in the Star-Chamber, the 20th of January, reſolved that the method of Proceeding as to the reading the Commiſſion, ſending for the Royal Priſoner, asking him Queſtions, &c. ſhould be left to their Preſident, on whom they conferred the Title of LORD PRESIDENT. And it was further reſolved, that if his Majeſty carried it inſolently, or contemptuouſly to their Mock Court, It ſhould be left to their Lord Preſident to reprehend him, and admoniſh him of his Duty, or command him to be taken away: But as to the Priſoner's taking off his Hat, they determined not to inſiſt on it that Day; and if he deſired Time, the Lord Preſident ſhould give him Time. It was ordered alſo that Mr. Liſle, and Mr. Say, ſhould be Aſſiſtants to the Preſident, and ſit near him. After which the Preſident, and the pretended Judges, attended by their Officers, and One and Twenty Gentlemen armed with Partizans, went down to the Court erected in Weſtminſter-Hall, a Sword of State and Mace being carried before them: The Preſident having placed himſelf in a Crimſon-Velvet Chair, and the reſt of the Members on each Side of him, on Benches hung with Scarlet, their Guard of Partizans divided themſelves on each Side the Court: Then the Ordinance for erecting this pretended Court was read, and the Commiſſioners called over, of whom Sixty-ſeven appeared and anſwered to their Names. After which the King was brought from Cotton-Houſe, and placed at the Bar, beneath his High and Mighty Judges: And having looked for ſome time with a Majeſtick Air upon his Sovereign Subjects ſeated upon the Bench, He ſat down in a great Chair provided for him, without moving his Hat, or paying any reſpect to his pretended Judges.

The King brought before the Regicides.

Then Bradſhaw with unparalleld Impudence told the King, That the Commons of England aſſembled in Parliament, deeply ſenſible of the Evils and Calamities he had brought upon the Nation, and of the Innocent Blood he had ſpilt; in purſuance of what they owed to God, to Juſtice, the Kingdom, and themſelves; and in purſuance of the Truſt repoſed in them by the People, had Reſolved to bring him to his Tryal, and had thereupon Conſtituted this High Court of Juſtice, before which he was now brought to hear his Charge: Then Cook their Solicitor, in the Name of all the People of England, exhibited the Charge; which ſet forth, That Charles Stuart, being admitted King of England, and entruſted with a limited Power to govern according to Law; and by his Truſt, Oath and Office being obliged to uſe the Power committed to him for the good of the People; out of a wicked Deſign to erect in Himſelf and his Family a Tyrannical Power, and to overthrow the Rights and Liberties of the People, had Traiterouſly and Maliciouſly levyed War againſt the Parliament and the People therein repreſented, particularly at Beverly, Nottingham, Edge-hill, Naſeby, &c. Whereby Bradſhaw's Speech to his Majeſty.

The Charge againſt the King.

1648-9. 24 Car. I.

Whereby the ſaid Charles Stuart had cauſed many Thouſands of the free People of this Nation to be ſlain, Families had been ruined, Treaſure waſted, Trade decayed, and many parts of the Land ſpoiled and become deſolate; And this, in order to advance the perſonal Intereſt, Will, Power, and pretended Prerogative of the ſaid Charles Stuart, againſt the publick Intereſt, Rights and Liberties of the People, by whom he was entruſted as aforeſaid: Wherefore the ſaid John Cook did, for the Treaſons and Crimes aforeſaid, on the behalf of the People of England, Impeach the ſaid Charles Stuart, as a Tyrant, Traytor, and Murderer, and a publick and Implacable Enemy to the Common-wealth; and prayed that Juſtice might be done upon him.

The King refuſes to acknowledge their Juriſdiction.

The Preſident requiring the King's Anſwer to the Charge, His Majeſty demanded by whoſe Authority he was brought thither, at a Time when he was engaged in a Treaty with Parliament; adding, that there were many unlawful Powers in the World, and that theirs ſeemed to be no better than that of Pyrates and Robbers: He told them he was their King, and had a Truſt committed to him by God which he would not betray, together with the Liberties of the People, by anſwering to an unlawful Power, as he held that Court to be: To which the Preſident replied, They ſat there by the Authority of the Commons of England, and it did not become him to Interrogate the Court in the Condition he was. The King ſaid, there was God in Heaven that would call them to an Account for the Authority they had uſurped; and that it was as great a Sin to ſubmit to an unlawful Authority, as it was to reſiſt a lawful Authority. To which Bradſhaw replied, that in their Apprehenſions, who were his Judges, their Authority was lawful; but the King ſaid, it was not their Apprehenſions or his, that muſt decide that; and abſolutely refuſing to acknowledge their Juriſdiction, he was carried back to Cotton-Houſe.

His Contempt Recorded.

The King being brought before this Mock Tribunal again the two ſucceeding Days, and ſtill refuſing to acknowledge their Authority, his Contempt (as they called it) was Recorded.

Witneſſes examined againſt him.

Then they proceeded to examine Witneſſes againſt him in the Painted Chamber, and take their Examinations in Writing; and on the 25th the Witneſſes atteſted the Truth of their Depoſitions, in open Court, upon Oath.

Who depoſe that the King began the War.

Several Witneſſes depoſed, that the King began the War in the Month of July, 1642 and others, that he charged at the Head of his Troops at Edge-hill, Cropredy-Bridge, Newbury, Naſeby, &c. Whereby they propoſed to ſhew that his Majeſty was the Author of the War, and the Occaſion of all the Blood that had been ſhed.

That he was not ſincere in his Treaties with them.

They endeavoured alſo to traduce his Majeſty as inſincere in his Treaties with the Parliament; for which purpoſe, Henry Gooche, of Gray's-Inn, was produced as a Witneſs, who depoſed that he waited on his Majeſty at the Iſle of Wight, and acquainted him, that he had many Friends; that, ſince he was pleaſed to juſtifie the Parliament in taking up Arms, moſt of the Presbyterian Party, both Soldiers and others, would ſtick cloſe to him: To which the King anſwered, that he would have his old Friends know, that though for the preſent he was content to give the Parliament leave to call their own War what they pleaſed, yet that he neither did at that Time, or ever could decline the Juſtice of his own Cauſe: The Deponent alſo told the King, that his Buſineſs was much retarded, becauſe his Friends wanted Commiſſions to act under, to which the King anſwered, that while he was engaged in a Treaty with the Parliament, he could not in Honour iſſue out any Commiſſions; but if the Deponent would apply to his Son, they might have any Commiſſions they deſired, and he would order the Marquis of Hertford to write to his Son in his Name.

1648-9. 24 Car. I.

Richard Price, a London Scrivener, alſo depoſed, that the King's Agents in London tampering with the Independents, to draw them off from the Parliament, and being diſcovered, the Committee of Safety directed thoſe that were tampered with, to comply ſeemingly with the King's Agents; and the Deponent, having obtained a ſafe Conduct thereupon, attended the King at Oxford, in January 1643, to treat with his Majeſty on that Subject. When his Majeſty obſerved to the Deponent, that the Independents were the moſt active Men in the Kingdom againſt him, and deſired the Deponent would endeavour the bringing them over to his Intereſt; promiſing on the Word of a King, if they would join him, and be as active for him, againſt the Parliament, as they had been againſt him, he would grant them whatever Freedom they could deſire.

The King brought before the Regicides, to hear his Sentence.

The King being brought to the Bar again, on Saturday the 27th of January, where he found Sixty-ſeven of his pretended Judges upon the Bench, Bradſhaw told him, that he had ſeveral Times been brought before that Court to anſwer the Charge of High-Treaſon, &c. that had been exhibited againſt him in the Name of all the People of England (Whereupon a Lady cryed out, No, nor half the People of England) However the Preſident went on, and having recapitulated the Proceedings, obſerved again that his Majeſty had there ſeveral Times refuſed to anſwer or own them for a Court, and that his Contumacy had been thrice Recorded: But they were ſtill ready to hear him in any Thing relating to his Defence, though they ſhould not ſuffer any Thing to be offered againſt their Juriſdiction.

He deſires to be heard by both Houſes.

The King anſwered, that ſince they would not admit it, He ſhould waive ſaying any Thing further to their Juriſdiction, though he thought the ſettling That, moſt conducive to the Peace of the Kingdom, and the Liberty of the Subject: That, if he had regarded his own Life more than the Welfare of the Publick, he ſhould have made a particular Defence, which would at leaſt have delayed an ugly Sentence, that he believed would paſs upon him. He ſaid a haſty Sentence once paſſed, might ſooner be repented of, than recalled. And therefore, more for the Kingdoms Sake than his own, he deſired to be heard by the Lords and Commons, before they proceeded to paſs Sentence. That this was but a ſmall Delay, and he might offer Reaſons conducive to the Peace and Welfare of the Kingdom; and therefore conjured 1644. 19 Car I. them once again, if they had that Regard to the publick Welfare they pretended, that he might be heard by both Houſes before Sentence paſſed.

The Commiſſioners hereupon withdrew into the Court of Wards to conſider of his Majeſty's Requeſt, and being returned, Bradſhaw told him that they were his Judges, conſtituted by the higheſt Authority; and that Judges ought no more to delay, than to deny Juſtice according to the Great Charter.

That it was their Unanimous Reſolution, they ſhould proceed to Judgment without further Delay; and having endeavoured to juſtify their Proceedings, by inſtances of ſeveral Rebellions in this and other Kingdoms, he ſaid, he apprehended theſe to be good Precedents for their bringing him to Judgment, contending that the King was Guilty of the whole Charge: Adviſed him to reflect on the greatneſs of his Sins, and hoped the Conſideration of them would produce a ſerious Repentance, and prayed God would have Mercy upon his Soul. After which he ordered the Sentence to be read, being of the following Tenour.

The Sentence pronounced on the King.

"That whereas the Commons had by the late Act Authoriſed and Conſtituted them an High Court of Juſtice, for the trying and judging, of Charles Stuart, King of England, for his Treaſons; &c. by virtue whereof, he had been three ſeveral times Convented before them, and refuſed to anſwer the Charge exhibited againſt him; they being ſatisfied in their Conſciences, as well from the Notoriety of the Fact, as by Examination of Witneſſes, that the ſaid Charles Stuart had been guilty of the wicked Deſigns and Endeavours in the Charge ſet forth; and that he had been and was, the Occaſion, Author and Contriver of the ſaid Unnatural, Cruel and bloody Wars, and thereby guilty of High Treaſon; and of the Murders, Rapines, Burnings, Spoils, Deſolations, Damages and Miſchiefs to this Nation, acted and committed in the ſaid Wars; They do adjudge that he the ſaid Charles Stuart, as a Tyrant, Traytor and Murderer, and publick Enemy to the good People of this Nation, ſhall be put to Death, by ſevering his Head from his Body.

Then the Preſident ſaid, This Sentence, now read and publiſhed, is the Act, Sentence, Judgment and Reſolution of the whole Court: And all the Regicides preſent ſtood up thereupon to expreſs their Aſſent; whoſe Names are, John Bradſhaw, Preſident; John Liſle, William Say, Oliver Cromwell, Henry Ireton, Sir Hardreſs Waller, Sir John Bourchier, Kt. William Heveningham, Iſaac Pennington, Alderman of London; Henry Marten, William Purefoy, John Barkſtead, Matthew Tomlinſon, John Blackſtone, Gilbert Millington, Sir William Conſtable, Bart. Edmund Ludlow, John Hutchinſon, Sir Michael Livеſey, Robert Tichbourne, Owen Roe, Robert Lilburne, Adrian Scroop, Richard Dean, John Okey, John Hewſon, William Goffe, Cornelius Holland, John Carew, John Jones, Miles Corbet, Francis Allen, Peregrine Pelham, Daniel Blagrave, Valentine Walton, John Downs, Thomas Horton, Thomas Hammond, Nicholas Love, Simon Meyne, Thomas Wayte, Thomas Harriſon, Edward Whaley, Thomas Pride, Iſaac Ewers, Tho. Lord Grey, of Groby, Sir John Danvers, Sir Thomas Maleverre, Bart. John Moore, Vincent Potter, Auguſtine Garland, John Dixwell, George Fleetwood, Peter Temple, John Alured, Henry Smith, Humphrey Edwards, Gregory Clement, Thomas Wogan, Sir Gregory Norton, Bart. Edmund Harvey, John Venn, Thomas Scot, Thomas Andrews Alderman of London, William Cawley, Anthony Stapeley, and James Temple.

The Names of 67 Regicides, preſent at the paſſing Sentence on the King.

1644. 19 Car. I.

His Majeſty preſſed earneſtly to be heard, after the Sentence was read, but Bradſhaw rudely refuſed it, and ordered him to be taken away. As he went down the Steps ſome of the Soldiers blew their Tobacco in his Eyes, and ſome Spit in his Face, while others as they were taught by Hugh Peters and their Officers, cried out, Juſtice, Juſtice, which his Majeſty obſerved, they would do as loudly againſt any of their own Generals for a little Money.

The King uſed barbarouſly.

On Monday the 29th of January, Forty-eight of the Regicides met again in the Painted Chamber, and ſigned a Warrant for the Execution of the King, the next Day, in the open Street, before the Gates of his own Palace of Whitehall; and accordingly his Majeſty was brought through the Park on Foot from St. James's to Whitehall, on Tueſday the 30th of January, the Way being lined with Soldiers, and a Guard of Halberdiers attending him. The King being permitted to remain ſome time in a Room at Whitehall, attended only by Biſhop Juxon. Mr. Nye and ſeveral other Fanatick Fathers, offered to aſſiſt his Majeſty in his laſt Moments; but he thanked them for the Tender of their Service, and ſaid, as they had ſo often cauſleſly prayed againſt him, he would not admit their praying with him at that time; however, if they pleaſed, they might pray for him. His Majeſty, having finiſhed his Devotion, and taken a piece of Bread and a Glaſs of Wine, was led by Colonel Hacker, into the Banqueting Houſe, and from thence through one of the Windows to the Scaffold erected before it, where he found two Executioners masked and dreſſed in looſe Frocks, who had provided Cords and Staples to drag him to his Execution if he reſiſted; however his Majeſty not at all terrified at theſe Preparations, with a compoſed Countenance, addreſſed himſelf to the People about him; declaring that he did not begin the War, and calling God to Witneſs, to whom he was juſt going to give an Account, That he never intended to encroach on the Privileges of Parliament: He acknowledged the Juſtice of God, however, in ſuffering him to die by an unjuſt Sentence, he himſelf having ſuffered an unjuſt Sentence to be executed (on the Lord Strafford.) Then turning to Biſhop Juxon he ſaid, that good Man could Witneſs for him, he had forgiven all the World, even thoſe that had been the chief Cauſers of his Death: He wiſhed they might repent, and prayed with St. Stephen, that this Sin might not be laid to their Charge; but told them they would never proſper, unleſs they gave God, the King, and the People their Due: That they muſt give God his Due, by regulating the Church according to the Scriptures, for which he propoſed the calling of a free National Synod: As to the King's Due, the Laws of the Land would inſtruct them in that: And the the People's Due was Liberty and Freedom, which no Man desired more than himself, and for the endeavouring to restore which he was now brought to that Place. If he would have yielded to arbitrary Sway, to have all Laws, Ecclesiastical and Civil, changed according to the Power of the Sword, he needed not have come thither; and wished it might not be laid to their Charge, that he was the MARTYR of the People, concluding with a Prayer, that they would take such Courses as were for the Good of the Kingdom, and their own Salvation.

The Bishop putting the King in Mind, that it might be expected he should declare what Faith he died in, his Majesty thanked him for putting him in mind of it, and said, he died a Christian, according to the Profession of the Church of England, as he found it left him by his Father, of which the Bishop was a Witness; and then, preparing for the Block, said, I go from a corruptible to an incorruptible Crown: Then he gave his George to the Bishop, and said, REMEMBER, with a particular Emphasis; (which gave the Regicides some Uneasiness, till they understood the Meaning of it from the Bishop;) then laying his Neck upon the Block, and stretching out his Hands, which was the Sign, one of the Executioners severed his Head from his Body at one Blow: But it was afterwards put into a Coffin with his Body, and exposed for several Days, both in the Palaces of Whitehall and St. James's, to the View of the People. His Majesty was in the forty-ninth Year of his Age when he was thus put to death, by those Sons of Violence, who were not content with his Death, but washed their Hands in his Blood, and gloried in the Parricide.

Bishop Juxon hardly used.

Bishop Juxon, who attended his Majesty on the Scaffold, had all his Papers taken from him, his Scrutores, Boxes, and his very Pockets were searched; and he was threatned very severely, by the Regicides, if he did not discover what the King meant by bidding him REMEMBER; to which the Bishop answered, that the King bid him remember to carry that supreme Command to his Son, that if ever he was restored to the Crown, HE SHOULD FORGIVE THE AUTHORS OF HIS FATHER'S DEATH, which surely must have put them into some Confusion, if they were not hardened beyond all Sense of Shame.

The Royal Corps interred at Windsor.

The King's Servants afterwards made their Application to the Men in Power, that the Royal Corps might be interred, with the Kings his Predecessors, in Henry the Seventh's Chapel; but this they refused, alledging, that Multitudes of People would probably resort thither, out of a superstitious Respect to his Memory, which might be dangerous to their Goverment; but at length they agreed it should be buried in St. George's Chapel at Windsor, where the Duke of Richmond, the Marquis of Hertford, the Earl of Southampton, and the Earl of Lindsey, saw it interred, in the same Vault where King Henry VIII. and his Queen, Jane Seymour, lie; but Whitchcott, the Governor of the Castle, would not suffer the Burial Service to be used after the Manner of the Church of England. And here the Corps of the Royal Martyr still remains, as appears by unquestionable Evidence, notwithstanding the Doubts of the Lord Clarendon, and some others, that it was removed elsewhere.

Remarks on the Proceedings against King Charles I.

It has been observed of the English, that though they are generally a religious, loyal, and virtuous People, yet when they are wicked, they exceed all others in bold and daring Villanies. Sovereign Princes have been privately assassinated and murdered by their rebellious Subjects in other Countries; but the English Sectaries were the first that ever openly avowed they had a Right to try and put their Kings to Death, and actually arraigned their Sovereign in so solemn a Manner. It is doing those Regicides too much Honour, though they followed the Forms, to suppose there was any Colour of Law to justify their Conduct; for it is a Maxim with us, never disputed till this Rebellion, that the Persons of our Kings are sacred; and by an Act of Parliament still in Force, it is declared, That neither the Peers of this Realm, nor the Commons, nor both together in Parliament, nor the People collectively or representatively, nor any other Persons whatsoever, had, have, hath, or ought to have, any coercive Power over the Person of the King; much less could a small Remnant of the Commons, who had expelled a Majority of their own Members, and wanted the Concurrence of the House of Lords, have any Authority to judge and condemn their King; and indeed they first voted away the Constitution; before they pretended to sit in Judgment on their Sovereign: They resolved, That the Commons of England were the supreme Power of the Nation; and that whatever was enacted or declared to be Law by the House of Commons, had the Force of a Law, though the Consent of the King and the House of Peers was not had thereto; which every one knows to be false at this Day, and yet it was on a Supposition that these Propositions were true, that they proceeded to judge their King; consequently the whole Proceeding was an Act of Violence: They were all guilty of the foulest and most consummate Treason, when they arraigned and prosecuted the King for Treason against themselves, who were not so much as one of the three Estates; nor would their Proceedings have been justifiable, if they had had that Authority to call their King to an Account they pretended to; for the Evidence they produced to convict him was far from proving the two grand Points they insisted on, (viz.) 1. That the King began the War, and, 2. That he was the Occasion of the Continuance of it.

For the Witnesses who deposed the King began the War, make the marching of his Troops into Beverly, in July 1642. the first Act of Hostility committed by his Majesty's Forces; which was long after the Parliament had armed their rebellious Mobs, and driven the King from his Palace of Whitehall; it was after they had seized the Royal Navy, new-modelled the Militia of London, and several other Counties, and armed them against the King; and after they had surprized the Town of Hull, and seized his Majesty's Magazines and Stores there, which were most notorious Acts of Hostility, if any thing can be accounted such; and consequently it must be admitted, the Parliament began the War.

1648. 24 Car. I.

And it is as evident, they were the Occaſion of the Continuance of the War; for in all the Treaties between the King and Parliament, after the Commencement of the War, whether at Oxford, Uxbridge, Newcaſtle, the Iſle of Wight, or elſewhere, they ever inſiſted on the aboliſhing Epiſcopacy, and the whole Eccleſiaſtical Conſtitution, and the Eſtabliſhment of Preſbytery, or ſomething worſe. They alſo demanded the Power of appointing the Great Officers of State, the Command of the ordinary Militia, and a Power to raiſe what Forces they pleaſed, by Sea and Land, and to levy Money on the Subjects to pay them, by their own Authority; And, laſtly, that he ſhould deliver up his faithful Friends and Followers to their Mercy. And from theſe Demands the Commiſſioners for the Parliament at the Treaty of Uxbridge, were order'd not to recede one Tittle. Even Rapin, Vol. xii. p. 268, 271. ſays, "It is evident "that the Parliament intended to leave the "King only an empty Title, and inveſt themſelves with the Sovereignty, and that not by "Artifice, but openly and publickly; that their "Aim was to deſtroy entirely the Worſhip of "the Church of England; to aſſume to themſelves the Sovereignty, under Colour of a-"bridging the Power of the Crown, and to "change the Conſtitution in Church and State." And ſurely thoſe who inſiſted on theſe unjuſt and unreaſonable Terms, muſt be allowed to be the Occaſion of the Continuance of the War.

To ſay that it was only the Parliament's Diſtruſt of the King that occaſioned the Continuance of the War, and that it was the King's Inſincerity that prevented a Peace, is ridiculous; when their Friends admit, that nothing leſs than the Deſtruction of the Conſtitution in Church and State, and their being veſted with an abſolute uncontroulable Power, would ſatisfy them: Had the King been never ſo inſincere, they had already extorted ſuch Acts of Parliament from him, and retrenched his Prerogative to that Degree, that they had very little to fear from that Quarter; and if thoſe Acts had not been ſufficient, His Majeſty offered to paſs what Acts they deſired for their Security. But after all, this want of Sincerity, ſo much talked of in the King, appears to be no more than this, that he ſometimes treated with one Party of his rebellious Subjects, and ſometimes with another, in order to put an End to the War; and if he could have made an Advantage of their Diviſions, re-eſtabliſhed himſelf upon the Throne, reſtored the Conſtitution, and delivered his People from the arbitrary Dominion and Oppreſſion of the Uſurpers, I believe few People, at this Day, will look upon ſuch ſeparate Treaties as Arguments of Inſincerity, or to deſerve any manner of Cenſure. 1648. 24 Car. I.

And if the King did yield to ſome of the Rebels Demands, with a View that, when Peace was reſtored, and a free Parliament called, the Houſes themſelves would deſire they ſhould be repealed, I cannot ſee the Immorality of ſuch a Proceeding; if the King knew he had not a Power of repealing the Laws, and altering the Conſtitution, without a legal Parliament, and his Conceſſions in this Reſpect therefore would be of no force, his Enemies were ſenſible of this too, and therefore, it was not only unreaſonable and unjuſt to inſiſt on ſuch Terms, but extremely weak and fooliſh to ſuppoſe they would ever be ſubmitted to, when the People returned to their Senſes and their Duty. If they would have been contented with the antient legal Conſtitution, which they pretended at firſt to contend for, they might have received a full Pardon for all that was paſſed, and had their Liberties and Properties ſecured to them, beyond a Poſſibility of their being infringed: But it is evident, it was DOMINION they fought for, and to make their Sovereign, as well as their Fellow Subjects, SLAVES. Nor do I perceive any material Difference between the Preſbyterians and Independants in this Reſpect; they both of them, in their Turns, inſiſted upon much the ſame Terms. The Preſbyterians fought the King in the Field, and refuſed to make Peace with him, unleſs he would yield to the unreaſonable Demands above-mentioned; they diveſted him of all his Prerogatives, made him a cloſe Priſoner, and delivered him into the Hands of his Murderers; and the Independants indeed committed the laſt horrid Act, and put him to death. The one would have buried him alive, and the other, perhaps, more mercifully took away his Life, and rendered him a glorious Martyr. If he would have conſented to an Abrogation of all the Laws, and have inveſted either Party with an arbitrary unlimitted Power, as the King himſelf obſerved on the Scaffold, he had never been brought thither; and therefore it may, with great Propriety be ſaid, he ſuffered for defending the Conſtitution in Church and State, and conſequently for the Liberties and Properties of his Subjects. 1648. 24 Car.

Duke Hamilton's Trial.

The Trial of JAMES Duke of Hamilton and Earl of Cambridge, before another pretended High Court of Juſtice, for High-Treaſon againſt the Kingdom and People of England, which began the 9th of Feb. 1648-9. 1648-9. 1 Car. 2.

The Charge againſt him.

HE was impeached by the Name of James Earl of Cambridge; for that, on or about the Nineteenth of July then laſt paſt, he had traiterouſly invaded the Kingdom, and levied War, in Behalf of the late King, againſt the Kingdom and People of England, committing many Murders, Outrages, &c. And particularly that, on or about the Twentieth of Auguſt then laſt paſt, he did join Battle, and fought the Forces of the Parliament, near Preſton in Lancaſhire, and did, then and there, murder Colonel Thornby, and others.

To

1648-9. 1 Car. 2. His Plea.

To this Charge the Duke pleaded 1. that he was Duke of Hamilton in Scotland, and by the Authority of the Parliament of that Kingdom, the ſupreme Power of the Nation, he undertook the command of their Armies, for juſtifiable Ends. 2. That he was born in Scotland, before his Father's Naturalization in England, and being an Alien born, could not be tried for High-Treaſon againſt the Kingdom of England. 3. That he was not only a Priſoner of War, but had ſurrendered upon Articles whereby his Life was ſecured; and deſired Counſel might be aſſigned him to argue theſe points of Law, and accordingly Mr. Chute, Mr. Hales, Mr. Parſons, and Dr. Walker were aſſigned his Counſel; but his petitioning for Time to ſend for his Witneſſes was not granted.

The Evidence.

The Priſoner being brought to the Bar the 17th of February, produced Duplicates of his Commiſſion, and his Orders from the Parliament, and the Committee of Eſtates in Scotland; and the Declaration containing the Ends of the Engagement was read.

The Articles of Capitulation alſo were read, whereby it appeared that the Duke ſtipulated for his Life; but ſome of the Officers who treated with the Duke averred, that they only meant to ſave his Life from the Soldiers, and not from the civil Power; others inſiſted, that the Treaty was in general Terms, and they underſtood his Life could not be taken away, either by the Civil or Military Powers, the Duke having ſurrendered to them upon condition, that his Life and the Lives of thoſe under his Command, ſhould be ſpared.

Then the Counſel for the Parliament, produced the reſt of their Evidence againſt the Duke: One of their Witneſſes depoſed, he heard his Grace ſay, that he was ſome Years younger than King Charles I. from whence it was inferred he was born after King James came to the Crown, and conſequently might be deemed a Subject of this Kingdom, and guilty of Treaſon: Other Witneſſes depoſed, that he joined Sir Marmaduke Langdale, who commanded the late King's Forces in the North of England; that he fought the Forces of the Parliament at Preſton, &c.

The Duke's Defence.

To which Charge and Evidence his Grace made the following Defence: He ſaid, that Capitulations had always been held inviolable by all Princes and States, as well with their Subjects, as with Independant Nations; that Prince Rupert, and the Lord Cottington, though excepted from Pardon by an Ordinance of Parliament, were notwithſtanding, upon the Articles for the Surrender of Oxford, permitted to tranſport themſelves beyond Sea; as were alſo the Earl of Briſtol and Lord Paulet upon the Articles for the Surrender of Exeter, though both of them were excepted from Pardon. That the Lord Fairfax, and the reſt of their Officers, had always carefully obſerved all Articles of Capitulation, and had frequently written to the Parliament on that Subject; and his Grace hoped he ſhould meet with the like Juſtice that others had done: He ſaid it had not been ſufficiently proved that he was a poſt natus, conſequently he muſt be deemed an Alien, and could not be guilty of High-Treaſon in invading the Kingdom: That as to Sir Marmaduke Langdale, he neither received Orders, or the Word from him, but marched and quartered apart; but, had it been otherwiſe, it could not have been Treaſon in his Grace, to have joined Sir Marmaduke; being commanded by the Parliament of Scotland, to join all thoſe who ſhould concur with him, in proſecuting the Ends of the Engagement. 1648-9. 1 Car. 2.

He prayed alſo, that an Order of Parliament might be read, importing, that no Quarter ſhould be given to any of the Iriſh in Arms, from whence he inferred, that others might have Quarter given them. And another Order was read, wherein it was declared, that all the Scots that entered England, ſhould be deemed Enemies, and all the Engliſh and Iriſh that joined them, Traitors.

That he, having his Birth, Honour, and Fortune in Scotland, was bound to pay Obedience to the Orders of that State, and to undertake the Command of General, for purpoſes which he conceived lawful: That the entering of the Scots Army into England, in the Year 1640. was not accounted treaſonable, but was very acceptable to this Kingdom, who gave them their brotherly Aſſiſtance; and the late unfortunate Army was deſigned for as good Ends; that he was born before his Father's Naturalization, and ſo could not be deemed an Engliſhman, and his being made an Engliſh Earl, did not naturalize him: That Articles were to be expounded according to the plain Meaning of the Words, and not by the mental Reſerves of the Officers engaged in the Treaty: That had he only ſurrendered a Priſoner of War, without ſtipulating for his Life, his Life ought not to have been touched, much leſs when there was an expreſs Article for ſaving their Lives: That if theſe Articles were violated, and the War ſhould be revived, it would prove a perfect Butchery, ſince none would ever truſt to a Capitulation for the future; nor was his Eſcape out of Priſon any Breach of the Articles, which required only, that he ſhould deliver himſelf up a Priſoner, and not that he ſhould remain ſo.

The Defence made by his Counſel.

To which, his Grace's Counſel added, that his Obligation and Subjection to the Kingdom of Scotland was indiſpenſible, and indiſſoluble; and that he could no more refuſe the Commands of that Kingdom, than a Native of England living here could diſobey the Commands of the Parliament of England: That no Man could be the Subject of two diſtinct Kingdoms; and whatever Obligations his Grace might have to England, they could not come in Competition with what he owed Scotland: That no Treaſon could be without a Breach of Faith and Allegiance due to them againſt whom it was committed: That England and Scotland were two independent Kingdoms; and though the Allegiance due to the King was the ſame in both Kingdoms, yet the Kingdoms were diſtinct, when the Duke undertook this Expedition. The Adminiſtration was not in the King then, but in the reſpective Parliaments of each Kingdom; and as the Duke's Allegiance to the Kingdom of Scotland was antienter and ſtronger than any Tie that could be laid upon him in England, what he did by the Command of the Kingdom of Scotland, might make him an Enemy to the Kingdom of England, but not a Traitor: That in the Hoſtilities between the two Kingdoms, none of the Priſoners 1648-9. 1 Car 2. Priſoners on either Side, had ever been put to Death as Traitors, becauſe the Nations were independent of each other; nor could the Duke's making uſe of the Aſſiſtance of Engliſh Forces render him a Traitor: Indeed if an Engliſhman conduct a foreign Army againſt his Country, or a Foreigner reſiding here, aſſiſt the Engliſh in a Rebellion, it is Treaſon in either of them, for a Native's commanding of a foreign Army, does not make him an Alien; and an Alien reſiding here, and aſſiſting Engliſh Rebels, is by the Law of England deemed a Traitor, becauſe he owes a local Allegiance.

But where an Alien invades the Kingdom with a foreign Force, though he does join Engliſh Rebels, he is ſtill deemed an Enemy, and not a Traitor.

The Council for the Commonwealth reply.

To this Defence, Mr. Steel, Attorney-General for the Commonwealth, replied, that the Priſoner was very far from being under any Neceſſity of taking that Command upon him, that he was a principal Member of that Parliament, under which he would ſhelter himſelf, and adviſed the Expedition; that his accepting the Commiſſion, and the Oath he had taken, were ſtrong Arguments alſo of a full and free Conſent; nor would the Scots ever have truſted him with the Command of their Forces, if they had not been aſſured of his Heart as well as his Hand, in the Execution of their Deſign; that his Letters to Sir Marmaduke Langdale alſo, wherein he prays for an Encreaſe of their Diſtractions in London, and for his Friends in Colcheſter, ſhewed he was not an unwilling Inſtrument, but one who exceeded, rather than fell ſhort, in the Execution of his Commiſſion.

As to the ſecond Part of his Plea, That he was a Scotſman, and an Alien, Evidence had been given, that he was one of the poſt nati, born after King James's Acceſſion to the Crown of England; and ſince he had not ſhewn the contrary, this ought to be taken for granted.

As to that Objection, That it was abſurd to ſay, a Man might owe a natural Allegiance to two ſeveral Kingdoms, he anſwered, it was ſo in a phyſical Senſe; but by Conſtruction of Law, he that was born in Scotland, might alſo owe an Allegiance to England, as had been reſolved in Calvin's Caſe; and in like manner it had been held for Law, that the Natives of Gaſcoigne and Aquitain, while under the Dominion of the King of England, were Denizens and Subjects of England.

And as there was a Ligeantia Regis, ſo there was a Ligeantia Regni; as Allegiance was formerly due to the King in his politick Capacity, ſo it was now due to the Commonwealth, who were poſſeſſed of the ſame Sovereign Power the King antiently had; however, as the Priſoner had been guilty of Murder, there was no need of any Denization to find him guilty of that.

Then he returned to maintain the Charge of Treaſon, and obſerved, that by 4 Jac. I. Offenders in Treaſon were to be tried where they were apprehended, in which Kingdom ſoever the Treaſon was committed.

He alſo attempted to ſhew, that the Kingdom of Scotland owed Homage to the Crown of England, and therefore the Natives of Scotland ought to be looked upon as Subjects of England.

He obſerved further, that the Priſoner had contributed to his own Denization; for receiving a Writ of Summons, 15 Car. commanding him, ex fide & Ligeantia ſua, to appear in Parliament, as a Peer of this Realm, he did accordingly appear, and act in that Parliament, and was choſen of ſeveral Committees in Affairs of great Importance to this Kingdom, which was inconſiſtent with his being an Alien. 1648-9. 1 Car 2.

Another Argument he uſed to prove the Priſoner a Traitor, was, That it appeared by his own Confeſſion, and the Declaration he made on the entering on this Expedition, that the Nations were at Amity, and his coming in a hoſtile Manner to invade the Kingdom, in a Time of Peace, therefore made him a Traitor. Treaſon was properly a Breach of Truſt.

As to that Part of his Plea, That he ſurrendered upon Articles, whereby he was to have his Life, he ſaid, theſe Articles could not bind the Civil Power of the State; for, if they did, they muſt amount to a Pardon of Treaſon; an Authority that could never be ſuppoſed to be delegated to Military Officers: Beſides, the Intention of the Parties in all Contracts were to obſerved, and two of the Officers that treated with him, had ſworn, they never intended to include the Civil Power; and, if they had, ſuch an Article would have been void. But if he was intitled to his Life by the Articles, he had loſt the Benefit of them by making his Eſcape; for he who ſurrenders himſelf a Priſoner of War, on Condition of Quarter, and afterwards breaks through what was to have been performed on his part, has deprived himſelf of that Privilege which he might otherwiſe have enjoyed.

That he had received great Benefit from the Articles already, in not being put to Death by the Sword immediately, (which was all that was intended, by giving him Quarter,) and by being allowed a fair Hearing before the Civil Magiſtrate, and Council to plead his Cauſe; that they might have demanded Judgment againſt their Priſoner, for failing to make good his Plea; for a Plea of Pardon implied a Confeſſion of the Fact; but that he had been indulged, however, in offering what he could in his Defence.

The Duke being brought to the Bar again on Tueſday the 6*th* of March, the Preſident Bradſhaw re-capitulated what Steel had argued againſt the Priſoner the Day before; concluding, that the Court rejected his Plea in all its Branches; after which he paſſed Sentence upon him, and ſome other Loyaliſts, who had been tried before the ſame pretended Court, viz. That their Heads ſhould be ſevered from their Bodies, on Friday the ninth Inſtant. Sentenced to be beheaded.

The Duke was afterwards tampered with by Hugh Peters, and ſome other Tools of Cromwell, to betray his Confederates in England; but not being diſpoſed to purchaſe his Life, by ſo baſe a Sacrifice, it was put to the Vote in that ſmall Remnant of the Houſe of Commons on the 8th, Whether he ſhould be reprieved or not? which paſſing in the Negative, he was beheaded the next Day, being the 9th of March 1648-9. 'Tis ſaid the Duke's Friends offered an hundred thouſand Pounds to ſave his Life; but that Cromwell and Argyle had reſolved to take him off, to facilitate the He is executed.

Remarks on Duke Hamilton's Trial.

the reducing of Scotland to their Arbitrary Dominion.

After the Uſurpers had the Impudence to erect a mock Court of Juſtice, for the Trial of their Sovereign, tis now no wonder to ſee them erect another, for the Trial of thoſe who adhered to him: Beſides Duke Hamilton, there were tried before this Court, the Earl of Holland, the Lord Capel, the Earl of Norwich, and Sir John Owen, who were all condemned; but Application being made to the Commons to ſave them, the Earl of Norwich and Sir John Owen had their Lives ſpared, and the reſt were executed.

As to the Hardſhips the Duke underwent at this Trial, the greateſt was to be called in queſtion by Tyrants and Uſurpers, who had no manner of Authority over him: The whole Proceeding was one continued Act of Injuſtice, and the putting him and the reſt of the Royaliſts to Death in cold Blood, ſo many premeditated Murders: Nor did they only uſurp that Authority the King once had, but a more abſolute Power than any King of England ever pretended to, ſuſpending and altering the Laws at Pleaſure; for by Law, every Subject had a Right to be tried by his Peers. Theſe High Courts of Juſtice, as they were called, were never heard of in England before, and had no other Authority than what they received from that Refuſe of a Parliament, which conſiſted chiefly of Regicides: It muſt be looked upon as a Hardſhip upon the Duke alſo, to arraign him as a Traitor to the Commonwealth of England, when, according to the Notion they themſelves profeſſed to have, ſince the Depoſing of the King, the Nations were become two Independant Commonwealths. It is true, an Inſurrection in either Kingdom, would have been conſtrued Treaſon and Rebellion againſt the King, when he was upon his Throne: But what Authority could the Engliſh Uſurpers yet pretend, over the Subjects of Scotland? The aſſerting therefore, that the Duke owed Allegiance to the Commonwealth of England, was ridiculous, and the executing him for Treaſon, was certainly Murder in them, though it ſhould be admitted they had acquired the Dominion of England.

1647. 23 Car. I.

Their Pretence alſo, that he ought to be adjudged a Traitor, becauſe Scotland once owed Homage to England, was equally unjuſt, for this Claim had been long waved, and the Scots treated as Enemies, and not as Traitors, when the two Nations were in a ſtate of War; and beſides, if Homage was due to the King, it does not follow, it was due to thoſe who had no Right to his Throne.

Their other Pretence, that his coming from a Kingdom in Amity with them made him a Traitor, has little more in it; for where the Subjects of one Nation in Amity with another, infeſt the Coaſts of their Allies by Sea or Land, they are to be treated as Pirates and Robbers, and not as Traytors.

But nothing could be more unjuſt than their denying him the Benefit of the Capitulation; for ſuch Articles had been obſerved by both ſides from the beginning of the War, a very few Inſtances excepted.

That they ſhould be bound to their good Behaviours for Life, and be for ever incapable of being Witneſſes in any Court of Juſtice; and laſtly, that they ſhould be impriſoned during the Pleaſure of the Houſe.*

A Petition in favour of the Defendants.

Soon after this Sentence, a Petition was delivered to Sir Thomas Fairfax the General, by ſeveral of the General Officers and Colonels of the Army, who were alſo Members of the Commons, in behalf of the ſaid John Morris, alias Poyntz, and the reſt of the Defendants, complaining of this Judgment of the Houſe of Lords, and the Oppreſſion and Injuries the ſaid Morris, and the reſt of the Defendants, underwent, on account of the ſaid Judgment; and praying that the General would write to the Parliament, in the behalf of the Defendants, that they might remain in the Poſſeſſion of the Mannors and Lands abovementioned; be reſtored to their Liberty, diſcharged of their Fines, and that the Cauſe might be determined by the Courſe of the Common Law; but the Editor informs us, that he could not find any further Proceedings in relation to this Buſineſs.

Remarks.

It is very probable, the Matter was compromiſed, for both Sides were notoriouſly in the Wrong: The Forgery ſeems to have been manifeſtly proved; but then the Houſe of Peers had nothing to do to try the Cauſe, and fine and impriſon the Defendants: For no Cauſe can 1649. 1 Car. 2. come Originally before that Houſe; eſpecially where Commoners are concerned: All Cauſes are brought thither by Writ of Error or Appeal, from ſome Inferior Court, unleſs there be an Impeachment by the Commons, which does not appear in this Caſe. The Lords therefore having aſſumed a Juriſdiction that did not belong to them, and the Defendants being Favourites of the Commons and the Army, as appears by the Petition made in their Behalf, by the General Officers, the Lords did not think fit to inſiſt on the Puniſhment of the Forgery, as it deſerved; and indeed, that Remnant of a Houſe of Peers had then very little Influence or Authority: They were in a Manner Tools to the Commons, and their Names only made uſe of to countenance the Rebellion againſt their Sovereign; or they might poſſibly have inſiſted they had a Power of puniſhing ſuch People as were guilty of forging and counterfeiting their Records. 1649. 1 Car. 2.

1649. 1 Car. 2. Morris's Trial.

The Trial of Colonel JOHN MORRIS, late Governor of Pontefract Caſtle, during the Grand Rebellion, for High-Treaſon, before the Uſurper's Judges, at the Aſſizes held at the Caſtle of York, the 16th of Auguſt, 1649. 1 Car. II. 1649. 1 Car. 2.

The Indictment. THE Colonel was indicted on the Statute of the 25 Edw. III. for levying War againſt the late King Charles.

When he was arraigned, he ſaid, he conceived that Court had no Power to try him, for he was a military Man, and therefore ought to be tried by a Council of War; and it was with ſome Difficulty that he was perſwaded to plead NOT GUILTY.

His Challenge. Then the Jury were called over, and Mr. Brooke coming to be ſworn as Foreman, the Colonel challenged him; but was told, it was too late, for he was already ſworn. The Colonel replied, he had not kiſſed the Book: The Court ſaid, that was a needleſs Ceremony. Then the Colonel deſired he might challenge him for Cauſe, alledging that he was his Enemy; but the Court would not ſet him aſide. The Colonel afterwards challenged ſixteen more; whereupon Puleſton, one of the Rebel Judges ſeemed enraged, and ſaid he had beſt take Care to keep within Compaſs, or, he ſhould give him ſuch a Blow as would ſtrike off his Head: To which the Colonel anſwered, That he might by Law challenge thirty five, without ſhewing Cauſe.

Then Witneſſes were produced, to prove the Colonel was Governor of Pontefract Caſtle, which he did not controvert; but he ſaid, there were ſome Points of Law to be diſputed, in Relation to the Indictment; and deſired he might have a Copy of the Indictment, and Counſel to argue the Matters of Law; which being denied him, he obſerved, that the Treaſon laid in the Indictment was, his levying War againſt the late King, which could not be true; becauſe he had acted only for the King, and never againſt him, and produced his Commiſſion; but the Court looking on it, obſerved that it was not granted by the King, but the Prince. The Colonel replied, The Prince had his Commiſſion from his Father, conſtituting him Captain-General, by which he was authorized to grant Commiſſions to him and others; and conſequently he acted by the King's Authority: The Court anſwered this would not avail him, if he had nothing elſe to ſay.

He pleads, he had the King's Commiſſion.

The Colonel replied, That by the ſame Power, all Judges, Juſtices of Peace, and Officers, had acted, and all Proceſs of Law was iſſued in the King's Name.

The Rebel Judges ſaid, The Power was not in the King but the Kingdom; he acted but in Truſt for the Kingdom. It was called The King's Highway, and The King's Coin; but the Property was in the Subject, his Natural and his Legal Power were different Things. The Court reply, the King was the Peoples Truſtee.

The Colonel anſwered, the King's Legal and Perſonal Power were ſo united, that they could not be ſeparated.

To this the Court replied, If the King ordered him to kill a Man, this Command would not juſtify him; and demanded if he had any thing more to ſay.

The Colonel obſerved again, that he had acted for the King, and in his Name; that this was before the Regal Power was aboliſhed, and therefore he could not be ſaid to have committed Treaſon againſt the Parliament: That the Caſtle or Palace he held for the King, by Virtue of his Commiſſion, was demoliſhed before the Act for aboliſhing Kingly Power took Place: That it was ſtrange they ſhould aſſume a Power their Predeceſſors never exerciſed; and that the putting him to Death, who was a Soldier, in this Manner, might be retaliated on their Friends: There might come a Turn of Times, and the Marquiſs of Ormonde had aſſured him, that whatever ſhould befall him, the like ſhould be returned on the Priſoners he had taken: That he was bound by his Allegiance to do what he had done if he had no Commiſſion; he knew no other Power but the King's he owed Allegiance to. The Colonel inſiſts, he acted for the King.

The Court anſwered, this was not much to the Purpoſe: The Colonel replied, that it was true, ſince they had rejected the Authority he acted by, he might as well have held his Tongue, were it not for the Satisfaction of the Hearers: They might do by him, as they had done by his dear Lord Strafford, put him to Death without Law, and then make an Act it ſhould be no Precedent. Then he inſiſted on the Statute of 11 Hen. VII. which declares, that whoever ſhall aid aid or assist the King in his Wars, shall not be questioned for it.

He pleads the Stat. 11 Hen. 7.

The Court answered, Henry VII. was a Usurper, and made that Act for his own Security: To which the Colonel replied, as it was never repealed, he ought to have the Benefit of it; but the Rebel Judges would hear no more, and ordered the Colonel to be laid in Irons.

The Court orders him to be loaded with Irons.

The Colonel said this was a Disgrace to him, and to all Soldiers, and desired they would not use him and his Fellow-Soldiers, who were Prisoners, thus ignominiously; for it would trouble him more than the Loss of his Life: But notwithstanding the Colonel was extremely importunate that he might not be laid in Irons, they put Irons both on his Hands and Legs before he was removed from the Bar, and even before the Verdict was brought in against him. Then the Court adjourned, and being assembled again in the Afternoon, the Jury gave in their Verdict, That the Colonel was GUILTY, as they did also against Blackstone or Blackburne, another brave Royalist in the like Circumstances.

The Jury find him Guilty.

He bravely asserts the Royal Cause.

When the Court had pronounced Sentence against the Colonel as a Traitor, he said, If I must suffer, I receive it with all Alacrity and Chearfulness, and I thank God, I shall die for a good Cause, and the Testimony of a good Conscience; for which, had I as many Lives as there are Stars in the Firmament, I would sacrifice them all for the same. I beseech God bless King Charles, and fight for all those that fight for him, or have fought for him.

There was some Application made, even by the Officers of the Rebels Army, to save the Colonel, as he was a Prisoner of War: But he was too brave a Man, and too loyal to his Prince, to be suffered to live by those Usurers.

His Speech and Behaviour at his Execution.

The twenty third of August being appointed for the Colonel's Execution, when he was brought out of Prison, and saw the Sledge, he said, I am as willing to go to my Death, as to put off my Cloaths and go to Bed: Being drawn to the Place of Execution, he declared he was brought up in the true Protestant Religion, and had his Education in the House of his dear Lord and Master the Earl of Strafford, one of the best-governed Houses in the Kingdom: And as he had been bred up in, and hitherto professed the Protestant Religion, without wavering, he was now resolved, by God's Assistance, to die in it.

Then he proceeded, and said, These Pains are nothing, if compared to those Dolours and Pains, which Christ our Saviour suffered for us, when in a bloody Sweat he endured the Wrath of God, the Pains of Hell, and the cursed and shameful Death due to our Sins; I praise God, I am not plagued with a far more grievous Punishment: The like hath befallen others, who undoubtedly are most glorious and blessed Saints with Christ in Heaven. It is the Lord's doing; and who will not take any Affliction in good Part, when it comes from the Hands of God? Shall we receive Good from the Hands of God, and shall we not receive Evil? Though I desire, as I am carnal, that this Cup may pass from me, yet not my Will, but thine be done.

I bless God, that I am thought worthy to suffer in so good a Cause: If I had a Thousand Lives I would willingly lay them down for the King, the Lords anointed. The Scripture commands us to fear God, and honour the King; to be subject to every Ordinance of Man for the Lord's Sake, whether to the King as Supreme, or to those that are in Authority under him. I pray God to turn the Hearts of all the Soldiers to their Lawful Sovereign, that this Land may enjoy Peace, which till then it will never do.

1649. 1 Car. 2.

After which he took his Bible, and read several Passages, suitable to his Condition, out of the Psalms, and having finished his Devotions, the Executioner did his Office.

Remarks Historical and Critical on Morris's Trial.

This brave Royalist Colonel Morris, surprized Pontefract Castle for the King, on the Second of June 1648, and for this Service, had the Government of it conferred upon him: Here he kept the whole Country in Subjection, for twenty Miles round and more, and became exceeding terrible to the Adherents of the Usurpers in Yorkshire: Whereupon Forces were drawn together, to invest the Place; and in the Beginning of October 1648, Rainsborough, one of the Rebel Chiefs, was sent down to command the Siege: Morris having Intelligence thereof, either marched in Person, or sent a Detachment of his Garrison, to beat up his Quarters at Doncaster, and take him Prisoner if possible; and they were so fortunate, as to surprize Rainsborough in his Lodgings: But he making a Resistance, and some Forces drawing together to rescue him, Rainsborough was killed in the Action, but the Party from Pontefract returned to the Castle, with little or no Loss.

Cromwell returning from Scotland with his Army about this Time, his Yorkshire Friends begged of him to reduce the Castle of Pontefract, which continued such a Terour to them; but he being engaged in greater Matters at that Time, namely, the breaking of the Treaty at the Isle of Wight, and bringing the King himself to the Block, was obliged to continue his March to London: However, he left a Detachment of the Army, under the Command of General Lambert, to re-inforce the Siege. The Garrison held out, notwithstanding, six Months longer; but being reduced then to the last Extremity, and finding it impossible to hold out many Days more, they capitulated the latter End of March 1649, when they were forced to submit to the following hard Conditions; namely, that the Governor Morris, and five more Officers of the Garrison, whom Cromwell, according to the Noble Historian, was resolved to sacrifice to the Manes of Rainsborough, should be excepted out of the Capitulation, and left to their Mercy, if the said proscribed Men could not make their Escape within the six Days limited for delivering up the Place; four of whom actually got off in two desperate Sallies the Garrison made, and the other two were so well concealed under some Stones and Rubbish in the Castle, where Provisions were left them to subsist on for a Month, that they were never discovered by the Enemy; and they made their Escape within ten Days after the Rebels became Masters of the Place, the Castle being immediately demolished and abandoned: However, Colonel Morris, with Mr. Beaumont, Chaplain 1649. 1 Car. 2. Chaplain to the Garriſon, and Colonel Blackburne were afterwards taken, tried, condemned, and executed by the Uſurpers, in a pretended Court of Juſtice, for High Treaſon, in making War againſt King Charles I. by whoſe Authority they had acted, as Colonel Morris inſiſted at his Trial. The Uſurpers would not put them to Death by Martial Law, for which they might have had ſome Pretence, as being excepted out of the Capitulation at Pontfract; but choſe to bring them before their Courts of Law, that, in condemning them, they might ſhew they adjudged all thoſe to be guilty of High-Treaſon, who had ſerved the King, and oppoſed the Parliament; thus making the King himſelf, and his loyal Subjects, Traitors to the People; and ſince they had already taken upon them, to condemn and execute their Sovereign, under Colour of Law, no Wonder his faithful Servants found no better Quarter at their Hands, eſpecially one who had ſo long oppoſed their whole united Power, after all other Forces and Places had ſurrendered, and Scotland was ſubdued. The Uſurpers would have done themſelves too much Honour, had they ſaved the Life of ſo brave a Cavalier, whoſe Fame will never die, any more than the Infamy of thoſe Men that put him to Death in cold Blood, in Defiance of all Laws, civil and military, and againſt the Laws of Nature and of Nations. 1649. 1 Car. 1.

The Rebels, thoſe pretended Patriots, who formerly railed at the Adminiſtration, for not allowing their Fellow-Subjects the Benefit of the Law, here denied the Colonel the Benefit of his Challenges, and impanelled his Enemies againſt him: They murdered him for making War againſt the King, when he fought for him, and by his Commiſſion; and when he cited that Act of Parliament of King Henry VII. which indemnifies every Man that takes up Arms for the King, they ſlighted the Statute; though we find the Rebels and Regicides themſelves, ſome few Years after, endeavouring to ſkreen themſelves from Juſtice, under the very ſame Act; and urging that, as they acted under the Powers in Being, the ſaid Statute ought in Equity to be extended to them; inaſmuch as the Uſurpers had the Power of a King, though not the Name: But with how ill a Grace they pleaded this Statute, when they had denied the Benefit of it to thoſe who had actually fought for the King, will be obſerved hereafter, in the Trials of the Regicides.

1649. 1 Car. 2. Lilburn's Trial.

The Trial of Lieutenant Colonel JOHN LILBURNE, by a Commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer, at Guildhall, London, for High-Treaſon, the 24*th*, 25*th*, and 26*th* of October, 1649. 1 Car. II.

1649. 1 Car. 2.

The Objections to the Juriſdiction of the Court, &c.

THE Priſoner being brought to the Bar, before he was arraigned, deſired to be heard; which being granted him, he objected to his being tried by a ſpecial Commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer: He complained of his being apprehended by a Detachment of Soldiers, and not by the Civil Magiſtrate; that his Chamber and Pockets had been ſearched, and his Eſtate, to the Value of three thouſand Pounds, ſeized without legal Proceſs; and of his being committed to the Tower, and no Allowance made him, as other Priſoners uſed to have, who were confined there: He demanded alſo to hear the Commiſſion read, by which the Court was held; which he thought not agreable to the Petition of Right, and the reſt of the good old Laws of England.

Anſwers to his Objections.

To this, Mr. Prideaux the Attorney General anſwered, That this was not a Special, but a General Commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer in the uſual Form; that it had been read before he came, and that the Bill had been found againſt him by the Grand Inqueſt.

Judge Jermin alſo informed him, That the Court was conſtituted by the ſupreme Authority of England; that their Commiſſion was founded on the Statute of 1 Weſtm. 2. which the Barons obtained in their Wars, and purchaſed by the Sword, for the Liberties and Priviledges of the Subject: That he was to anſwer the Charge of oppoſing the ſupreme Power, now ſettled in the Houſe of Commons, not newly erected but revived; for it was ſo in the Saxon, and in the Roman Times; requiring the Priſoner to put himſelf upon his Trial, and hold up his Hand at the Bar.

The ſupreme Power ſaid to be originally in the Commons

Lilburne replied, He had good Reaſons to believe their Commiſſion to be illegal, and deſired all the good People preſent, to take notice, that they refuſed the reading the Commiſſion, by which they went about to take away his Life; nor did he know the Meaning of holding up his Hand: He looked upon it to be a tickliſh Point; he might throw away his Life, if he held it up, before he knew what it meant. His Reply.

To which Judge Keble anſwered, It was to ſignify he was the Perſon they enquired for, and if he did but own himſelf to be John Lilburne, it ſhould be ſufficient.

Then Lilburne ſaid, His Name was John Lilburne, Son to Mr. Richard Lilburne of Durham; a Freeman of London, and late Lieutenant Colonel in the Parliament's Army; but deſired they would not ſurprize him with Punctilio's.

The Court told him, if he talked of Punctilio's, they would put a Stop to that Language. Lilburne replied, Give me Leave to ſpeak, or knock me on the Head where I ſtand. Mr. Bradſhaw, Preſident of the High Court of Juſtice, as it was called, gave Duke Hamilton Leave to ſpeak to the Punctilio's of Law; and I hope you will grant me, that have been in Arms for you, as much Favour, as was granted to Duke Hamilton, who was againſt you.

Then

1649. 1 Car. 2.

Then the Clerk arraigning him, and demanding if he was Guilty, or Not guilty, Lilburne ſaid, he was not to anſwer Queſtions for or againſt himſelf; he did not know what Benefits he might loſe by anſwering, and therefore deſired a Copy of his Indictment, Counſel, and Time to conſult them; and that he might not be entrapped with Niceties, and Forms of Law, that could not be found in Engliſh Books. However, he was at length prevailed on to plead, Not guilty of the Treaſons in Manner and Form, as laid in the Indictment: And being aſked how he would be tried? he anſwered, By the known Laws of England, and a legal Jury of his Equals, And in the Preſence of that God, who knew if the Court were poſſeſſed with premeditated Malice, to deſtroy him right or wrong: And having repeated his Demand for Counſel, and a Copy of his Indictment, he was told, he could not have either: Lilburne replied, He deſired no other Privilege of them, the Nations pretended Friends, than he had at Oxford from its pretended Enemies, when he was tried before Chief Juſtice Heath, for Treaſon and Rebellion againſt the King. If they, for whom he fought, would not be as juſt to him, as the Cavaliers againſt whom he fought, he was reſolved to ſtand there, and die upon the Principles of a true Engliſhman: So they might murder him, and take his Blood if they pleaſed.

He is prevailed on to plead, with ſome Difficulty.

Demands Counſel, and a Copy of his Indictment.

Says, the Cavaliers allowed him Counſel.

Was it juſt to allow Counſel to plead for an Eſtate, and deny him Counſel in a Caſe of Life? And when Judges were ſeven Years ending a Suit for Money or Land, would they deny him a few Days, to prepare for his Defence? Theſe were pretended to be arbitrary and tyrannical Prerogatives of the King's; but if they were not taken away, by thoſe who took away his Life, then only the Name was gone, but the Tyranny remained. Judge Heath had allowed him Council in the higheſt Treaſon, even the levying War againſt the King, and fighting his Forces at the Sword's Point.

To which the Court anſwered, Judge Heath knew that was no Treaſon; he acted by the Parliament's ſpecial Authority; he had their Commiſſion to juſtify him.

Lilburne replied, The Letter of the Law was point-blank againſt him; and if the Cavaliers had prevailed, both he and they might have been hanged, for all their Parliament Commiſſions.

The next Day, being the 26th of October, the Priſoner was brought into the Court again; when the Jury were called over; and Lilburne having challenged two or three of them, twelve were ſworn, and the Indictment was read: Which ſet forth, that the Priſoner intending to diſturb the Government, then happily eſtabliſhed, without King or Houſe of Lords, in the way of a Commonwealth and free State, and to bring them into Hatred and Contempt with the good People of England, had written and publiſhed ſeveral treaſonable Libels: The firſt entitled, Salva Libertate. 2. An Impeachment of High Treaſon againſt Oliver Cromwell, and his Son-in-Law Ireton, late Members of the forcibly diſſolved Houſe of Commons. 3. A Hue and Cry after Sir Arthur Haſelrig. 4. An Outcry of the young Men and Apprentices of London: or, An Inquiſition after the loſt fundamental Laws and Liberties of England, directed to the Soldiers of the Army. 5. The legal fundamental Laws and Liberties of the People revived, aſſerted, and vindicated: Declaring, that the preſent Government was tyrannical, uſurped, and unlawful; and that the Commons aſſembled in Parliament, were not the Supreme Authority of the Nation: And the following Paſſages were extracted out of the ſaid Libels, to prove the Treaſon, viz.

The Charge againſt him.

1649. 1 Car. 2.

The People now ſee their Slavery and abſolute Bondage is like to encreaſe, under the preſent tyannical, arbitrary, new-erected, robbing Government.

The obnoxious Paſſages produced as Proof of the Treaſon.

The preſent Juncto are no Parliament, according to Law or Reaſon, but a Company of uſurping Tyrants, and Deſtroyers of your Laws and Liberties.

Moſt of our preſent Juncto, and their new framed Council of State, muſt go to Tyburn, or Tower Hill.

Your Officers have often ſtiled them no better than a Mock Parliament, A Shadow of a Parliament.

Miſery and Poverty were never ſo extreme, under the moſt tyrannical of our Kings, as under theſe pretended Friends.

Nothing but the groundleſs Wills of theſe Men of Blood, rageth and ruleth over us.

The preſent ſupreme Authority fought againſt both King and Parliament, rooted out all legal Magiſtracy, and left none but themſelves; and could be compared to none but Murderers and Robbers, having no more juſt Right than ſo many Algier Pyrates.

The King never acted the like Tyranny, and yet by St. Oliver's Means loſt his Head; and Oliver and his Parliament have plucked up the Houſe of Lords by the Roots.

They (The great Officers of the Army) have had as much Power over their Parliament, now ſitting, as ever a School-maſter had over his Boys.

The preſent Men in Power, have trod all Liberty under Foot, and ſet up their Tyranny by the Sword.

The High Court of Juſtice is unlawful, if thoſe who ſet it up were a legal Parliament, which they were not, but a Pack of traiterous tyrannical Uſurpers: And they being no Parliament, the other is no Court of Juſtice.

He tells the young Men, They are obliged to exert themſelves, for their own and the Nations Advantage; and neither to addreſs or ſuffer the TYRANTS IN POWER, to be addreſſed or petitioned; but to chuſe ſome of the ableſt among themſelves, who would venture their Lives to oppoſe the preſent Uſurpers: Deſiring the Soldiers, if they had any Compaſſion for themſelves, or their Fellow Subjects, to aſſiſt in their REDEMPTION FROM SLAVERY; eſpecially thoſe, who ſigned the ſolemn Engagement: Adviſing them to chuſe two out of each Troop and Company, to correſpond and conſult with the ſaid young Men's Friends, for eſtabliſhing the Liberties and Freedom of the People.

In another Place, he ſays, That the young Men were reſolved to incite their Fellow Apprentices of the Out-Pariſhes to chuſe Agents, and deſire by Letter each County in England to do the ſame; which Agents ſhould, with their Burford Friends, meet and conſider of the ſpeedieſt Method of chuſing a new Parliament, according to the ſaid Agreement; ſeeing THE PRESENT PRETENDED PARLIAMENT ONLY SHARED THE PUBLICK TREASURE, AND MOST BENEFICIAL PLACES

1649. 1. Car. 2. AMONG THEMSELVES, without redreſſing Oppreſſions, or receiving Petitions or Complaints: For, notwithſtanding the many Oaths, Promiſes, and Engagements of the preſent Commonwealth, to maintain the Liberties and Properties of the People, THEY WERE PERJURED TYRANTS, AND OUGHT TO BE ABHORRED OF ALL MEN.

That Cromwell and his Confederates, were guilty of moſt of the Crimes in kind, charged againſt the late King, though under new Denominations.

That no Promiſes could bind the chief Jugglers, and Leaders of the Army: And that he, (the Priſoner) left their Council, eſteeming them a Pack of diſſembling Knaves, eſpecially Ireton: And averred, That the General, and chiefeſt of his Council, dreaded a new and free Parliament more than the Day of Judgment: That neither Korah, Dathan, and Abiram of Old, nor the Anabaptiſts with John of Leyden, and Buperdullion at Munſter; nor Jack Straw or Wat Tyler were comparable to the General and his Council, for Rebellions and Treaſons againſt all Kinds of Magiſtracy.

He tells the Soldiers, That they aſſiſted rather than endeavoured to ſuppreſs the Deſtroyers of the Liberties of the People: And if any one complained, his Houſe was immediately beſet with armed Janizaries, to take off the People's Courage, and prevent their maintaining their Freedoms.

And the Indictment farther ſet forth, that the ſaid John Lilburne, not being an Officer, Soldier, or Member of the Army, did traiterouſly endeavour to incite Mutiny and Rebellion in the Army, under General Fairfax; and particularly did endeavour to draw Thomas Lewis, John Skinner, and John Toppe, from their Obedience to their ſuperior Officers; and did deliver to the aforeſaid three Soldiers the ſaid Books, containing the treaſonable Expreſſions aforeſaid, and which were written and publiſhed to the Intent to ſtir up, and raiſe Forces againſt the Commonwealth; and bring about an Alteration in the Government, in Contempt of the Laws, &c.

The Evidence of his printing and publiſhing the Books.

The Witneſſes, produced on Behalf of the Commonwealth, depoſed, That the Priſoner recommended the Books mentioned in the Indictment, and corrected one of the Sheets at the Printer's; and that he publiſhed them, by diſperſing them among the Soldiers: and endeavoured to incite, and ſtir up the Soldiers to Mutiny, againſt their ſuperior Officers and the Commonwealth.

An Ordinance of Parliament, which makes the oppoſing or reflecting on the Commonwealth Treaſon.

An Ordinance of Parliament of the 14th of May 1649, alſo was read; declaring, "That "whereas the Parliament had aboliſhed Kingly "Government, and reſolved, that the Peo"ple ſhould be governed by their own Re"preſentatives; it was hereby enacted, That "whoever ſhould maliciouſly publiſh, by "writing, printing, &c. that the ſaid Go"vernment was tyrannical, uſurped, or un"lawful, and not the Supreme Authority; "or, ſhould plot or endeavour to ſtir up, "or raiſe Forces againſt the preſent Govern"ment, for the Subverſion thereof, or a"gainſt the Keepers of the Liberties of En"gland, or the Council of State, or any "of them, ſhould be deemed guilty of High "Treaſon: And that whoever (not being an "Officer, or Soldier) ſhould endeavour to ſtir "up any Mutiny in the Army, or withdraw "the Soldiers from their Obedience to their "ſuperior Officers, or ſhould invite Foreign"ers to invade the Kingdom, or counterfeit "the Great Seal, ſhould likewiſe be adjudged "guilty of High Treaſon." 1649. 1. Car.

Lilburne in his Defence inſiſted, That it was not proved he was the Author of the Books laid in the Indictment; but was anſwered, That, ſince it appeared he had diſperſed and publiſhed them, this made him guilty of High Treaſon. Lilburne's Defence.

Then he objected, that he was indicted for Crimes committed againſt the Keepers of the Liberties of England, and one of them (Colonel Purefoy) was made an Evidence againſt him; but the Teſtimony of a Man that was a Party, ought not to be credited.

He obſerved, that a Priſoner ought to be tried in the County where the Treaſon was committed; and they had laid Facts in the Indictment, ſaid to be committed in three different Counties; and, that there was but one Witneſs to moſt of the particular Treaſons.

He ſaid he had ſtood five Hours waſting his Spirits already, and now to ſtand to anſwer a five Hours Charge extempore, was a Burthen too heavy for a Horſe; and hoped they did not deſign to hang him, becauſe he was tired, and had not Strength left to pronounce his Defence; and deſired a Week's Time, or at leaſt till the next Morning; but was told, he muſt enter upon his Defence immediately: Then he deſired he might withdraw an Hour to peruſe his Notes, and refreſh his Spirits: And this being alſo refuſed, he cried out, Well, if you are reſolved to have my Blood, right or wrong, I appeal to the Lord God, Omnipotent, and a mighty Judge between you and me, to require and requite that Blood on you and your Poſterity, to the third and fourth Generation. And a Scaffold falling down as he was ſpeaking, put the Court into ſome Conſternation. After which he ſaid, If you will not allow me Liberty to withdraw and eaſe Nature, I deſire I may do it in Court? Whereupon a Pot was brought him, and he was allowed ſome little Time to look over his Papers: But Keble, one of his Judges, ſoon interrupted him; and ſaid, Take away his Chair; The Court cannot wait his Motions: Speak what ye have to ſay.

Lilburne anſwered, I deſire to know, whether, after I have pleaded to Matter of Fact, you will permit me to ſpeak to the Jury, on whoſe Integrity my Life depends; and, who are Judges of Law, as well as Fact; and you only the Pronouncers of their Will: You, who call yourſelves Judges of the Law, are only Norman Intruders, Cyphers to pronounce their Sentence who are Judges of Law, as well as Fact: To which Judge Jermin anſwered, Was ever ſuch damnable blaſphemous Hereſy, to call the Judges Cyphers: The Judges have been Judges of Law from the firſt Settlement of the Law of England, and the Jury only Judges of Fact.

Lilburne replied, If you will permit me to read, I will diſprove this from your own Law: Here is the firſt Part of Coke's Inſtitutes, (holding the Book in his Hand) which all Lawyers allow to be good Law; and here Coke ſays, That a ſpecial Verdict, or at large, may be given upon any Iſſue; but if they will take upon them the Knowledge of the Law, they may give their Verdict generally.

Then he objected, That ſome of the Books laid in the Indictment, were publiſhed before the Act on which he was indicted took Place; and urged, That where there was no Law, there was no Tranſgreſſion: He obſerved farther, That it was the Intention, and not the Act, which made a Thing criminal; and he had always endeavoured the Proſperity of the Nation, he ſaid, though it was true he had been proclaimed a Traitor in all the great Towns in England, and impriſoned for Crimes with which he had never been charged ſince; and now, for complaining of hard Uſage, Acts were made on Purpoſe to bring him within a Charge of High Treaſon. The Court anſwered, this was nothing to the Purpoſe; they ſhould not ſuffer him to go on at this Rate: Whereupon Lilburne cried out, Well, If you will not let me proceed, my Blood be upon your Heads: I deſire the Jury will take notice of your unjuſt and cruel Uſage: Then he repeated his Complaints, That his Eſtate was taken from him; That he was refuſed Council, &c. but reſigned himſelf to the Care and Conſciences of his Fellow Citizens, the honeſt Jury; who (he again obſerved) were Judges of the Law, as well as Fact; and prayed God to direct them, to act according to Juſtice: Whereupon the Audience cried Amen, and gave a great Hum; and the Judges being apprehenſive of a Tumult, directed Major General Skippon to ſend for three Companies of Soldiers more for their Protection.

The People ſhew themſelves well-affected to him, and the Court ſend for a ſtronger Guard.

Then Prideaux, their Attorney-General, ſummed up the Evidence, and informed the Jury, that two Witneſſes were not neceſſary to convict the Priſoner of Treaſon; for the Statute of 1 and 2 P. M. had repealed the Statutes of Edw. VI. Then he made an Encomium on the Officers of that gallant Army, who had been ſo faithful to their Truſt, and had ſo much advanced the Peace and Happineſs of the Nation, obſerving, That God had bleſſed and owned them in a miraculous Manner. But Lilburne interrupted the Attorney, and obſerved, that he (the Attorney) was once one of thoſe that voted the Army Traitors, and was ſet down as a Malignant by the Commiſſioners of the Army, though he was now become a good acquieſcing Creature; and demanded, if, notwithſtanding their boaſted Faithfulneſs, the Army had not twice rebelled againſt their Creators, their Lords and Maſters.

The Army govern the Parliament at this Time. Mr. Attorney applauds the Army.

However, Mr. Attorney went on, ſhewing what great Things the Army had done, though they could not, he ſaid, eſcape the vile Tongue and Pen of Mr. Lilburne, any more than the Parliament and Civil Magiſtrate; and therefore, he hoped the Jury, as they tendered the Honour and Welfare of them all, and if they had any Remembrance of the great and wonderful Things their renowned Army had done, and with what Confidence and Deſpite to all Law and Authority Lilburne had publiſhed thoſe Books, they would take Care he ſhould ſmart for it; concluding, that the Court were Judges of the Law, as the Jury were of the Fact. Judge Keble alſo, in his Directions to the Jury, told them that the Statutes of Edw. VI. which required two Witneſſes, were repealed by that of Queen Mary, which enacted, that the Common Law ſhould be the Rule in Trials of Treaſon; and, by the Common Law, one Witneſs with concurring Circumſtances, was ſufficient; that he did not obſerve: That any Fact the Priſoner was charged with ſtood upon a ſingle Teſtimony, but was ſupported by many aggravating Circumſtances; and that this was the greateſt Treaſon that ever was attempted by one Man; that it ſtruck at the Subverſion of the Commonwealth, and to have laid them all in Blood; and left it to their Conſciences, if he was not guilty of the moſt tranſcendent Treaſon that ever was hatched in England.

Judge Keble affirms, two Witneſſes were not neceſſary in Treaſon.

1649. 1 Car. 2.

The Jury, before they went out, deſired they might have a Quart of Sack, to refreſh themſelves, but were told, No Jury were ever allowed to drink in Capital Caſes, and it was thought a great Indulgence that they were permitted to have a Candle. The Jury, returning into Court about an Hour afterwards, gave in their Verdict, that the Priſoner was NOT GUILTY; at which the People ſhouted for half an Hour, without ceaſing. But, notwithſtanding Mr. Lilburne was acquitted, he was remanded to the Tower, and Major-General Skippon ordered to guard him thither, with a good Body of Troops; however, the Multitude followed him, with loud Acclamations, to the Tower Gates, and abundance of Bonfires were made in the Streets that Night; and the People afterwards appeared ſo exaſperated at Lilburne's being continued a Priſoner, that the Council of State, on the 8th of November, thought fit to direct their Warrant to the Lieutenant of the Tower to diſcharge him.

Wine denied the Jury.

Lilburne acquitted.

The People ſhout, and make Bonfires.

Cromwell appears to have been under great Apprehenſions from the daring Spirit of this Man, and could not reſt till he got an Ordinance paſſed for his Baniſhment; whereby it was declared, that he ſhould be adjudged guilty of Felony, if ever he appeared in England after a certain limited Time: But neither was this much regarded by Lilburne; he was afterwards found in England, and brought to his Trial, at the Old-Bailey, on that Act, the 20th of Auguſt, 1653. but again acquited by the Jury; at which the Parliament were ſo incenſed, that they ordered the Jurors to be apprehended, and brought before the Council of State, to ſhew Cauſe why they acquitted the Priſoner of Felony, againſt the plaineſt Evidence: And, though all the Jury was ſeparately examined and threatned, they would give no other Anſwer, but that they looked upon themſelves to be Judges of the Law as well as the Fact; that they gave the Verdict according to their Conſciences: As to the Reaſons that induced them to acquit him, they would give none. Nor had Cromwell any way to defend his Uſurpation againſt the Attacks of this brave and popular Man, but by impriſoning him arbitrarily in Dover-Caſtle, where he died a Sort of a Martyr to Liberty.

An Ordinance for the Baniſhment of Lilburne.

He is tried for remaining in England, and acquitted.

The Jury threatned.

Lilburne impriſoned in Dover-Caſtle, dies there.

The Trial of Mr. Lilburne gives us a very lively Idea of the Condition of the Subjects of England during the Uſurpation, and ſhews, that Tyranny and arbitrary Power were far from being baniſhed the Realm, on the aboliſhing of Kingly Government; or rather, that thoſe Men who rebelled againſt their King, and murdered him on the Pretence of Tyranny and Maladminiſtration, were ten times more arbitrary arbitrary and deſpotick than the King had been, and entirely ſubverted that Conſtitution and thoſe Laws they pretended to be ſo zealous to preſerve, proſecuting ſuch Men with the utmoſt Violence as complained of their Oppreſſions.

Lilburne informs us, the People were reduced to the utmoſt Slavery and Bondage, by a Company of uſurping Tyrants and Deſtroyers of their Laws and Liberties; that Miſery and Poverty were never ſo extreme, under the moſt tyrannical of our Kings, as under theſe pretended Friends to the Conſtitution; that they had trod all Liberty under Foot, and ſet up their Tyranny by the Sword: That Cromwell and his Aſſociates were guilty of the very Crimes they charged the late Adminiſtration with; that no Promiſes could bind them; they were a Pack of diſſembling Knaves; that the arbitrary Wills of theſe Men of Blood raged and ruled over all, and they were no better than Murderers and Robbers.

In this Situation of Affairs, the Priſoner had little Reaſon to expect the Benefit or Protection of the Laws; the ſeizing his Eſtate, the Impriſonment of his Perſon, and the reſt of the Outrages he complains of, were but the natural Effects of the Tyranny the Uſurpers exerciſed; and how they came to indulge him a Trial by a Jury, is not eaſy to conceive, unleſs they looked upon this as the moſt popular Way of cutting him off, and depended on the Sheriffs returning ſuch a Jury as would have anſwered their Ends.

Their affirming that the Jury were not Judges of the Law as well as Fact; that two Witneſſes were not neceſſary in Treaſon, and denying him Council to argue the Points of Law, were but trivial Jnjuries, compared with others they daily committed; with their rooting up and ſubverting the very Foundations of the Government, and ruling the Nation with a Military Force. 1649. 1 Car.

We find even John Lilburne, and all the Parliamentarians, who had been ſo zealous in deſtroying Kingly Government, now repenting their Raſhneſs, and wiſhing for a Reſtoration; even Cromwell and his Army could not awe them into Silence. The People looked upon Lilburne as the Champion of their Liberties; and ſo general was the Diſaffection, that the Uſurpers were not able to get a Jury to convict him, though they made Ordinances of Parliament on purpoſe to deſtroy him. And it is evident, if the People had not been kept in Bondage by an Army of Veteran Troops, to whom Cromwell, their Chief, in a manner gave the Plunder of the Nation, King Charles II. had been reſtored to his Throne within leſs than a Year after his Father's Murder. The People ſoon ſaw through the Hypocriſy of thoſe pretended Saints, and that, inſtead of vindicating their Liberties and Properties, the Uſurpers intended only to eſtabliſh their Tyranny, and bring them under a more intolerable Yoke than any People in Europe were ſubject to: And this we find they did in the Name of the Lord, and in the Name of a Parliament, an Aſſembly of Men of their own appointing, with whom they ſhared the Spoils of the Kingdom.

1650. 2 Car. 2. Andrewe's Trial.

The Trial of Colonel EUSEBIUS ANDREWE, a Barriſter of Gray's-Inn, for High-Treaſon againſt the Rump Parliament, before their pretended High Court of Juſtice, 16 Aug. 1650. 2 Car. II.

1650. 2 Car. 2.

The Charge. THE Editors of this Trials have not given us the Articles, or Charge, exhibited in the pretended High Court of Juſtice, againſt the Colonel: But from his Anſwers and Defence, it appears, he was charged with a Conſpiracy to ſubvert their (uſurped) Government; and the Overt-Acts laid of it, were his correſponding with King Charles II. endeavouring to bring him in; and, in order to it, conſpiring with Sir John Gell and others, to raiſe Forces; to ſeize upon the Iſle of Ely, and taking an Oath of Secrecy not to reveal the Conſpiracy.

The Colonel was apprehended at an Inn in Graveſend, the 24th of March 1649-50, and examined by Preſident Bradſhaw, Sir Henry Mildmay, and Thomas Scot, Members of their Council of State, and delegated to take his Examination.

Mr. Buckley, who publiſhed the Account of theſe Proceedings againſt his Friend Colonel Andrewe, ſays, the Colonel found, by the Queſtions that were put to him, that he was betrayed, and that his Examiners were acquainted with every Circumſtance of the Conſpiracy, and therefore endeavoured to merit their Favour, by freely confeſſing what he found it was impoſſible to conceal.

His Examination. In his Examination therefore, taken the 27th of March 1650, he confeſſed, that he had been unfortunately and treacherouſly ſeduced into an Action that rendered him obnoxious to their Diſpleaſure: He acknowledged, that he took up Arms for his late Majeſty King Charles I. in the Year 1642, and continued in his Service till the Surrender of Worceſter, in July 1645. That he had omitted to make his Compoſition with the State: That he had neither taken the Proteſtation required by the preſent Powers, the ſolemn League and Covenant, the Negative Oath, or the Engagement.

He confeſſed, That Mr. John Barnard, who was his Major, when he commanded a Regiment in the King's Service, had communicated to him the Schemes of ſome Reformades, Levellers, Agitators, and other Perſons diſaffected to the preſent Powers; but that he neither promoted, or conſented to them: That one John Benſon, who pretended to have ſerved in the Parliament Army under Sir John Gell, had

1650. 2 Car. 2. had ſhewn him alſo ſome Papers relating to Affairs of State, which he ſaid were intended to be ſent beyond Sea: And that both Benſon and Captain Holmes, who introduced him to the Examinant, magnified Sir John Gell's Intereſt in his Country; ſaid he was inclined to join the Royal Party; that he ſerved the Parliament with Reluctance, and was willing to expiate his former Fault, by ſome beneficial Service for the Prince (King Charles II.)

That Major Barnard propoſed the reſuming a Deſign the Examinant had formed, during the War, of ſeizing the Iſle of Ely, with the Aſſiſtance of Sir John Gell, Holmes, and Benſon, and it was reſolved, that the Examinant and Benſon ſhould try if the People of Cambridgeſhire would engage in it, and if Sir John Gell's Reſolution and Strength were ſuch as had been repreſented.

That he afterwards diſcourſed with Sir John Gell, who ſhewed he was diſſatisfied his Arrears were not paid, and that his Services for the Parliament were not requited; and intimated that, if ever he took up Arms again, it ſhould be for the Prince, deſiring that his Affection for the Royal Cauſe might be repreſented to him.

However, the Time for the Examinant's remaining in England (according to an Order of State, for baniſhing ſuch Cavaliers as did not comply with them) being expired, he was preparing to go over to New England or Virginia; when Major Barnard and Benſon came to him again, and told him, there was a Deſign laid, on the Cavaliers leaving the Town, to ſeize the Cavalry in the Service of the preſent Powers in their Quarters: That the Examinant was pitched upon to go over to Holland, to concert Matters with the Prince, and Money was raiſed to defray his Expences; and that he (the Colonel) anſwered, If the Money was ready, he would lay aſide his Deſign of going to the Plantations, and entertain the Motion.

That, a few Days after, Major Barnard and Benſon came to the Examinant again, and informed him, that ſeveral Perſons of Quality and Fortune, in Kent, Buckinghamſhire, and Dorſetſhire, would preſently come up near the Town, join in an Engagement to proſecute the Deſign, and advance Money for it; and deſired him to draw up an Engagement, which he did on the Inſtructions they gave him; and that they preſſed him to bring Sir John Gell into it, but propoſing it to Sir John the ſame Day, he anſwered, he was in no Capacity to enter upon ſuch an Attempt at preſent, neither would he come into any Engagement under his Hand and Seal to act for the Future, for that Benſon was given to drink, and laviſh of his Tongue; but entruſted the Examinant ſo far as to tell him, if he went to Holland upon this Occaſion, he ſhould poſſeſs the Prince with a good Opinion of him, let him know that he would do nothing againſt him, and if he (Sir John) were in Command, he would be ſo to the Prince's Advantage.

That giving Sir John's Anſwer to Major Barnard and Benſon, they did not ſeem to be diſſatisfied with it, but ſaid, they had appointed a Deputation of Gentlemen, from the Counties of Kent, Buckingham, and Dorſet, to meet at the Three Cranes at the Savoy-Gate, and agree on their reſpective Proportions of Money, deſiring the Examinant to be there, who came accordingly, but no Gentlemen from the ſaid three Counties appeared; only Major Barnard produced two Letters, ſubſcribed by Smith and Thatcher, importing that the Kentiſh Gentlemen were come as far as Rocheſter, and would be within twelve Miles of London that Night, and would give them a Meeting any where near London the Day following, deſiring Major Barnard might come to them forthwith, who pretended to take Horſe accordingly, and go into Kent: That the ſame Night, one Smith and Captain Aſhley brought the Examinant a Letter from Barnard, reprehending him and Sir John Gell for their Backwardneſs in ſigning the Engagement, and declaring, that unleſs the Engagement was ſigned by Sir John Gell, his Kentiſh Friends would not proceed further: To which the Examinant anſwered, under a Vow of Secrecy, that he was ſatisfied concerning Sir John Gell, and if any Gentleman of Quality, in whoſe Judgment the reſt would abide, would addreſs to Sir John, he would ſatisfy him under an Oath of Secrecy; but that he durſt not truſt Benſon, and Barnard was a Stranger to him: That Captain Aſhley and Benſon thereupon took their Leaves, aſſuring the Examinant, that they thought no more would be expected from Sir John; they would return to their Company that Night, and the next Day, being Tueſday, the Money ſhould be paid at the Palſgrave's-Head.

They broke their Word, however, as to the Payment of the Money; and the next Night Captain Aſhley and Benſon delivered the Examinant a Letter from Major Barnard, preſſing him to ſign the Engagement; upon which Condition, Barnard ſaid, he would go with him the next Day to Graveſend, where they ſhould meet the Gentlemen of Kent, and the Money ſhould be paid him: But that, having ſigned the Engagement, and going to Graveſend the ſame Night, he found no Gentlemen there, and having waited, in Expectation of ſeeing them, till Monday the 24th of March, he was ſeized at Graveſend by a Party of Horſe, and brought to London.

The Colonel diſcovers he had been betrayed.

The Colonel, at his Examinations before the Committee of the Council of State, obſerved, That there had been Spies ſet upon him for ſeveral Years, and particularly Major Barnard, which the Preſident did not deny: On the contrary, he took upon him to juſtify the Parliament, by the Practice of all States to ſet a Watch upon ſuch Perſons as they knew to be diſaffected to them.

He petitions for his Enlargement.

The Colonel afterwards ſent ſeveral Petitions to the Council of State, importing, that ſince he had not prevaricated with them, or concealed any Thing or Perſon from them, that might give their Lordſhips Satisfaction, or ſerve the State, he might have the Liberty of the Tower, and his Friends might viſit him.

To be brought to his Trial.

He petitioned alſo, that he might not be tried before the High Court of Juſtice; but afterwards he petitioned to be brought to a ſpeedy Trial, repreſenting, that he muſt otherwiſe infallibly periſh in the Tower, all Perſons being prohibited to come at him, or relieve his Neceſſities; but receiving no Anſwer from the Council of State, he drew up a Petition to the Parliament, wherein he ſets forth, that he had been betrayed by a Pack of Setters into Actions, which abſtracted from their Circumſtances rendered him liable to their Juſtice; and this had been done in Hopes that he would have drawn in divers Perſons of Quality and Fortune into the ſame Danger.

1650. 2 Car. 2.

He petitions the Parliament to be releaſed, &c.

That, failing in that Part of their Deſign, they had betrayed the Petitioner to the Council of State, by whoſe Warrant he had been ſixteen Weeks a cloſe Priſoner, without the Acceſs of his Friends, or Means to ſubſiſt on; and was like to periſh by his Wants, before it was known by a publick Trial, whether he was an Object of their Juſtice or Mercy; and by this cloſe Reſtraint was deprived of all Means of making his Defence.

He humbly deſired therefore, 1. That they would admit him to ſue out his Pardon, on giving Security for his good Behaviour; and, 2. If that was too great a Favour, grant him Licence to depart the Commonwealth; but, 3. If that was not permitted, that he might receive a publick Trial, and have an Opportunity of preparing for his Defence; and, 4. That he might have the Liberty of the Tower, be permitted to ſee his Friends, and that the Debt he had contracted by his Impriſonment might be diſcharged.

He is brought before the High Court of Juſtice.

To this Petition I do not find he received any Anſwer, but in Auguſt he was brought before the High Court of Juſtiee: The Charge was opened and aggravated by their Attorney-General Prideaux, who gave the Colonel very abuſive Language; however, he was allowed to put in his Anſwer in Writing, which he did on the 16th of Auguſt, containing in Effect, a Plea to the Juriſdiction of the Court; for he inſiſted, that the Ordinance for eſtabliſhing a High Court of Juſtice, being contrary to Magna Charta, and the Fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, by which every Man ought to be tried by his Peers, was void.

Pleads to their Juriſdiction.

That this very Parliament had, by ſeveral Remonſtrances, declared, that the Preſervation of the Laws, and the due Adminiſtration of Juſtice, were their Juſtification in taking up Arms againſt the King, and the Ends they propoſed by the War; and had imprecated God's Curſe on all that ſhould decline thoſe Ends: That by the Ordinance, or Votes of Non-Adreſſes, January 1648. they aſſured the Kingdom, that, though they had laid the King aſide, they would govern by the Laws, and not interrupt the Courſe of Juſtice in the ordinary Courts.——The Conſtitution of the High Court of Juſtice therefore was a Breach of that publick Faith of the Parliament, exhibited and pledged in their Declarations and Votes to the Freemen of England.

He did inſiſt therefore, and affirm for Law, and claim as his Right, 1. That the Act being defective by which this Court was conſtituted, they had no Power over him, or to preſs him to a further Anſwer. 2. That by Virtue of Magna Charta, the Petition of Right, the ſaid Remonſtrances and Declarations of Parliament, he ought not to be proceeded againſt by this Court, but in an ordinary Court of Juſtice, and be tried by his Peers.

He alſo put in a ſecond and a third Anſwer, importing, That though the Court was legally conſtituted, yet they were no more than Commiſſioners of Oyer and Terminer, and ought to try him by a Jury; and at his Hearing repeated and enforced all that he had inſiſted on in his ſeveral Anſwers. 1650. 2 Car. 2.

Inſiſts that by Magna Charta he ought to be tried by his Peers.

In his Arguments at the Bar, he obſerves, that Magna Charta was but a Confirmation, or Reſtitution of the Common Law; that it had been thirty Times confirmed; that Hubert de Burgh, in the Reign of Henry III. was condemned for endeavouring a Reverſal of it; and Hugh Spencer, in the Reign of Edward II. for adviſing the making a Breach in it; and in the Reign of Edward III. it was enacted, That if any Statute ſhould be made contrary to it, it ſhould be void.

And by this Great Charter it was granted, That no Freeman ſhould be taken, impriſoned, or condemned, but by lawful Judgment of his Peers.

That the Ordinance for eſtabliſhing the High Court of Juſtice, being diametrically oppoſite to the Great Charter, was of no Force; but as the Makers of this Law were armed with Power, he confeſſed he was not in a Condition to diſpute it with them, and therefore proceeds to his ſecond Argument:

Wherein he ſhews, that their Commiſſion reſembled that in the Reign of King Charles I. which iſſued for the Trial of the Subject by a Court-Martial, againſt which the Petition of Right was particularly levelled; and it was granted there ſhould never be any ſuch for the future. 2. He obſerved that, though they were called Commiſſioners by the Act, they had no Commiſſion but the Act itſelf; whereas, in regard they were not a Court of Record, they ought to have had Commiſſions, returnable at a certain Day in ſome Court of Record, where their Proceedings might be extant and viſible; and if the Act gave them a Power to condemn and execute him, yet, he obſerved, they had none to acquit and releaſe him; ſo that if they did not kill him by the Sword of Juſtice, he muſt be left in worſe Hands, to be buried alive in Reſtraint and Want, which was againſt the Law of Nature and Nations, and particularly againſt the Laws of this Land.

But if they ſhould be granted to be a Court, They muſt acknowledge they were a Court ex parte, ſet up to ſerve a particular Purpoſe, to deprive the Subjects of their Lives and Liberties, by Ways unknown to our Laws; that as they had a Power over the Lives and Lands of the Subject, it was abſolutely neceſſary they ſhould be a Court of Record, that the State might know what was become of the Matter in Iſſue, and of the Perſon put upon his Trial; and that the Subject, if he was acquitted, might at all Times reſort to the Record, if he ſhould be queſtioned again for the ſame Fact in any other Court.

Another Exception he made to the Act was, that it was made for the Puniſhment of Perſons that had committed certain Facts before the Act was made, and who could not have been puniſhed by any Law in being at the Time of the Fact committed; and that it was not correcting the Fault, but the Deſtruction of the Perſon, which was manifeſtly deſigned by ſuch Clauſes of Retroſpection, as it appeared in the Lord Strafford's Caſe; and he begged leave to ſay, that the Magna Charta and the Statutes out of Date.

1650. 2 Car. 2.

the Act might rather be termed a Snare than a Law, and looked more like a Warrant for an Arbitrary Execution, than an Authority to support a Judicial and Legal Proceeding or Trial.

Another Exception he made, was, that the Oath taken by the Commiſſioners, was not an equal Oath to adminiſter Juſtice impartially, between the State and the Subject, or taken as it ought to be in open Court; that inſtead of being tried by ſworn Jurors, and adjudged by ſworn Juſtices; he and all who fell into his unhappy Circumſtances, were to be tried by their ſworn Enemies, from whom little Juſtice was to be expected.

He inſiſted farther, that if their Authority was admitted to be Legal, yet he ought to be tried by a Jury; for the Act which eſtabliſhed the High Court of Jnſtice, did not prohibit their trying him by a Jury, as Magna Charta, and the Statutes made in Confirmation of it, required; and if they were at Liberty to try him by a Jury; then he ought to have a Trial by a Jury, ſince Magna Charta and the reſt of the Statutes, which required that every Man ſhould be tried by his Peers, were ſtill in Force: If the Act for erecting their Court of Juſtice intended to enervate the force of thoſe Laws, it would have repealed them, or at leaſt have impowered them to proceed in this unuſual Way (non obſtante) notwithſtanding the ſaid Statutes; or at leaſt have declared they were to act in that manner, pro hac vice; and that it ſhould not be made a Precedent, (as they had enacted in the Lord Strafford's Caſe.)

That it was his Right to be tryed by a Jury, and if they proceeded otherwiſe, if Law was not out of Faſhion, they would but weave Penelope's Webb, and one Day's Judgment be unravelled by the next Day's Writ of Error, or a Reverſal in Parliament; but After-games for Life were dangerous, and he thought himſelf obliged in Duty to his Country, as well as for his own Preſervation, not to ſubmit to this manner of Trial, leſt in him a Precedent ſhould be made for the Deſtruction of his fellow Subjects.

That the Act or Ordinance for conſtituting this Court, authorized them to proceed to Trial, Condemnation, Execution, &c. but they were not reſtrained as to the Manner of their Proceedings to Trial, excluſively of a Trial per pares; but the Manner of Trial, as well as the Judgment and Execution, was left to them, or the Major Part of them, and if they thought fit, they might proceed by Preſentment and Jury.

But if when they lawfully might by their own Law (he urged it ad hominem) try him by a Jury, and would not, then they muſt pardon him, if he averred that they took from him, and in him from all the Commonalty in England, three Grand Priviledges; and firſt, the Benefit of his Challenges, for he might challenge thirty-five Jurors peremptorily, and challenge for Cauſe without number; and if this Benefit were allowed him here, he could challenge every one of the Bench for Cauſe, without inſiſting on his peremptory Challenges.

Magna Charta and the Statutes out of Date.

Here Commiſſioner Keble told him, that the Statutes and Caſes he cited were now out of Date.

Then the Colonel went on, and ſaid, a ſecond Benefit they deprived him of, was, a Trial per pares (by his Peers), and of ſeeing and croſs-examining the Witneſſes, produced againſt him, which ought to be by Law viva voce. Thirdly and Laſtly, they took from him the Right and Priviledge of a fair Verdict: A Verdict was the Senſe and Opinion of all the Jurors, and one knowing and Conſcientious Man, might preſerve an innocent Man, whom eleven ignorant or careleſs Men would deſtroy; whereas the Sentence of this Court was determined by a Majority of Voices, ſome of them influenced probably by the Opinions of others, which was the great Evil complained of in the Court of Star-chamber, in the preceding Reign; and certainly was a very great Evil, eſpecially in Caſes of Life.

1650. 2 Car. 2.

That a Verdict by a Jury, alſo, was to be given immediately before they had any Refreſhment, or had an Opportunity of converſing with any one that might influence or biaſs them: But this Court, that heard the Evidence to-Day, might at any time (before the 29*th* of September) give their Sentence; and in the mean Time how much their own Affairs might put the Evidence for him out of their Heads, and how much the State's Power might put his Safety out of their Hearts, he had juſt Cauſe to ſuſpect; but, he was reſolved not to be in love with that Life, which the Common Law could not protect; he had rather die the Law's Martyr, than live the State's Slave.

A ſhort reply to his defence.

To which the Attorney General Prideaux, replied, that the Court was not at leiſure to take notice of his Law Caſes; but obſerved, that by his Confeſſion he had an Affection to act againſt the State, though nothing was acted; which was Treaſon ſufficient to convict him, and for that Affection he deſerved Death.

The Court over-rule all his objections, and condemn him.

Whereupon the Court pronounced Sentence, that he ſhould be hanged, drawn, and quartered as a Traitor; but on his Petition to the Parliament, an Ordinance was made to change the Sentence, and that he ſhould be beheaded.

His Speech and Behaviour at his Execution.

The Colonel being brought to the Scaffold erected on Tower-Hill, on the 22*d* of Auguſt, ſaid when he ſaw the Block, I hope there is no more but this Block between me and Heaven: Having been ſome time upon the Scaffold, he addreſſed himſelf to the People, and ſaid: "Your "Buſineſs here this Day, is to ſee a ſad Spec- "tacle, a Man, brought in a Moment to be "cut off in the Prime of his Years; taken from "farther Opportunity of doing ſervice to him- "ſelf, his Friends, his Country, or his God: "This ſeldom happens but for very great Cauſe; "and though truly, if my general Courſe of "Life were enquired into, I might modeſtly "ſay, there would be found ſuch a Degree of "moral Honeſty, as ſome might be forward "to expoſtulate why this great Judgment is be- "fallen me? " under his Rod I have laid down my Life, " I may be comforted by his Staff, and re- " ceived into Glory.

" I am very confident, by what I have heard " ſince my Sentence, there are more Excepti- " ons made againſt the Proceedings than ever I " made: My Triers had a Law, and the Vali- " dity of that Law is not now to be diſputed " by me. My Accuſers, or rather Betrayers, I " pity, and am ſorry for them; they have com- " mitted Judas's Crime; I wiſh and pray for " them with St. Peter's Tears; but wiſh they " may be taken up, before they have drunk " more Blood of Chriſtian Men.

" There have been ſeveral Addreſſes made " for Mercy, and I ſhall impute the Obſtruc- " tions to nothing more than my own Sins; " and ſeeing God ſees it fit (I having not glo- " rified him in my Life) I ſhall do it in my " Death, I am content. In the Face of God I " profeſs, I have no particular Malice to any " one of the State or Parliament: For the Cauſe " in which I had a great while ſtrove, I muſt " ſay my Engagements and Purſuance of it, " hath laid no Scruple on my Conſcience: It " was upon Principles of Law, of which I am " a Profeſſor, and upon Principles of Religion, " my Judgment rectified, and my Conſcience " ſatisfied, that I have purſued theſe ways; for " which I bleſs God I have no Blackneſs on " my Conſcience, nor have I put this into the " Bead-roll of my Sins.

" I preſume not to decide Controverſies; I " deſire God to glorify himſelf in proſpering " that Side that hath Right in it, and that you " may enjoy Peace and Plenty here, when I " ſhall enjoy my God.

" In my Converſation in the World, I do " not know where I have an Enemy with Cauſe, " or that there is a Perſon who has injured me, " that I do not as freely forgive as if I had " named them; yea, I forgive all the World, " as I deſire my heavenly Father, for Chriſt's " ſake, to forgive me.

" The Buſineſs of Death is a ſad Sentence in " itſelf, if Men conſult with Fleſh and Blood: " But, truly, without boaſting I ſay it, or if I " do boaſt, it is in the Lord; I have not to " this Minute had one Conſultation with Fleſh, " about the Blow of the Axe, or one Thought " of it, more than as my Paſs-port to Glory.

" I take it as an Honour, and I owe a Thank- " fulneſs to thoſe under whoſe Power I am, that " they have ſent me hither to a Place, how- " ever of Puniſhment, yet of ſome Honour, " to die a Death ſomewhat worthy of my " Blood.

" I deſire of God, that thoſe Gentlemen in " that ſad Bead-roll, to be tried by the High " Court of Juſtice, that they may find that real- " ly there, which is nominal in the Act, An " High Court of Juſtice, or a Court of High " Juſtice; High in its Righteouſneſs, not in its " Severity; no more clouded with the Teſtimo- " ny of Folks that ſell Blood for Gain: Father " forgive them, and I forgive them, as I deſire " thee to forgive me.

" I deſire you now to pray for me, and not " give over Praying until my laſt Moment; " that as I have a very great Load of Sins, ſo " I may have the Wings of your Prayers aſ- " ſiſting thoſe Angels that ſhall convey my " Soul to Heaven: And I doubt not but I ſhall " there ſee my bleſſed Saviour, and my gallant " Maſter the King of England, and another " Maſter I much honour, my Lord Capel; and " that I ſhall with them, and all Saints, rejoice " for ever more."

1650. 2 Car. 2.

Then having prayed a Quarter of an Hour, he turned himſelf again to the People and ſaid,

" One thing more I deſire to be clear in: " There lies a common Imputation on the Ca- " valiers, that they are Papiſts, and under that " Name we are made odious to thoſe of a con- " trary Opinion: I am not a Papiſt, but re- " nounce the Pope with all his Dependencies. " When the Diſtractions in Religion firſt ſprung " up, I might have been thought apt to turn " off from this Church to the Romiſh; but was " abſolutely unſatisfied in their Doctrine in " point of Faith, and very much as to their " Diſcipline. The Religion I profeſs, is that " which paſſeth under the Name of Proteſtant, " though that be rather a Name of Deſtinction " than properly eſſential to Religion: But that " Religion founded in the Reformation, purg- " ed from all the Errors of Rome, in the Reign " of Edward VI. practiſed in the Reign of " Queen Elizabeth, King James, and King " Charles, that bleſſed Prince deceaſed; that " Religion, before it was defaced, I am of, " which I take to be Chriſt's Catholick, though " not the Roman Catholick Religion."——

Then turning to the Executioner, he ſaid, " I " have no Reaſon to quarrel with thee; thou art " not the Hand that throws the Stone: I am " not of ſuch Eſtate to be liberal, but here is " three Pounds for thee, which is all I have: And having undreſſed himſelf for the Block, and prayed again, he ſaid, " there is none that " looks on me, though many Faces, and per- " haps different from me in Opinion and Prac- " tice, but hath ſomething of Pity in it; and " may that Mercy that is in your Hearts fall " into your own Boſoms when you have need " of it; and may you never find ſuch a Block " of Sin, to ſtand in the Way of your Mercy, " as I have met with."

Then having ſaluted and taken leave of his Friends, he ordered the Executioner, when he ſaid, Lord Jeſus receive me, to do his Office; after which he ſubmitted to the Block, and his Head was ſevered from his Body at one Blow.

Remarks on Col. Andrewe's Trial.

In theſe Proceedings againſt Colonel Andrewe, we find the Uſurpers guilty of all thoſe arbitrary Practices they complained of in the preceding Reign, and made a Colour for their Rebellion, as the Colonel ſhews at large in his Defence; nay, that they were guilty of much greater Oppreſſions, governed much more arbitrarily, and with leſs Regard to the Laws and Conſtitution of the Kingdom, than any King had ever done: Magna Charta and the Laws made for the Confirmation of it, and of the Subject's Liberties, and the Breach whereof were ſo loudly complained of by thoſe pretended Patriots, before the War, were now laughed at, and become the Jeſt and Scorn of the Uſurpers: So little were the People bettered by depoſing and murdering their Lawful Sovereigns!

But

1650. 1 Car. 2.

But what is ſtill more to be lamented is, that ſuch were the Diſtreſſes of the oppreſſed Cavaliers, that ſome of them, unable to ſuſtain the Weight of their Misfortunes, became Spies for the Rebels, drew in and betrayed their beſt Friends, in order to ſave themſelves or their Eſtates, from the Jaws of thoſe devouring Tyrants and Oppreſſors, that now ruled the Kingdom with a Rod of Iron: All Converſation was become unſafe; no Man knew whom to truſt, even under Oaths of Secrecy; and very often were thoſe ſuſpected of Treachery that leaſt deſerved it; as we find here, ſome of thoſe very Men were put to Death for the ſame Conſpiracy, that the Colonel ſuſpected had drawn him into it with a Deſign to betray him.

Love's Trial.

The Trial of CHRISTOPHER LOVE Clerk, before a pretended High Court of Juſtice, in Weſtminſter-Hall, for High-Treaſon the 20th of June, 1651. 3 Car. II.

1651. 3 Car. 2.

The Charge, or Impeachment.

THE Charge which Prideaux, the Attorney General, exhibited on the Behalf of the Keepers of the Liberties of England, ſet forth, that the ſaid Chriſtopher Love, and his Accomplices, had traiterouſly conſpired and endeavoured to raiſe Forces againſt the Government, ſince it had been ſettled in a Commonwealth and free State, without a King and Houſe of Lords; and, in order to ſubvert the ſame, had, ſince the Death of Charles Stuart, the late King, (who, for his notorious Treaſons, Tyrannies, and Murders, was juſtly condemned and executed,) traiterouſly endeavoured to promote and advance Charles Stuart, his eldeſt Son, to the Throne; that he had alſo invited the Scots to invade this Commonwealth, and abetted, aided, and aſſiſted them with Money and Arms; as he had alſo Titus, Maſſey, and other Traitors, in Confederacy with the Scots, againſt the Peace of the Commonwealth, Free-Eſtate, Parliament, and People of England, and in Contempt of their Laws, &c. for which the ſaid Attorney, on Behalf of the Keepers of the Liberties of England, did impeach the ſaid Chriſtopher Love as a Traitor and publick Enemy, praying he might be brought to Trial, Judgment, &c.

The Priſoner being arraigned, inſiſted ſtrenuouſly, that he might have Counſel, to adviſe with him concerning the Legality of the Charge, before he pleaded; but this being refuſed, he pleaded Not Guilty: After which the Evidence was produced againſt him.

The Evidence.

The Witneſſes abundantly proved, and Love himſelf afterwards confeſſed, that he had been engaged in a Treaty with the King, and with the Scots, to reſtore his Majeſty, upon Condition he would eſtabliſh Preſbytery, ſacrifice all his Cavalier Friends, and extirpate Epiſcopacy; and that Love, and his Accomplices, had actually raiſed Money to enable Colonel Titus to negotiate a Treaty in the Iſle of Jerſey and at Breda with the King; and for the Relief of Colonel Maſſey and the Scots, who were taken Priſoners by Cromwell, at the Battle of Dunbar, in Scotland; and that they had often prayed and faſted for the Succeſs of the Engliſh and Scots Preſbyterians againſt the preſent Powers. Nay, it appeared that they had applied to the Queen Dowager, to perſuade her Son, King Charles II. to abandon the Church of England and the Cavaliers, and eſtabliſh Presbytery; and upon theſe Terms, they promiſed to endeavour the Ruin of the preſent Powers, and to become good Royaliſts.

Love's Defence.

Mr. Love, in his Defence, obſerved, that there were many Things laid to his Charge which were ſaid to be done before the Commencement of the Act, on which he was proſecuted: That he was charged with ſome Things which he knew not, and with ſome that he did not, as the raiſing Inſurrections and Rebellions; and declared, he never held Correſpondence with the late King's Son, the Queen, or their Miniſters, or with any of the Scotiſh Nation, or ever deſired or directed any Man to do ſo; but confeſſed, however, the reading over a Commiſſion, and ſeveral Letters and Papers at his Houſe, in order to a Treaty with King Charles II.

He objected alſo, that there had been but one Witneſs to any one Fact; and that the Witneſſes were incompetent, having confeſſed themſelves guilty of Treaſon: He acknowledged, he had been preſent at ſuch Conſultations as were mentioned, but ſaid, he was always againſt giving a Commiſſion to any Perſons to treat with the King; however, if it was true, that he was concerned in ſending Colonel Titus to King Charles, this was laid to be done in the the Year 1649. which was before the Act was made that made it Treaſon to treat with Charles Stuart; and though it was enacted, that it ſhould be Treaſon to ſend Money, Horſes, or Arms into Scotland, the moving others to do this, he held, was not Treaſon; and if it was proved, that Money was brought to his Houſe for theſe Purpoſes, it did not follow, that he was concerned in conveying it, either to the Agents employed to treat with Charles Stuart, or to the Scots.

He ſaid, he was unwilling to confeſs any thing, before he ſaw the Witneſſes Face to Face; for, ſhould his Confeſſion have amounted to Treaſon by their Law, they might have hanged him, and ſo he ſhould have been guilty of his own Death; but now he did confeſs, there had been ſeveral Meetings at his Houſe, and that he was preſent at the reading of the Commiſſion above-mentioned, and of ſeveral Letters relating to the Scots; but he did not give his Conſent to the Commiſſion, or know the Danger of it; and he was adviſed, that his being preſent at theſe Conſultations, and concealing of them, was but Miſpriſion of Treaſon, for which he ſubmitted himſelf to their Mercy.

He ſhews what a violent Enemy he had been againſt the Royaliſts.

Then he ſolemnly proteſted, he was no Malignant, but on the contrary, had engaged many in the Parliament's Quarrel againſt the King; and though he gave but little to the War, yet he gave his All, (Cloaths and Books excepted.) When he was Maſter of Arts at Oxford, he ſaid, he was the firſt that refuſed ſigning the Canons concerning the Common-Prayer, for which he was expelled; that in 1640 and 1641, he was impriſoned at Newcaſtle for ſpeaking againſt the Errors of the Liturgy; and was the firſt Miniſter, after the Wars began, that was apprehended for preaching againſt the King: That he was afterwards complained of by the King's Commiſſioners at Uxbridge, for a Sermon he preached there againſt the Royaliſts; and now this great Trouble was fallen upon him: It was not Death he was afraid of, but was concerned that he ſhould receive it from thoſe Hands for whom he had ſuffered ſo much, with whom he had been engaged in the ſame Quarrel, and joined in the ſame Covenant: This exceedingly touched him.

He acknowledged, he was deſirous that the King and the Scots ſhould agree, becauſe he believed it much for the Intereſt of their Religion, that he ſhould not join with the Cavaliers and Iriſh Rebels; that ſince there was a Clauſe in the Covenant, which required them to ſeek the Union and Good of both Nations, and ſince the Scots had declared Charles Stuart their King, he believed it agreeable to their Covenant to deſire an Agreement betwixt them; he hoped they would not hearken to any politick Suggeſtions, as if it would not be for the Honour or Intereſt of the State to ſave him; but take care how they brought innocent Blood upon them, and ſo committed himſelf to God and their Conſciences.

The Reply to the Priſoner's Defence.

To this Defence Mr. Attorney replied, that Mr. Love had confeſſed much more than Miſpriſion of Treaſon; that the frequent Repetition and long Concealment of thoſe treaſonable Conferences was Treaſon; and he thought there was very little Ingenuity in the Priſoner's Confeſſion, which he did not make till the Facts were plainly proved upon him; that his Imprecations, calling God to witneſs he never wrote, or ſent a Letter, or lent Money, when it appeared he had moved and ſolicited others to write and to lend Money, were ſhameful Equivocations, eſpecially in a Miniſter of the Goſpel; but all the College of Jeſuits had not more Shifts and Evaſions than theſe Men had: One of his Brother-Preachers, he obſerved, refuſed to give Evidence againſt Love, becauſe he believed the Life of the Priſoner precious in God's Sight; which ſhewed, they thought the Life of a Traitor more precious than the Commonwealth; but he hoped they ſhould root out thoſe Opinions, or the Men that held them.

That Mr. Love had been guilty of the higheſt Ingratitude, conſpiring the Deſtruction of that State which had been ſo exceeding bountiful to him; he did not only enjoy his Liberty and the Protection of the Government, but, by his own Confeſſion, had one of the beſt Preferments in London conferred upon him: And what had he to do to interpoſe and diſquiet himſelf about the Adminiſtration of the Commonwealth? That he had dared to charge his Blood upon the Court, but it had been well if he had thought of Blood; before he had been inſtrumental in ſpilling ſo much Blood in Scotland; that there would be no living in Society, if ſuch Incendiaries were not brought to Juſtice; that he hoped the Court would conſider what Juſtice was due to the Commonwealth, and moved they would appoint another Day for the Counſel of the State to reply to the Priſoner's Defence. 1651. 3 Car. 2.

The Court reflect on the Priſoner.

Then the Preſident obſerved to Mr. Love, how zealous he had been for reſtoring the Preſbyterian Government and Diſcipline, and ſaid, he had diſplayed his Gift of Oratory in his Defence; but that the Orators amongſt the Heathens were the principal Incendaries, and there was ſcarce any Hereſies, Murders, Treaſons, or any other notorious Villanies perpetrated in Chriſtendom, but Prieſts, or thoſe that called themſelves Miniſters of Jeſus Chriſt, had a conſiderable Share in them; and though the Priſoner ſeemed to value himſelf upon his Office, he would have him know, that their Office of adminiſtering Juſtice was ſuperior to his, who only taught it, and that Judgment and Juſtice were the higheſt Religion in the World.

A further Reply to the Priſoner's Defence.

The Priſoner being brought before the Court again the 27th of June, the Counſel for the Commonwealth made a further Reply to the Priſoner's Defence: And as to his Objection, that the Witneſſes againſt him had confeſſed themſelves guilty of the ſame Crimes they accuſed him of, ſuch had always been deemed legal Witneſſes; They acknowledged, there ought to be two Witneſſes in Treaſon; but in a Caſe conſiſting of complicated Facts, and a Reiteration of many Actions, it was not neceſſary there ſhould be two Witneſſes to every Fact: But, if there was one Witneſs to one Fact, and another to another Fact, both tending to the Accompliſhment of the ſame Species of Treaſon, theſe were two Witneſſes, as the Law required: So when one Witneſs teſtified, he was preſent at Mr. Love's at the reading of a treaſonable Letter, a Second atteſted the writing of it, and a Third the ſending of it, though they ſpoke to ſeveral Parts of the Buſineſs, yet all concurring to the ſame Treaſon, this was legal Proof,

That though Mr. Love had objected, that the Evidence of Treaſon ought to be as clear as the Sun, they thought it difficult to meet with ſuch Proof, where a Plot was hatched in Darkneſs, where every Thing had been tranſacted under a Diſguiſe: Their Meetings and Conſultations went under the Notion of Prayer and Faſting, and their Contributions to foment a Rebellion paſſed under the Name of Charitable Uſes; nor could any Place be more obſcure and unſuſpected than Mr. Love's Houſe, who was a Miniſter of the Goſpel, and had been ſo very active in the Parliament's Service, that he had urged it as Meritorious.

As to his Objection, that he was charged with Crimes committed before this Court was erected, it was anſwered, That their Commiſſion gave them Cognizance of Crimes committed before and ſince; and it was never made an Objection at the Aſſizes, that the Offences were committed before the Judges received their Commiſſions; nor did he ſtand charged with any Crime before there was a Law made for the Puniſhment of it: For even on the 30th of January, 1648. an Ordinance paſſed, That whoever ſhould proclaim, declare, publiſh, or any way promote Charles Stuart, 1651. 3 Car. 2. Stuart, or any other Perſon to be King, or chief Magiſtrate, without conſent of Parliament, ſhould be adjudged a Traytor: Againſt which Mr. Love had highly offended, nor was there any Time limited for Proſecution by that Act: That another Law was made indeed, in July 1649. declaring what Offences ſhould be Treaſon; by a Third, that Court was conſtituted, and it was declared what Offences they were to take Cognizance off; and by a Fourth, all Correſpondence with the Scots was made Treaſon; againſt every one of which, the Evidence had ſhewn to a Demonſtration the Priſoner had offended: That Mr. Love was not impeached for a ſimple Omiſſion; he had acknowledged his debating theſe Matters; and though he pretended to abominate ſome of the Meaſures taken by his Accomplices, ſtill he continued amongſt them, and had ſeveral Meetings and Conſultations with them at his own Houſe, and therefore was guilty of the whole: There were no acceſſaries in Treaſon.

If the Priſoner had not been guilty of Actual Rebellion, he was proved to be guilty of ſuch Facts as tended to Rebellion; and though the Thing was not accompliſhed, it was nevertheleſs Treaſon: If they were to wait till a Rebellion was actually raiſed, it might probably be too late to call the Conſpirators to an Account.

As to his taking it ill of the State, that he ſhould ſuffer by them, for whom he had done and ſuffered ſo much, he thought the State had moſt reaſon to take up the Complaint: Had a Cavalier, a profeſſed Enemy, conſpired againſt them, they might have borne it; but that Mr. Love, who had preached and prayed for them, and gone along with them; that he, who lived like a petty King in this Commonwealth, ſhould conſpire againſt it, was a high Aggravation of his Crime; nor could it be thought hard, that he, who in ſuch Circumſtances proſecuted the State, ſhould be proſecuted by them.

It was obſerved alſo, that ſome Paſſages in the Priſoner's Sermon at Uxbridge, were very applicable to the preſent Occaſion, particularly where he ſays, I have ever thought that too much Mercy towards Malignants, hath made more Delinquents than ever Juſtice hath done: Mercy ſhould not weigh down Juſtice: In God they are both equal; Why ſhould it not be ſo in Man? The ſparing of Offenders hath made many worſe, few or none better: To them that have ſhewed no Mercy, let Judgment be ſhewed without Mercy: Much Guilt contracted, much innocent Blood ſpilt, which muſt be avenged either on us, or by us; and thoſe who lie under the Guilt of much innocent Blood, are not meet Perſons to be at Peace with, till all the Guilt of Blood be expiated, either by the Sword of the Law, or by the Law of the Sword: A Peace can never be ſafe or juſt till then. And the Counſel for the State concluded with demanding Judgment againſt the Priſoner, who thereupon offered a Paper of Exceptions, and deſired he might have Counſel aſſigned him to argue them; and accordingly Mr. Maynard, Mr. Hale, Mr. Waller, and Mr. Archer, were aſſigned to be of the Priſoner's Counſel.

The Priſoner's Rancour againſt the Royaliſts retorted upon him.

The Priſoner takes exceptions to the Charge.

The Subſtance of the Exceptions were, that the Impeachment had not ſtrictly purſued the Acts of Parliament on which it was founded; that the Priſoner was charged with treaſonable Facts, ſaid to be done ſome Years before ſome of the Acts paſſed; that the Witneſſes had been promiſed Rewards, and threatened, to make them give Evidence againſt him. 1651. 3 Car. 2.

Mr. Archer and Mr. Waller, the Priſoner's Counſel, offering to argue the Exceptions, the Court would not ſuffer it, becauſe they had not taken the Engagement; and Mr. Hale only was ſuffered to ſpeak to them: But there appearing very little in the Exceptions, it is ſufficient to ſay they were over-ruled. Mr. Attorney therefore moving again for Judgment, the Priſoner was ſentenced to be beheaded.

They are over-ruled. He is ſentenced to be beheaded.

The whole Body of Preſbyterian Fathers addreſſed the Parliament to pardon Love, but could obtain no more than a Month's Reprieve, and he was executed on Tower-Hill the 22d. of Auguſt; when he declared he deſired the King's Reſtoration on no other Terms than the Eſtabliſhment of Preſbytery, which was now in Danger of being ſuppreſſed by the Independants. A great many more of the Preſbyterian Preachers, in London, were diſcovered to be in a Confederacy with the Scots to bring in the King at this Time; but it was not thought expedient to drive the whole Body of them to Deſpair, by executing any more of them, now the Scots were in Arms; leſt by joining with that Nation, and the Cavaliers, their new erected Commonwealth ſhould be endangered; for at this very Inſtant Advice came to London, that the King was entered England with an Army of Scots, and that Cromwell was ſo far behind him, that he could afford the preſent Powers no Protection: However they were ſoon recovered from their Conſternation by the Battle the King loſt at Worceſter, the 3d of September following.

Remarks on Love's Trial.

The Uſurpers, finding that the People were no longer to be impoſed on by the ſpecious Pretences they made of defending their Religious and Civil Rights; that they were ſenſible, Ambition and Avarice, and a View to the advancing their private Fortunes, were the real Motives of all their Actions; that they were endeavouring to eſtabliſh an arbitrary, tyrannical Government, inſtead of vindicating the Subject's Liberties and Properties; did not think it proper to commit the Fortune of their State Priſoners to Juries according to the antient Laws; but when they determined to ſacrifice any Perſon, appointed a ſelect Number of their own Creatures, Sharers in the Plunder of the Nation, to judge, or rather murder, the pretended Criminal in a ſolemn Manner.

Love would never have been convicted by a Jury of Citizens, who were at this Time as much prejudiced againſt the Uſurpers, as ever they had been againſt the King; and yet it evident they were ſo biggotted to their Idol Preſbytery, that they would never have admitted the King to reign over them, on any other Terms than thoſe of eſtabliſhing it, and diſcarding the Cavaliers. The King and the Royaliſts therefore, were very little obliged to them; when, finding themſelves harraſſed, ſcorned, and derided by their preſent Maſters the Independants, they would have made the King their Tool, to have eſtabliſhed Presbytery, and ſuffered him to have enjoyed the Name of King, on Condition of lodging the Sovereign Power in 1651. 3 Car. 2. in their Hands; ſo that he would in reality have been no more than their Officer, to execute what they were pleaſed to decree. Theſe were the Favours Love and his Brethren intended to indulge the King and Nation in; for which neither the Church or the Crown ſeem to be much obliged to them, though they are very loud in crying up this Kind of Loyalty.

It is reported, that the Interceſſions for Love were ſo powerful, that Cromwell was prevailed on to ſpare him; but the Meſſenger who carried the Expreſs from Holland, where Cromwell then was, to London, falling into the Hands of ſome Cavaliers, they took away the Papers Cromwell had written in Love's behalf, and detained the Meſſenger till the Execution was over; obſerving that Love had been the moſt implacable of all the late King's Enemies, and that he intended nothing more by the Treaty with his Majeſty King Charles II. for which he was condemned, than to re-eſtabliſh his own Sect upon the Ruins of the Church of England, and the Royaliſts.

1651. 3 Car. 2. Gibbons's Trial.

The Trial of JOHN GIBBONS, before the High Court of Juſtice in Weſtminſter-Hall, for High-Treaſon, the 18th of July, 1651. 3 Car. II.

The Charge. THE Charge was the ſame with that exhibited againſt Love, viz. that the Priſoner had endeavoured to advance Charles Stuart to the Throne, and correſponded with the Scots, who were preparing to invade England.

The Priſoner inſiſts on a Trial by Jury. The Priſoner inſiſted on his being tried by a Jury of his Neighbours, according to the antient fundamental Laws; but the Court told him, the State had preſcribed another Way of Trial, more honourable and advantageous to him, which he muſt ſubmit to.

The Evidence. Major Adams depoſed, that the Priſoner was preſent at a Conſultation, for endeavouring an Agreement between the King and the Scots, and drawing up a Petition to the King; and that there were ſome Letters ſent to, and received from Scotland, which the Priſoner was privy to; that there were Letters alſo ſent to, and from the King and his Agents, which were read at Mr. Love's Houſe when the Priſoner was preſent; that he brought a rough Draught of the Inſtructions to one of their Meetings, which were to be ſent to Holland for treating with the King; that he was a conſtant Man at the Conſultations of the Malcontents in London, and particularly was preſent at Mr. Love's, when a Letter was read from Maſſey, wherein he deſired that Arms and Money might be ſent down to Scotland, and the Company agreed to ſend him three or four hundred Pounds.

Major Alford depoſed, that he (the Deponent) was at a Conſultation at the Swan at Dowgate-Hill, when Mr. Titus, one of the King's Agents, was preſent, and gave them an Account of the good Inclinations of the King, declaring he was willing to caſt off the Cavaliers, if he could be aſſured there was a Party in England that adhered to the Covenant; and that a Petition to his Majeſty was drawn up, and ſent over, by Titus; but he could not be poſitive the Priſoner was preſent.

That a Commiſſion was prepared at Mr. Love's Houſe for the Lord Willoughby and others, and Inſtructions concerning a Treaty between the King and the Scots, which the Priſoner and the Deponent carried down to Graveſend, and delivered to Mr. Maſon (a Domeſtick of the Lord Percy's) to be carried over to Holland; that the Deponent was ſent over to Calais by the Conſpirators, and brought Papers back from thence, which were read at Mr. Love's Houſe; and the Priſoner was preſent at the reading of ſome of them.

Mr. Harvey depoſed, that Gibbons informed him, two thouſand Pounds were ſent down to Scotland, and that Maſſey was to land with Forces in the Weſt; that many of the Lord General's Soldiers had deſerted, and that a Town was to be delivered up.

Major Huntington depoſed, that Gibbons firſt acquainted him with the Conſpiracy, told him he might hear News at Mr. Love's Houſe, and that the Priſoner and the Deponent were preſent at Mr. Love's, when a Paper ſent from Maſſey, Graves, and Titus, was read.

The Counſel for the State, having produced all their Evidence, and made their Obſervations upon it, the Priſoner deſired time to anſwer it, and was allowed till the 23*d*. Inſtant; when appearing before the Court again, he told them he was as ill provided for his Defence then, as he was before; for having employed one to take Notes of the Charge and the Evidence, the Court had ordered the Notes to be taken away, and deprived him of all Means of making his Defence: He deſired therefore, they would order his Notes to be delivered him, or it was impoſſible he ſhould offer any thing material; but this being refuſed, he only obſerved in general, that the Evidence was full of Contradictions; that the Witneſſes were not ſuch as the Law required, having confeſſed themſelves guilty of the Crimes they charged him with, and gave their Teſtimony againſt him, either through Fear of Death, or Hopes of Reward, and that there was but one Witneſs to any one Fact; concluding with Proteſtations of his Innocence, which the Court giving little Credit to, Judgment was pronounced, That the ſaid John Gibbons ſhould ſuffer Death as a Traitor, by having his Head ſevered from his Body; and he was executed accordingly.

The Court takes away the Priſoner's Notes.

He makes a general Defence.

Condemned and executed.

This Gentleman is another Inſtance of the Juſtice exerciſed by theſe Uſurpers: He was one of thoſe on whom they were determined to execute their Vengeance; and therefore, denying him

Remarks on the Trial of Gibbons.

The Reader, no doubt, obſerves alſo, from this and ſome former Proceedings, that the Uſurpers frequently changed the manner of Execution, as well as the manner of Trial; and that inſtead of hanging and quartering Perſons, condemned for what they called Treaſon againſt their Commonwealth, they were content ſometimes with beheading them.

The Indictment.

THE Indictment was found by the Grand Jury of the County of Middleſex, and charges, That Richard Faulconer, late of Weſtbury, in the County of Southampton, Gent. intending to bring the Right Honourable William Lord Craven, Baron of Hamſted-Marſhal in danger of his Life, and of the Sequeſtration of his Goods and Lands, did, on the 10th of February, 1650. at Whitehall, in the Pariſh of St. Martins in the Fields, in the County of Middleſex, before Samuel Moyer, Eſq; James Ruſſel, Eſq; and other Commiſſioners for compounding with Delinquents, and managing their Eſtates, corruptly, wilfully, falſly, and maliciouſly take his Corporal Oath, That ſeveral Officers, about thirty in Number, made a Petition to the Scots King Charles to entertain them to fight for him againſt the Commonwealth of England, by the Name of barbarous and inhuman Rebels, either in England or Scotland, for Recovery of his juſt Rights, and reinſtating him in his Throne; and that the ſaid Officers deputed him, the ſaid Richard Faulconer, and Colonel Drury, to preſent the ſaid Petition: That he, the ſaid Faulconer, drew up the ſaid Petition; and, with the ſaid Colonel Drury, applied to the Lord Craven to give it to the Queen of Bohemia, to preſent to the ſaid King of Scots; and that the Lord Craven directed them to deliver the ſaid Petition to the Queen of Bohemia themſelves, and he would ſpeak for them; and that the Queen of Bohemia did preſent the ſaid Petition; and that the Lord Craven afterwards told them, they ſhould receive an Anſwer from the Queen of Bohemia to their Petition, and that he (the ſaid Lord Craven) had ſpoken to the Queen of Bohemia in their Behalf: Whereas the whole Narrative, relating to the ſaid Petition, and the Delivery of it to the King of Scots, was falſe, and the ſaid Richard Faulconer perjured, &c. The Counſel for the Commonwealth having opened the Indictment, ſaid, they ſhould prove, that the Oath which Faulconer had taken was falſe, and that he had done it with a Deſign to get Money, and that the Conſequence of it might have been the Ruin of the Lord Craven, of his Eſtate, Fame, and Fortune: That there was indeed a Petition delivered, but not a Petition of the Tenor Faulconer had ſworn; and it was evident Faulconer knew the Contrary.

Then the Witneſſes were called, and Proof having been firſt made, that Faulconer had taken the Oath before the Commiſſioners for Sequeſtrations,

The Evidence againſt Faulconer.

Mr. Horſnel depoſed, that the Night before the King of Scots went from Breda, Colonel Drury, Captain Briſcoe, and divers others, carried a little ſhort Petition to the King, to put him in mind of a former Petition they had delivered, praying that ſome Courſe might be taken, that their Arrears, which they owed in Town, might be paid, or their Landlords, where they lodged, would be Sufferers, for they were not able themſelves to pay them; that he (the Deponent) ſet his Hand to the Petition, and was in the Room when Drury and Briſcoe came to deliver it; but there was not a Word in the Petition that related to any thing but the Relief of their preſent Neceſſities: And being aſked by the Court, if there was no Mention of barbarous and inhuman Rebels, he anſwered, There was nothing of that Nature in it.

Captain Briſcoe alſo depoſed, That there were divers Gentlemen in great Diſtreſs met at Colonel Drury's Chamber, at the Time of the Treaty between the Scots King and the Commiſſioners at Breda, and they agreed to prefer a Petition to the King, which was drawn at Colonel Drury's Chamber, expreſſing their Neceſſities, and that they might not be left to periſh, and deſiring that the People of the Town might be ſatisfied; but that, going to deliver it, they met Secretary Long, who told them, it was to no purpoſe, for there was no Money come in. That the Petitioners, having notice afterwards that the King was to depart from Breda, met together again, and drew a ſhort Petition, to put the King in mind of his Promiſe to Secretary Long, concerning ſatisfying the People of the Town, and the Relief of the Petitioners: Which Paper the ſaid Briſcoe delivered to the Scots King, who threw it on the Table, at which they ſtood amazed, being likely to be left in Diſtreſs; but the Lord Craven accidentally coming in, Briſco ſaid to him, Sir, We are a Company of poor diſtreſſed Gentlemen, likely to be left here in Miſery; (his Lordſhip ſaid, Well;) and the next Morning the King went away without giving any Relief to the Petitioners. And the Court demanding, if there were any ſuch Words in it as barbarous and inhuman Rebels, he anſwered, he read it, and there was no ſuch Thing in it; the whole Scope of it being to relieve their Neceſſities, there 1652. 4 Car. 2. was not ſo much as any Mention of the Parliament.

Colonel Drury depoſed to the ſame Effect, adding, That Major Faulconer drew the Petition himſelf in his Son's Paper-Book, and he had the Draught ready to produce; (exhibiting the Original to the Court at the ſame Time, under Faulconer's Hand;) in which Petition they ſhewed how they had ſerved the late King, and what Neceſſities they were in; that they gave this Petition to Secretary Long, who told them, it was in vain to deliver it to the King, for he had not a Piſtole left: That they followed Secretary Long, however, and ſolicited him for three Weeks together, but he ſtill put them off; whereupon they drew a ſhort Petition, the Day before the King went from Breda, to remind the King of the Promiſe he had made to Secretary Long, and deſiring that the Inhabitants of Breda might be relieved, or they would be undone: That Briſcoe, and the Deponent, delivered it to the King, who laid it on the Table; and Lord Craven coming in at that Inſtant, Captain Briſcoe, who had trailed a Pike under his Lordſhip, told him there were many Gentlemen ready to ſtarve, and deſired him to ſpeak a favourable Word to the Queen of Bohemia for them; but the next Morning the King went away, and nothing was done for the Petitioners.

Then the firſt Petition produced by Drury, of Faulconer's own Hand-writing, was read in Court, being couched in theſe Words:

The Petition, delivered to King CharlesII. read.

May it pleaſe your Majeſty,

" THE great Senſe we have always had " of your Majeſty's preſent Condition, " hath been the prime Cauſe of our long Si- " lence; but now our Neceſſities are grown ſo " great and inſupportable, that we are enforced " either to petition or periſh; moſt humbly de- " ſiring your Majeſty to take into your Prince- " ly Conſideration their Extremities, who have " been ever ready to proſtrate their Lives in your " Majeſty's Royal Father's Service; nor no leſs " willing and ready to proſecute the ſame in what " your Majeſty ſhall command; moſt humbly " petitioning your Royal Order, that ſome " Courſe may be taken for our preſent Subſi- " ſtance, that our future Endeavours may not " be buried in that unavoidable Calamity which " our Loyalty hath reduced us unto,

And we ſhall cordially pray for your Majeſty.

Colonel Drury further depoſed, that he dictated the Petition to Faulconer, who wrote it at his Chamber; and that it was afterwards written over fair, and delivered to Secretary Long, and that the ſecond Petition was only to put the King in mind of his Promiſe. And being aſked by the Court, whether the Words barbarous and inhuman Rebels were in the firſt Petition, he anſwered, That Faulconer moved to have the Words, barbarous and inhuman Rebels, inſerted, but was anſwered, That as they were Soldiers of Fortune, it was uncivil Language, and therefore they would not give way to it: He added, that Captain Briſco was one of them that was pitched upon to deliver the firſt Petition, on account of the many Wounds he had received, believing the King would commiſerate their Caſe the more; and the Deponent was appointed the other, becauſe he was known to the Queen of Bohemia: That the Lord Craven was not preſent at the Delivery of the firſt Petition, but was there when the laſt was delivered, to remind the King of his Promiſe. The Colonel further depoſed, that Faulconer, being diſcontented they got no Money, ſaid, as they were going to Town, This is a horrid Thing, that we ſhould be in this Caſe, to follow a Thing they call a King. God damn me, I will go into England, and do all the Miſchief I can. 1652. 4 Car. 2.

Then Witneſſes were produced, to ſhew that Faulconer was a Man that deſerved no Credit.

Wooldridge, an Attorney of Clement's-Inn, depoſed, That Faulconer came to his Chamber, about a Twelvemonth before, and told him, he had been in the Low-Countries, and ſeen ſome Lords ſit in Council with the King; that he had ſworn againſt the Lord Craven, which would bring great Advantage to the State: He had received fourſcore Pounds already for doing it, and expected a greater Reward. And as to Faulconer's Character, Wooldridge depoſed, that he was as wicked a Man as any in England, had ſpent his Eſtate and left his Country; that at Petersfield he drank a Health to the Devil in the middle of the Street, for which a Juſtice of the Peace bound him over to the Seſſions. Mr. Jackſon depoſed, That about five Years before, Faulconer was ranting and drinking Healths at Petersfield, and among others, drank a Health to the Devil, and ſaid, I have ſpent my Brother's Eſtate and my own, and will never want Money; for while there is any in the Nation, I will get it one way or other; I will do ſomething of Infamy to be talked of, that the Name of Faulconer may never die.

Mr. James Graham depoſed, That in the Year 1647. being in a Cellar with Faulconer, he took out a two and twenty Shilling Piece of Gold, and put into the Deponent's Hand, and ſaid, God damn him, Blood and Wounds, he would bugger his Soul to Hell; and theſe Words he uſed frequently, to Man, Woman, and Child, and when he was corrected for it, he would anſwer, Damn him, Blood and Wounds, he would do it: But the Court demanding of the Witneſs, if Faulconer ever did any thing upon him, he anſwered, No; he was able to deal with as good a Man as he.

Mr. Bradley depoſed, that he heard Faulconer ſay, Our Saviour Chriſt was a Baſtard, and a Carpenter's Son, and carried a Baſket of Tools after his Father.

Mr. Dyer depoſed, That Faulconer procured a Man to perſonate Captain Biſhop; that he confeſſed he had once an Intention to murder Captain Biſhop, becauſe he did not ſupply him with Money ſo faſt as he expected, though he had received ſeventy Pounds of the Captain.

Captain Ballard depoſed, That Faulconer counterfeited a Letter from Colonel Burgeſs to Captain Biſhop one of the Council of State, in order to get Money of Biſhop for the Intelligence, and would have had the Deponent carry the Letter, but he refuſed.

Powel, a Juſtice of Peace of Middleſex, depoſed, that he committed Faulconer for Felony, and that he had the Reputation of a Highwayman.

Mr. Goodman, Goaler of Ailesbury, depoſed, that on the 20*th* of March 1648. Faulconer was committed 1652. 4 Car. 2. committed to Ailesbury Goal, by Sir Thomas Saunders, and three other Juſtices of the Peace, upon Suſpicion of Felony, Robbery, and Murder.

The Defence made by the Priſoner's Counſel.

To this Evidence, the Counſel for the Priſoner anſwered, that the Oath Faulconer had taken before the Commiſſioners for Sequeſtrations, was not duly proved; what had been produced being only the Tranſcript of a Copy of the Oath, as entered in the Journals of Parliament: And if the Words barbarous and inhuman Rebels, were not in the Petition delivered to the King of Scots, there was what amounted to as much: The Petitioners ſay, They proſtrate themſelves before him, and promiſe to proſecute his Cauſe, as they had done his Father's, who looked upon them as Rebels; that Mr. Faulconer's Caſe was very hard, being employed at the Court at Breda, as an Emiſſary and Spy for the Commonwealth; and at his return, giving an account of his Obſervations at Breda, had let ſomething fall relating to the Lord Craven, without any Deſign; that the Subſtance of what Faulconer had ſworn, was acknowledged to be true, and that the very Words barbarous and inhuman Rebels were debated on drawing up the Petition, and he might forget whether they were inſerted or not, and therefore could not be charged with wilful and corrupt Perjury; it was but a Miſtake at moſt: Beſides, they ſhould ſhew that he did not ſwear to the very Words, but to that effect.

The Evidence for Faulconer.

Then Captain Biſhop, one of the Commiſſioners for ſequeſtered or forfeited Eſtates, was produced as a Witneſs in behalf of Faulconer. The Captain depoſed, that Faulconer had done great Service to the State; that it was owing to him, the Commonwealth ſat ſafe at that Hour, and that he himſelf (the Deponent) was now alive, and it was an ill Requital to proceed in this manner againſt ſuch a Man.

Then the Captain gave particular Inſtances of ſeveral Plots and Intrigues of the Royaliſts againſt the State, which he ſhewed, had been defeated by Faulconer's Means, (but the Editor is not ſo good as to give us the Particulars, though they might have given us great Light into the Tranſactions of thoſe Times.

Captain Biſhop added, that he had never known Faulconer drink, or misbehave himſelf, but always obſerved him to be a ſober Man; that Horſnel, one of the Witneſſes againſt Faulconer, was a diſaffected Perſon, and ordered to be tried before the High Court of Juſtice; that Colonel Drury was a Papiſt in Arms, and being brought before him to be examined, appeared a forward Witneſs, having the Lord Craven in his Mouth before he was queſtioned about him; and that in his Evidence here, he contradicted what he had ſworn before him; (but this appeared a miſtake;) and as to Faulconer's having Money given him, Captain Biſhop obſerved it was but reaſonable he ſhould be rewarded for the Services he had done the State; and, notwithſtanding what had been ſworn againſt him, he believed the Subſtance of Faulconer's Information was true; and this was all that was requiſite; for he ſwore but to that Effect, as he could teſtify, having drawn up the Information for him; and if thoſe words were not in, Faulconer directed them to be put in.

Then Mr. Winſlow, another of the Commiſſioners for ſequeſtered Eſtates, being upon the Bench, deſired leave to inform the Court, that the Commiſſioners meeting at Whitehall, to adminiſter the Oath to Faulconer, the Information was read to them, which had been prepared by Captain Biſhop, and having no Clerk with them, and there being occaſion to make ſome Alterations, the Captain took the trouble of writing it over again; after which it was read over to Faulconer, and atteſted by him, and all the Commiſſioners preſent ſubſcribed their Hands; adding, that the Oath taken by Faulconer, was, that the Information or Depoſition made by him contained the Truth, the whole Truth, and nothing but the Truth. 1652. 4 Car. 2.

Mr. Barners, another of the Commiſſioners, alſo declared that this was true.

Then Lieutenant-Colonel Joyce was produced as an Evidence for Faulconer, and ſhewed, that ſeveral Plots and Conſpiracies againſt the Commonwealth, had been defeated by the Intelligence Faulconer had given of them; (but theſe the Editor, it ſeems, did not think fit to acquaint us with, as not being material, he ſuggeſts; which ſhews either his Partiality, or a very great Defect in Judgment.)

Colonel Joyce added, that Faulconer had been an Enemy to himſelf indeed, in ſpending his Eſtate, but that he was always faithful to the Parliament; and he believed that Faulconer had cuffed and buffeted ſome of the Witneſſes againſt him for their Malignity, and therefore nothing could be expected to come from them to Faulconer's Reputation; and that Faulconer had been ſent over to Holland as a Spy, on account of his Fidelity to the Commonwealth.

Lieutenant-Colonel Bardſey depoſed, that he ſet his Hand to the Petition at Breda; that the Lord Craven was deſired to deliver it; but his Lordſhip ſaid he was no Courtier, he was a Servant of the States, and directed them to the Queen of Bohemia, who delivered it, and told the Petitioners, the King would do what he could for them; but he went away the next Morning. That Faulconer moved to have the Words barbarous and inhuman Rebels inſerted in the Petition he drew; but it was oppoſed, and they were omitted.

Michel an Innkeeper depoſed, that Faulconer had lain at his Houſe a Year and Half; that he was a Scholar bred up at the Univerſity, and he believed a very honeſt Man.

Captain Mowbray depoſed, that Captain Briſcoe, one of the Witneſſes againſt Faulconer, uſed to decoy the Engliſh Officers and Soldiers at Amſterdam on board the Dutch Ships, and ſell them for Slaves to the Plantations; that the Dutch immediately clapt ſuch Engliſh Men under Hatches, and gave Briſcoe ſix Dollars per Head for them when they were ſecured——That he had been acquainted with Faulconer five Years, and he behaved himſelf civilly, for ought he knew.

Mr. Corey (the Editor tells us) teſtified ſomething concerning Briſcoe's ſending Men to the Plantations, and that he would drink and ſwear ſometimes, as other Men did, that were accuſtomed to it.

The Obſervations of Faulconer's Counſel on the Evidence.

Upon this Evidence the Counſel for Faulconer obſerved, that the Teſtimony of Captain Biſhop, and Lieutenant-Colonel Joyce, who gave an account of the Services he had done the Commonwealth, was to be regarded much more than the partial Evidence that had been given againſt him

1652. 4 Car. 2. him: That it appeared the Design was not only to convict Faulconer of Perjury, but, by this Conviction and discrediting of him, to undermine what had been done by the Parliament upon his Testimony, and other concurrent Evidence, and to avoid the Sale the Parliament thought fit to make of the Lord Craven's Estate: That nothing had been objected against Faulconer's Credit while they had any other Stone to turn, though there had been great Endeavours made in Parliament to prevent the Sale of that Lord's Estate: When all other Means failed, then they fell to framing this Indictment of Perjury.——Faulconer might have appeared guilty of some Extravagances, but they saw what Part he was appointed to act: He was to dissemble, and appear what he was not, and perhaps, when he was amongst the God-damn-me's, and such sort of Men, he might seem like his Company; this might conduce to his Designs: The Part he was appointed to act rendered it necessary to dissemble, and to wind and turn himself into all Shapes; and, though not to drink a Health to the Devil, yet, sometimes, hold a Candle to the Devil.

That it was proved, the first Petition declared they would serve the King as they had served his Father, and they served his Father against the Parliament; therefore their Petition must be understood to be entertained to serve the King against the Parliament.

That it was a melancholy Case, when this Gentleman had performed such Services for the Commonwealth, and Settlements had been made in Parliament grounded on his Information, that they should be blasted and reversed by an artificial Indictment, preferred a great while after: If he should, for what he had done with a View of serving the State, be convicted of Perjury, it would be a Discouragement to all Men to undertake the like Employment for the future.——Concluding, that if there was a Mistake in what he had sworn, yet it appeared not to be maliciously or corruptly done, and therefore the Jury ought to find for Faulconer.

The Reply of the Counsel against Faulconer.

To this Defence, the Counsel for the Commonwealth replied, That the Evidence which had been given for Faulconer, tended chiefly to magnify his Services to the Commonwealth: They did not dispute his Services, they said, but his having done good Service, as a Spy beyond Sea, did not licence him to give a false Accusation of another kind, that had no Relation to what he was sent about: And as to what Mr. Bishop deposed, that he made Oath to that Effect, Mr. Bishop acted but the Part of a Secretary; the Information was mended and settled by the Commissioners, and sworn by Faulconer without the Words to that Effect in it; and it was not for a Clerk to come and say, the Words to that Effect ought to have been added; at that rate any Oath may be evaded.

As to the Objection that had been made to Briscoe's Credit, that he sold his Fellow-Soldiers to the Dutch Plantations, for twelve Stivers (Pence) a Day; this was but hearsay Evidence, what a Dutchman had been heard to say, and no Regard was to be had to it, nor would his being given to swear take off his Testimony.

That the Words barbarous and inhuman Rebels, it appeared, were proposed by Faulconer himself, and upon a Debate rejected, which Faulconer could not be ignorant of, or pretend not to know, when the Petition was drawn by himself. 1652. 4 Car. 2.

They had indeed brought some Witnesses to support Faulconer's Credit, but they were to consider what damnable Blasphemy had been proved against him, (in Relation to our Saviour's Nativity, &c.) nor could there be any Excuse for a Man's kneeling down, and drinking a Health to the Devil; his good Services would not justify his complying with God-damn-me's, he was not sent to do such things; besides, they had proved, he had personated another Man, and offered at such Villany as a Man would be ashamed to name; these could not be palliated by any Service whatever: That Mr. Bishop appeared a very forward Witness, and when he had given his Evidence, took upon him the Part of an Advocate, and therefore could not be looked upon as impartial; he said, indeed, that it was through Faulconer that the Commonwealth sat safe at that Hour, but it was God they sat safe by, and not by him; and when they were upon a Question of Truth, Truth and Righteousness were to be considered, before all the Service in the World.

That it was evident, the Lord Craven was not concerned in the first Petition, in which they made the King of Scots Offers of their Service; this was three Weeks before the last Petition was delivered, which desired nothing more, than that they might have Money to pay their Quarters; and yet Faulconer had sworn, that in this last Petition, delivered the Night before the King left Breda, the Petitioners offered to serve him against the Commonwealth, those barbarous and inhuman Rebels; which appeared to be false; and where a Man swears what he knows to be false, Corruption is always implied.

Nor was even this last Petition promoted by the Lord Craven, for it was delivered before the Lord Craven came in: Neither would the Words to that Effect have helped the Defendant, if they had been in his Affidavit, for there was nothing like the Words barbarous and inhuman Rebels, in either of the Petitions; this could not be an Oversight in Faulconer, who was so well acquainted with the Contents of them; and besides, it had been proved, that when he could not obtain what he desired beyond Sea, he declared he would go over to England, and do what Mischief he could. And, lastly, as to the Objection, that the Oath he had made had not been duly proved, they found it recorded in the Journals of Parliament; and it was not to be presumed the Parliament would enter it into their Books, and cause a Nobleman's Estate to be sold upon it, if no such Oath had been made.

After the Reply, the Judges delivered their respective Opinions, but the Editor has not thought fit to give us their Reasons, or to tell us whether the Court were divided, or unanimous: He says no more, than that Faulconer was convicted of Perjury, and that thereupon the following Order was made by the Court: (viz.) Faulconer convicted.

The Defendant was this Day brought into Court, under the Custody of the Marshal, upon an Indictment for Perjury, whereunto he had formerly pleaded Not Guilty; and the Jury thereupon being impanelled and sworn, found him guilty of the Perjury Faulconer is committed; but no Judgment given.

1652. 4 Car. 2.

jury in the Indictment mentioned; and thereupon the ſaid Faulconer is committed to the Cuſtody of the ſaid Marſhal, there to remain until, &c.

Remarks on Faulconer's Trial.

Here we ſee ſome of thoſe infamous Arts practiſed by the Rebels, to dive into their Prince's Councils, in order to betray him, and prevent his Reſtoration: They made Choice of the moſt abandoned Wretches, ſuch as would curſe and ſwear, blaſpheme, perjure themſelves, or commit any Villany to promote the good Old Cauſe: All was innocent, all was meritorious, that was done to ſupport their Uſurpation; the End, in their Opinion, ſanctified the Means, how deteſtable ſoever. Such a Complication of Wickedneſs never was charged and proved upon any one Man as upon Faulconer; and yet did theſe Uſurpers ſkreen him from Juſtice, in Conſideration of the Services he had done their Commonwealth.——And we find ſome of their Leading Men declaring at this Trial, That to Faulconer was owing the Safety and Eſtabliſhment of their State: The Counſel for the Commonwealth, indeed, denied it, and inſiſted, that their Eſtabliſhment was the Work of God. But as their Uſurpation was founded in Treachery and Rebellion, and evidently ſupported by ſuch Inſtruments as theſe, though God in his Wiſdom ſuffered the Uſurpers to tyrannize over the Subjects of this Kingdom for a Time, their Power and Influence ſeem to be derived immediately from the Prince of Darkneſs, rather than from that Being, that is of purer Eyes than to behold Iniquity with Pleaſure.

Even their grand Argument of Succeſs, to prove the Juſtice of their Cauſe, failed them ſoon after; and God was pleaſed to work a much greater Miracle for the Reſtoration of their Lawful Prince, in Peace, without the leaſt Bloodſhed or Oppoſition, than they could pretend he ever wrought in all the Victories they were permitted to obtain over their Sovereign and their Fellow-Subjects. The Regicides themſelves, when they were brought to Juſtice, acknowledged, that God had ſpit in their Faces, and diſclaimed their accurſed Cauſe, of which they had long impiouſly declared him the Grand Patron and Protector.

I can not diſmiſs this Trial without obſerving the extreme Diſtreſs, both the King and his faithful Subjects were reduced to, during this intolerable Uſurpation: Thoſe of them that remained at home, were plundered, impriſoned, decimated, and forced to compound for their Eſtates over and over again, till they had nothing left: Impious Villains were encouraged to draw them into Plots for the Reſtoration of their Sovereign, and then betray them; perjured Men were frequently ſuborned to ſwear them out of their Lives and Eſtates. In this Trial we have an Inſtance of the Lord Craven's loſing his Eſtate, on the Teſtimony of the infamous Faulconer, who ſwore he had promoted a Petition to his Majeſty King Charles II. in which he ſtiled the Uſurpers barbarous and inhuman Rebels; when Faulconer himſelf appeared to be the Man that propoſed that Expreſſion, and that it was unanimouſly rejected by the Cavaliers. If it be ſaid, that the State was ſo juſt to proſecute Faulconer for this notorious Perjury, I can not tell with what Views they might ſuffer this; but it appears that they had ſeveral Times before ſaved him from the Gallows; and even now, when he was evidently convicted of the Perjury, they would not permit him to be puniſhed for it: And it is very poſſible that ſome of the Chiefs of the Rebels found their Account in recovering the Lord Craven's Eſtate for him again, or Faulconer's Perjury had never been animadverted upon; no doubt his Lordſhip made very large Offers to ſome of their Grandees to preſerve ſome Part of his Eſtate from Sequeſtration.

1652. 4 Car. 2.

Nor were the Hardſhips of the Cavaliers abroad leſs than theirs at home: We find the King himſelf reduced to that Neceſſity, that he had not a Piſtole left, and all his Adherents ſtarving in the Low Countries and elſewhere, inſomuch that many of them ſold themſelves to the Dutch for Slaves, and were tranſported to their Plantations; as many Engliſh and Scots Gentlemen had been before to the Engliſh Plantations by the Uſurpers themſelves.

Lilburn's Trial.

The Trial of Lieutenant-Colonel JOHN LILBURN, for Felony, in returning to England, (after an Ordinance of the Uſurpers made for his Baniſhment,) at the Seſſions at the Old-Baily, London, the 13th, 14th, 15th, and 16th Days of July, 1653. 5 Car. II.

1653. 5 Car. 2.

His Account of the Occaſion of this Proſecution.

LIEUTENANT-Colonel Lilburn relates, that he had been Solicitor for his Uncle, George Lilburn, Eſq; and Mr. Joſiah Primate, for the Recovery of a Colliery in the County of Durham, valued at 5000 l. per Ann. taken from them by Force and Violence by Sir Arthur Haſlerig; that they, the Plaintiffs, preferred a Petition to the Parliament for Juſtice, but Sir Arthur, by his Intereſt, procured a Report in his Favour; and that thereupon the Parliament voted the Plaintiff's Petition to be falſe, malicious, and ſcandalous, that Sir Arthur had not been guilty of Oppreſſion or Tyranny, as the Petition charged; that the Petition ſhould be burnt by the Hangman, and that Primate the Petitioner, ſhould pay ſeven thouſand Pounds, or lie in Priſon till it was paid. And on the 15th of January, 1651-2, made ſeveral Reſolutions againſt him the ſaid Lieutenant-Colonel Lilburn, who had ſolicited the Cauſe for his Uncle and the ſaid Primate, viz. That he ſhould pay 3000 l. to the Uſe of the Commonwealth, 2000 l.

1653. 5 Car. 2. 2000 l. to Sir Arthur Haſlerig, and 2000 l. to the Commiſſioners for compounding with Delinquents (for ſlandering them before the Houſe, I preſume.)

A Reſolution of the Commons to fine and baniſh him.

They reſolved alſo That Colonel Lilburn ſhould be baniſhed out of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Territories thereto belonging, making it Felony for him to return thither; and that he ſhould depart within thirty Days.

That the Serjeant at Arms ſhould apprehend him, and bring him to the Bar of the Houſe, to receive Judgment on the Tueſday following; and he thereupon ſurrendered himſelf voluntarily to the Serjeant, and was brought into the Houſe on the Day prefixed, when the Speaker ordered him to kneel, but he refuſed; whereupon they ordered him to withdraw, which he did,

A Bill for his baniſhment brought in.

and afterwards a Bill was ordered to be brought in for his Baniſhment, and that ten Days of the Time ſhould be taken off, that had been allowed for his Departure, by the aforeſaid Reſolution: Mr. Lilburn ſays farther, that he ſent the Houſe Word by their Serjeant, that the Reaſon he re-

He refuſes to kneel before the Houſe.

fuſed to kneel, was not out of any Diſreſpect to the Houſe; but he apprehended; if he kneeled at their Bar to receive Sentence, he ſhould ſeem to acknowledge the Juſtice of it; whereas he had broken no Law, but followed a juſt Cauſe in an honeſt Way, without uſing any baſe or wicked Means to effect his Deſigns; that though the Report had been made to the Houſe in Favour of Sir Arthur, they had fully proved every Clauſe and Circumſtance in their Petition (except Sir Arthur Haſlerig's private Correſpondence with the Commiſſioners of Sequeſtrations); but if they had not, there was no Law to authorize the Parliament to paſs ſuch a Sentence upon him: He would therefore be cut in ten thouſand Pieces before he would kneel, and thereby betray his own, and the Nation's Liberties.

A Petition in his behalf.

In the mean Time a Petition was preſented by a Multitude of People, in the behalf of Colonel Lilburn, being directed To the ſupreme Authority, the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, and entitled The humble Petition of many well-affected People, inhabiting the City of London and Weſtminſter, Southwark, and Parts adjacent, in Behalf of the juſt Liberties of the free People, of England, highly concerned in the Sentence againſt Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn.

In this Petition they tell this Rump, or Refuſe of a Parliament, that if Colonel Lilburn's manifold Services for their Cauſe could be forgotten, and they looked upon him but as the meaneſt of well-affected Perſons, yet in their late Cenſure of him, they apprehended the native Rights of the Subject to be ſo invaded, that there never was greater Occaſion to apply for Redreſs.

For if he had in reality been an Offender, he muſt be ſo by ſome Law in being, made before the Fact, and ought to be proſecuted in the Courts of Law, and be convicted by a Jury, and ſuch Puniſhment inflicted as the Law preſcribed. The Law declared that no Freeman ſhould be adjudged of Life, Liberty, or Eſtate, but by Juries, a Freedom which Parliaments in all Ages contended for, as the Birthright and Inheritance of the Subject, as appeared in the Petition of Right, which this very Parliament once ſtiled A moſt excellent Law.

They truſted therefore, this Parliament would preſerve their Rights entire to them and their Poſterity, from the Encroachments of thoſe that would innovate upon them: They conceived alſo, that the Original of theſe unhappy Differences between Sir Arthur Haſlerig and Mr. Lilburn, were occaſioned by Sir Arthur's ſtopping ſome Money that was due to Mr. Lilburn, without legal Proceſs; and that, had the Matter been duly tried by a Jury at common Law, all the Inconveniencies ariſing on his Proceeding had been avoided; that the Way of determining Cauſes by the major Votes of a Committee, was not ſo ſatisfactory as the Verdict of a Jury, where a Man might have his Challenges to thoſe that were evidently partial, or otherwiſe unqualified to judge of the Fact.

They took notice alſo, of the Exorbitance of the ſeveral Fines laid upon him, amounting to ſeven thouſand Pounds, which was more than the Colonel could ever be ſuppoſed able to pay, and was therefore contrary to Magna Charta: Nor did their Sentence reſt here; but they had condemned him to Death, if ever he was found in England, and that without any Crime laid to his Charge, for ought appeared (the Report of the Committee not being ſuffered to be publiſhed); and all this without any legal Proceſs commenced againſt him, or being allowed a Trial by Jury, which in Caſes of Life had never been denied a Commoner in the worſt of Times.

They pray therefore, 1. That the Parliament will revoke their Sentence againſt Colonel Lilburn: 2. That they will permit the Parties to proſecute their Cauſe at Law.

Lilburn goes into Exile.

But the Parliament taking no notice of the Petition, the Colonel deſired the Speaker's Paſs to go beyond Sea in purſuance of their Sentence; and this being denied him, he ſet out for Dover, attended by a Multitude of his Friends, where producing the Common's Votes for his Baniſhment, the Cuſtom-houſe Officers ſuffered him to paſs, and he arrived ſoon after at Amſterdam, where he met with the printed Act for his Baniſhment.

The Subſtance of the Act for his Baniſhment.

This Act or Ordinance, is entitled An Act for the Execution of a Judgment given in Parliament againſt Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn, and recites, that, whereas upon the 15*th* of January, 1651. a Judgment was given in Parliament, againſt the ſaid Lilburn, for High Crimes and Miſdemeanors, relating to a falſe, malicious, and ſcandalous Petition preſented to the Parliament, by Joſiah Primate of London, Leatherſeller (and, as I preſume, drawn up by Lilburn); it was therefore enacted that the ſeveral Fines, impoſed by the ſaid Judgment on the ſaid Lilburn, ſhould be forthwith levied and paid, and that the ſaid Lilburn ſhould within twenty Days, to be accounted from the 15th of January 1651. depart out of England, Scotland, Ireland, and the Iſlands, Territories and Dominions thereof; and Made Felony for him to return.

if he ſhould afterwards be found, or ſhould be remaining in England, Scotland, or Ireland, or within any of the Iſlands, Territories, or Dominions thereof, he ſhould be adjudged a Felon, and be executed as a Felon, without Benefit of Clergy; and all Perſons, who ſhould harbour or conceal him, ſhould be adjudged acceſſary to the Felony after the Fact.

He comes to England again.

The Colonel returning to London, in June 1653. was apprehended and carried before John Fowk,

1653. 5. Car. 2.

His Arraignment.

Fowk, then Lord Mayor, who made his Mittimus, and ſent him to Newgate, and he was brought to his Trial at the Old-Baily on the 13th of July following. Mr. Lilburn being arraigned, and required to hold up his Hand, deſired the Court to inform him what that Ceremony meant; and whether he held up his Hand or not, does not appear; but he tells us that, after a great deal of Wrangling on that Point, he ſaid, My Lord, I muſt acknowledge my Name to be John Lilburn, Gent. Son of Richard Lilburn, of Thickley-Punchardon in the County of Durham, Eſq; and I am here ready to anſwer any Thing any Man hath to lay to my Charge. Then the Indictment was read; and it being demanded if he was Guilty or Not guilty, he made a Speech, applying himſelf to the Chief Baron Wylde, and deſiring he might ſpeak to the Inſufficiency and Illegality of the Indictment; for he apprehended it would be too late to aſſign Errors after he had pleaded: He alſo deſired he might have a Copy of the Indictment, and Counſel aſſigned him; abſolutely refuſing to plead, till he had an Order for them: And after having been brought ſeveral Times before the Court, and threatened ſeverely if he refuſed to plead, he did at length obtain a Copy of the Indictment, which ſet forth, that, in and by a Statute made in the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, holden the 30*th* of January, 1651. entitled An Act for the Execution of a Judgment given in Parliament, againſt Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn, it was enacted, that the ſaid John Lilburn ſhould within twenty Days (to be accounted from the 15th of January 1651.) depart out of England, Scotland, Ireland, and the Iſlands, Territories and Dominions thereof, and if he ſhould after that time be found, or ſhould be remaining within England, Scotland, Ireland, or any of the Iſlands, Territories, or Dominions thereof, he ſhould be adjudged a Felon, and executed as a Felon without Benefit of Clergy; and that the ſaid John Lilburn, the Statute aforeſaid not weighing, nor the Puniſhment therein contained, any whit fearing, after the Time limited, viz. on the 15th of June 1653. was found, and was felonioufly remaining in England, viz. at London, in the Pariſh of Giles without Cripplegate, in the Ward of Cripplegate London, againſt the Form of the ſaid Statute, the public Peace, &c.

The Indictment.

His Exceptions to the Indictment

Not ſigned by Counſel.

Mr. Lilburn put in his Exceptions to the Indictment on Saturday the 18th of July, ſigned by himſelf; but the Court refuſed them, becauſe they were not ſigned by his Counſel; to which Mr. Lilburn anſwered, they had aſſigned him Counſel but to one Point; whereas he had ſeveral Pleas and Exceptions to the Indictment, which his Counſel durſt not ſign, unleſs they were aſſigned his Counſel at large: That his Counſel alſo informed him, that all the Judges and Lawyers in England were not able to draw up a legal Indictment on the Act of Baniſhment of the 30th of January 1651. and the Votes or Judgment as it was called, of the 15*th* of January 1651. upon which it was grounded; for that the Judgment and the Execution of the Judgment ought to be like a Pair of Indentures; tally exactly in every Circumſtance: But in the pretended Judgment, and the Act for the Execution thereof, there were theſe three Eſſential differences. Firſt, The Judgment ſaid, Lieutenant Colonel John Lilburn ſhall be baniſhed, and depart out of England within thirty Days, and the Act for executing the Judgment ſaid he ſhall depart within twenty Days; ſo that there was ten Days Difference betwixt the Judgment itſelf, and the Act for the Execution of it. Secondly, The Judgment baniſhed him out of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Iſlands and Territories thereto belonging, but not out of their Dominions; ſo that Wales being denominated in Law a Dominion, he might ſecurely have lived in Wales all his Days; notwithſtanding that Judgment: But then comes the Act of the 30th of January 1651. which is called an Act for the Execution of the ſaid Judgment, and baniſhes the ſaid John Lilburne out of England, Scotland, Ireland, and the Iſlands, Territories and Dominions thereof; ſo that here was another eſſential Difference between the pretended Judgment, and the Act for the Execution thereof. Thirdly, The Judgment ſays, If he ſhall return into England at any Time after the Expiration of the ſaid thirty Days, he ſhall be adjudged a Felon, &c. But the Act ſays, If he ſhall return to England after his Baniſhment.

1653. 5 Car. 2.

Whereupon the Court gave him time till Six in the Evening, that his Counſel might ſign his Exceptions; but Lilburn obſerved that the Time was ſo ſhort, that it would be impoſſible to get their Hands, and that they had ſo long denied him his Right in this Particular, that moſt, if not all his Counſel were gone the Circuit, adding that he was moſt concerned in the Exceptions; his Life muſt pay for the Faults in them, if there were any; and therefore preſſed that they would accept them without his Counſel's Hands; but the Court told him this could not be admitted.

He reflects on the Tyranny of the Adminiſtration.

Lilburne replied, it was very well known, that the greateſt Men now in England were his Adverſaries, and it was no great Difficulty for them to cruſh any Man they ſet themſelves againſt: That his Counſel durſt not oppoſe ſuch potent Enemies, nor was it reaſonable they ſhould; they were Men of great Eſtates, and great Practice, and it would probably be their Ruin; he could not in Conſcience deſire it of them, and therefore again deſired they would accept his Exceptions under his own Hand: But they refuſed, and ordered him to get his Exceptions ſigned before Six that Evening.

Some of his Exceptions ſigned by Counſel.

His further Demands.

Mr. Lilburn being brought into Court again at Six in the Evening, ſaid his Exceptions were ſigned by Mr. Norbury and Mr. Maynard; and that they blamed him very much for his Folly, in not demanding Oyer, or hearing in open Court, Of the Act of Baniſhment, the Judgment upon which it was grounded, and of the Crimes that were charged as the Occaſion of it; that it was his Right in Law to have Oyer of theſe, and afterwards Copies of them, to enable him to perfect his Exceptions, for they informed him, That, if no legal Act could be produced, or if the Judgment was illegal, or if no Crimes in Law were charged, on which the Judgment could be founded, all was null and void; and what was not good Originally, could never be made ſo by Tract of Time; and what was not found and ſubſtantial 1653. 5 Car. 2. ſubſtantial in its Foundation, could never be made ſo by the Superſtructure. He confeſſed they had not Time to draw up a formal Claim of this Right; but, according to their Inſtructions, he had got a Paper drawn up and engroſſed, which was ſigned with his own Hand; but the Court refuſed to receive it, becauſe it was not ſigned by his Counſel.

Whereupon Lilburne ſaid, his Counſel adviſed him to dwell upon his Demand of Oyer, as his Right, being his chief Shield and Buckler to defend his Life; demanding, if they would rob him of his Birthright, the Benefit of the Law? which he repeated ſeveral Times, with an exalted Voice, when the Court interrupted him; telling them, If they denied him Juſtice, and would not permit him to ſpeak for his Life, he appealed to all the People that heard him that Day, declaring, that the Lord Mayor and the Court robbed him of his Birthright, and would not ſuffer him to ſpeak for his Life; and being Maſter of very good Lungs, he perfectly drowned the Voices of his Proſecutors, and abuſed the Recorder Steel, and the Attorney-General Prideaux very handſomely; and when the Court endeavoured to brow-beat and ſilence him, he cried out again, My Lord, will you murder me without Law, by robbing me of my Birthright, and denying me Oyer of the Act &c? My able honeſt Counſel have commanded me to dwell upon my Demand of Oyer as upon my Life; if this were granted me I am ſecure; for you can produce no legal Act of Parliament, or Judgment againſt me, nor have I ever committed any Crime to found them upon.

He appeals from the Court to the People.

At length the Court, weary with the Oppoſition he made, told him, if he put in the Exceptions he had under his Counſel's Hand, they aſſured him, in caſe his Counſel, at their next Meeting, would avow his Demand of Oyer, they would grant it: Whereupon Mr. Lilburn delivered in his Exceptions; in which the Objections he had made verbally to the Proceedings, were drawn up in Form, and ſigned by his Counſel, Norbury and Maynard.

Lilburn afterwards made a Speech to the Court, in which he repeated much of what he had ſaid before, and then withdrew. He obſerves, that the Court were in ſuch Conſternation when he appealed to the People, that they thought fit to ſend for more Forces to protect them, though Colonel Okey had a ſtrong Guard of Soldiers there from the Beginning of the Trial.

The Trial imperfect.

Neither Mr. Lilburn or his Friends give any further Account of his Trial, only it appears he was acquitted by the Jury; from whence, I preſume, his Exceptions were all over-ruled. The Jury were afterwards called before the Council of State, and examined concerning their Verdict; but it does not appear any of them were puniſhed for the Verdict they had given.

He was acquitted.

Some of Lilburn's bold Expreſſions in Court.

Among other Expreſſions of Lilburn's at the Trial, it is related by ſome, he told the Court, That the Act for his Baniſhment, was an unjuſt, an unrighteous, and a treacherous Act; that he doubted not to ſhatter it to Pieces; they could not make an Act of Parliament ſince the King's Head was cut off: That if there was any Judicatory in Parliament, it was in the Lords and not in the Commons; they had nothing to do to ſentence any but their own Members: That all Crimes ought to be adjudged by the Common Law; Acts of Attainder were unlawful: He told them, They made the Land groan with their Oppreſſions. To Prideaux he ſaid, It is the Admiration of my Soul, that a Man ſhould ſit in Judgment on me that thirſts after my Blood. 1653. 5 Car. 2.

The Army, he ſaid, had, many of them, been very good Inſtruments to deliver them from Tyranny, but he wiſhed they had not then a greater Tyrant (meaning Cromwell) than they had delivered them from: His Jury, he called, His honourable Jury, and affirmed, that it was They that were the Keepers of the Liberties of England; they were Judges of the Law as well as of the Fact.

Remarks on Lilburn's Trial.

All the World muſt allow Mr. Lilburn's Remarks on this Proſecution were very juſt; indeed he was furniſhed with them by ſome of the ableſt Counſel in England; and, if he was not the Author of them, yet his Courage in repeating and maintaining thoſe Maxims they had furniſhed him with, and in a Manner telling Cromwell to his Face, that his Power was uſurped, and his Adminiſtration tyrannical, was very heroical, and what few Men durſt have done, when he was arrived at that Height of Power.

And here we ſee how ſenſible the City of London, and the whole Body of the Nation, were, as well as John Lilburn, of the Oppreſſions they ſuffered, and how much they had contributed to the Subverſion of the Laws, and enſlaving themſelves and their Poſterity, by adhering to their hypocritical Leaders: We ſee they petitioned, threatened, and upbraided the Uſurpers with deſtroying that Conſtitution they pretended to preſerve, and deluding them with ſpecious Pretences of defending their invaded Liberties, till they had poſſeſſed themſelves of Sovereign Power, and eſtabliſhed their Tyranny, and then becoming much greater Oppreſſors than their Lawful Prince had ever been: They complain of thoſe very Abuſes, for the Redreſſing of which they had been ſpirited up into a Rebellion againſt their Natural Sovereign, and made acceſſary to his Murder. They obſerve that Men were condemned without a legal Trial, that they were exorbitantly fined, beyond the Value of their Eſtates; and an Ordinance of Parliament made for baniſhing a Man, who had offended againſt no Law in being. So ſenſible now were the People of the Hypocriſy of their Leaders, that it was not in the Power of the Uſurpers to pack a Jury to convict this Malcontent: But his Acquittal was of little Advantage to him; the Nation was then governed with a Rod of Iron, and ſince they could not get him condemned in the Courts of Law, they made uſe of pure Force, and detained this rough Member of the Church-Militant, who had done and ſuffered ſo much for the good Old Cauſe, in Priſon to his dying Day; and though he had quarrelled with, and oppoſed every Government he had lived under, it appears, he became at laſt a peaceable Quaker, and diſclaimed the Uſe of Carnal Weapons.

Lilburn dies a Quaker.

I ſhall only obſerve further, that That Rump of the Commons, that then went under the Name of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, aſſumed a greater Power, both in Civil and Criminal Caſes, than the Houſe of of Lords, or Commons, or both of them united, had ever exerciſed before the Conſtitution was ſubverted; fining and baniſhing Men at Pleaſure, without hearing them in their Defence; though indeed, they ſeem at this Time to have been no more than the Uſurper's Tools, to execute his Decrees, notwithſtanding the pretended Government was exerciſed in their Names.

Buried after their Way.

I ſhould have taken Notice before, that the Corpſe of John Lilburn, after he was dead, was brought by the Quakers to their Meeting-Houſe at the Bull and Mouth, in London, where it was put into a plain Coffin, without any Pall or other Covering, and from thence carried, in Contradiction to antient Cuſtom, with the Head foremoſt, to the New Church-Yard at Bethlehem, where it was interred, without Chriſtian Burial, or any Ceremony, but the Sighs of the Brethren.

Streater's Caſe.

Proceedings in the Upper-Bench (as the King's-Bench was then denominated) on a Habeas Corpus, brought by Captain JOHN STREATER, in Michaelmas and Hilary Terms, 1653. 5 Car. II.

1653. 5 Car. 2.

The Habeas Corpus he brought.

THE Habeas Corpus was in Engliſh, and of the following Tenor: "By the Keep"ers of the Liberties of England, by Authority
"of Parliament, to the Keeper of the Priſon of "the Gatehouſe, &c. We command you, that "the Body of John Streater, in the Priſon un"der your Cuſtody detained, as it is ſaid, to"gether with the Day and Cauſe of his taking
"and detaining, by whatſoever Name the ſaid
"John is called therein, you have before us,
"in the Upper-Bench at Weſtminſter, on Wed-
"neſday next after the Morrow of St. Martin,
"to undergo and receive thoſe Things which
"our ſaid Court of Upper-Bench ſhall then and "there order, concerning him in this Part. And
"this you may not omit at your Peril, and muſt
"bring with you this Writ. Witneſs Henry
"Rolle, (the Chief-Juſtice) at Weſtm. 12. Nov.
"1653."

Committed by a Warrant of the Council of State,

Captain Streater being brought before the Court the 23d of November, the Return of the Habeas Corpus was read, wherein were recited two Warrants; the firſt by the Council of State, dated 12 Sept. 1653. and directed to the Keeper of the Gatehouſe, commanding him to receive and keep the Body of the ſaid John Streater, committed for publiſhing ſeditious Pamphlets againſt the State: The other was a Warrant ſigned by the Speaker of the Commons, dated the 21ſt of Nov. and directed to the Keeper of the Gatehouſe, commanding him, by Virtue of an Order of Parliament, made the ſame Day to receive and keep the ſaid John Streater Priſoner, till he ſhould be delivered by Order of Parliament.

And continued by a Warrant from the Speaker of the Commons.

He moves to be bailed.

Then the Priſoner's Counſel moved, that, as to the firſt Order, if there was no more than the publiſhing of ſcandalous Pamphlets, he might be bailed; and the Court being of Opinion he ought to be bailed, ordered the Priſoner to ſpeak to the ſecond Warrant. Whereupon Captain Streater ſaid, As to the ſecond Part of the Return, which mentioned an Order of Parliament, he had this Exception: That it did not mention any Cauſe of his Impriſonment.

And whereas it had been objected, That the Parliament was not bound to ſhew Cauſe upon a Commitment, he hoped the Parliament would not encourage the maintaining an Argument ſo repugnant to their Honour, and which had, within Memory, been condemned by the Parliament themſelves: That the Parliament on the 17th of March, 1648. had declared, That their Authority was only by Law; that they were ſenſible of the Excellency and Equality of the Law of England, and would uphold the true approved Rules of Law: They had declared alſo, That the good old Laws, and Courts of Juſtice, and the Cuſtoms of England were the Badges of their Freedom, Rights, and Privileges; that by MAGNA CHARTA, None ſhall be taken or impriſoned, but by legal Proceſs, according to the old Law of the Land; and there being no lawful Cauſe ſhewn in the Return, let the Command come from whence it will, the Law would warrant his being diſcharged: That an Order of Parliament could not repeal or ſuſpend Laws; and Sir Edward Coke obſerves, that even an Act of Parliament is not pleadable in a Court of Record, but by Record or under Seal, much leſs an Order of Parliament that is not recorded on the Parliament Rolls itſelf.

The Attorney-General oppoſes his being bailed.

The Court demanding of the Attorney-General, what he had to offer in Anſwer to this, he ſaid, he ſhould not argue upon it; for the Priſoner was committed by an Order of Parliament, who need give no Account of their Reaſons for it to that Court; it was their Pleaſure to commit him, till he ſhould be cleared by an Order of the ſame Power, and the Court could not but remember Orders of the like Nature. To which it was ſaid, There had indeed been the like Orders, in the Caſes of Lilburn, Chetwin, and others, who made their Application to the Parliament, and if the Priſoner would apply himſelf to the Houſe, they would do him Juſtice; but as he was committed by them, who were a ſuperior Court, and they only knowing the Cauſe of his Commitment, it was not fit for the Upper Bench to controul the Parliament, or to enquire into it. That the Parliament were the ſupreme Power, and might alter or ſuſpend the Laws as they pleaſed, and were not obliged to expreſs the Cauſe of Commitment, as inferior Courts and Officers were; that their Orders were no more to be queſtioned than their Acts; and there was no Neceſſity of reading a Bill three Times now, as when the Legiſlative Power was in King, Lords, and Commons. Mr. Ju-tice Nichols alſo ſaid, he had known ſeveral Acts of Parliament paſſed on once reading: And upon the whole the Court was of Opinion, that an Order made by the Parliament, in whom the Legiſlative Authority was then veſted, muſt be Law to them; they muſt not diſpute their Authority.

The Court refuſe to Bail him. The Parliament diſſolved. He brings an alias Habeas Corpus.

The Parliament being diſſolved by Cromwell, in the Michaelmas Vacation, Streater obtained an alias Habeas Corpus in Hilary Term, of the following Tenor, viz.

" Oliver, Lord Protector of the Common" wealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, &c.
" to the Keeper of the Gatehouſe, &c. We " command you, as formerly we commanded
" you, that the Body of John Streater, Gent.
" in Priſon under your Cuſtody detained, to" gether with the Day and Cauſe of his taking
" and detaining, by whatſoever Name the ſaid
" John is called therein, you have before us
" at the Upper Bench in Weſtminſter upon Mon-
" day next, after the 15 Days of St. Hilary
" next coming, to undergo and receive thoſe
" Things which our Court of Upper Bench
" aforeſaid, ſhall conſider of him in this Behalf,
" and this you may not omit in any wiſe, upon
" Peril that will fall thereon. Witneſs Henry
" Rolle, at Weſtminſter the 26th of January,
" 1653."

To which Aquila Wykes, the Keeper of the Gatehouſe Priſon, made the following Return:

" To his Highneſs the Lord Protector of the " Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ire- " land, and the Dominions thereof, in the Up-
" per Bench Weſtminſter, at the Day and Place
" in the Writ to this Schedule annexed named:
" I do certify, that before the coming of the " ſaid Writ to me directed, that is to ſay, the
" 12*th* Day of September 1653. John Streater
" in the Writ named, was committed to my
" Cuſtody, and there detained by Virtue of " a Warrant from the late Council of State,
" and by another Warrant from the Speaker,
&c. (both which Warrants are recited) and then concludes, " And theſe are the Cauſes of the " detaining of the ſaid John Streater, whoſe
" Body before the Lord Protector aforeſaid, I
" have ready accordingly, at the Day and Place
" in the ſaid Writ contained, as I am within
" commanded."

Aquila Wykes, Keeper of the Gatehouſe.

He moves to be diſcharged.

The Priſoner being hereupon committed to the Marſhal of the Upper Bench, and brought into Court again by Rule the 7th of February, his Counſel moved that he might be diſcharged; for that the Parliament being diſſolved, their Order was no longer in force.

The Attorney gives very odd Reaſons againſt it.

To which Mr. Attorney anſwered, that Parliaments could not be diſſolved; that the Parliament was the ſame Power that was ſtill in being; and as by this Commitment the Priſoner was not to be delivered, but by Order of Parliament, he conceived he could not be releaſed by any other Power; he muſt be content till the Meeting of the Parliament, which was to be the 3*d* of September, 1654. He admitted that an Order of one or both Houſes, when the Parliament conſiſted of King, Lords, and Commons, would not be binding on a Diſſolution; but now that Power was united in the Commons, their Order was of greater Force; nor was it material whether Cauſe was ſhewn or not; the Parliament might commit without, and it was to be preſumed, they had Cauſe for ſo doing; and therefore moved he might be remanded to the Gatehouſe. 1653. 5 Car. 2.

The Reply of the Priſoner's Counſel.

The Priſoner's Counſel replied, that Parliaments might, and did determine; and then their Orders determined, though their Acts remained in Force: But that this was not ſo much as an Order of Parliament; it was but a Warrant from the Speaker, that it had been ordained; that whoever ſaid the Parliament was in being, ſhould be adjudged guilty of an High Offence, and if it did not continue in being, their Orders could be of no Force; that an Order of Parliament was not a Judgment of Parliament; that they were here in Court, coram Protectore, and moved again that he might be diſcharged; but the Court took Time to conſider of it.

The Court diſcharge the Priſoner.

The Priſoner being brought to the Bar again the eleventh of February, Chief Juſtice Rolle delivered the Opinion of the Court, viz. that the firſt Part of the Return was too general, it not mentioning what Books, or whoſe Books they were, or where or when they were publiſhed: That the ſecond Part of the Return was grounded upon an Order of Parliament, which was determined with the Parliament; and that That Court was to take Notice when the Parliament was ſitting, and when diſcontinued, and which were Orders of Parliament, and which were Acts: That it was ever the Opinion of the Parliament themſelves, that upon a Diſſolution all their Pommittees and Orders ceaſe: That the Court did not reverſe the Order of Parliament; it was reverſed by their Diſſolution, and there was no viſible way to relieve the Priſoner but in that Court: Intervals of Parliament might be as long as they had been in ſome late Reigns; and if an Order of Parliament ſhould be binding on a Diſſolution, where was the Liberty of the Subject? The Court therefore was unanimous, that the Priſoner ought to be diſcharged; and a Rule was made accordingly.

John Lilburn refuſed the Benefit of an Habeas Corpus.

John Lilburn had not ſo good Fortune; for though he brought an Habeas Corpus, directed to Colonel Barkſtead Lieutenant of the Tower, the Lieutenant refuſed to bring him into Court, alledging he had received a Counter Order from the Council of State, That Lilburn ſhould not be brought before the Upper Bench, but abide the Pleaſure of the Houſe; and Lilburn's Counſel ſaid, that they had no Inſtructions from their Client, for they were not permitted to have Acceſs to him, and moved for an alias Habeas Corpus; but the Court would not grant it, and told them the Council of State had their Reaſons for what they did: Nor would Oliver, after he had turned the Parliament out of Doors, and aſſumed the Title of Protector, ever ſuffer Lilburn to be diſcharged or bailed; but detained him in Priſon by his ſole Will and Power, without giving any Reaſon for it to the Day of his Death.

Remarks on the Habeas Corpus brought by Streater, Lilburne, &c.

Theſe Proceedings ſufficiently ſhew how much the Condition of the Subject was mended by the Uſurpers; they murdered their King, under a Pretence of reſtoring Liberty and Property, and when they had poſſeſſed themſelves of Sovereign Power, became greater Oppreſſors, and more arbitrary than any of our Kings. We find their

Attorney-

1653. 5 Car. 2. Attorney-General affirming, that Men might be impriſoned for Life, by a Vote or Order of the Commons without a Trial, and even without ſhewing any Cauſe of Commitment: To ſome they refuſed the Writ of Habeas Corpus, and others, when they were brought before the Upper Bench, were told that this Court could not relieve them: It was the Pleaſure of the Commons to commit the Priſoner, and he could not be releaſed by any other Power, even after the Parliament was diſſolved; that the Commons might alter or ſuſpend the Laws as they pleaſed, and their Orders were no more to be diſputed than their Acts: In ſhort, the People were now Slaves to a ſmall Remnant of the Commons, as they were afterwards to Cromwell, and no Shadow of Law, Liberty, or Property remaining. 1653. 5 Car. 2.

1654. 6 Car. 2. The Trial of Gerhard and Vowel.

The Arraignment of SOMERSET FOX, JOHN GERHARD, and PETER VOWELL, for High-Treaſon, againſt the Protector, CROMWELL, before pretended High Court of Juſtice, of which JOHN LISLE was Preſident, the 30th of June, 1654. 6 Car. II. 1654. 6 Car. 2.

The Charge THE Priſoners were charged with High-Treaſon, in conſpiring againſt the Life of the Lord Protector, to ſubvert that pretended Government, bring in Charles Stuart, and proclaim him King; ſeize on the Protector's Guards, and involve the Nation in a bloody War.

Fox confeſſes it. Fox confeſſed the Charge; but Vowel for ſome time objected to the Juriſdiction of the Court, inſiſting he ought to be tried by a Jury, by Magna Charta, and the antient Laws of the Kingdom, as well as by the ſixth Article of the Protector's Inſtrument of Government; but this being over-ruled by their pretended Judges, the Evidewas produced againſt Vowel and Gerhard.

Objections to the Juriſdiction of the Court over-ruled.

The Evidence. The Witneſſes depoſed, that the Priſoners, Gerhard and Vowel, were in a Plot to ſeize on the Lord Protector, and ſeveral of his Council, and murder them, and to bring in and proclaim Charles Stuart, Son of the late King; that this being reſolved on by the Conſpirators in England, Mr. Hinſhaw, one of their Number, and others, went over to France to acquaint Charles Stuart with the Deſign, without whoſe Approbation ſome of them refuſed to act: That Mr. Hinſhaw applied himſelf to Prince Rupert, who brought him to Charles Stuart, who was of Opinion the Conſpirators ought not to proceed in their Deſign, for three Reaſons; firſt, It would be diſhonourable to come in by ſuch Means; ſecondly, It did not ſeem feaſible; and thirdly, It was not Seaſonable at that Time: But that Prince Rupert afterwards encouraged the Deſign, and promiſed his Aſſiſtance.

That Mr. Hinſhaw, Mr. Wiſeman, and Mr. Gerhard, three of the Conſpirators, returning to England, Hinſhaw acquainted their Accomplices of the Overture that had been made to Charles Stuart, and affirmed that Prince Rupert had engaged to ſend over ten thouſand Engliſh, Scots, and French, to be commanded by the Duke of York, and land in Suſſex and other Places; and that there were Forces ready to join them.

That they had agreed to ſurprize the Protector with a Body of Horſe as he went from White-Hall to Hampton-Court, which he uſed to do every Saturday Night with a very ſmall Guard; they were to ſeize the Forces quartered in Weſtminſter, the Meuſe, &c. to ſurprize the Tower, raiſe an Inſurrection in the City of London, and Proclaim Charles Stuart there; and one Billingſly, a Butcher in Smithfield, was to raiſe a Party, and take the Troopers Horſes that were at Graſs in Iſlington Fields, which was ſaid to be a Project of Vowel's.

The chief Witneſſes againſt the Priſoners, were Mr. Wiſeman, Mr. Charles Gerhard, and Mr. Hudſon, a blind Clergyman, all of them very honeſt Gentlemen, and were certainly engaged with the reſt to pull down the Uſurper, and bring in the King, but obliged to become Witneſſes to ſave their own Lives: However, they teſtified no more than they found the Uſurpers were very well acquainted with before.

The Priſoners' Defence. Mr. Vowel and Mr. Gerhard, the Priſoners, denied the whole Charge at their Trials, and inſiſted that Treaſon (if the Facts were proved) could only be committed againſt a King; the Protector was a Perſon not known in our Law: To which Prideaux, the Attorney-General for the Commonwealth, replied, that the Laws which made it High-Treaſon to Conſpire the Death of the King, were ſtill in force; and that by King was meant any Supreme Governor, whether King, Queen or Protector, though the King only was named in the Act.

Liſle endeavours to ſhew the Wickedneſs of the Conſpiracy. The Priſoners being afterwards brought into Court to hear Judgment, the Preſident Liſle made a Speech to them, wherein he endeavoured to ſhew the Wickedneſs of this Conſpiracy, and the Reaſonableneſs of the Puniſhment the Law had inflicted upon ſuch Offences: After which the Sentence was read againſt the three Priſoners, being of the following Tenor, viz.

The Sentence. That the Court, upon due Conſideration had of the Treaſons and Murders plotted and contrived by the Priſoners againſt his Highneſs the Lord Protector and the Commonwealth, and to raiſe a bloody War therein, did adjudge them to be hanged by the Neck till they were Dead.

Fox pardoned. Somerſet Fox however was reprieved, on Account of his acknowledging the Offence, and pleading guilty; and Mr. Gerhard, upon his Petition, had the Manner of his Execution changed, from hanging to beheading; however, both Mr. Vowel and Mr. Gerhard were executed the the ſame Day, namely, on Monday the 10th of July; the firſt being hanged in the Morning, on a Gallows erected for that Purpoſe at Charing-Croſs, and Mr. Gerhard was beheaded on a Scaffold at Tower-Hill, at Four in the Afternoon. They both gloried in their Loyalty to their Sovereign, declaring themſelves true Members of the Church of England, exhorting the People to remain ſtedfaſt in that Profeſſion, and in their Loyalty to their Prince. They did not deny but there had been ſome Diſcourſe how the Uſurpation might be demoliſhed, and the King reſtored; but affirmed, there was no Scheme actually agreed on for bringing theſe Things about.

Remarks on the Trial of Vowel and Gerhard.

They were both brave Men, and far from regreting the laying down their Lives for their Religion and their Country; and as the Uſurper knew them to be immoveably loyal, he was determined to make them Examples of his Vengeance, whether they were actually in a Plot to deſtroy him or not. And here we ſee how ſome Lawyers, whoſe Buſineſs it is to defend the Laws and Conſtitution, can proſtitute their Profeſſion to the vileſt Purpoſes, and make the Laws ſpeak a Language directly contrary to their true Meaning, and the Intent of the Legiſlators that made them; telling the People, that the Statutes that were made for the Preſervation of the King and Government, were to be interpreted to the Deſtruction of both; that the Uſurper, who had killed the King, and taken Poſſeſſion of his Throne, was their lawful Prince; and the preſent King and his loyal Subjects Rebels, by thoſe very Statutes that eſtabliſhed the Rights of both. Of all Kinds of Murder, thoſe that are committed under a Colour of Law are the moſt to be deteſted. How vile muſt thoſe Judges and Counſel appear therefore, who thus pervert Law and Juſtice, in order to deſtroy the beſt and braveſt Men! Surely the Names of Liſle and Prideaux muſt remain infamous to lateſt Poſterity, while thoſe of Vowel and Gerhard, whoſe Blood they hunted after, ſhall ſhine in the Annals of Fame, as long as the Sun and Moon endures. 1654. 6 Car. 2.

1654. 6. Car. 2. Pordage's Proſecution

The next Proceeding in the State Trials is the Proſecution of Dr. John Pordage, Rector of Bradfield, in the County of Berks, for certain Heretical Doctrines, before Commiſſioners for ejecting ſcandalous and inſufficient Miniſters, Octob. 1654.

1654. 6 Car. 2.

The Charge againſt him.

THE principal Errors he was charged with were, his denying the Divinity of Chriſt, and the Merits of his Paſſion; his maintaining that Chriſt was a Type, and but a Type, and not perfect; which Charge the Doctor denied, nor was it well proved againſt him; and the Commiſſioners, on paſſing Sentence, declared, that they did not think him guilty of it; however, they thought fit to adjudge and decree, That he ſhould be ejected out of the Rectory of Bradfield, and the Profits thereof.

He is deprived.

Remarks on this Proſecution.

This ſhews how great a Power the Uſurpers conferred on their Commiſſioners for ejecting ſcandalous Miniſters; that they made them Judges of Hereſy and erroneous Doctrines, as well as of the Lives and Morals of the Clergy, and authorized them to ſuſpend and deprive whom they ſaw fit; and poſſibly the greateſt Crime the Doctor was guilty of, was his being poſſeſſed of one of the beſt Livings in Berkſhire, which the Uſurpers thought fit to beſtow on one of their Favourites. Thus we ſee thoſe Men who uſed to complain of the Juriſdiction of the Biſhops and Eccleſiaſtical Courts, ſet up a more arbitrary Tribunal, to take Cognizance of thoſe Matters, than ever was erected in England ſince the Reformation.

1655. 7 Car. 2. Penruddock's Trial.

The Trial of Colonel John Penruddock, for High-Treaſon, by a ſpecial Commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer, held at Exeter, the 19th of April, 1655. 7 Car. II.

1655. 7 Car. 2.

Short Minutes of it only.

THIS which is denominated a Trial, is no more than ſome ſhort Notes, or Memorandums of the Colonel's, in which he relates, That he was arraigned together with Hugh Grove, Richard Reeves, Robert Duke, George Duke, Thomas Fitz-James, Francis Jones, Edward Davis, Thomas Poulton, and Francis Bennet, Gent. and that he, in Behalf of himſelf and his Fellow Priſoners, excepted to the Indictment, as not according to Law, deſiring Counſel might be aſſigned to argue the Errors it contained: That this being denied him, he pleaded Not Guilty, and having challenged twenty-four of the Pannel, a Jury was ſworn; that he afterwards deſired a Copy of the Indictment, and Time to prepare for his Defence, which were refuſed, and he was obliged to enter upon his Defence immediately; wherein he urged, among other Things, that the Law knew no ſuch Perſon as a Protector, againſt whom the Treaſon was ſaid to be committed, and cited a Paſſage out of Bracton, who ſays, Omnes ſub Rege, & ipſe nullo niſi

His Defence.

1655. 7 Car. II.

niſi tantum Deo, &c. He cited alſo a Parliament Roll, where it is ſaid, Whoever ſhall refuſe Aid to the King when War is levyed againſt him, is guilty of Treaſon; and that all Men who adhere to the King in Perſonal Service, are freed from Treaſon by Law: He thought it ſtrange therefore, they ſhould found their Indictment on a Statute which made his adhering to the King Treaſon; and deſired that the Statute might be read, but the Court would not indulge him ſo far. Then Mr. Attorney made a long Speech, aggravating the Charge againſt the Colonel, and telling the Jury, he had been four Years in France; that he held a Correſpondence with Charles Stuart, of whom he had learned the Popiſh Religion, and intended to introduce Popery; that Charles Stuart, whom he would bring in, was a debauched lewd young Man, and would engage the Nation in another bloody Quarrel; in which he told the Jury, they with their Wives and Children would be deſtroyed, if the Cavaliers ſucceeded.

The Charge enforced.

To which the Colonel replied, Mr. Attorney had put on him a Bear-Skin, and now deſigned to bait him; but ſaid, he had ſurrendered to Captain Crook upon Condition of Quarter, and ought not after that to have been tried for his Life: He obſerved alſo that the Witneſſes produced againſt him had teſtified, that when King Charles II. was proclaimed at Salisbury, he had declared for the true Proteſtant Religion, the Liberty of the Subject, and Privilege of Parliament; from whence he concluded it was obvious, that he was not for bringing in the Popiſh Religion.

Had he ſeen the Crown upon the Head of any Perſon, he ſaid he might have known what was Treaſon; but here was no ſuch Land-Mark, and he did not know how he could be guilty of what he was charged with: He adviſed the Jury not to be terrified by the Power and Splendor of the Court, and betrayed into a Sin of a deeper Die, than the Judges Scarlet, by drawing his Blood upon their Heads: He bid them look upon him as the Image of his Creator; for that Stamp of God's which was upon his Viſage, was not to be defaced without an Account given for it: He had inſiſted to be tried by thoſe Laws, which were eſtabliſhed by the Wiſdom of their Anceſtors; but he was tried by a Law, that was cut out by a rebellious Sword; and if they did not look well to it, the Sheets on which it was recorded, might ſerve ſome of them for Winding-Sheets: That the moſt they could make of the Matter was but a Riot; however, if they found it Specially, they would in ſome Meaſure acquit themſelves, and throw the Blood that was ſpilled upon the Judges: But the Jury, after a ſhort Receſs, brought him in GUILTY.

On Monday the 23d of April, the Colonel was brought to the Bar again with twenty-ſix Gentlemen more, who had been tried in the mean Time, and the Court demanded what he had to ſay, why Sentence ſhould not be pronounced: He anſwered, he could have offered the Articles of Surrender, but did not think it proper in this Court: If the Protector would give him his Life, he ſhould return him Thanks; but if not, he ſhould forgive him and the Court. After which Sentence was pronounced on the Colonel and the reſt of the Priſoners, That they ſhould be drawn, hanged, and quartered, as Traitors.

1655. 7 Car. II. Sentence paſſed.

Whereupon they obſerved, that this was but an odd way of performing Articles of Capitulation, whereby they had ſtipulated for Life, Liberty, and Eſtate.

The Colonel and Mr. Grove, had the Honour done them of being beheaded at Exeter; ſeveral other Priſoners were hanged at Exeter and Salisbury, and a great Number of Royaliſts were tranſported to the Plantations like convicted Felons.

He is executed.

This Proceeding, how imperfect ſoever, could not be omitted, becauſe it is the beſt we could meet with of the Sufferings of theſe brave Men: The Hardſhip Colonel Penruddock and the reſt of the Priſoners chiefly complained of, we find was, the Violation of the Articles of Capitulation, whereby their Lives, Liberties, and Eſtates, ought to have been ſecured. But the Uſurpers were now ſo firmly eſtabliſhed, that they feared no Retaliation; and as for the Injuſtice of putting theſe brave Cavaliers to death, it never troubled them in the leaſt: They had waſhed their Hands in the Blood of their Sovereign, and deſtroyed ſo many thouſands of his loyal Subjects in the Name of the Lord; that they looked upon ſuch human Sacrifices, (eſpecially thoſe of the beſt Blood in the Nation) as meritorious Offerings to their Maker: And here it may be proper to give ſome Account of the Occaſion of Penruddock's Misfortune. The Nation it ſeems, became generally diſaffected on Cromwell's aſſuming the Protectorſhip, even the Independants as well as the Royaliſts: The Presbyterians were exaſperated to the laſt Degree, to find themſelves over-reached; and when they had, with the utmoſt Hazard, ſubverted the Monarchy, ſaw one of their own Number aſſume the ſole Government of the Nation, and exerciſe a more abſolute Tyranny than any Sovereign in Europe, not allowing them any Share in the Adminiſtration. While the People were in this Diſpoſition, the Royaliſts ſent over to the King (then at Cologn) for Commiſſions and Generals, to conduct an Inſurrection in his Favour: Whereupon his Majeſty ſent them Wilmot Earl of Rocheſter, and Sir Joſeph Wagſtaffe, and went himſelf in Diſguiſe to Fluſhing in Zealand, that he might be ready to embark for England on the firſt Notice of their Succeſs. Wilmot and Wagſtaffe finding the People generally diſaffected on their Arrival, the former went into the North of England, and Wagſtaffe into the Weſt; but their Deſigns were fruſtrated by the Treachery of one Manning, who having ſerved King Charles I. afterwards entered himſelf in the Service of the Uſurpers, and was employed by Thurloe, Secretary to Cromwell, as a Spy in the Family of King Charles II. From this Man it was Cromwell received Advice that the King was gone to Zealand, in Expectation of an Inſurrection in England, and named ſeveral Royaliſts as concerned in a Conſpiracy againſt him; which occaſioned their being taken Remarks on Penruddock's Tryal.

1655 7 Car. II. up, and put Cromwell upon his Guard: But Manning was not acquainted with the Meaſures that had been concerted, or the particular Perſons that were to conduct the Enterprize. However Cromwell, upon the Intelligence he had received, cauſing ſeveral Leading Men among the Royaliſts to be apprehended, and narrowly watching the Motions of the reſt, the Deſign was ſo far defeated, that Wiltſhire and Hampſhire were the only Counties which found it practicable to appear in Arms, and here they were not very numerous. The Royaliſts of Wiltſhire amounting to two hundred Horſe, among whom were Colonel Penruddock, Grove, Jones, Mompeſſon, Maſon, and other Perſons of Diſtinction, led by Sir Joſeph Wagſtaffe, aſſembled the 11th of March and came to Salisbury, where the Aſſizes was then held, about five in the Morning, and ſurprized Rolls, the Uſurper's Lord Chief Juſtice, Mr. Juſtice Nicholas, and the High Sheriff, in their Beds, and locked up all the Stables which were then full of Horſes, in order to mount their Friends in Town; and Wagſtaffe, it is ſaid, would have hanged up the Judges and Sheriff, in order to render his Party deſperate; but Penruddock and the Country Gentlemen, would not conſent to it; and having ſpent three or four Hours in Town, in Expectation of being joined by the Hampſhire Men, they retired towards Devonſhire, but ſo fatigued and diſpirited, that Captain Crook purſuing them with a Troop of Horſe, they ſurrendered to him, on Condition their Lives, Liberties, and Eſtates ſhould be ſecured; but Wagſtaffe, Maſon, and Mompeſſon, not truſting to the Capitulation, made their Eſcapes beyond Sea: In the mean Time Wilmot finding it impracticable to aſſemble the Royaliſts in the North with any Proſpect of Succeſs, adviſed them to remain quiet, and return to his Majeſty at Cologn; where Manning's Treachery being diſcovered, the King ordered him to be ſhot to death. 1655. 7 Car. Proceedings againſt JAMES NAYLOR, before a Committee of the Commons, for Blaſphemy and other Miſdemeanors in December, 1656. 8 Car. II.

1656. 8 Car. II. Naylor's Tryal. 1656. 8 Car. II.

The Charge.

THE Priſoner was charged, Firſt, with aſſuming the Geſtures, Words, Honour, Worſhip, and Miracles of Chriſt. Secondly, with aſſuming the Names, and incommunicable Attributes of our Bleſſed Saviour.

Some Account of the Man.

James Naylor, was born at Ardiſloe near Wakefield in Yorkſhire, and entering himſelf in the Rebels Army, at the Beginning of the Civil Wars, became Quarter-Maſter in Lieutenant-General Lambert's own Troop; but falling Sick in Scotland, he returned Home, and became a Member of an Independant Congregation; from which he was excluded for Blaſphemy, and giving out that it was lawful to lye with any Woman of the ſame Sect; and his Familiarity with one Mrs. Roper, a married Woman. From Yorkſhire he went to Cornwall, to viſit the Quakers there, and was committed to Exeter Goal as a Vagrant, with ſeveral of that Sect who attended him; but being ſet at Liberty, by an Order of the Uſurper's Council, he and his Diſciples began a kind of ſolemn Proceſſion from Exeter to Briſtol, in Imitation of our Saviour's riding to Jeruſalem.

The Evidence againſt him.

The Witneſſes depoſed, That James Naylor was ſet upon an Aſs which was led by a Woman, and in all the Towns they paſſed through in their Way to Briſtol, his Diſciples ſpread their Garments, and ſung, Holy, Holy, Holy, before him, and ſaid they were moved by the Spirit ſo to do: And Naylor himſelf ſaid, That Garments were ſpread, and Praiſes ſung to the Lord before him, at his Entrance into Briſtol; and ſaid, It was as the Lord put into their Hearts; it was done to the Praiſe of his Father, and he might not refuſe any Thing that was moved of the Lord; he did think the Father commanded them to do it: And being asked, Who they meant by Holy, &c. he anſwered, They were of Age, let them anſwer for themſelves: He had alſo the Deſcription of our Saviour's Perſon about him; and it was obſerved by the Committee, that his Perſon much reſembled the Picture commonly drawn for our Bleſſed Saviour; and he affected to give the like Anſwers that Chriſt gave; as when he was asked, How he could live without Food fifteen or ſixteen Days? (as he pretended he had) He anſwered, Man liveth not by Bread alone, but by every Word that proceedeth out of the Mouth of God; and in another of his Anſwers he ſaid, If they had known the Father, they ſhould have known him alſo. It was teſtified alſo, that ſeveral Women kneeled before him, and kiſſed his Feet; and one Dorcas Erbery depoſed, That ſhe was dead two Days in Exeter Goal, and Naylor laid his Hands on her, and raiſed her up: And when the Committee demanded of the Priſoner, If he raiſed her from the dead? he anſwered, I can do nothing of myſelf, but there is a Power in me from above: And being asked, Who bore witneſs of him? he anſwered, The Scriptures do bear Witneſs to the Power which is in me, which is everlaſting; and that it was the ſame Power, whereof they read in Scripture, that had raiſed the dead, according to the Power manifeſt: That as to what Dorcas Erbery, or any other, attributed to him as a Creature, that had Beginning and Ending, he utterly denied; but what any Perſon ſaw of God in him, that he did not deny: That the ſame Power which did raiſe the dead, which they read of in Scripture, the ſame Chriſt,

1656. 8 Car. II.

Chriſt, the ſame Anointing according to the Meaſure of him, was manifeſt in him, (the Priſoner) and no other: And being asked, If any prayed to him? he anſwered, as a Creature, he did diſown it. A Letter from one Hannah Stranger being found about him, wherein ſhe gives him the Title of The faireſt of ten thouſand; he ſaid, if ſhe meant it of what was viſible, he denied the Title; but as ſpoken of that which the Father had begotten in him, he durſt not diſown it; for that was beautiful wherever it was begotten: In the ſame Letter Stranger gave him the Title of The only begotten Son of God: And it being demanded, If he was the only begotten Son of God? he anſwered, He was the Son of God, and that the Son of God was but one.

In another Letter from Jane Woodcock, ſhe gave him the Title of The Prophet of the moſt High; and Naylor himſelf at his firſt Examination, averred, That he was the Prophet of the moſt High God; but afterwards he only ſaid, He was a Prophet of the moſt High God.

In a Letter from Thomas Simmons, he was ſtiled The King of Iſrael; and being asked, If he aſſumed that Title? he anſwered, He had no Kingdom in this World; yet a Kingdom he had, and he that had redeemed him, had redeemed him to be a King for ever; but he denied any ſuch Thing as a Creature, further than as God manifeſted in the Fleſh; and if they gave that Title to Chriſt in him, then he owned it. In another Letter from Hannah Stranger, ſhe gave him the Title of The everlaſting Son of Righteouſneſs; and Naylor being examined about it ſaid, God manifeſt in the Fleſh, he did witneſs and might not deny; and that where God was manifeſted in the Fleſh, there was the everlaſting Son of Righteouſneſs. Jane Woodcock, in another Letter to Naylor ſays, He was ſent to judge and try the Cauſe of Iſrael; and at his Examination he averred, He was ſent to try the Cauſe of Iſrael, by him who made all Creatures, who had ſent his Spirit and his Son into him, to try the Cauſe; but ſaid, he was no judge of carnal Matters.

In the Poſtſcript to Hannah Stranger's Letter, her Husband wrote, Thy Name ſhall no more be called James but Jeſus; and Naylor on his Examination ſaid, If they gave it to any other but the Son of God that was in him, he denied the Name; but he underſtood they gave that Name to the Jeſus, the Chriſt, that was in him: That he did not call himſelf by that Name, but what his Father had publiſhed, was another Thing.

In another Letter from Martha Simmons to Naylor, ſhe ſtiles him, Thou well beloved Lamb of God, in whom the Hope of Iſrael ſtands; and Naylor, at his Examination ſaid, If he were not his Lamb, he ſhould not be ſought to be devoured: And being asked, If the Hope of Iſrael did ſtand in him? he anſwered, It ſtands only in Chriſt, and as Jeſus Chriſt is known in me: And being aſked again, Are you he, in whom the Hope of Iſrael ſtands? he anſwered, Chriſt in me, the Hope of Glory: Being queſtioned further concerning the Titles given him in the Letters, he ſaid, He did not deſign they ſhould have ſeen them, becauſe he knew there were Things in them, that many could not bear; but now he ſaw his Father purpoſed they ſhould not be hid. Being asked, Whether he owned or diſclaimed the Attributes? he anſwered, If they had it from the Lord, what was he that he ſhould judge it? But if they were aſcribed to the Creature, then it was reprovable: If they did it to the Lord, he durſt not reprove it; adding, that he looked upon the Honour and Worſhip given him, to be to the true Honour of Chriſt, or elſe he would utterly have denied it.

1656. 8 Car. II.

It was further depoſed by John Baynham, Deputy-Serjeant to the Commons, That while Naylor was in his Cuſtody, he uſually ſat in a Chair, and his Diſciples, Men and Women, kneeled about him, or ſat on the Ground when they were weary of kneeling, ſinging, Holy, Holy, to the Almighty, to the true God and great God, and Glory to the Almighty, &c. and this they did all Day long, but Naylor never ſung himſelf.

That there was a great Reſort of other People to him, who in like Manner kneeled before him; and that Naylor never ſhewed any Diſlike, or reproved them for it.

Naylor's Defence.

It being demanded of Naylor, what he had to ſay in his Defence, he anſwered, That he abhorred that any Honour which was due to God, ſhould be given to him, as he was a Creature; but it pleaſed the Lord, to ſet him up as a Sign of the coming of the Righteous One: And as to what had been done in paſſing through Towns, he was commanded by the Power of the Lord, to ſuffer ſuch Things to be done to the Outward Man as a Sign; but he abhorred any Honour as a Creature.

He is convicted.

Upon the Whole, the Committee reſolved that the Charge was fully proved againſt the Priſoner; who being ſent for to the Houſe the ſixth of December, and commanded to kneel, he refuſed; and ſtanding with his Hat on at the Bar, the Serjeant, by the Speaker's Order, took it off; and being asked, If his Name was James Naylor? he anſwered, He was ſo called ever ſince he could remember; and acknowleged he had given the Anſwers abovementioned to the Committee: After which he was commanded to withdraw; and it was reſolved to agree with the Committee, firſt, That Naylor was guilty of horrid Blaſphemy; ſecondly, That he was a grand Impoſtor and Seducer of the People: And the Queſtion being put, That it be Part of his Puniſhment to have his Hair cut off, it paſſed in the Negative: But on the 17th of December, the following Sentence was agreed on, (viz.) That James Naylor be ſet in the Pillory in the Palace-Yard on Thurſday next, and be whipped from thence to the Old Exchange, by the Hangman; where, on the Saturday following, he ſhall likewiſe be ſet in the Pillory; and in each Place wear a Paper, ſignifying his Crimes: That at the Old Exchange, his Tongue ſhall be bored through with a hot Iron; and he ſhall be there alſo ſtigmatized in the Forehead with the Letter B, and afterwards conveyed to Briſtol, and ride ride into and through the ſaid City, on a bare Horſe's Back, with his Face to the Tail, and be publickly whipped the next Market-Day after he comes thither; and afterwards be committed to Bridewell in London; and reſtrained from the Society of all People; and have neither Pen, Ink, or Paper, or any Relief, but what he gains by his Labour.

The Execution of it.

While this Sentence was executing on the Priſoner in the Pillory, his Followers adored him, and afterwards licked his Wounds, and kiſſed his Feet. When he came firſt to Bridewell he faſted three Days, but then was glad to eat, and work to keep himſelf alive; while another Quaker, attempting to faſt forty Days in Imitation of our Saviour, was ſtarved.

Remarks on Naylor's Trial.

Theſe were ſome of the happy Conſequences of the Subverſion of the Church and State: Sound Religion, and ſound Politicks, were now entirely baniſhed the Nation; the People were divided into a Multitude of impious and blaſphemous Sects, every one of which propoſed the new-modelling of the State, as well as the Church, after the Whimſies of their own Brains; and we ſee how tenderly Blaſphemy and Idolatry were then dealt with: Theſe Saints, who could not bear the Image or Picture of our Saviour on a Glaſs Window, in the Days of Monarchy and Epiſcopacy, now fall down and worſhip a Man like themſelves, in the publick Streets and Highways, in the Face of all the World, aſcribing to him the Attributes of the Deity; and yet, we do not find any one of them puniſhed for it, except this James Naylor: And whether his Sentence was adequate to the Offence, I leave the World to judge.

1656. 8 Car. II.

Quakers, Fifth-Monarchy Men, The Family of Love, and every Enthuſiaſtical Opinion was tolerated; only the Diſciples of the National Church and the Loyaliſts, were perſecuted with Rigour; and as to theſe, the Powers then in Being, publiſhed a Declaration, to let them know, That they would not allow them the Favour of a Trial, if any of them were ſuſpected of conſpiring to reſtore the Conſtitution, but they would believe them all guilty; and put them to death, without ſo much as ſuffering them to have the Benefit even of the Forms of Law.

Sindercome's Trial.

The Trial of MILES SINDERCOME, alias FISH, for High-Treaſon, at the Upper Bench, Weſtminſter; the 9th of February, 1656. 8 Car II.

1656. 8 Car. II.

The Indictment.

MILES Sindercome, was indicted for High-Treaſon, in conſpiring againſt the Life of the Lord-Protector, to ſubvert the Government of the Common-Wealth, and to levy War againſt the ſame. The Overt-acts laid of the Conſpiracy were, That he, with one William Boyce, and others his Accomplices, hired a Houſe in Weſtminſter, to which they carried Arms and Ammunition, with an Intent to murder the Protector; that they alſo provided Horſes, and took another Houſe at Hammerſmith for the ſame Purpoſe; and that they brought Gunpowder, Brimſtone, and other combuſtible Materials, into the Chapel of Whitehall, and ſet Fire to the ſame, to the great Danger and Diſturbance of the Protector.

Notes only of the Evidence.

All the Account the Editor has given us of this Trial, is ſome ſhort Notes that ſeem to have been taken by a Friend of the Uſurper's; who relates, That Toope, one of the Priſoner's Accomplices, depoſed, That the Priſoner had made him Offers of Money and Preferment, to join with him in murdering the Protector; That the Deponent, (who was a Soldier in Cromwell's Guards) was to give Notice when the Protector went abroad, and what Part of the Coach he ſat in; he gave Evidence alſo of their buying up fleet Horſes; of the Priſoner's lodging Gunpowder, &c. in the Chapel of Whitehall; and his Reſolution to kill the Protector, if the Fire did not take.

That Cecil, another of the Conſpirators, depoſed, That the Priſoner engaged him in the Deſign of aſſaſſinating the Protector; and that they were upon the Road five or ſix Times, in order to effect it, particularly once in Hyde-Park, when Toope gave them Notice the Protector went abroad; That they took a Houſe at Hammerſmith alſo, and lodged Arms in it on Purpoſe to ſhoot him as he came by; and that one of their Guns would carry 12 Carbine Bullets and a Slug; and he deſcribed the Fire-Works prepared for burning Whitehall.

He depoſed alſo, That Forces were expected from Spain and Flanders, to join the Conſpirators, and that great Part of the Fleet would revolt; and believed that Colonel Sexby was the principal Agent at Bruſſels: That there were thirty or forty engaged to aſſaſſinate the Protector; but it was ſo ordered, that not any one ſhould know the others were in the Plot, untill the Matter was ripe for Execution.

He depoſed further, That Houſes were taken in Weſtminſter, and Arms lodged in them, to kill the Protector as he went to the Parliament-Houſe: That the Priſoner, Cecil the Deponent, and Boyce, actually went out into a Yard near Weſtminſter-Abbey, to ſhoot the Protector, as he paſſed from the Abbey to the Parliament, in the Painted-Chamber; but were prevented by ſome Accident.

The Witneſſes depoſed further, That this Attempt not ſucceeding, they provided fleet Horſes to kill him as he rode out; and attempted the firſt Time, the latter End of September; a ſecond Time, as the Protector went the Back-Way from Kenſington to London; a third Time, when he went to Hyde-Park

1656. 1 Car. II.

Park in his Coach; a fourth Time, when he went to Turnham-Green; and a fifth Time, when the Protector alighted from his Horſe in Hyde-Park, but were prevented then by Cecil's Horſe being out of Order: That Sindercome rode out once alone to kill him; and all theſe Attempts failing, they reſolved to fire Whitehall.

The Priſoner's Defence.

Sindercome abſolutely denied he knew of any Plot; and inſiſted, as others had done, that no Treaſon could be committed againſt the Perſon they ſtiled Protector: To which the Uſurper's Chief Juſtice Glynn, and Juſtice Warburton, replied, That to compaſs the Death of the Chief Magiſtrate, by what Name ſoever he was called, was High-Treaſon; and that he (the Protector) was the Fountain of Juſtice, in whoſe Name all Writs run, and all Commiſſions and Grants were made: And the Jury finding him GUILTY, the following Judgment was paſſed on the Priſoner, Viz.

He is convicted.

The Sentence paſſed.

That he ſhould be drawn upon a Hurdle from the Tower to Tyburn, and there be hanged untill he was half dead, and then being cut down, his Bowels ſhould be taken out, and burnt in his Sight; his Body divided into four Quarters, and diſpoſed of as his Highneſs the Lord Protector ſhould think fit.

He is found dead in his Bed.

Whether Sindercome poiſoned himſelf, becauſe he apprehended the Sentence would be rigorouſly executed, or to avoid the Ignominy of the Execution; or whether he was poiſoned, or otherwiſe privately murdered, by the Direction of the Uſurper, leaſt he ſhould diſcover more of his Villainy, does not fully appear: But it is certain he was found dead in his Bed, the Night before he ſhould have been executed; whereupon the Coroner ſat upon his Body, and ſeveral Witneſſes were examined, as to the Manner of the Priſoner's Death.

The Coroner ſits on him.

The Evidence before the Coroner.

Sir Richard Napier, Doctor of Phyſick, and Doctor Fern, Reader of Anatomy in Greſham-College, depoſed, That being deſired by Sir John Barkſtead, Lieutenant of the Tower, to ſee the Head of Miles Sindercome opened (his Body having been opened before their coming by the Surgeons) and make their Obſervations thereon; they found the Brain much inflamed, red, and diſtended with Blood, ſwollen as full as the Skull could well hold; beſides much grumous and clodded Blood out of the Veins, which muſt be the Effect of ſome very violent and preternatural Cauſe. Yet were they not able poſitively to determine what that was, or whence it proceeded, the Motion being much more ſudden and violent than that of Apoplexies, and other known Diſeaſes of the Brain, except when cauſed by Contuſion, and other the like extraordinary Violences.

Charles Stamford and Nicholas Brethers, Wardens of the Surgeons Company, and Laurence Loe, another able Surgeon, depoſed, That being ordered to open the Body of Miles Sindercome, Priſoner in the Tower, they could not find out, or diſcover any the uſual Symptoms, or Effects, accompanying the taking of known and ſharp Poiſons, cauſing ſudden Death; but by the Diſtenſion and Swelling of the Brain and Veſſels in the Head, with much coagulated Blood, which they found there: Their Opinions therefore were, That the Priſoner had cauſed the ſame by ſome extraordinary Means, for the haſtening of his Death.

1656. 7 Car. II.

Under the Cloſe-Stool, in Sindercome's Room, was found, after he was dead (as it is ſaid) the following Paper, ſubſcribed with his own Hand, (Viz.)

A Note ſaid to be found in the Priſoner's Room.

GOD knoweth my Heart, I do take this Courſe, becauſe I would not have all the open Shame of the World executed upon my Body: I deſire all good People not to judge amiſs of me; for I do not fear my Life, but do truſt God with my Soul. I did this Thing without the Privity of any Perſon in the World: I do before God and the World clear my Keeper, my Siſters, Mother or Brother, or any other of my Relations; but it was done alone by my ſelf: I ſay by me,

The 13th Day, 1656. February.

MILES SINDERCOME.

Further Evidence.

Elizabeth Herring, Wife of William Herring Mariner, and Siſter to Miles Sindercome, depoſed, That ſhe went ſeveral Times to ſee her ſaid Brother in the Tower, and that going to him on Monday the 9th of February, after he had received Sentence of Death, and lamenting his Condition, he ſaid, before they ſhould have his Life ſo ſhamefully (meaning the Lord Protector, ſhe believed) he would poiſon himſelf, and deſired her to procure him ſome Poiſon, which ſhe refuſed; and that coming every Day after to ſee him while he lived, he did not mention Poiſon any more, or ſpeak any Words of Diſcontent, as if he intended to deſtroy himſelf; nor did he complain of any Sickneſs, or Diſeaſe, that he was troubled withal: That on Friday the 13th of February, the laſt Day he lived, ſhe perſuaded him to confeſs who had a Hand in the Plot againſt the Lord Protector; and told him, if he would confeſs, his Highneſs would grant him his Life, and wiſhed him to truſt to God and Man. To which the ſaid Sindercome replied, He would have it under black and white, and that he would truſt no Man: That about Eight at Night ſhe left him in good Health, as ſhe thought; and that he found in his Conſcience he had made his Peace with the Lord: ——Denied ſhe ever brought him Poiſon, or any other Thing to deſtroy him; yet confeſſed, that on the ſaid Friday Night before he died, ſhe did ſay, ſhe deſired with all her Heart to ſee him die a natural Death in that Chamber.

Two other Women, who viſited Sindercome after Sentence, depoſed, That they did not know of any Poiſon brought him; nor did they ever hear him ſpeak any Words as if he intended to deſtroy himſelf by Poiſon, or otherwiſe.

The Evidence of the Officers that guarded him.

William Foſter, one of the Officers appointed to remain in the Chamber, where Sindercome

1656. 7 Car. II. come was impriſoned, depoſed, That on Friday, the 13th of February, about Nine at Night, the Priſoner deſired him and four more, that were then in his Room, to withdraw out of the Chamber, while he went to Prayers, which they did; and within a Quarter of an Hour he called them in again, and took a Book in his Hand to read, after which he ſaid he would go to Bed, and that was the laſt Night he ſhould go to Bed; and laying himſelf down, fell aſleep, and ſnored, as the Examinant thought; but deſiring Daniel Steer, his Keeper, to take a Candle and ſee how the Priſoner lay in his Bed, Steer ſaid he was almoſt dead; however, he lay Speechleſs for two Hours after, and then died.

Philip Brown, another of the Officers appointed to wait in the Priſoner's Chamber, depoſed, That he was at Dinner with Sindercome on the 13th of February, and he ſaid, That was the laſt Meal he ſhould ever eat: And that afterwards two of the Priſoner's Siſters, a Couſin, and another Woman, came to ſee him, and would have perſuaded him to confeſs who brought him into thoſe Troubles, and he anſwered, To whom ſhould he confeſs? He could not expect Mercy from him who was reſolved to give him none: Adding, That Cromwell ſaid to him when he was taken and brought before him, Sindercome, Have I caught you? You that have ſought many ways to take away my Life, I will have no Conſideration at all of thy Life. That when Sindercome had repeated theſe Words, he fell in a great Paſſion, and ſaid he might go and accuſe the Lord Fleetwood, the Lord Lambert, Sir John Barkſtead, Sir Thomas Pride, or any other Member of the Army, if he was minded to deſtroy innocent Blood. That about Seven the ſame Evening this Examinant received Orders from the Major, That Sindercome ſhould have ſome Time allowed him apart to prepare himſelf, if he deſired it; and thereupon the Examinant retired out of the Chamber, and left him alone; and ſtanding at the Door, a quarter of an Hour after, he ſaw the ſaid Miles kneeling by the Bed-ſide; but ſoon after this, one of the Centinels, who ſtood at the Chamber-Door, told the Examinant, that Sindercome did cough and keck, as if he was vomiting; and opening the Door, he found the Priſoner walking about the Room. That Captain Foſter, and Captain Sharp, who were ordered to be there that Night, then came into the Room; and about Nine at Night Sindercome deſired all the Company to withdraw out of the Room, and within a quarter of an Hour called them in again, took a Book in his Hand to read, and then ſaid he would go to Bed, That was the laſt Night he ſhould go to Bed; and that a little Time after he lay down they diſcovered he was dying, as the laſt Witneſs depoſed.

Daniel Steer, the Priſoner's Keeper, depoſed, That Sindercome being a Priſoner in the Tower, the latter End of January, told the Examinant, If he would be faithful to him, he would give him the Value of his Place, were it worth two hundred Pounds, deſiring he would provide him (Sindercome) a Black Suit of Cloaths, a Peruke, and ſhort Dagger, and paſs him out of the Water-gate, and he would kill any Man that ſhould oppoſe him: That the Priſoner, coming back to the Tower from his Trial, the 9th of February, was in a great Paſſion, and ſaid they ſhould not have their Ends, and deſired the Examinant to help him to ſome Poiſon, that he might make away himſelf; and he refuſing, the Priſoner applied himſelf to his Siſter, Elizabeth Herring, who was preſent, to bring him ſome Poiſon, but ſhe fell a crying; and afterwards the Priſoner and the ſaid Elizabeth had ſome private Diſcourſe, which the Examinant did not hear: That his Siſter being gone, the Priſoner demanded if he could not poſſibly help him to make his Eſcape, and if he could, he would make Two Hundred Pounds good to him that Night; and if the Examinant would go along with the Priſoner, he would make that 200 l. Seven Hundred Pounds, or what he ſhould deſire; but the Examinant replied, it was impoſſible for him to make his Eſcape, there was ſuch a ſtrict Guard kept about him. That on the 13th of February, about Ten at Night, the Examinant was in the Priſoner's Chamber, together with Captain Sharp, Captain Foſter, Enſign Browne, and Serjeant Stock; and that the Priſoner deſired them to withdraw, called them in again within a quarter of an Hour, went to Bed, and died as the former Witneſſes had depoſed; but that he knew of no Poiſon, or any other Means the Priſoner uſed to take away his Life.

1656. 7 Car. II.

Captain Henry Sharpe, who was in Sindercome's Room, on Friday the 13th of February, confirmed the Evidence the former Witneſſes gave; adding, that after the Priſoner's Siſter, and the reſt of the Women were gone, they cauſed the Room and the Bed to be ſearched, leſt any Thing ſhould be left there for the Priſoner to do himſelf a Miſchief withal; but nothing could be found.

Elizabeth Sindercome, of Deptford, Widow, the Priſoner's Mother, depoſed, That ſhe went three Times to ſee her Son while he was Priſoner in the Tower; and that ſhe did not know of any violent Means uſed by him, or any other, to haſten his Death: That he told her, the laſt Time ſhe was with him, he was prepared to die, and ſhe ſaw him no more. But about Twelve a Clock on Friday Night, the 13th of February, ſhe heard ſhe was ſent for, and heard he was very ſick and weak, of which Sickneſs he died preſently after.

The Coroner's Inqueſt doubtful, and adjourn.

The Coroner's Inqueſt having conſidered the aboveſaid Depoſitions, could come to no Reſolution, as to the Cauſe of his Death, and therefore adjourned.

They meet, and adjourn again.

On the 16th of February, they ſat again, when it is ſaid they were of Opinion, that the Priſoner, by ſome extraordinary Means, had been the Occaſion of his own Death, and believed the ſame to be by Poiſon; but adjourned however until Seven the next Morning, at the Lord Chief Juſtice's Houſe, where having received his Lordſhip's Direction, they gave in their Verdict, That the ſaid Miles Sindercome, on the 13th of February, about Nine at Night, ſnuffed up a certain poiſoned Powder, through his Noſe, and by the Strength and Operation

Directed by the Ch. Juſtice find he poiſoned himſelf.

1656. 7 Car. II.

Operation of the ſaid Poiſon, he, the ſaid Miles Sindercome, within three Hours after, died; and ſo they found that he did felonioufly kill and murder himſelf.

Whereupon the Coroner iſſued his Warrant to the Conſtables and Headboroughs within the Liberty of the Tower, requiring them to bury the Corpſe of the ſaid Miles Sindercome in the common Highway; and it was accordingly, the ſame 17th of February, drawn to the open Place on Tower-Hill at a Horſe's Tail, with the Head forward, and thrown into a Hole dug under the common Scaffold forExecution, ſtark naked; and a Stake, ſpiked with Iron, driven through the Corpſe; that Part of the Stake, that remained above Ground, being plated with Iron.

Lord Clarendon's Account of Sindercome.

The Lord Clarendon, ſpeaking of Sindercome in his Hiſtory of the Grand Rebellion, ſays he was a very ſtout Man, and had been much in Cromwell's Favour, but afterwards became his Enemy, and had twice or thrice, by wonderful and unexpected Accidents, been diſappointed in the Minute he made ſure to kill him; and that when Cromwell cauſed him to be apprehended, his Behaviour was ſo reſolute at his Examination and Trial, as if he thought he ſhould ſtill be able to do it; and it was manifeſt he had more Aſſociates who were undiſcovered, and as reſolute as himſelf; and though Cromwell had got him condemned to die, the Fellow's Carriage and Words were ſuch, as if he knew very well how to avoid the Judgment; which made Cromwell believe, that a Party in the Army, would attempt his Reſcue: Whereupon he gave ſtrict Charge, that he ſhould be carefully looked to in the Tower, and three or four of the Guards always with him Day and Night. At the Day appointed for his Execution, thoſe Troops Cromwell were moſt confident of, were placed upon Tower-Hill, where the Gallows was erected; but when the Guard called Sindercome to riſe in the Morning, they found him dead in his Bed, which gave Trouble exceedingly to Cromwell; for beſides that he hoped, at his Death, to avoid the utmoſt Rigour of it, he would have confeſſed many of his Confederates; he now found himſelf under the Reproach of having cauſed him to be poiſoned, as not daring to bring him to publick Juſtice; nor could he ſuppreſs that Scandal. This Accident perplexed Cromwell very much; and though he was without the particular Diſcovery he expected, he made a general Diſcovery by it, that he himſelf was more odious in his Army, than he believed he had been. See Clarendon's Hiſtory, Vol. III. p. 646, & Seq. 8vo. Edit.

The Account the Uſurper thought fit to give of this Event.

In a Pamphlet entituled, A further Narrative of the Paſſages of theſe Times in the Common-Wealth of England, is recited, A brief Relation of the late dangerous Plot, publiſhed, as is evident from the Face of it, by the Uſurper's Authority and Direction; in which it is ſaid, "The principal Perſon employed in "the traiterous Deſign, for the Deſtruction "of his Highneſs's Perſon, was a notable "deſperate Fellow named Sindercome; one "who, heretofore, had been a Quarter-Maſter "under Sir John Reynolds in the Army; "and was, about two Years before, caſhiered "by General Monk, among others in Scotland: He aſſociated to himſelf one Cecil; "and many others were engaged in the Buſineſs: For the carrying on their Work, they "held Correſpondence with ſome in Flanders, "received Directions from thence, from Time "to Time; and for their Encouragement, "Don Alonzo, the late Ambaſſador of Spain "in England, returned them over Sums of "Money, with which they were enabled to "proceed."

1656. 7 Car. II.

In the ſame Pamphlet entitled, A further Narrative, &c. is recited alſo a Narrative, which, it is ſaid, Colonel Edward Sexby delivered to Sir John Barkſtead Lieutenant of the Tower, the 12th of October 1657; wherein they make Colonel Sexby ſay, "Sir John, "I ſent to you, to tell you that I am "guilty of the whole Buſineſs of Sindercome, "as to the Deſign of killing the Lord Protector, &c. And to that Purpoſe I furniſhed Sindercome with about 500 l. in Money, "and alſo with Arms; and tied him to an "Engagement, that he ſhould not reveal the "Deſign": Adding, "The Letters they "have of mine, they could not prove to be "mine; but by my own Confeſſion, which "I now confeſs and acknowledge, are mine. "And that I was with Charles Stuart, and "acquainted him, That I was an Enemy to "the Lord Protector: And I alſo declare, "That I received a large Sum of Money "from the Spaniards, to carry on the ſaid "Deſign, and to make what Confuſion I "could in England, by endeavouring the "killing of the Lord Protector, and by what "other Means I had in Deſign: And to that "End, the better to effect it, I came into England in a diſguiſed Habit, and was the Principal in putting on others in the ſaid Deſign: I was the only Man that ſet on Sindercome to kill the Lord Protector. He "owned the Book, called Killing no Murder, "and ſaid he was ſtill of that Judgment; "and yet they make him ſay, It was both "fooliſhly and knaviſhly done in that Book, "to charge the Lieutenant of the Tower "touching Sindercome's Death.

Colonel Sexby died in the Tower the 13*th of* January, 1657, almoſt a Year after Sindercome's Death.

Some Account who Sindercome was.

Miles Sindercome, was the Son of —— Sindercome of Deptford near London, and it is probable his Father was a Seaman, a great many of the Inhabitants of that Town being ſuch, and his Siſter appearing to be married to one Herring a Seaman, of that Place: However the Son (it is related) was Apprentice to a Surgeon at St. Katherine's near the Tower; and went into the Rebels Army, when the Civil Wars broke out, where he arrived at the Poſt of Quarter-Maſter of Horſe, and was a great Favourite of Cromwell's, till he found him averſe to his aſſuming Sovereign Power.

Having thus ſtated the Facts, as well as I was able, from the Materials before me; I ſhall now proceed to make ſome Remarks on the Trial and Death of Sindercome.

1656. 7 Car. II.

Remarks on Sindercome's Trial and Death.

I do not find any body doubts of Sindercome's Deſign to aſſaſſinate the Uſurper Cromwell; all the Diſpute was, whether ſuch a Conſpiracy was High-Treaſon, or rather, whether it was not a laudable Attempt, to endeavour to take away the Life of a Man, who had invaded the Liberties of his Country, which he pretended to defend; of one who had murdered his Sovereign; abſolutely deſtroyed the Conſtitution; and uſurped an arbritary Dominion over his Fellow-Subjects, whom he held in the moſt abject Slavery.

The Chief Juſtice Glynn, and his Brother, it ſeems, held, That this Uſurper and Tyrant was as lawful a Prince as ever reigned; and that all the Statutes made againſt Treaſon were equally in Force againſt thoſe who conſpired his Death, as if they had conſpired the Death of a Prince, againſt whoſe Title there was no manner of Exception; which was in Effect to adjudge there was no Diſtinction between Right and Wrong, between a Legal Government, and a Power that had nothing but Force to ſupport it: That a Pyrate, or a Highwayman, had as much Right to the Submiſſion and Obedience of thoſe he had got in his Power, as any Sovereign had to the Submiſſion and Allegiance of his Subjects; which is a Doctrine that might be expected from ſuch Judges, who were content to take their Commiſſions from the Uſurper, and who daily put Men to Death, and deprived them of their Liberties and Eſtates, by no better Authority. But I ſhall ſpend no Time in refuting an Opinion that all the World condemns at this Day. I proceed to another Queſtion that was made upon the Occaſion, viz. Whether it was lawful for any Subject, over whom Cromwell had (without any Colour or Pretence of Law) uſurped a Dominion, to endeavour to deliver himſelf, his Prince, and his Fellow-Subjects, from this Man's Tyranny and Oppreſſion, by taking away the Uſurper's Life: It ſeems, it was the Opinion of many in thoſe Times, that it was lawful, and an Heroick Act, to take off the Uſurper, by any Means whatever, when he was grown too great to be called to an Account by the ordinary Methods of Juſtice; and accordingly a Book was publiſhed, ſaid to be written by Colonel Titus, (though here they make Sexby the Author of it.) to prove Killing (in this Caſe) No Murder: And this, it ſeems, was the Opinion of the Old Romans, and the Maxim Brutus went upon, when he murdered Cæſar in the Senate, who had leſs to juſtify him than Sindercome had, inaſmuch as Cæſar did not add Oppreſſion to his Uſurpation, as Cromwell did to a very great Degree.

But whether ſuch Aſſaſſinations are juſtifiable or not, ſure I am, King Charles II. never gave any Countenance to them; either becauſe he did not approve of them, or becauſe he was ſatisfied the Uſurper would encourage the like Attempts upon him, and would be much more likely to ſucceed in them; the King having no Guards to ſecure his Perſon, as the Uſurper had. It may be obſerved farther, that Sindercome acted upon a different Principle than either the ancient Romans, or the modern Royaliſts, went upon; for he was a true Leveller, one who had been taught by the Uſurper, or his Creatures, that there ought to be no Diſtinction or Superiority amongſt Men: And, by Virtue of this Principle, had aſſiſted Cromwell, firſt in murdering his Prince, and then in ſubduing the Rump: And the poor deluded Enthuſiaſt expected, when this was accompliſhed, that Cromwell ſhould have relinquiſhed the Power, he had poſſeſſed himſelf of by their Means, and have left every Man to do what was Right in his own Eyes. And when Sindercome, and his Fellow-Levellers, found he aſſumed a more arbitrary and tyrannical Government than any they had demoliſhed, they were reſolved to cut him off: And it coſt him more Trouble and Diſquiet to ſubdue thoſe, into whom he had inſtilled the Levelling Principles, in order to deſtroy all the Powers above him, than it did to defend himſelf againſt the Loyaliſts, and all the Reſt of his Enemies. It is evident he never enjoyed any tolerable Security, after he diſcovered there was nothing in all that Hypocritical Zeal he had pretended for Religion and Liberty, and that Ambition was the Spring of all his Actions: When the Levellers ſaw this, they bent their whole Force againſt him; and he ſo much dreaded them, that he wore Armour under his Cloaths, and ſcarce ever lay twice in the ſame Chamber. Fear and Perplexity might be diſcovered in his Countenance, and he could not take his natural Reſt; he was ever diſtracted with frightful Dreams, and became the moſt uneaſy Mortal in the three Kingdoms he had ruined: This was the happy State he had waded through Seas of Blood to arrive at. But to return to Sindercome, and enquire a little into the Cauſe of his Death.

The Coroner's Jury (as well as the People) it appears, were in great Doubt what was the Occaſion of his Death; they adjourned twice, and could come to no Agreement, until they were carried to the Chief Juſtice's Chamber, and received his Directions. To ſuggeſt, as the Uſurper's Friends do, that they were carried thither only to learn how to put their Preſentment into Form, was ridiculous; this was the Coroner's Buſineſs, and not theirs; and he could not have wanted Inſtructions, if he had been ignorant of the Form himſelf: It is evident, therefore, the Jury were carried to the Chief Juſtice's Chamber to be threatened, or otherwiſe influenced in their Verdict; and here they are made to ſay, That he killed himſelf, by ſnuffing Poiſon up his Noſe: Though it did not appear to them that he ever had any Snuff, or that there was any lodged in the Noſtrils, or the Paſſages to the Brain, which ſurely there muſt have been, if the Brain had been affected by it: Beſides, Sindercome muſt be exceeding well skilled in Poiſons, to find one that ſhould operate ſo kindly, and ſo ſeaſonably; that only threw him into a pleaſant Slumber, according to the Depoſitions of his Guards, and killed him within the Space of two Hours, without a Struggle or a Groan, or at leaſt any ſuch Agonies or Convulſions, that might have been expected from a Poiſon, that had its Effect ſo ſuddenly; and as there were no Symptoms of 1656 7 Car II. Poiſon appeared, either in the Manner of his Death, or on the opening his Head or Body, it ſeems much more probable that he was ſmothered with the Bed-cloaths, than poiſoned. If it be demanded, why the Uſurper ſhould murder the poor Wretch privately? The Lord Clarendon, has furniſhed us with two very good Reaſons for it, (viz.) Leſt he ſhould be reſcued by his Brethren, the Levellers in the Army; or, he ſhould declare ſome unſeaſonable Truths, having been very intimate with the Uſurper.

Poiſon

His Mother's Depoſition is ſo drawn up, I muſt confeſs, that on the firſt Reading, one would be inclined to think ſhe was with him when he died; but upon reading it more carefully, I find ſhe only ſays, ſhe heard he was very ſick, and ſhe heard he died ſuddenly: Beſides the Coroner's Inqueſt find he died at Twelve a Clock at Night, and ſhe did not hear of his Illneſs, it appears, till then, if ſhe did till the next Day; for this Senſe the Words will very well bear, namely, That ſhe heard the next Day, that ſhe was ſent for at Twelve the preceding Night. 1656. 7 Car. II.

And laſtly, there can be very little Streſs laid on theſe Words of the Priſoner, that That was the laſt Bed he ſhould go into, if he did ſpeak them; for he might very well ſay this, though he had no Deſign of poiſoning himſelf, becauſe he knew he was to be executed the next Morning, and had Time allowed him by his Guard to ſay his Prayers, and prepare for his Execution: Their producing ſuch Circumſtances, therefore, to prove he murdered himſelf, ſeems to intimate they wanted better Evidence of it.

The Trial of Sir HENRY SLINGSBY, Knt. for High-Treaſon, before a pretended High Court of Juſtice in Weſtminſter-Hall, the 25th of May, 1658. 10 Car. II.

1658. 10 Car. II.

The Charge THE Impeachment charges Sir Henry with High-Treaſon againſt the Lord Protector (Cromwell) and the Common-Wealth, in conſpiring to betray the Town and Garriſon of Hull, to Charles Stuart, eldeſt Son of the late King Charles; and with endeavouring to withdraw Ralph Waterhouſe, John Overton, and other Officers of the ſaid Garriſon, from their Obedience to his Highneſs the ſaid Lord Protector: With endeavouring to raiſe an Inſurrection in Favour of the ſaid Charles Stuart, the Son, correſponding with him, and contriving to advance him to the Throne; and with delivering a Commiſſion from Charles Stuart to the ſaid Waterhouſe, to be Governor of the Caſtle of Hull.

He deſires a Trial by Jury Sir Henry being arraigned, deſired he might be tried by a Jury, according to Law; but was told, the Court conſiſted of a Number of Perſons amounting to two or three Juries: That Acts of Parliament made Law and Juſtice, and theſe had altered the Manner of Trial, and conſtituted this Court both Jury and Judges; and that he was a Parliament-Man when the Act was made, and ſo conſented to it.

Sir Henry replied, he was a Priſoner when the Act was made, and could not be ſaid to treſpaſs againſt their Laws, becauſe he never ſubmitted to them: That Laws were intended for the Preſervation of Liberty and Property; but every Thing was taken from him, he had received no Benefit by their Laws: However, Sir Henry being at length prevailed on to plead Not Guilty, the Attorney-General called his Witneſſes.

The Evidence Ralph Waterhouſe depoſed, That Sir Henry tampered with him, and offered him 5000 l. to ſecure the South-houſe for the King's Service, and ſaid that the Duke of York would bring over 7 or 8000 Men from Flanders to beſiege Hull, and if the South-houſe were ſecured, the Work would be half done: That Sir Henry alſo offered the Deponent a Commiſſion to be Governor of the Caſtle, and two Block-houſes near Hull, which was dated at Bruges, March 12, 1657, and that the Deponent had then the Command of a Company, and of the South-Block-Houſe.

Overton depoſed, he ſaw Sir Henry deliver the ſaid Commiſſion to Waterhouſe, in April, then laſt paſt: And that he alſo being an Officer of the Garriſon of Hull, and Sir Henry his Priſoner, he had in like Manner tampered with the Deponent to betray the Town to the King, and told him, the King would land either at Hull or Scarborough; and that the Priſoner ſaid, his Son aſſured him the Town was too ſtrong for the Garriſon.

George Thompſon, Lieutenant to Waterhouſe, alſo depoſed, That Sir Henry had tampered with him, and told him there was a Deſign to bring in the King with a conſiderable Army; and that the King had promiſed Pardon to all Officers, but the Lord Protector and Bradſhaw.

His Defence. Sir Henry in his Defence ſaid, he perceived he had been trepaned by theſe Fellows, and that they had ſworn that ſeriouſly, which he had ſpoken in Mirth, while he was their Priſoner in Hull; but that indeed they had moved the Matter to him, and not he to them; and that the Commiſſion they mentioned was a Blank he had by him theſe four Years.

1658. 10 Car. II. Hewet's Trial.

The Trial of JOHN HEWET, D. D. for High-Treason, before a pretended High-Court of Justice in Westminster-Hall, the first of June, 1658. 10 Car. II.

The Charge. THE Attorney-General exhibited an Impeachment against the Doctor, wherein he is charged with High-Treason, in conspiring, with other Traitors, to levy War against the Protector and Common-wealth, in order to subvert their Government, and advance Charles Stuart to the Throne: He is also charged with delivering Commissions from the said Charles Stuart, to John Stapely, and Henry Mallory, to levy War, &c.

He questions the Authority of the Court. The Doctor, being arraigned as usual, desired he might have Counsel; and this being denied, he demanded by what Authority the Court sat, and that their Commission might be read; but the President answered, they sat there by a Commission under the Great Seal, in pursuance of an Act of Parliament; and that it was not usual to read Commissions to Prisoners.

The Doctor replied, He was not to own every Person who would take upon himself to judge him, and therefore again desired to know by what Commission they sat; and if all the Commissioners were there, as he apprehended they ought to be, by the Earl of Leicester's Case in Plowden.

The Attorney-General said, the Commission authorized all the 150 named in it to be his Judges, or any Seventeen of them; but indeed where no Quorum was appointed, as in the Case in Plowden, they must be all present.

The Clerk demanding of the Doctor again, If he was Guilty, or Not Guilty? the Doctor answered, he should be loth to save his Life, by forfeiting a good Conscience: That he was looked upon in a double Capacity, as a Clergyman, and Common-wealths-man, and he would not give Scandal to either; therefore, if they would do Justice to themselves, and vindicate the Legality of their Judicature, he would proceed: Otherwise he would rather die ten thousand Times, than be guilty of giving up his Fellow-Freemens Liberties and Privileges: And the Doctor, refusing peremptorily to plead, was ordered to be taken away, and John Mordant, Esq; to be brought to the Bar. Refuses to plead.

1658. 10 Car. II. Mordant's Trial.

The Trial of the Hon. JOHN MORDANT, Esq; for High-Treason, before a pretended High Court of Justice, the first of June, 1658. 10 Car. II.

The Charge. THE Prisoner was impeached of High-Treason, against the Lord Protector and Common-wealth, for inciting and endeavouring to raise a new War, in order to subvert their Government, and advance Charles Stuart to the Throne; and for that he consulted with John Stapely and Henry Mallory how to effect the same, and delivered Commissions to several other Persons to levy War against the Government.

Mr. Mordant, being arraigned, made the same Objections to the Court, and the Legality of this Method of Trial, that Dr. Hewet had done; but at length, by the Advice of his Friends, and an Intimation that Mercy was intended towards him, he pleaded Not guilty.

The Evidence. Then the Protector's Counsel produced their Evidence, and first Mr. John Stapely was sworn, who deposed, That the Prisoner told him there was a Design to bring in the King, who had wrote to him to speak to his Friends to be ready; and that the King would bring 7000 Men with him; and Sir Francis Vincent and Sir William Waller were in the Conspiracy.

Mr. Anthony Stapely deposed, That being at the Half-Moon-Tavern, in Aldersgate-street, with Captain Mallory and Mr. Mordant, the latter enquired into the Affairs of Sussex, and what Preparations there were, in case the King of Scots should land; and the Deponent answering, There would be an Appearance answerable to his Expectations; but there was a considerable Strength ready to assist them in Surrey; Mr. Mordant replied, He had delivered out four Commissions, three of Horse, and one of Foot, to the best of his Remembrance, but he durst not swear it; and it was agreed to meet at Crawley, in Surrey, the Tuesday following, to concert Matters between Surrey and Sussex.

Then the Deposition of Captain Mallory, who had escaped out of Prison, was read; giving an Account of the Conspirators meeting at the Half-Moon, and appointing to meet again in Surrey, to see how Affairs stood in relation to the Counties of Surrey and Sussex. His Defence.

Mr. Mordant observed in his Defence, That the first Witness did not swear he saw any Letter from Charles Stuart, and however he was but one Witness; that the next was very uncertain in his Evidence, and could not tell, whether the Commissions were for Horse or Foot; that there was no Meeting at the Place mentioned in Surrey, nor was it said what they were were to meet about. Then the Court adjourned; and on the 2d of June, Sir Henry Slingsby, Doctor Hewet, and Mr. Mordant, were again brought to the Bar, and Mr. Attorney prayed the Judgment of the Court as to Sir Henry Slingsby and Mr. Mordant; and as to Doctor Hewet, who refused to plead, he demanded their Justice.

The President thereupon demanding of Sir Henry Slingsby, what he could say, Why the Court should not proceed to Judgment? He answered, he desired to be tried by a Jury, looking on the Court as his Enemies, some of them having already sequestered and sold his Estate, because he would not compound; and if he had compounded, the Times were so unsettled, that he did not know but he might be compelled to compound over again; and thought it strange, that his Enemies should be both his Judges and Jury: But the Court would hear no more of this; and the President proceeded to make a Speech to the Prisoners, wherein he tells them, That it was a great Aggravation of the Sins of the Egyptians, that when God had declared himself by so many Signs and Wonders on Behalf of the Israelites, they should still pursue Moses: And who could be so much a Stranger to these Nations, as to be ignorant what God had done among them, by a Series of wonderfull Providences so many Years together, against a Party, who were still hatching of Treasons and Rebellions against them? That it grieved his Soul to think, after so many signal Providences, wherein God seemed to declare himself as it were by Signs and Wonders, that their Hearts should be more hardned than the Egyptians; for they did at length see that the Lord fought against them: But the Cavaliers, though they could not but see that the Lord fought against them, that the Stars in their Courses fought against them, yet they would not see or confess it, till their Destruction overtook them; and if these wonderful Providences would not move them, he thought National Considerations might deter them from these Practices: For Charles Stuart was in Confederacy with Spain, that great Popish Interest against England: And it was very strange that a Protestant could assist such an Interest as this; yet such Protestants were the Prisoners. And as to Sir Henry Slingsby's observing that he was a Prisoner, and therefore not subject to their Laws; he said every Man owed a Natural Allegiance to the supreme Magistrate, and that his not owning the Government was in itself a great Offence, and far from being an Excuse for Treason: And what did they think would have become of the Protestant Interest if they had succeeded, and Charles Stuart had been brought in? Did they but review the Declarations of Parliament, since 1640, they would see what Family it was betrayed the Protestants of France, when Rochel was taken? What Family it was that betrayed the Protestants in Germany, and in the Palatinate, when a Peace was made with Spain? What could they think of that Family that could tolerate Popery for a Match with Spain? What would that Family have done if they had regained the three Kingdoms once again?

1658. 10 Car. II.

As to Mr. Mordant, he said, God appeared to him at this Time, as he did to Sinners in Jesus Christ; for he did clear Sinners in Jesus Christ, even when they were Guilty, and so God cleared him. He would not say he was Guilty, but bid him ask his own Conscience, whether he was so or not? and bless God as long as he lived, and bless the Lord Protector, by whose Authority he was cleared.

Mordant acquitted.

Then the Clerk was ordered to read the Sentence against the other two Prisoners, viz.) That they should be Drawn, Hanged, Beheaded and Quartered; but the Protector was pleased to be contented with the severing their Heads from their Bodies: And they were beheaded on Tower-Hill, the 8th of June.

They are Executed.

I do not perceive, there was any formed Plot for bringing in the King at this Time; but his Majesty had been endeavouring to prevail with the Spaniards, to spare him a Body of Troops; and the Cavaliers, in hopes that a Negotiation would have succeeded, were numbering their Friends, and computing what Forces they might depend on, if the King should Land. And it is amazing that, after so long and so cruel a Tyranny, the Spirits of the Cavaliers were not yet broken; that after so many Repulses and Defeats, they should retain their Courage, and dare to oppose the Usurper, who was supported by an Army of Veteran Troops: They were not yet convinced it seems, that Success was an Argument of a good Cause; nor would the President of this Mock-Court, if he had foreseen that, within the space of Two Years, all his Arguments, drawn from the Success of the Tyrant's Arms, would have retorted with so much Advantage upon the Rebels, so shamefully have insulted these brave Men, who refused to acknowledge the Tyrant's Jurisdiction.

Remarks on the Trial of Sir Henry Slingsby, &c.

We see the President also, urging the danger of Popery against a Restoration; not reflecting, that his Masters had destroyed all Appearance of Religion; unless Hypocrisy and Cant, Oppression and Injustice, might pass for such: And as to the State, they could not be ignorant that the Constitution was entirely subverted, and all their Liberties and Priviledges swallowed up, by the successful Usurpation they so much adored.

What worse could have happened by the Restoration of the King, with what he endeavoured to terrify the People? And when this Event, which he seemed so much to dread, happened, how were the Days of King Charles II. when the Laws flowed in their proper Channel, and every Man remained secure in the Enjoyment of his Property, preferable to that Iron Age, when every Thing, and every Person, was forced to submit to the arbitrary Dictates of the Usurpers!

With what a different Face did the Nation appear after the Restoration! Arts and Sciences, universal Benevolence, good Humour, and Freedom of Conversation, were some of the blessed Fruits of the King's Return; while nothing but Murders, Robberies, Sequestrations, and Decimations, were exercised on the best and greatest Part of the Nation, during the

The Trials of Twenty-Nine of the REGICIDES, for High-Treaſon, by a Commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer, at the Old-Bailey, London, 10 October, 1660. 12 Car. II.

The Trials of the Regicides.

The Charge THE Indictment charged them with Compaſſing and Imagining the Death of the late King Charles I. And the ſitting in Judgment on his Majeſty, and ſigning a Warrant for the Execution, were laid as Overt-Acts of that Treaſonable Imagination.

Harriſon tried. Colonel Thomas Harriſon, was the firſt of the Regicides that was brought upon his Trial; who being Arraigned and directed to plead Guilty or Not Guilty, ſaid they were vain Words, and deſired he might anſwer the Charge his own way; however, he was prevailed on at length to plead Not Guilty.

The Evidence againſt him. Then the King's Counſel opened the Indictment, and produced Five Witneſſes, who depoſed, that Thomas Harriſon, the Priſoner, ſat as one of the King's Judges, in the pretended high Court of Juſtice; and particularly on the 27th of January, 1648. when the Sentence was read; and that he ſtood up with the reſt, to expreſs his Aſſent to it: And one of the Witneſſes made Oath, that the Members of that pretended Court, ſitting in the Exchequer Chamber, and debating concerning the Impeachment of the King, Harriſon ſaid, Gentlemen, it will be good for us to Blacken him; and that he heard Harriſon tell the other Regicides, that when he was bringing the King to London, the King asked him when they were in the Coach together, what they intended to do with him; whether to Murder him or not: And the Priſoner anſwered, there was no intention to Murder him; they had no ſuch Thoughts; but the Lord hath reſerved you for a publick Example of Juſtice. The Priſoner's Hand alſo was proved to the Warrant for ſummoning the High Court of Juſtice, and to the Warrant for Beheading his late Majeſty

The Lord Newburgh depoſed further, That Harriſon commanded the Party that brought the King from Hurſt-Caſtle to London; and that his Majeſty dining on the Road, at Bagſhot-Lodge, where the Deponent then reſided, Harriſon gave Orders for placing the Centinels; and when they ſet forward for Windſor, Harriſon ordered ſeveral of his Officers to ride cloſe to his Majeſty, leſt he ſhould make his Eſcape.

Harriſon's Defence. The Priſoner ſaid in his Defence, that the Matter, he was charged with, was not done in a Corner; the Sound of it had reached moſt Nations: And he believed the Hearts of ſome had felt the Terrors of that Preſence of God that was with his Servants in thoſe Days; however it had ſeemed good to God to ſuffer this Turn to come upon them: That he had earneſtly deſired of God, the Searcher of Hearts, if he had done amiſs, that he might receive ſome Convictions on his Conſcience; but though he had ſought it with Tears many a Time of that God, in reſpect of whom they and all Nations were but as a Drop of the Bucket, to that Moment he had rather received Aſſurance of the Juſtice of what he had done: And he believed, e'er long, it would be made known from Heaven, there was more of God in it, than Men were aware of: That their Lordſhips knew what a Conteſt there had been for many Years, and how active many upon the Bench had been. And being reprimanded by the Court for his Reflections, he went on, and ſaid, That what he had done was out of Conſcience to the Lord; and he conceived, that what had been done by Authority of Parliament, no other Juriſdiction could meddle with: That they were the ſupreme Authority, and thoſe who acted under them could not be queſtioned by any Power leſs than that. And whereas it had been ſaid they uſurped that Power, he ſaid it was rather done In the Fear of the Lord. (Here he was interrupted again, and told, that ſuch Things were not fit to be vented in an Aſſembly of Chriſtians, to make God the Author of all their damnable Treaſons.) He proceeded, however, and ſaid, That what he had done by Authority of Parliament, he ought not to be queſtioned for: Otherwiſe they were in a miſerable Condition, Bound to obey thoſe that were in Authority, and yet to be puniſhed when they obeyed; and deſired Counſel to that Point. The Court anſwered, If there was any Difficulty, they ſhould, and ought to be Counſel for him; but that neither one or both the Houſes of Parliament, neither the People, collectively or repreſentatively, had any Coercive Power over their King; much leſs thoſe few Members of the Commons, after they had purged their Houſe of the Corrupt Majority, as they called it: And Mr. Anneſley put the Priſoner in mind, That he was the Man that forcibly removed the Parliament's Guard, and placed other Guards at the Door of the Houſe, who threatened and inſulted the Members: That after the Houſe had reſolved, That the Treaty in the Iſle of Wight was a

Ground

1660. 12 Car. II.

Ground for Peace, Forces were drawn down to the Houſe of Commons, and none ſuffered to come in, but thoſe the Soldiers approved of: And all, who profeſſed any Duty to the King, were ſeized on by Harriſon, and his Fellows; and then the Priſoner, and a ſmall Remnant of the Houſe, declared againſt the Vote that had paſſed for a Treaty with his Majeſty, and took upon them to exerciſe Sovereign Authority; and under theſe he would skreen himſelf, as acting by Authority of Parliament, when a Majority of the Houſe of Commons diſavowed their Proceedings: And had they been Entire, they could have had no Pretence to the ſupreme Authority.

The Chief Baron's Charge to the Jury.

Then the Lord Chief Baron proceeded to direct the Jury, and informed them, That if any of the Overt-Acts, laid in the Indictment, was proved; either his Conſulting, Adviſing, Sitting in Judgment, or Sentencing the King, they ought to find the Priſoner Guilty; but here All theſe Facts were proved, not only by Witneſſes, but by the Priſoner's Confeſſion: He obſerved alſo, that the Priſoner had the King; in his Cuſtody, and brought him Priſoner from Hurſt-Caſtle, without any Authority from thoſe he called the Supreme Power: And that if any Man went about to impriſon the King, it had been often adjudged an Evidence of imagining and compaſſing the King's Death: That the Priſoner was ſo far from denying the Facts, that he juſtified what had been laid to his Charge. Whereupon the Jury found him guilty, without going out of Court; and Sentence was pronounced on him as a Traitor.

He is convicted and condemned

Scroop tried.

Then Adrian Scroop was brought to the Bar, againſt whom ſix or ſeven Witneſſes depoſed, That they had ſeen him ſit as one of the late King's Judges, in the pretended High Court of Juſtice; and particularly, on the 27th of January, when the Sentence was read, and they all ſtood up to expreſs their Aſſent to it: His Hand was alſo proved to the Warrant for ſummoning the Court, and to the Warrant for beheading the King.

The Evidence.

His Defence.

Mr. Scroop ſaid in his Defence, That the High Court of Juſtice was erected by the Parliament, which was then the Supreme Authority of the Nation, and generally ſubmitted to; and what he had done, was in Obedience to that Authority.

The Court reply to him.

The Lord Chief Baron replied, That what he had offered in his Defence, tended rather to aggravate, than extenuate his Crime; that he (as well as others) was miſtaken in the Word Parliament: There was not one Precedent of any other Houſe of Commons aſſuming Legiſlative Power, or making an Act to erect a Court of Juſtice, for the Trial of their King: And beſides, there were but Forty-ſix, even of the Commons, that ſat in the Houſe; Two Hundred and Forty were excluded; ſo that they had no Pretence to be called an Houſe: That the Lords alſo were then in being, and rejected that pretended Act, under which they would ſhelter themſelves; and of the Forty-ſix Commoners that remained in the Lower-Houſe, there were not more than Five or Six and Twenty that were for erecting that Court; and theſe Men had taken the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and ſworn to defend the King, his Crown and Rights, againſt all Perſons whatſoever: That they had acknowledged, in the Oath of Supremacy, that the King was the ſupreme Governor of theſe Nations; and ſworn that they would maintain all the Priviledges, Immunities and Preheminences, annexed to the Imperial Crown of this Realm; and thoſe who pretended that Men, by breaking through all the Ties and Obligations of Allegiance, could gain any lawful Authority, muſt ſpeak againſt the Light of their Conſciences, and all Laws, Divine and Human. Mr. Scroop ſaid, If he had been miſled, he was not the only Perſon. He ſaw a great many Faces that were miſled as well as himſelf; and he hoped an Error in Judgment would not be accounted Malice: He never went to Work with a malicious Intent, or bore Malice to his late Majeſty: But the Lord Chief Baron told him, that though this might be ſome Excuſe for him before God, in Law the Fact itſelf implied Malice; and the Jury, without going out of Court, found him guilty.

But 26 of the Commons that voted for trying the King.

1660. 12 Car. II.

Scroop reflects on the Court.

He is convicted.

Then Mr. John Carew was brought to the Bar, and the King's Counſel having opened the Indictment, the Witneſſes depoſed, That the Priſoner ſat as one of the late King's Judges, in the pretended High-Court of Juſtice: That his Hand was to the Warrant for ſummoning the ſaid Court, and to the Warrant for beheading his late Majeſty; and that the Priſoner was a Member of the Long Parliament.

Carew tried.

The Evidence.

Mr. Carew, in his Defence, ſeemed much offended, that it was ſaid in the Indictment, he had not the Fear of God before his Eyes, but was moved by the Devil to murder the King; and averred, that what he had done, was in the Fear of the Lord, and in Obedience to his Holy and Righteous Laws: He confeſſed that he did Conſent to be one of the late King's Judges; firſt, in Obedience to the Lord; and, ſecondly, in Obedience to that which was then the Supreme Authority of the Nation: That the Matter in Queſtion had been controverted in the Face of the whole World; and the Lord had given an Anſwer upon ſolemn Appeals; (And was entering upon the Grounds and Reaſons of the War) But the Court let him know, That they muſt not hear him make Diſcourſes in Juſtification of a horrid and notorious Treaſon; and as to his having acted in the Fear of the Lord, they bid him remember, that the Devil appeared ſometimes as an Angel of Light: And that he ſhould not be ſuffered to caſt in Bones of Contention, to revive thoſe Differences which were but juſt laid aſleep. That this Treaſon had no Relation to what was done by the Lords and Commons, at the Beginning of the War; for the Act, under which he pretended to skreen himſelf, was not made by the Authority of either Houſe: There were but Forty-ſix of the Commons in the Houſe, when it was debated; and not more than Twenty-ſix that voted it; which could never be underſtood by any one to be an Act of Parliament: It was no more than an Order of a ſmall Remnant of the Commons, after they had excluded a vaſt Majority.

He continues to juſtify the Fact.

The Priſoner replied, Since they would not ſuffer him to open the Nature of theſe Things, and the Grounds he went on, which ſatisfied his own Conſcience, that what he did was from the Lord, he left his Cauſe to the Jury; telling them, that the Authority he ſpoke of was a Rightful Authority; it was the Supreme Power: It was well known what they were: Concluding, he had deſired to ſpeak the Words of Truth, and Soberneſs; but was prevented.

He is convicted.

Then the Court having obſerved to the Jury, that the Treaſon was fully proved, both by Witneſſes, and his own Confeſſion, they found him Guilty, without going from the Bar: After which the Court adjourned.

Scot tried.

The Court ſitting again the 12th of October, Thomas Scot was brought to the Bar, againſt whom the Indictment being opened, and the Jury ſworn, ſeveral Witneſſes depoſed, That the Priſoner ſat as one of the late King's Judges, in the pretended high Court of Juſtice, and particularly, on the 27th of January, when all the Members ſtood up, to expreſs their Aſſent to the Sentence: Another Witneſs depoſed, That his Hand was to the Warrant for beheading the late King. Sir Theophilus Biddolph depoſed, that he heard Mr. Scot ſay, in Richard's Parliament, That he ſat as one of the King's Judges; and he was ſo far from repenting of it, that he deſired this Inſcription might be upon his Tomb, (Viz.) Here lies Thomas Scot, who adjudged to Death the late King. Colonel Copley teſtified the ſame Thing; and that the Priſoner added, He hoped he never ſhould repent of the King's Death.

The Lord Mayor Elect depoſed, That on the laſt Day of the ſitting of the Parliament, a little before his Majeſty's Return to England, Mr. Scot, ſeeing the Houſe muſt break, ſaid, Their Heads muſt be laid to the Block, if there was a new Parliament: I confeſs (ſaid he) I had a Hand in putting the King to Death, and I deſire all the World may take Notice of it; and when I die, that it may be written on my Tomb. I do not repent of any Thing I have done; if it it were to do, I could do it again. William Lenthall, Eſq; alſo depoſed, That, the Houſe being about to diſſolve itſelf, Mr. Scot made a Speech, juſtifying the putting the King to Death; but he did not remember the particular Expreſſions mentioned by the other Witneſſes. Then the Lord Mayor further depoſed, that this was the Concluſion of Mr. Scot's Speech in the Houſe, Being it is your Pleaſure to have it ſo (the Houſe diſſolved), I know not how to hinder it; but when that is done, I know not where to hide this hated Head of mine. Mr. Baker alſo depoſed, that diſcourſing with Mr. Scot, in the Time of Richard's Parliament, he ſaid, He had cut off one Tyrant's Head, and he hoped to cut off another.

Scot's Defence.

The Priſoner ſaid in his Defence, that it was a Breach of Privilege to proſecute him in an inferiour Court, for what he had ſaid, or done, in Parliament; but the Court informed him, that for Treaſon, or Felony, committed in the Parliament-Houſe, there was no Privi- 1660. 12 Car II.
ledge that could prevent his being tried for them in the Courts of Common-Law; but that there did not want other Evidence of his compaſſing and imagining the King's Death.

Then Mr. Scot proceeded in his Defence, and averred, That he never ſaid, He hoped he ſhould never repent of the King's Death: But on the contrary, he had often, by Prayers and Tears, beſought the Lord, that if there were any Iniquity in it, he would ſhew it him: That it was by the Command and Authority of a Parliamentary Power he ſat as one of the King's Judges; and this muſt juſtify him, whatever the Nature of the Fact was: That this Court could not take Cognizance whether they were a legal Parliament, or not; and he did not know, but it might be as fit for that Parliament to make Laws, as the laſt, being called by the Keepers of the Liberties of England: That if they were not properly a Parliament, they were the Legiſlative Power, and their Acts binding: That if two Eſtates might exclude a Third, as they had done the Biſhops; if the ſecond did not continue to exerciſe their Truſt; they that were in, by Occupancy might have a Title to the whole; and continued to inſiſt he had a Parliamentary Authority, a Legiſlative Power, to juſtify him.

The Court reply to his Defence.

The Court replied, That theſe Things had been urged already, and that no ſingle Perſon or Community, neither the People collectively, or repreſentatively, had any Coercive Power over the King. That the Aſſembly, who made that pretended Act, were not an Eighth Part of the Commons Houſe: That the Houſe of Lords was then ſitting, and rejected it; and therefore there was nothing like Parliamentary Authority to juſtify him. That Forty Highwaymen, met together at Shooter's-Hill, might as well pretend to Parliamentary Authority, as that little Convention at Weſtminſter: That the vulgar Acceptation of the Word Parliament, had led many into Miſtakes; but that nothing could properly be ſaid to be done by Parliamentary Authority, but what was done by King, Lords, and Commons: And as to what the Priſoner mentioned, concerning the ejecting the Biſhops, this was not at all to the Purpoſe; for that Act was made by the Conſent of King, Lords, and Commons: And,

Mr. Anneſley put the Priſoner in mind, that when the People appeared jealous that they intended to alter the Government, the Parliament called it A Black Scandal, caſt upon them: And that the two Houſes cauſed a Declaration to be affixed on all the Churches in England: That they held the Government of King, Lords and Commons, to be the Fundamental Government of this Kingdom. Then the Priſoner claimed the Benefit of his Majeſty's Pardon; but the Court replyed, It was very odd to talk of a Pardon, after ſuch a Juſtification: That the King's Proclamation could not be pleaded in Bar to the Proceedings of the Court: They could take no Notice of a Pardon that was not under the Broad Seal; though they did not doubt his Majeſty would Inviolably make it good, if he appeared to be within it. Then the Lord Chief Baron directed directed the Jury, and took particular Notice of the aggravating Speeches of the Prisoner, his Justifying the King's Murder, and wishing the Action might be Engraven on his Tomb: And the Jury thereupon found him Guilty.

Clement pleads Guilty.

Then Gregory Clement was brought into Court, and pleaded Guilty.

Jones Convicted.

John Jones also, being set to the Bar, offered to make a partial Confession, which the Court not accepting, the Jury was sworn, and the Witnesses produced, who deposed they saw the Prisoner sit as one of the late King's Judges, in the pretended High Court of Justice. His Hand also was proved to the Warrant for summoning the Court, and to the Warrant for beheading the King: And the Jury found him Guilty.

The Chief Baron's Speech to the Prisoners.

Then all the Prisoners, that had been tried after Harrison, were set to the Bar; and it was demanded, what they had to say, why Judgment should not pass upon them: To which they generally answered, they threw themselves on the King's Mercy: And the Lord Chief Baron made a Speech to them on the Occasion, in which he set the horrid Crime the Prisoners were convicted of, in a proper Light: He told them the King they had murdered, was a Person of eminent Parts and Virtues, that would have rendered him admired even in a private Station: That his Clemency appeared in the beginning of his Reign; and, if they looked back, they would find the People enjoyed greater Peace and Prosperity in his Days, than in the Reigns of former Princes: That but one Nobleman had been put to Death in his Time, and that for an Offence not to be named. That they might remember the King had, before the Wars, redressed every Grievance they could complain of; the Star-Chamber, High-Commission, Ship-Money, the Claim of Stannery, &c. That they would do well also to reflect what Concessions his Majesty made at the Isle of Wight; how he wooed and courted the People to obtain Peace: And that they should kill their King, and such a King, They ought to lay it to Heart, and consider with themselves; for, though they pretended Conscience, they should remember what Our Saviour said: That the Time will come, when they will persecute you and kill you, and think they do God good Service. That there was such a Thing as Spiritual Pride, and Men might be over-run with an Opinion of their own Holiness, and go by pretended Revelations, and say they prayed about such a Thing, and found no Remorse or Reluctance; as the Man in Shropshire, who murdered his Father and Mother, when he was questioned for it, alledged, he had prayed against it, and could not understand it to be a Sin. And therefore he exhorted the Criminals to try their Spirits, and examine the Fact by the Word of God, and not think every Fancy and Imagination to be Conscience: After which, the usual Sentence in High Treason was passed upon them, and the Court adjourned.

Sentence passed on the Prisoners.

Cook tried.

The Court meeting again the 14th of October, John Cook, Solicitor to the Regicides, who preferred the Charge of High Treason against the late King, was brought to the Bar: And not challenging any of the Pannel, the first twelve were sworn of the Jury. Then the Solicitor-General opened the Indictment, and observed that this was the Man, who exhibited that wicked Instrument, called A Charge of High-Treason, against his late Majesty in the Name of all the People of England: That he aggravated the Charge, and would not suffer his Majesty to speak in his Defence: Told the King he endeavoured to spin out Delays, and desired the Charge might be taken pro confesso: That this was the Man that pressed the pretended Court to give Judgment against the King; and demanded that wicked Judgment before it was pronounced: And though he had acknowledged his Majesty to be a Wise and Gracious King, yet declared, That he must die, and Monarchy with him: That this was the Prisoner's part, who had also received Wages, and a Reward for his Iniquity. Then the Witnesses were called, who deposed, That the Prisoner exhibited an Impeachment, or Parchment-Writing, to the pretended High Court of Justice, which was called A Charge against the King; and the said Charge being now produced, it was proved that Cook's Hand was subscribed to it: That he often interrupted his Majesty, and prayed that the Charge might be taken pro confesso; and for several Days pressed for Judgment against his Majesty.

1660. 12 Car. II.

The Indictment opened.

The Evidence.

It was testified also, that Cook charged his Majesty with being guilty of the Highest Treasons and Crimes, that ever were acted on the Theatre of England; and pressing that Judgment might be given against his Majesty, said, That it was not so much he, as the Innocent and precious Blood that had been shed, that cryed for Judgment against the Prisoner at the Bar (The King). And one Starkey, of Gray's-Inn, deposed, that, discoursing with Cook about his being made Solicitor-General, he answered, He was serving the People; that he would see strange Things; and that he must wait upon God: He did acknowledge the King was a Wise and Gracious Prince; but said, He must die, and Monarchy with him.

Cook's Defence.

But Cook cross-examining Nutley, one of the Witnesses, Nutley deposed, that he heard the Prisoner say, He hoped they did not intend to take away the King's Life: That he (the Prisoner) laboured against it; and they told him, they only intended to bring him to submit to the Parliament.

The Prisoner further said in his Defence, That the Words he used at that Proceeding, were not his own; he was directed what he should speak, and he hoped he might make much the same Plea St. Paul did, That against Cæsar or against the Law, he had not offended at all: For first, he was commanded to do what he did, and acting only within his own Sphere as a Counsellor, by the Command of the then supreme Power, he could not be guilty of Treason: Secondly, Words could not amount to Treason; and though it was said, his Hand was to the Impeachment, he thought that was not well proved: He insisted further, That one who writes or speaks Words dictated by another, (though they might might be in their own Nature treaſonable) yet they were not Treaſon on the Writer or Speaker, becauſe they did not diſcover a traiterous Heart; and he appealed to God, if he uſed one irreverend Expreſſion towards his Majeſty, or ſtiled him, The Priſoner at the Bar, as the Witneſs had ſworn: That a Counſellor was to make the beſt of his Client's Cauſe, and leave it to the Court; and Counſellors did frequently engage in Buſineſs, before they rightly underſtood the Fact: He appealed to the Counſel, if they had not many Times been ſorry, that a Verdict had been given for their Client, when they diſcovered the Right lay on the other Side; and this might be his Caſe. Had it been a Time of Peace, he acknowledged this would have been Treaſon; but his Majeſty being in the Power of the Army, the drawing up a Charge againſt him, and deſiring Juſtice, and that he might be brought to a ſpeedy Trial, in order to his Acquittal, was rather a Service to his Majeſty, than Treaſon againſt him: He urged further, That what he had done in that Matter, was for his Fee, and not of Malice; though it might be called Avaritia, it could not be called Malitia; he did nothing Judicially but Miniſterially: But conſcious his Defence was very weak, he ſaid he laid hold on his Majeſty's Declaration at Breda, wherein he promiſed to pardon all who were not excepted in a free Parliament; and he obſerved, that this Convention, not being called by the King's Writ, was not ſuch a Parliament, as could make the Exception: Concluding, That human Juſtice did never puniſh ſo much for Expiation as Prevention, that others might be deterred from committing ſuch Acts; that now all Things were ſettled, there could be no Danger in ſparing him, the like Caſe could never happen again.

The King's Counſel Reply.

The King's Counſel, in their Reply to this Defence ſaid, That the Priſoner miſtook his Charge, if he thought it was only for Words; it was for compaſſing and imagining the King's Death; and the Evidence of that Charge was, his meeting in an Aſſembly of the Regicides, and the Part he bore in that Aſſembly: Nor was it a General Rule, That Words were not Treaſon; for if a Man declare the Imagination of his Heart, by exhorting and perſuading Men to kill the King, there could not be a greater Overt-Act than ſuch Words, or a clearer Evidence of his traiterous Imagination: And as to his Innocence in ſimply demanding Juſtice, they were to obſerve, That the Subject-Matter, was a Charge of High-Treaſon againſt the King; he prayed that the King, as a Traitor, might be brought to Juſtice; preſſed that the Charge might be taken pro confeſſo: And whether Mr Cook could intend this, in order to the Acquittal of his Majeſty, he left the Jury to determine.

As to the Priſoner's laying hold on his Majeſty's Letter or Declaration from Breda, that could not amount to a Pardon, not being under the Broad Seal; neither would the Words it contained have amounted to a Pardon, if they had been under the Broad Seal: Beſides, it appeared by the King's Letter, that he intended ſuch as ſhould be excepted by that very Parliament his Letter was directed to, and the Priſoner was expreſly excepted by Name; his Majeſty therefore was not obliged even in Honour to ſpare him. 1660. 12 Car. II.

That the Jury ſhould conſider the Caſe as their own: The Priſoner had exhibited a Charge againſt his late Majeſty, in the Name of All the People of England, of whom they were Part, and they ought to let the World know, that the People of England had no Hand in that Charge: That they ſhould conſider how the Priſoner had hunted after the King's Life; how he had fiſhed for Evidence againſt him, aggravated the Charge, was afflicted at the Delays, and angry when he was interrupted.

And as to the Priſoner's ſaying, He pleaded for his Fee, Judas too had thirty Pieces of Silver, for which he hanged himſelf; and it was the higheſt Diſgrace he could throw upon the long Robe, to ſhelter himſelf under his Profeſſion: That indeed it was an Aggravation of his Crime, that he, who knew the Law ſo well, ſhould ſo groſly tranſgreſs it: That Mr. Cook in adviſing the Act, was as inſtrumental, as much a Traitor, as the Man in the Frock that did the Execution: That a Counſellor indeed was not always bound to know the Judge's Patent; but here was no Colour of a legal Proceeding, nothing but a mock Court of Juſtice, ſuch a one as Mr. Cook never met with in all his Reading: They knew of no Law under Heaven for putting the King to Death, though they endeavoured to ſhelter themſelves under a Colour of Juſtice, to do the moſt execrable Treaſon in the World.

The Chief Baron ſums up the Evidence.

The Lord Chief Baron in ſumming up the Evidence obſerved, that when Cook demanded Juſtice againſt the King, he had charged him as A Tyrant, Traitor, Murderer, and common Enemy; that thoſe, who ſpit in the King's Face, alſo demanded Juſtice; but every Man knew what they meant by Juſtice: That the Priſoner had alſo urged, That it was not ſo much he, as the Blood that had been ſhed, that cried for Judgment; and whether the Priſoner meant a Judgment for the King's Acquittal, he left to the Jury: He took Notice alſo of the Priſoner's Anſwers to Starkey, when he expoſtulated with him about being concerned in the King's Murder, (viz.) You ſhall ſee ſtrange Things; you muſt wait upon God: This, the Chief Baron obſerved, was then the canting Language of thoſe who were about to commit ſome horrid Impiety, and from that other Expreſſion, The King muſt die, and Monarchy with him, it appeared it was Monarchy and Government they hated: Many of thoſe who ſat upon the late King, acknowledged he was a gracious Prince; they did not hate his Perſon any more than the Priſoner, but Monarchy was the Thing they would behead.

That as to his having acted by the Authority in Being, and citing the 11 Hen. II. which provides, That he who ſerves a King for the Time being in his Wars, ſhall not be puniſhed; that Act was expreſly againſt him: For that Act was made for the Preſervation of a 1660. 12 Car. II. King de facto, much more of a King de jure; and the Perſon they had ſtiled their Priſoner, they had owned to be their King; they charged him as King, and ſentenced him as King. That King Henry VIIth's Care was to preſerve even a King de facto, and Kingly Government; it was not in favour of an Antimonarchical Government. The Regicides proceeded againſt their own King, as their King; calling him, in their Charge, Charles Stuart, King of England; and therefore there was no Colour that the Priſoner ſhould have any Benefit of the Letter, or the Equity, of 11 Hen. VII.

King

Cook's Reply to the Chief Baron.

However, Mr. Cook, being indulged the Liberty of replying to the Chief Baron, ſaid, Though their Lordſhips were pleaſed to lay no Weight on the Orders or Authority by which he acted; he did then act truly and conſcientiouſly, and thought that Authority would have borne him out; though the Court were pleaſed to look upon them as a parcel of People without Authority, his Judgment was not yet convinced as to that Point; and that all the Words he ſpoke were dictated to him, even thoſe, That it was not ſo much he, as the innocent Blood, that cried for Juſtice.

To which the Chief Baron ſaid, He made his Caſe rather worſe: That they had delivered their Opinions already; That the acting by ſuch an Authority, was ſo far from being an Extenuation, that it was an Aggravation of the Crime; That his expreſſing his Approbation of that Power, and acting under it, were the very Things with which he was charged: And the Jury, after a very ſhort Receſs, brought in the Priſoner GUILTY.

Peters's Trial.

Hugh Peters, Cromwell's Chaplain, being brought next upon his Trial, made no Challenges to the Jurors; whereupon the firſt Twelve of the Pannel were ſworn, and charged with the Priſoner: Then the King's Counſel produced their Evidence. And firſt, Dr. William Young depoſed, That Hugh Peters, the Priſoner, lay ſick at his Houſe in the Year 1649, and that he remained in his Family ſix or ſeven Weeks after his Recovery, there being a great Intimacy between them; that the Priſoner, about that Time, told the Deponent, He was ſent over from New England to foment a Civil War, and drive on their Reformation.

The Evidence.

That he was afterwards ſent over to Ireland by the Parliament, to carry on their Deſigns there, and that he had ſpent near 3000 l. in that Service, for which he had only received a ſmall Pittance, in Land, out of the Lord Worceſter's Eſtate; That the Priſoner uſed to ſay, while he reſided with the Deponent, It would never be well till the Lords, the Levites, and the Lawyers, were put down: That the Priſoner was a Colonel under Cromwell (as well as a Preacher), and having an Authority to raiſe Forces for the War in Ireland, would have had the Deponent accept a Commiſſion to ſerve under him: That the Priſoner informed the Deponent, when the late King was taken from Holmeby-Houſe, the Parliament had a Deſign to have ſeized Cromwel and himſelf; but having Notice of it, they made their Eſcape out of London, riding hard for it as far as Ware, where they conſidered how they ſhould diſpoſe of the King; and came to a Reſolution, They would try him for his Life, and cut off his Head. 1660. 12 Car. II.

Mr. Starkey depoſed, That the Head-Quarters being at Windſor, a little before the King's Trial, Ireton lay at his Father's Houſe there; and that Cromwell and the General Officers uſed to hold their Councils of War at his Father's; That after theſe Councils roſe, there uſed to be a private Conſultation, at which Cromwell, Ireton, the Priſoner, Colonel Rich, and a fifth Perſon, aſſiſted; and they generally ſat up till Two or Three in the Morning; and he believed it was this private Cabal that contrived the Buſineſs againſt the King; That the Priſoner frequently came with Ireton, and dined and ſupped with him, at his Father's, with the Family; and talking of the King, Peters uſed to ſay, The King was a Tyrant and a Fool, and not fit to be a King; and that it was a dangerous, chargeable, and uſeleſs Office: That Ireton and Peters being at Supper at his Father's, when News came that the King was made Priſoner in the Iſle of Wight, his Father, inſtead of ſaying God ſave the King, Prince, and Realm, as he uſually did after his Grace, (at which Ireton and Peters uſed to laugh) ſaid, God ſave the King's moſt excellent Majeſty, and preſerve him out of the Hands of all his Enemies: Whereupon Peters ſaid, Old Gentleman, your Idol will not ſtand long.

Walkley depoſed, That he ſaw Peters at the Conſultations with the Regicides, in the Painted-Chamber, before the King's Trial; That when the King was brought to London, he ſaw him riding in a triumphant Manner before the Coach the King was in: And at another Time, he ſaw Peters marſhalling the Soldiers in St. James's-Park, and heard him ſay, If we can but keep up our Army ſeven Years longer, we need not care for the King and all his Poſterity.

Simpſon depoſed, That he ſaw the Priſoner at ſeveral Conſultations concerning the King; and that, at the King's Trial, he heard him bid Colonel Stubberd to cry out, Juſtice, Juſtice, againſt the Traitor at the Bar: That the Soldiers cried out as they were directed; and, as the King was going back to Cotton-Houſe, ſome of them ſpit in his Face, which he wiped off, and ſmiled.

Richardſon depoſed, That he ſaw the Priſoner ſtanding in the High Court of Juſtice; That he commended Bradſhaw's Carriage; and holding up his Hands, ſaid, This is a moſt glorious Beginning of the Work. And Sir Jeremy Whichcot depoſed, He heard the Priſoner ſay, I cannot but look upon this Court with great Reverence, for it doth reſemble, in ſome Meaſure, the Trials that ſhall be at the End of the World by the Saints: That the Priſoner ſeldom ſpoke of the King, but he called him Tyrant; and ſaid, he would have preached before him (the King); but the poor Wretch would not hear him.

Nunnelly depoſed, That he ſaw Peters in the Banquetting-Houſe, about an Hour before the

1660. 12 Car. II.

the King was beheaded; that he went out upon the Scaffold, and came off again; and whiſpering the Joiner who erected it, the Joiner immediately knocked down four Staples upon the Scaffold: That after the King's Head was cut off, the Deponent ſaw the Vizards go into a Chamber, and he thought he ſaw Peters come out of the ſame Chamber an Hour afterwards; but he was ſure he ſaw him go with the Hangman to take Water.

Stephen Clough depoſed, That Peters, in his Prayer before a Council of Officers at Weſtminſter, ſaid, O Lord, What a Mercy is it to ſee this great City fall down before us! And what a Stir is there to bring this Great Man to Trial; without whoſe Blood he will turn us all into Blood if he reign again!

Beaver depoſed, That the Priſoner preaching before the two Houſes, on a Faſt-Day, a little before the Act was made for the King's Trial, he ſaid, "It was a very ſad thing, "that it ſhould be made a Queſtion among "us, as among the old Jews, Whether our "Saviour Jeſus Chriſt muſt be crucified; "or that Barabbas ſhould be releaſed, the "Oppreſſor of the People: O Jeſus (ſaid he) "where are we, that That ſhould be a Queſtion? And becauſe you ſhould think, my "Lords and Gentlemen, that it is a Queſtion, "I tell you it is a Queſtion: I have been in "the City, which may very well be compared to Jeruſalem; and I profeſs theſe "fooliſh Citizens, for a little Trading and "Profit, will have Chriſt (pointing to the "Red-coats on the Pulpit-Stairs) crucified, "and that great Barabbas, at Windſor, releaſed. I do not much mind what the "Rabble ſay; but I have been with my "Brethren, the Clergy, in the Aſſembly, and "I perceive they are for crucifying Chriſt "alſo, and releaſing Barabbas. O Jeſus, "what ſhall we do now! Then addreſſing himſelf to the Lords and Commons, he ſaid, "You are the Sanhedrim, the great Council of "the Nation; therefore you muſt be ſure "to do Juſtice; it is from you we expect "it: You muſt not only be the Inheritors "of your Anceſtors; but you muſt do as "they did: They oppoſed tyrannical Kings, "and deſtroyed them. It is you that we "chiefly expect Juſtice from. Do not prefer "the great Barabbas, Murderer, Tyrant and "Traitor, before theſe poor Hearts (pointing to the Soldiers again): And that for two or three Hours he harangued his Audience, preſſing them to bring the King to a ſpeedy Trial, and to puniſh him capitally.

Mr. Chace depoſed, That he heard the Priſoner preach before Cromwell and Bradſhaw, on the 20th of January, 1648, on that Text in the Pſalms, Bind your Kings in Chains, and your Nobles in Fetters of Iron: And obſerved, that the next Pſalm had twelve Hallelujahs; which were intended, he ſaid, to expreſs their Joy, That Kings were bound in Chains, &c. He told them alſo the common Story of the Mayor that laid the Biſhop's Man by the Heels for being Drunk; and when the Biſhop complained of it, the Mayor anſwered, There was an Act of Parliament for it, and neither the Biſhop nor his Man were excepted out of it. And ſo (ſays Peters) Here is a great talk in the World; What, will you cut off the King's Head; the Head of a Proteſtant Prince? Turn to your Bibles, and you ſhall find, Whoſoever ſheds Man's Blood, by Man ſhall his Blood be ſhed. As the Mayor ſaid of the Biſhop and his Servant, I ſee neither King Charles, nor Prince Charles, nor Prince Rupert, nor Prince Maurice, nor any of that Rabble, excepted out of it; and added, This is the Day that I, and many Saints of God, have been praying for theſe many Years; And the Deponent obſerved, that Cromwell laughed heartily at theſe Flights.

Tongue depoſed, That he heard the Priſoner preach at Whitehall, the 21ſt of January, 1648, on that Paſſage, Bind your Kings in Chains, &c. And ſaid, He hoped to ſee ſuch another Day as the Day before (when the King's Tryal began): That he bleſſed God the Lower Houſe was purged; and aſſured them, the Houſe of Lords would down ſuddenly.

The Priſoner's Defence.

The Priſoner in his Defence ſaid, He was ſent from New England, to ſolicit the Affairs of that Country here: And indeed, at the Importunity of the London Miniſters, after his Arrival, he was active in the Troubles that followed; but they were much deeper engaged in that Affair than he was: He was ſorry to hear himſelf charged with that Behaviour towards the late King, and begged Pardon for his Folly and Weakneſs; but ſaid, he had no Malice or Miſchief in his Heart againſt him: That he had always acted with Honour and Reſpect towards his Majeſty, particularly when he was at Windſor; and had propoſed three Ways to his Majeſty to extricate himſelf out of the Difficulties he was in; but he did not approve of them: That he was none of thoſe who ſat in the High Court of Juſtice, or brought the King to that unhappy End: And laſtly, He obſerved, that there was but a ſingle Witneſs to any one Fact.

A Reply to his Defence.

To which the King's Counſel replied, That ſome Facts had been undeniably proved againſt him: That the Meeting and Conſulting together about the King's Death; or the giving Aid, Comfort, or Encouragement to thoſe Traitors, made him guilty of the whole Charge, in the Eye of the Law; though he did not ſit in that High Court, or ſentence the late King: And that, whatever Speeches he had uttered, either in the Pulpit, or out of it, tending to Sedition and Rebellion, were ſuch Overt-Act as proved the treaſonable Imagination of his Heart, with which he was charged: That though there ought to be two Witneſſes in Treaſon, there need not be two to every Fact; but in his Caſe there had been ſeveral Witneſſes produced to one Fact; ſo that this Objection carried no manner of Weight with it.

That his being in Arms, againſt his Majeſty, had not only been proved by ſeveral Witneſſes; but he had confeſſed it. It was proved alſo, that he had called the Day of his Majeſty's Trial, A glorious Day, and reſembled it to that Great Day, wherein the Saints ſhould judge the World; that he had often

1660. 12 Car. II.

often prayed for it alſo; ſo that no Man could be ſaid more juſtly to have conſpired and contrived the Death of the King, than this miſerable Prieſt had done: The Honour of the Pulpit therefore ought to be vindicated. His Death would preach better than his Life had done; it might be a Means to convert many a deluded Man, whom his Preaching had ſeduced; for ſeveral had been brought to that Bar, who averred, that what they had done, was in the Fear of the Lord; and now it appeared who taught them, and led them into theſe pernicious Errors: They hoped therefore the Court would make an Example of this Carnal Prophet: And the Jury being withdrawn, in a very little Time found the Priſoner guilty. Whereupon the King's Counſel moved, that Cook and Peters might receive Judgment together: And the Lord Chief Baron having made a Speech to the Priſoners, wherein he obſerved they had had a liberal Education, and therefore could not be ignorant how groſly they had offended againſt the Laws of God and Man, by being inſtrumental in the King's Murder, pronounced Sentence on them as Traitors: And then the Court adjourned.

Peters convicted.

Cook and Peters condemned.

On the 15th of October, Daniel Axtel was brought to the Bar; and a Jury being ſworn, and charged with the Priſoner, the King's Counſel opened the Indictment and the Evidence: After which, the Witneſſes were produced, who depoſed, That Colonel Stubberd and Axtel commanded the Guards that were drawn up in Weſtminſter Hall, for the Security of the pretended High Court of Juſtice, at the King's Trial: That upon exhibiting the Charge againſt the King, in the Name of all the Commons of England, a Lady, (ſaid to be the Lady Fairfax) cried out, It was a Lie; not a Quarter of the People were concerned in it: Oliver Cromwell was a Rogue and a Traitor: Whereupon the Court called to the Guard, and Axtel their Commander, ordered ſome of his Soldiers to preſent their Pieces at the Lady, and bid her unmask. Other Witneſſes depoſed, that Axtel ſaid, Down with the Whores; ſhoot them: That he was more active than any of the Officers, and ſtood laughing with his Soldiers, and ſcoffing aloud when the King urged to be heard; and when the King bid his pretended Judges remember he was their lawful King, Axtel ordered the Soldiers to cry out, Juſtice, Juſtice! and beat thoſe that refuſed; and that the laſt Day of the Trial, he made his Soldiers cry, Execution, Execution! A Witneſs alſo depoſed, that the Priſoner commanded a Company of Soldiers in the Banquetting-Houſe, during the King's Execution; and that he was the Man that ſent for the Executioner. Another Witneſs teſtified that Axtel ſaid, Hewlet beheaded the King: And Col. Huncks made Oath, that Cromwell bidding him (the Deponent) ſign the Order for the King's Execution, and threatening him for refuſing it, Axtel ſaid to the Deponent, I am aſhamed of you; the Ship is now coming into Harbour, and will you ſtrike Sail before you come to Anchor?

Axtel's Trial.

The Evidence.

Axtel in his Defence ſaid, that Hunks was a perfect Stranger to him, and that he did not remember his having ſaid any ſuch Words as he had teſtified: That the Statute of 25 Edw. III. on which he was indicted, concerned only private Perſons, who compaſſed the King's Death: But here a War was entered into, an Army raiſed by Authority of Parliament, who had declared the Militia was of Right in them: That he acted by Commiſſion from the Parliament's General; a Parliament called by the King's Writ, choſen by the People, and by an Act that could not be diſſolved, but by their own Conſent. That this Parliament was in being when the King's Trial happened, and was not yet legally diſſolved: He conceived, that their Authority was acknowledged at Home and Abroad, and the Judges, the Interpreters of the Law, acted by their Authority; and he hoped this was ſufficient to bear him out: That what he had done was as a Soldier, he derived his Power from his General, who had his from the Fountain, namely, from the Lords and Commons: If he was upon the Guard at the King's Trial, it was by the Command of his General, not voluntary: He was not a Contriver, Counſellor, Parliament-Man, or any of the Judges that ſentenced the King; nor had any Hand in his Execution; and if it was ſuch an Offence to have a Command in the Army, General Monk and the other Generals were as Criminal as he; and all the People, who acted by the ſame Authority in the three Nations: That if he was guilty of Treaſon, the Commons in Parliament began the Treaſon: And if the Repreſentative Body were Traitors, then were the People whom they repreſented ſo too, and there would not be found a Jury to try the Cauſe. And though it had been objected to him, that they had deſtroyed both Lords and Commons, before the Fact was committed: The Commiſſion, which authorized him to obey his General, was given him while the Lords and Commons ſat in Parliament; and he did but his Duty in being with his Regiment in the Hall: If the General had commanded him to take that Poſt, he muſt have died if he had refuſed; and it was hard he ſhould be in the ſame Danger when he obeyed.

1660. 12 Car. II.

Axtel's Defence.

He ſtill inſiſted, that he had not adviſed, or compaſſed the King's Death; that he neither Sentenced him, nor ſigned the Warrant for his Execution; nor was he concerned in the Violence put upon the Houſe of Commons: They were his Superiors that put that Force upon the Houſe; he was then an inferior Officer: And as to what had been ſworn, concerning ſilencing the Lady, who made the Diſturbance, he ſaid, if the Lady talked impertinently, and he deſired her to hold her Tongue, he hoped this was not Treaſon; eſpecially as he was commanded on pain of Death to keep the Peace.

As to the Witneſſes depoſing he laughed and ſcoffed, while others ſighed: He believed he had as deep a Senſe of what was tranſacted that Day, as others; but if he had ſmiled, he hoped that was not Treaſon: And he hoped

hoped it would appear he beat his Soldiers for crying Juſtice, Juſtice, and not to make them cry Juſtice: However, if he did encourage them to demand Juſtice, and Execution, the Execution of Juſtice was a glorious Thing; Juſtice was one of the great Attributes of God, and the deſiring of it could be no Crime. The ſending for the Executioner, he abſolutely denied, and averred he was never at any Conſultation about the King's Death. This he ſaid was managed by Ireton, Harriſon, and Cromwell, among themſelves: Nor could he ever tell any one that Hewlet executed the King, being perfectly ignorant what Perſons were concerned in the Execution.

He obſerved further, That the Words Juſtice and Execution, being ſpoken without Application to any Perſon or Thing, were of an uncertain Signification, and might bear a good, as well as a bad Conſtruction; and in Favour of Life, the beſt Senſe ought to be put upon them. And laſtly, he inſiſted that his Majeſty had promiſed to pardon all that were not excepted by Parliament, which muſt be intended, he conceived, of a legal Parliament, called by the King's Writ, which this was not, and conſequently could not except him out of the Pardon promiſed by the King.

The Reply to Axtel's Defence.

The King's Counſel, in their Reply to the Priſoner's Defence, ſaid, they did not charge him with what he had done by Virtue of his Commiſſion, but with thoſe violent Acts of encouraging the Soldiers to cry for Juſtice and Execution; and thoſe other Acts, which manifeſted his Malice againſt the King: That he was not indicted for levying War, but for compaſſing the King's Death; and the Overt-Acts, above-mentioned, were given in Evidence to prove it: Nor could there be any Excuſe for committing Treaſon; his Commiſſion could not warrant his doing a Treaſonable Act: He was obliged to take Notice whether the Authority, by which he acted, was good or not; neither did his Commiſſion empower him to put the King to Death; but he was obliged, by the Tenor of it, to preſerve him: That thoſe very Lords and Commons, under whom he would ſhelter himſelf, made Proteſtations and Declarations, and had impoſed and taken Oaths, for the Preſervation of the King's Perſon, which he could not but take Notice of: He muſt remember alſo, that the Army came with their Swords in their Hands to the Houſe, and turned out whom they pleaſed, excluding far the greateſt Part of the Members, and laid the Lords aſide: After which, Forty-ſix of the Commons took upon them to ſit, and only Twenty-ſix voted that Ordinance, which he pretended to act in Obedience to: And laſtly, that it was impoſſible to miſtake what he meant by crying for Juſtice and Execution: Whereupon the Jury, after a very ſhort Receſs, brought the Priſoner in Guilty.

Hacker's Trial.

Then Colonel Francis Hacker was brought upon his Trial, and making no Challenges to the Jurors, the firſt twelve in the Pannel were ſworn, after which the King's Counſel opened the Indictment and produced their Witneſſes.

The Evidence.

Colonel Tomlinſon, depoſed, That Colonel Hacker, the Priſoner, was one of the Halberdiers that guarded the King at Cotton-Houſe, and from thence to his Trial, before the pretended High-Court of Juſtice in Weſtminſter-Hall: That the Day appointed for the King to die, the Halberdiers brought his Majeſty through the Park from St. James's to Whitehall; that Colonel Hacker, by Virtue of the Warrant for the King's Execution, led him out of Whitehall to the Scaffold, erected before the Banquetting-Houſe.

1660. 12 Car. II.

Mr. Secretary Morrice, and the Lord Annesley, depoſed, That the Priſoner Hacker acknowledged before them, that he ſigned the Warrant to the Executioner, to behead the King; but ſaid, he did not remember the Name of the Man: Another Witneſs depoſed, that Colonel Hacker ſeemed to have the principal Command on the Scaffold, when the King was beheaded.

Hacker's Defence.

The Priſoner ſaid in his Defence, That he was a Soldier under Command, and what he had done was, by Virtue of a Warrant from the High Court of Juſtice: That he did not deliver the Warrant, or Order to the Executioner, or knew who he was; and was neither Counſellor, Abettor, or Adviſer of the Fact.

The Reply of the Court.

But the chief Baron, in his directions to the Jury, told them, If the Priſoner who brought the King to the Scaffold, and who had the Care and Management of the Buſineſs, and ſigned the Warrant to the Executioner, was not guilty of compaſſing the King's Death, no Man could be ſaid to guilty; and the Jury being withdrawn a little while, brought in their Verdict, that the Priſoner was GUILTY.

He is Convicted.

Hulet's Trial.

Then William Hulet, or Hewlet, was ſet to the Bar; and the Jury being ſworn, the King's Counſel took notice on opening the Evidence, that this was the Man in the Frock and Vizard, that cut off the King's Head: To prove which Richard Gittens, was ſworn,

The Evidence.

who depoſed, that he and Hulet, were Serjeants in the ſame Regiment twelve or thirteen Years: That a Day or two before the King was murdered, Colonel Hewſon commanded eight and thirty Serjeants (of which Number were the Deponent and the Priſoner) to take an Oath of Secrecy; which when they had done, he demanded if any of them would undertake to Execute the King, promiſing a Reward of an hundred Pounds, and Preferment in the Army, to him that ſhould do it: And every Man refuſed; however, they underſtood afterwards, that Hulet accepted the Office: That the Day the King was murdered, the Deponent was one of the Guards drawn up in the Banquetting-Houſe: That he got upon the Scaffold, when his Majeſty was brought thither, and heard his Majeſty ſay to one of the Executioners, Is the Block faſt? And Hulet (as the Deponent believed) was the Man who fell upon his Knees, and asked the King forgiveneſs: The Deponent thought it was Hulet by his Speech, and the proportion of his Body; and what confirmed him in that Opinion was, that Hulet was not ſeen in the Regiment that Day: But that the Executioner, whoever he was, had a pair of Freeze Trunk Breeches and a Vizard on, with a Grey Beard; and Colonel Hewſon uſed afterwards to call Hulet.

Hulet's Defence.

1660. 12 Car. II. Hulet Father Grey-Beard, as did moſt of the Soldiers in the Army.

Stammers depoſed, that Hulet was Captain-Lieutenant of Colonel Hewſon's own Troop, and that he (the Deponent) entering himſelf in the ſame Troop at Dublin, about nine or ten Years ſince, Hulet ſome little Time after, ſent for him to his Chamber, and among other Converſation told him, that he cut off the King's Head, and had an hundred Pounds for it: But Hulet deſiring him to name the Man he ſent for him, Stammers ſaid he could not remember the Man.

Captain Toogood depoſed, that in the Year 1650, being in Dublin Caſtle with Colonel Hewſon, Hulet the Priſoner came in, and the Deponent obſerving an extraordinary Familiarity between them, upon Hulet's going away, asked Hewſon, who he was; and the Colonel anſwered, he had made him his Lieutenant, from a Serjeant: He was a mettled Fellow; it was he that did the King's Buſineſs on the Scaffold: The Deponent added, that Colonel Pretty alſo told him, that Hewſon aſſured him, Hulet either cut off the King's Head, or held it up, and ſaid, Behold the Head of a Traitor: And that the Deponent talking with Hulet himſelf at Carlow in Ireland, concerning the Execution, Hulet ſaid, What I did, I will not be aſhamed of; If it were to do again, I would do it: That diſcourſing with Hulet at another Time, concerning the King's Death, he ſaid, it was true, he was one of the Perſons diſguiſed upon the Scaffold: And if the King had refuſed to ſubmit to the Block, there were Staples fixed in the Scaffold, and he had that about him, that would have compelled him to ſubmit: And at another Time Hulet ſaid, he ſhould not deny the Buſineſs of the King's Death, call him to an Account when they would.

Davis depoſed, that drinking at a Tavern in Dublin with Captain Hulet, and asking him, If he took up the King's Head, and ſaid Behold the Head of a Traitor; Hulet anſwered, it was a Queſtion he never reſolved any Man, though often demanded: However, it was no matter who ſaid it; I ſay it now, It was the Head of a Traitor.

Lieutenant Colonel Nelſon, depoſed, that diſcourſing with Colonel Axtel, concerning the Perſon that beheaded the King, Axtel ſaid, they would not employ Men of mean Spirits, they did not know; but pitched upon Hulet and Walker, two ſtout Fellows, their Serjeants: That Walker gave the Blow, and Hulet held up the Head; and they had 30 l. a piece, or 30 l. between them.

Benjamin Francis depoſed, that the Vizards were cloathed alike in woollen Frocks, cloſe to their Bodies, like Butchers: One of them had a Black Beard, and the other a Grey Beard and Peruke; and that Grey-Beard, who cut off the King's Head, was about the Size of Hulet the Priſoner; and Burden depoſed, that Hulet was not ſeen among the Soldiers, either the Day the King was murdered, or the Day after.

Hulet's Defence. The Priſoner in his Defence ſaid, He never diſcourſed with any one of the King's Death, but Stammers; who charging him with being one of the Vizards, he anſwered, you do me wrong; and Stammers ſaying it was a juſt Act, he (the Priſoner) replyed, whether it was ſo or not, he had nothing to do to juſtifie it. 1660. 12 Car II.

He ſaid further, that he could prove by a very good Token, that he was in another Place when the King died; for he and ſeven or eight Serjeants more were made Priſoners that Day, becauſe they refuſed to be upon the Scaffold; and that he would prove by Forty Witneſſes, that it was another Man that did the Fact, if they would give him Time.

The Evidence for Priſoner. Then ſeveral Witneſſes were called on behalf of the Priſoner, and particularly one of the Sheriffs Officers, who depoſed, That drinking with the common Hangman, a little after the King died, and asking him if he did the Fact, The Hangman anſwered, God forgive me, I did it; and I had forty Half-Crowns for my Pains.

Smith, a Waterman depoſed, That, as ſoon as the Blow was given, a File of Musketeers brought the Hangman to the Deponent's Boat, and the Soldiers ſaid, Waterman away with him quickly: That when he and his Mate had got the Hangman ſome Diſtance from the Shoar, they asked him, if it was he that cut off the King's Head, and he ſaid No, as I am a Sinner to God; and trembled every Joint of him. He ſaid, he was fetched to Whitehall indeed by a Troop of Horſe, and kept cloſe Priſoner there; and they had his Inſtruments, but he did not do it: That the Deponent thereupon ſaid, he would ſink his Boat, if he did not tell him true; but the Hangman perſiſted to deny it with ſeveral Proteſtations.

Cox depoſed, That when the Lord Capel was Beheaded, he asked the Hangman if he did not cut off his Maſter's Head, and the Hangman ſaid Yes; and told him, that was the Axe: Whereupon the Lord Capel took the Axe, and kiſſed it; and giving him five Guineas ſaid, Sirrah, Wer't thou not afraid? and the Hangman anſwered, they made him cut it off, and he had thirty Pounds for his Pains.

Other Witneſſes depoſed, They heard the common Hangman acknowledge, he cut off the King's Head. Then the Priſoner deſired he might have a Fortnights Time to produce the reſt of his Witneſſes; but was told, that could not be granted: And the Jury withdrawing and debating the Matter a conſiderable Time among themſelves, brought in the Priſoner Guilty; and then the Court adjourned. Hulet convicted.

Fifteen Priſoners tried before one Jury. The Court ſitting again at the Old-Bailey the 16th of October, Edmund Harvey, Iſaac Pennington, Henry Marten, Gilbert Millington, Robert Titchburne, Owen Roe, Robert Lilburn, Henry Smith, John Downes, Vincent Potter, Auguſtine Garland, Simon Meyne, James Temple, Peter Temple, and Thomas Wayte, were brought to the Bar, and one Jury charged with them all. Mr. Harvey, inſtead of making a Defence, confeſſed that he did ſit in the pretended High Court of Juſtice; but ſaid, he did not ſign the Warrant for Beheading his Majeſty. He produced two Witneſſes alſo, who depoſed, he endeavoured to prevent the Sentence, and Harvey's Confeſſion.

1660 12 Car II. and that he was under a great Concern when it paſſed; and tendering a Petition to the Court, that they would interceed in the Behalf of himſelf, his Wife, and thirteen Children, the Court promiſed to preſent the Petition to his Majeſty.

Pennington's Confeſſion. Iſaac Pennington, the ſeditious Alderman, alſo confeſſed, that he ſat in the pretended High-Court of Juſtice; and endeavoured to excuſe himſelf, by alledging, he was drawn in by others, and had no Malice againſt his Majeſty; and made a Merit of it, that he abſolutely refuſed to ſign the Warrant for beheading of him, though he was much importuned to do it.

Marten's Trial. Henry Marten confeſſed the Fact; but ſaid, he did not do it maliciouſly, murderouſly, and traitorouſly, as was laid in the Indictment: To which Mr. Solicitor replied, That Marten thought he might ſentence the King to Death, and ſign a Warrant for his Execution, meekly, innocently, charitably, and honeſtly; and becauſe he endeavoured to wipe off the Malice, they would prove that he did it merrily, and was in great Sport at the Time of ſigning the Warrant for the King's Execution.

The Evidence. Ewer depoſed, That being in the Painted-Chamber, the 29th of January, 1648, when the Warrant for the King's Execution was ſigned, he ſaw Cromwell mark Marten's Face with a Pen, and Marten marked Cromwell's Face.

Sir Purbeck Temple depoſed, That at a Conſult of the Regicides, in the Painted-Chamber, juſt before the King's Trial, Cromwell ſaid, the firſt Queſtion the King would ask, would be, By what Authority they tried him; and demanded, what Anſwer they ſhould give to it? And that, after ſome Pauſe, Marten the Priſoner ſaid, In the Name of the Commons in Parliament aſſembled, and all the good People of England; which was the Anſwer afterwards made to his Majeſty, in their Mock-Court in Weſtminſter-Hall.

Marten's Defence. Marten, in his Defence, ſaid, That according to the little Law he had, no Fact could be a Crime in itſelf, but as it was circumſtantiated; and that his being in Sport when the Warrant was ſigned, did not imply Malice: That the Commiſſion they acted by, was in the Name of the Commons aſſembled in Parliament, the then ſupreme Authority: And he that gave Obedience to the Supreme Power de facto, whether it was ſo de jure, or not, might be deemed of a peaceable Diſpoſition, and was far from being a Traitor. That the Statute of Henry VII. indemnified thoſe that were in Arms for a King de facto: And if the Supreme Officer de facto might juſtify a War, he preſumed the Supreme Authority of England might juſtify the erecting ſuch a Judicature, though it was but an Authority de facto. And as to the Objection, that it was but a Third Eſtate, and a ſmall Part of that; yet it was all that was extant: And he had heard Lawyers ſay, where Commons were appurtenant to a Tenement, and the Tenement burnt down, ſo that only a ſmall Stick remained, the Commons belonged to that one Stick, as if the whole Tenement was ſtanding: That the King was not then ſuch a King, whoſe Peace, Crown, and Dignity, were concerned in publick Matters; he was not then in the Execution of his Office, but a Priſoner: He, the Priſoner, had then, as now, a peaceable Diſpoſition, and Reſolution to ſubmit to the Government that God had ſet over him. He thought his preſent Majeſty's Title the beſt under Heaven; for he was called in by the Repreſentative Body of the Nation; and, whether his Life were long or ſhort, he ſhould always pay Obedience to him. He confeſſed he did adhere heartily to the Parliament's Army; and his Life was at the King's Mercy; and if the King pleaſed to give him his Life, he ſhould lie under a double Obligation to his Majeſty; and concluded with obſerving to the Jury, That it was as much the Intereſt of the Crown, that the Innocent ſhould be acquitted, as the Guilty condemned. 1660 12 Car II.

The King's Counſel's Reply. Then Mr. Solicitor having ſummed up the Evidence, ſaid, Gentlemen of the Jury, what does the Priſoner ſay, in his Defence, more than this? The Fact I have committed is ſuch, that I durſt not call it Innocent; but would have you believe it ſuch. Was it your Intention, Gentlemen, that the King ſhould be tried, as the Priſoner moved? It will concern you, therefore, to declare, that the People of England do abhor theſe Facts and Principles: All that the Priſoner has ſaid is, That there was an Authority of his own making, whereby he becomes Innocent; but we hope out of his own Mouth you will find him Guilty.

Millington's Confeſſion. Gilbert Millington confeſſed himſelf guilty; but ſaid in his Excuſe, that he was over-awed by the then Powers; and preferred a Petition for Mercy, which was accepted.

Titchburn's Confeſſion. Robert Titchburn alſo acknowledged his Offence; but ſaid he had no more Malice againſt his Majeſty, than againſt the Wife of his Boſom: That he was ignorant of the Law, &c. and begged for Mercy.

Roe's Confeſſion. Owen Roe, confeſſed his ſitting in the Mock-Court of Juſtice, and ſigning the Warrant for the Execution; but ſaid he was an ignorant Tradeſman, led away by others; and threw himſelf at the King's Mercy.

Lilburn's Confeſſion. Robert Lilburne acknowledged his Guilt; but urged Ignorance in the Laws as his Excuſe.

Smith's Confeſſion. Henry Smith confeſſed the Crime alſo, and ſaid he was over-awed by the Powers then in being; and begged the Court would be Mediators for him to his Majeſty.

Eight of the Regicides convicted. Then the Lord Chief Baron ſummed up the Evidence, as to Harvey, Pennington, Marten, Millington, Titchburne, Roe, Lilburn, and Smith; and the Jury found them all GUILTY.

Downes's Confeſſion. After which John Downes was brought to the Bar, who acknowledged his ſitting in the pretended High Court of Juſtice; but ſaid he was thruſt into the Number, of the King's Judges, and was never at any Conſultation about the Matter: That it was he that moved ſo paſſionately, the King might he heard before the Parliament, and cauſed the Court to be adjourned; whereupon Cromwell ſtormed, and ſaid, ſure Downes did not know, that they had to do with the moſt hard-hearted Man upon upon Earth: That it was not fit the Court ſhould be interrupted by one peeviſh Fellow: That the Bottom of it was, he would fain ſave his old Maſter, and threatened him ſeverely.

Upon which the Lord Chief Baron obſerved, That notwithſtanding theſe Convictions, the Priſoner proceeded to ſign the Warrant for beheading the King.

Potter's Confeſſion.

Vincent Potter confeſſed his ſitting in the pretended Court, and ſigning the Warrant; but ſaid he was not concerned in the Contrivance; and threw himſelf upon the King's Mercy.

Garland's Confeſſion.

Auguſtine Garland confeſſed his ſitting in the Court, and ſigning the Warrant for the Execution.

The Evidence againſt him.

The King's Counſel anſwered, They would not accept his Confeſſion, for they would prove that he was one of the Men that ſpit in the King's Face: Whereupon Clench was ſworn, and depoſed, That on the Day of the Sentence, when they were hurrying the King away, Garland came by, and ſpit in his Majeſty's Face; and the Witneſs being asked, if he did it on Purpoſe, anſwered, I ſuppoſe he did it ſomewhat ſuſpiciouſly in that way: Garland replied, He did not know he was near the King, (which ſeems to admit he did it, whether accidentally, or not); and if he was guilty of that Inhumanity, deſired no Favour of God Almighty. He confeſſed, however, that he was in the Chair, when the Act paſſed for trying the King; but ſaid, he was forced into it; and what he had done was out of Fear of the Powers then in Being: That he never had any Malice againſt his Majeſty, or ſhewed any diſreſpect to him or his Friends.

His Excuſe.

Meyne's Confeſſion.

Simon Meyne alſo confeſſed his ſitting in the Court, and ſigning the Warrant for the King's Execution; but ſaid he was under a Force, and threatened in caſe he refuſed.

J. Temple's Confeſſion.

James Temple made the ſame Confeſſion; and tendered a Petition for Mercy.

P. Temple's Confeſſion.

Peter Temple made the like Confeſſion; but pretended he had no Malice in his Heart againſt the King.

Wayte's Confeſſion.

Thomas Wayte confeſſed his ſitting in the Court, and ſigning the Warrant for beheading his late Majeſty; but ſaid he was drawn in, and trepaned; and offered a Petition to the King and both Houſes of Parliament for Mercy, which was accepted.

Hevening-ham's Confeſſion.

William Haveningham confeſſed his Sitting in the pretended Court; but ſaid he was under a Force; and that he did, however, refuſe to ſign the Warrant for ſummoning the Court, and for the King's Execution; and begged the Court to intercede for him to the King and Parliament for Mercy.

Eight more convicted.

Then the Jury withdrew, and in a little time returned with their Verdict, That John Downes, Vincent Potter, Auguſtine Garland, Simon Meyne, James Temple, Peter Temple, Thomas Wayte, and William Haveningham, were all GUILTY.

Sentence paſſed in 13 Regicides.

After which, Sir Hardreſs Waller, Fleetwood, Hacker, Axtel, Hulet, Pennington, Marten, Millington, Titchburne, Roe, Lilburn, Smith, and Harvey, being called to Judgment, the Lord Chief Baron acquainted them, That although he was to paſs Sentence of Death upon all; yet as to all but three of them Execution was to be ſuſpended, till another Act of Parliament ſhould paſs for that Purpoſe: And as to Mr. Heveningham, one of the three, he thought no Order would ſuddenly be given for his Execution; but as to Axtel and Hacker, He ſaid there was no Room for them to hope for Mercy.

1660. 12 Car. II. The Execution of all but three of them ſuſpended.

The Lord Chief Baron's Speech to the convicted Regicides.

Then he put the Priſoners in mind of the Oaths of Allegiance they had taken to his late Majeſty; and that it had been declared by Act of Parliament, That the People, neither collectively or repreſentatively, had any Coercive Power over the Perſon of the King: That, in the Oath of Allegiance, they had acknowledged the King to be Supreme, conſequently there could be no Power co-ordinate with him, much leſs ſuperior to him: That no leſs than ten Statutes called the Crown of England an Imperial Crown; and that of 24 Hen. VIII. cap. 12. declared, It was ſubject to none but God Almighty. And ſo, 16 R. 2. &c. That the King of Poland, indeed, took an Oath at his Coronation, with a Condition, That if he did not govern according to certain Rules, the People ſhould be freed from their Allegiance: But the King of England was King before he took his Coronation-Oath; and did not take it upon any Condition, or was accountable to any but God for his Actions: That the Law declares, The King can do no Wrong: Not but that the King might have the Imbecilities and Infirmities of other Men; but the King, in his ſingle Perſon, could do no Wrong, ſuch as would make him obnoxious to the Laws, or accountable to any: But if the King commanded another to beat any Perſon, or diſſeize him of his Lands, there was a Remedy againſt ſuch a Perſon, though none againſt the King. The Law preſerved the Perſon of the King untouched; but what was done unlawfully by his Miniſters, there was a Remedy againſt his Miniſters, for: That the King was ſtiled in our Law Books, Caput Reipublicæ, Salus populi, The Lieutenant of God, &c. And the Spencers Treaſon, That the King might be compelled to yield to the Peoples Demands, had been condemned by two Acts of Parliament: That he did not preſs this, to inſinuate that the King might do what he would; but to ſhew them that the Perſon of the King was Sacred, and not to be touched: And having exhorted the Priſoners to repent of their horrid Treaſons, he pronounced Sentence on all of them, except Haveningham, on whom Judgment was pronounced the 19th Inſtant.

The ten Regicides executed.

Of all the Regicides, there were but ten executed about this Time, viz. Harriſon, Carew, Cook, Peters, Scot, Clement, Scroop, Jones, Hacker, and Axtel; as to Hulet, who was charged with cutting off the King's Head, the Evidence was held deficient.

Harriſon the firſt.

Harriſon was executed at Charing-Croſs on the 13th of October; Carew on the 15th of the ſame Month; Cook and Peters on the 16th; Scot, Gregory, Clement, Scroop, and Jones on the 17th; all at Charing-Croſs: But Axtel and Hacker were executed at Tyburn the 19th Inſtant.

Their Behaviour at their Execution.

Moſt of them died impenitent, and gloried in the Murder of their Sovereign. Harriſon cryed out as he was going to Execution, That he went to ſuffer in the moſt Glorious Cauſe that ever was in the World; and that there was more of God in it than Men were aware of. Carew declared, That what he had done was of the Lord; and if it were to be done again, he would do it. Cook, while he ſtood upon the Ladder, ſaid, The moſt glorious Sight that ever was ſeen in the World was, Jeſus Chriſt upon the Croſs; and the moſt glorious, next to that, was, to ſee a poor Creature ſuffer in his Cauſe; and that he believed an Army of Martyrs would willingly come from Heaven to ſuffer in ſuch a Cauſe as he ſuffered for. Hacker ſaid, If he had a thouſand Lives, he would lay them all down for the Cauſe. And Axtel thanked the Lord, no Guilt lay upon his Conſcience. But ſome of them, it is ſaid, had raiſed themſelves to this Pitch by Strong-Waters; and Hugh Peters was very drunk, when he was drawn to his Execution; which occaſioned Cook, who ſuffered with him, to ſay, Here is a poor Brother, that I am afraid is not fit to die at this Time. Only Scroop and Jones diſcovered any Remorſe, or behaved with tolerable Decency; but Scroop, it ſeems, prayed for the King; and the other acknowledged the Juſtice of their Sentence.

Cromwell, Bradſhaw, Ireton and Pride, buried under the Gallows.

The Bodies of ſome of the principal Regicides alſo, that died before the Reſtoration, viz. of Cromwell, Bradſhaw, Ireton, and Pride, were taken out of their Graves, and dragged on Hurdles to Tyburn, where they were hanged up, from Ten in the Morning till Sun-ſet, and then buried under the Gallows.

19 Regicides that fled, attainted.

An Act alſo paſſed, to attaint 19 of the Regicides that fled from Juſtice; and to confiſcate the Eſtates of thoſe that died before the Reſtoration.

Mounſon, Mildmay, and Wallop, dragged to Tyburn;

The Eſtates alſo of the Lord Mounſon, Sir Henry Mildmay, and Mr. Wallop, who had been pardoned, as to Life; with the Eſtates of Sir James Harrington and John Phelps, not then apprehended, were alſo confiſcated; and the Lord Mounſon, Sir James Harrington, and Sir Henry Mildmay, were degraded from their Honours and Titles, and drawn upon Sledges, with Ropes about their Necks, from the Tower of London, to the Gallows at Tyburn, and from thence to the Tower again, on the 27th of January, 1661. And it was Enacted, they ſhould remain Priſoners for Life; but they had ſuch powerful Mediators at Court, that they were not long after releaſed out of Priſon, and great Part of their Eſtates reſtored them: And ſuch was the Gratitude and Ingenuity of Mildmay, for all this Grace, that he became one of the moſt implacable Enemies King Charles II. had; which his Majeſty took Notice of, when he came to preſent him with a ſeditious Addreſs afterwards.

but pardoned in the End.

But before the laſt mentioned Act, for inflicting Pains and Penalties on theſe and the reſt of the Regicides, was made, thoſe who had been condemned and reprieved, being brought to the Bar, and ordered to ſhew Cauſe why Judgment ſhould not be executed upon them; they anſwered, that they had ſurrendered themſelves, upon his Majeſty's Gracious Declaration from Breda, and the Proclamation afterwards publiſhed, by the Advice of both Houſes of Parliament, to render themſelves; being adviſed that they would thereby ſave Lives; and humbly craved the Mercy of the two Houſes, and their Mediation to his Majeſty: To which, it is ſaid, that infamous Droll Harry Marten added, That he had never obeyed any Proclamation before; And he hoped he ſhould not be hanged for taking the King's Word now.

1660. 12 Car. II.

The Bill for executing the reſt of the condemned Regicides dropped.

And they were ſo fortunate, that the Bill, that was brought in for their Execution, was dropped at the ſecond Reading, whereby their Lives were ſaved.

Corbet, Okey, and Berkſtead, who had fled, apprehended.

Three of the Regicides who had fled from Juſtice (viz.) Miles Corbet, Colonel John Okey, and Colonel John Berkſtead, were afterwards apprehended in Holland, at the Inſtance of Sir George Downing, (his Majeſty's Reſident to the States in the Year 1662.) and ſent over to England; and having been Out-lawed for High-Treaſon, a Rule was made by the Court of King's-Bench, for their Execution at Tyburn.

They die penitent.

Theſe were the laſt of the Regicides that were puniſhed Capitally; and it was obſerved they died very Penitent, exhorting the People to ſubmit to his Majeſty's Government.

Remarks on the Trials of the Regicides.

From the Conduct and Speeches of that amphibious Animal Hugh Peters, both Prieſt and Soldier, it is eaſy to obſerve what the REFORMATION was, the Saints drove at in thoſe Days: It was a Maxim with him, it ſeems, That it would never be well, till the Lords, the Levites, and the Lawyers were put down. The Monarchy was already deſtroyed, and converted into a Common-Wealth; but he was afraid the Old Conſtitution would Revive, unleſs the Levites, the Clergy of the Epiſcopal Church, and Laws of the Land were deſtroyed and eradicated, and the Peers entirely extirpated: But to conſider a little more particularly, the Principles the King's Murderers went upon.

The Reformation they drove at.

The Subſtance of their Defence conſiſts in four Articles.

The chief Part of the Regicides Defence, at their reſpective Trials, it appears, conſiſted in maintaining theſe five Propoſitions.

1. That the Commons, under whom they acted, were, from the firſt Foundation of the Government, the Supreme Power of this Nation.

2. That it was their Duty to obey the Powers de facto, whether they were ſo de jure or not.

3. That their Cauſe was approved and countenanced by Heaven, as appeared on many ſolemn Appeals to God, and a long Train of Succeſſes.

4. That ſeveral of their Judges were in Arms for the Parliament againſt the King, and were therefore as guilty of High-Treaſon as themſelves.

5. And laſtly, They were under a Force, and compelled to ſubmit to the Powers then in being: All which I ſhall conſider in their Order.

That the Commons were the Original of Power.

As to the Firſt, That the Commons were Originally (and conſequently ought always to be be looked upon as) The Supreme Power of the Nation. This is a Maxim that our Presbyterians and other Republicans have always maintained, whenever they were uppermoſt, or durſt diſcloſe their Thoughts. They pretend to derive our Conſtitution from the Saxons or Germans, who were governed, they tell us, by their Wittena-Gemots, or great Councils choſen by the People; and that theſe Councils elected both their Civil and Military Officers, changing them as often as they ſaw fit: That when the Saxons ſettled in Britain, their Conſtitution remained the ſame; only they allowed the Chief Magiſtrate and General (uſually the ſame Perſon) to take the Name of King upon him, reſerving ſtill the Power to themſelves of depoſing him, calling him to Account, and ſitting in Judgment upon him: By virtue of which Supreme Authority, the Regicides and their Diſciples juſtified the Trial of the King and the putting him to Death.

1660. 12 Car. II.

The firſt Article of the Regicides defence anſwered.

In Anſwer to which, It does not appear that the Wittena-Gemots, or great Councils of the Germans, conſiſted of the Repreſentatives of the Commons: Nay, it is evident, they conſiſted of the hereditary Nobility, who held their Lands of their reſpective Konings, or ſuperior Lords, by Military Tenures, and were obliged to attend their Superiors, with a certain Number of Troops, in all their Wars: Neither does it appear, that they had a Power of electing or depoſing their Princes; but if they had, theſe Councils conſiſted of the Nobility, and not of the Repreſentatives of the Commons, as has been obſerved already. If therefore the Power of electing, depoſing, or judging their Princes or Chief Magiſtrates, was lodged any where, it was in the Nobility, and not in the Commons; and conſequently, when the Commons aſſumed that Power, it was evidently an unprecedented Uſurpation. But further, whatever the German Governments were, it is evident, this Nation never knew any ſuch Conſtitution as our Republicans feign the Germans and the Saxons once had: There never was an Inſtance of a King tried and condemned to Death by his Subjects in England, till the Year 1648, and it is ſtrange, if the People had ſuch a Right, it was never exerciſed or pretended to, till then. It is true, the Barons or Nobility did ſometimes reſiſt and depoſe their Kings, under pretence of Maladminiſtration; but the Commons had nothing to do in theſe Conteſts: The Diſpute was, whether the Supreme Power, or laſt Reſort, was lodged in the Crown, or the Nobility: It was never thought to be in the Commons, during the Barons Wars; and all that ever the Barons pretended to, was, that when one King had forfeited his Right to govern them by Maladminiſtration, the Crown devolved upon the next in Succeſſion; or they ſuggeſted that ſome other Prince of the Blood Royal had a prior Title: They never had the Aſſurance to ſay the Supreme Power devolved on themſelves, or reverted to them: This was reſerved for the Saints of the laſt Age to affirm of the 3d and laſt Eſtate that was conſtituted.

But to return to the Times of the Saxons: When they came over to England, we find the ſeveral Expeditions they made, were undertaken in the Name of their Princes, or Generals; with theſe the Britiſh Kings treated, and not with their Wittena-Gemots, or Parliaments. There is no mention made, either of their Great Council's treating, or ratifying any Treaty made with the Britons; which is ſtrange, if the Prince was no more than their Officer.

1660. 12 Car. II.

Rapin, the great Advocate for a Republican Form of Government, indeed maintains, that Hengiſt, the firſt of the Saxon Chiefs, whom the Britons invited into England, was no Sovereign Prince, or had any Civil Authority in his own Country, but what he derived from the Wittena-Gemot, or Parliament: That he was only elected General in this Expedition, and might have been deprived of that Command, even by the Soldiers he brought with him; from which Premiſſes he proceeds to draw this Conſequence, That ſince Hengiſt was not naturally King of the Saxons, he could only become ſo by the Election of thoſe under his Command.

But admitting for once, what can never be proved, that there was no ſuch Thing as a Monarch, or Sovereign Prince, among the Saxons, and that they were governed by their Wittena-Gemots, or Great Councils; will it follow from thence, that the Soldiers, led by Hengiſt in this Expedition to England, had a Power of electing, or depoſing their General? If the Soldiers, as well as Hengiſt, were ſubject to ſome Saxon State, that ſent them on this Expedition, how could they transfer their Allegiance, and elect him their King?

And indeed, Rapin himſelf has given ſo plain and full an Account of Hengiſt's Acceſſion to the Kingdom of Kent, that there is no room to ſuppoſe he was elected by the Saxons. He acknowledges that that Crown was conferred on him by Vortigern, King of Britain; and that thereby he became Sovereign of Kent, and veſted with the like Prerogatives as Vortigern had been, who made a Ceſſion of that Kingdom to him.

But then Rapin objects, that this could not give Hengiſt Dominion of the Saxons he brought with him: THIS COULD NEVER BE BROUGHT ABOUT, BUT BY THEIR CHOICE OF HIM TO BE THEIR KING. And it is true, taking the Word Choice in its full Latitude, we may admit that the Saxons became Hengiſt's Subjects (if they were not ſo before) by their own Choice; that is, as every Foreigner becomes a Subject of England, who chooſes to reſide in England, and ſubmit to the Government here: But it does not follow from thence, that Hengiſt was elected King by the Saxons, or that the King of England is elected to that Dignity by ſuch Foreigners as chuſe to reſide here.

Should it be admitted that Hengiſt was not a Sovereign Prince in Germany, and had no Civil Authority over thoſe he brought with him, into the Kingdom of Kent; yet, when Vortigern had reſigned that Kingdom to him, might not Hengiſt give his Followers the Choice of returning Home, or of remaining with him, without dividing his Authority amongſt them? In returning to Germany, probably, nothing but Rags and Poverty was to be expected; but upon their remaining in Kent, it is presumed, even by Rapin himself, that Hengist promised, and actually parcelled out most of the Lands of that Kingdom amongst them, to hold them of him by Military Tenures (the usual Conduct of the Saxons, and other Northern Nations). And what Occasion had Hengist then to put it to the Vote, whether he should be their King, or not? The Terms he offered to his Followers were advantagious enough, without parcelling out his Authority amongst them.

Had the Saxon Soldiers opposed Hengist's accepting the Crown of Kent, and assuming the like Authority that Vortigern had, would he not have said of Course, You are perfectly at Liberty to return Home; but since a great Prince has been pleased to confer a Kingdom on me, you must pardon me if I take the Liberty to accept it. I have no Favours to ask of you; but if you have any Expectations from me, it will be your Wisdom to behave yourselves as becomes my Subjects? What could any Officer in Hengist's Army reply to this? Is it to be supposed that any one of them would have refused to become his Subject, upon his conferring some fine Roman, or British, Vill upon him, with an Extent of Land, sufficient to maintain a great Man in Splendour; and such a Command as usually attended all Feudal Tenures. From the whole I conclude, that, since it is admitted that the British Kings were Supreme, and not subject to be called to an Account by their People; so neither were the Saxon Kings, who succeeded them in their Authority, and particularly Hengist, the first Saxon King, who received his Crown from Vortigern, King of Britain, and was not elected to that Dignity, either by the Britons or Saxons.

But let the Constitution have been, as our Republicans dream Originally; every one knows that by Custom, Common or Statute-Law, the Constitution has been very much altered, since the Saxons arrived amongst us; and that at the Time of the Grand Rebellion, the King, both by Common and Statute-Law, was Supreme in his Dominions, having no Equal, much less a Superior, either within his Dominions or without.

The Lord Chief Baron Bridgman observed, at the Trials of the Regicides, That no less than Ten Acts of Parliament stile the Crown of England, an Imperial Crown: That the Treason of the Spencers, in the Reign of Richard II. was their maintaining, That Allegiance was due to the King, by Reason of his Crown; and that if the King did not demean himself as he ought, since he could not be reformed by Law, he might by sharp Imprisonment (the very Doctrine the Presbyterians taught and practised, after they had subdued their Sovereign King Charles I.) But this, he told them, had been adjudged Treason by two Acts of Parliament: That our Law-Books stiled the King, The Lieutenant of God; and that the Crown of England was not subject to any human Judicature: And if this was Law, at the Time of the Grand Rebellion, to what Purpose is it to bring the old Saxons as Precedents for our deposing and judging Kings? If we should admit they had such a Power, that they had such Laws; it is evident we had no such Laws in the Reign of King Charles I. And this the Rebels seemed conscious of, by their Schemes for extirpating all Laws and Lawyers, as well as the Lords and the Levites. The Rebels had made loud Complaints, That their Religious and Civil Rights were invaded by the Crown; but they no sooner got the Power into their Hands, than they entirely subverted both the Ecclesiastical and Civil Government: Reformation was pretended, but it was Empire they fought for, and usurped a Power Ten Times more oppressive and arbitrary than that they complained of.

1662. 12 Car. II.

And admitting that the Parliament might contend with the Crown, in Defence of their Liberties, and Properties; yet their entering into a War with their Sovereign, after every Thing, they could demand for their Security, was granted; and the King had transferred, or surrendered to them, some of the most valuable Branches of his Prerogative, can never be defended. But lastly, as the Court well observed, the Regicides could not shelter themselves, even under the Parliament; since the House of Peers, and much the greatest Part of the Commons, were excluded, before they entered upon the last Tragick Scene; and consequently, the Judgment given against the Regicides was extremely just and equitable.

2. The second Part of the Regicides Defence was, That they thought themselves obliged in Law and Conscience to obey the Powers in being; and cited the 11 Henry VII. which indemnifies the Subject for serving a King de facto; and miserable, they said, must be the Condition of the People, if they were bound to obey those that were in Possession of the Sovereign Power, and yet might be punished for obeying them. As the Statute of 11 Henry VII. had provided, That he who served the King for the Time being, should not be punished, that Statute ought in Equity to be extended to them, who obeyed the Supreme Power then in being: If the Supreme Officer de facto might justify a War, and those were indemnified, who took up Arms for him against the King de jure, the Supreme Power de facto might justify the erecting a Court for the Trial of the King and his Adherents, who had conspired the Destruction of the State, which was then settled and established: If the King's Person was sacred, and ought not to be resisted or assaulted, upon any Account, the attacking him with Sword and Pistol, and endeavouring to murder him in the Field, could never be justified: But if it was lawful to make War upon the King, in order to compel him to yield to their Demands by Force of Arms; and to take away the Lives of the King, and his Loyal Subjects, in a Military way, for encroaching on the Liberties of the People; it was lawful also to call him to an Account in a Civil Way, and to judge and condemn both him and them, for making a Breach in the Constitution: Besides, the King was not then in the Execution of his Office, but

That the Subject was obliged to obey the Power in being.

1660. 12 Car. II.

but a Priſoner of War, and ſubject to the Power the Regicides acted under.

To this it was anſwered, That the Regicides groſly miſtook the Meaning of the Statute of 11 Hen. VII. for that Act was made for the Security of a King de facto, and his Adherents; much more for the Preſervation of a King de jure, and his faithful Subjects; it was not made in Favour of an antimonarchical Government: Beſides, the Regicides had owned the Perſon they proceeded againſt to be their King, and ſentenced him to Death as their King, without pretending there was any other King, either de facto or de jure; and therefore there was no Colour for them to claim the Benefit, either of the Letter, or the Equity, of that Act, made for the Support of Kingly Government.

That the People would be more miſerable, if every ſucceſsful Rebel might claim a Right to their Allegiance, than they could be by being under an Obligation to obey their lawful Princes; for no ambitious Man would be afraid to conſpire the Death of his Prince, or the Subverſion of any Government he happened to live under.

If that Notion prevailed, that Poſſeſſion alone would give him a Right to the Dominion of his fellow Subjects, then Changes of Government would probably become as frequent as the Revolutions of the Moon; for by the ſame Rule that Poſſeſſion gives one Uſurper a Right, it will give an hundred a Right to our Allegiance: There could never be ſuch a Thing as a ſettled Government; but the People muſt be for ever harraſſed by ſucceſſive Uſurpations, as we find they were during the Grand Rebellion: One Set of Men had ſcarce poſſeſſed themſelves of Sovereign Power, but they were diſpoſſeſſed by another; till the People, wearied out with perpetual Revolutions, almoſt unanimouſly agreed to reſtore their antient Form of Government.

Laſtly, It was obſerved, that none of our Princes (whether Kings de facto or de jure) from the firſt Foundation of the Government, to that Time, ever pretended that bare Poſſeſſion gave them a Right to Reign; but always ſet up ſome other Claim or Title; conſequently Poſſeſſion alone could not give any one, or any Number of Men, a Right to Sovereign Power, or to the Allegiance of the Subject. Theſe Saints were the firſt in this Nation that pretended Dominion was founded in Grace; or, that Poſſeſſion extinguiſhed all other Rights: That a ſucceſsful Rebel had nothing to do but to kill and take Poſſeſſion; and that this alone was ſufficient to conſtitute him a rightful and lawful Governor. The Judgment of High Treaſon therefore, which was pronounced againſt thoſe Men who maintained and practiſed ſuch pernicious Doctrines, muſt be acknowledged to be agreeable to the Laws of God and Man.

Succeſs an Argument of the Juſtneſs of their Cauſe.

3. The next Part of the Regicides Defence was, That their Actions were approved by Heaven, as was manifeſt, they ſaid, from that continued Train of Succeſs with which they were bleſſed for many Years.

Harriſon, one of the moſt forward and active amongſt the Regicides, ſays at his Trial, Some had felt the Terrors of that Preſence of God that was with his Servants (the Regicides) in thoſe Days, however it had ſeemed good to God to ſuffer this Turn (the Reſtoration) to come upon them: That he had earneſtly deſired of God, the Searcher of Hearts, If he had done amiſs, that he might receive of him ſome Convictions upon his Conſcience; but to that Moment he had rather received Aſſurance of the Juſtice of what he had done; and he believed, e'er long, it would be made known from Heaven, There was more of God in it than Men were aware of.

Carew, at his Trial, affirmed, That what he had done, was in the Fear of the Lord, and in Obedience to his holy and righteous Laws: That the Matter in Queſtion had been controverted in the Face of the whole World; and the Lord had given an Anſwer, upon ſolemn Appeals, to theſe Things.

Scot deſired it might be engraven on his Tomb-Stone, That he adjudged the King to Death, and that he did not repent of it; and at his Execution, ſaid, It was the moſt Glorious Cauſe in the World. And further, Peters reſembled their Mock Court of Juſtice to the Trials that ſhould be, at the End of the World, by the Saints.

From whence it appears, that they thought they were doing God good Service, when they murdered their King, plundered his Loyal Subjects, and reduced their Country to the utmoſt Miſery and Confuſion; and in this they tell us, they were abundantly confirmed by the Succeſs of their rebellious Arms. To which it was anſwered, that the Regicides might pretend Conſcience for what they had done; but they would do well to remember our Saviour's Prediction, That the Time will come when they will perſecute you, and kill you, and think they do God good Service. That there was ſuch a thing as Spiritual Pride: Men might be over-run with an Opinion of their own Holineſs, and act by pretended Revelations: They might ſay that they had prayed for the Direction of Heaven, when they were about to perpetrate the groſſeſt Villaines; and that they found no Remorſe for committing them, as the Man did who murdered his Father and Mother, and averred he could not underſtand there was any Sin in it: That nothing could be more deſtructive to Society, to the Peace and Happineſs of the World, than ſuch pernicious Principles. People that were prompted by an erroneous Conſcience, to commit all manner of Outrages, were more to be dreaded than thoſe whom Neceſſity, Ambition, or Avarice, ſometimes puſhed upon unwarrantable Actions; for the one retained a conſtant permanent Principle of doing Miſchief for God's Sake, while the others were miſchievous but by Accident. Men who looked upon Murder and Rebellion as the Way to Paradiſe, and believed their Holineſs entitled them to this World and the next, would undoubtedly prove more troubleſome and dangerous to Government in General, than any other Set of

An Anſwer to the third Article of the Regicides Defence.

1660. 12 Car. II.

of Men that had not the like Expectations of Happineſs in both Worlds, as a Reward of their ſeditious and treaſonable Attempts.

The chief Reaſon, no doubt, of the Rebels inſiſting ſo much on this Argument of Succeſs, was, that they found none of the reſt would bear them out: They obſerved that all the Laws of their Country were Point-blank againſt them; and therefore reſorted to God's over-ruling Providence to juſtify their Conduct. A Battle between the Rebels and their Sovereign was, in thoſe Days, called, An Appeal to God: And though they might before have ſome Doubts and Scruples upon their Minds, concerning the Lawfulneſs of dethroning their Prince, and aſſuming that arbitrary Dominion they exerciſed; a Victory or two made them perfectly eaſy, and imagine they were fighting the Lord's Battles: And indeed we have Inſtances of Pirates and Banditti, that have entertained the ſame Notions, whoſe repeated Succeſſes againſt the honeſt and induſtrious Part of the World, have induced them to think themſelves the Favourites of Heaven. Thoſe of Algiers pretend to as much Religion as the Heroes of Forty-eight: They declare they engage in the Cauſe of God and their Prophet, when they rob and murder their peaceable Neighbours of a different Faith: And thus it was among our Saints; they firſt reprobated all Mankind but themſelves, and then pretended that none but themſelves had a Right to enjoy any thing in this World, or the next: They had an Authority from Heaven, they would have us believe, to deſtroy all Mankind that would not ſubſcribe to their Creed; and ſo rooted and confirmed were they in theſe Opinions, that though they ſaw their great Argument of Succeſs turned upon them; and that, after numberleſs Victories obtained againſt their native Kings, Monarchy and the Royal Family was peaceably reſtored, and all their hopeful Schemes defeated without the leaſt Bloodſhed; yet ſuch were their Prejudices, ſuch their Infatuation, they had been ſo long uſed to look upon their deteſted Cauſe, as the Cauſe of God, that their own Argument of Succeſs had no Weight with them, when they ſaw it on the Side of the King and his Loyal Subjects; inſomuch, that when they came to die, and receive the due Reward of their Parricide, they went out of the World glorying in their Rebellion and Uſurpation; and inſiſting to the laſt that Their Cauſe was approved by Heaven; which made their Execution neceſſary, that others might be deterred from the like Attempts.

The fourth Part of their Defence, that they were as Innocent as the Parliament that began the War.

4. Another Part of the Regicides Defence was, that they were as Innocent as ſome of their Judges, who were Members of the Long Parliament, that began the War againſt the King.

Harriſon at his Trial, told the Court, that their Lordſhips knew how active many of thoſe had been in the late Rebellion, who now ſat upon the Bench as his Judges, and had juſtified their Reſiſtance, and taking up Arms againſt his late Majeſty.

Axtel alſo averred at his Trial, that General Monk, and the reſt of the Officers of the Uſurper's Army, were as guilty as he; and ſo were all the People, that had acted by the ſame Authority, in the Three Kingdoms. That the Lords and Commons had aſſerted their Right to the Militia, and that it was agreeable to Reaſon and Conſcience, that the Common People ſhould be directed in their Judgements by the High Court of Parliament: That if he was guilty of Teaſon, the Parliament began the Treaſon; with a great deal more to the ſame Purpoſe. 1660. 12 Car. II.

An anſwer to the 4th Part of the Regicides Defence.

To this the Court anſwered, That it did not become the Priſoners at the Bar, to make Reflections on their Judges: That they ſhould not ſuffer them to throw in Bones of Contention, and revive old Quarrels: They did not call them to an Account for what they had done by Authority of Parliament; but for their Actions ſince they had turned the Parliament out of Doors; and for the Malice they expreſſed, to the very laſt, againſt the King and Government.

And though it be true, that the two Houſes had involved themſelves in the Guilt of Rebellion, and that many of theſe Officers and Judges, who acted under them, were once guilty of High-Treaſon; yet, as they had ſhewn themſelves ſenſible of their Error, and in a manner expiated their Offence, by contributing in a very great Degree to the Reſtoration of the King, and the antient Conſtitution, it was highly reaſonable they ſhould be Indemnified for what they had formerly done; but there was not the ſame Reaſon that thoſe who ſtill perſevered obſtinately in their Rebellion, ſhould enjoy the like Indulgence. The Court juſtly obſerved, that Pardons were for the Penitent, and not for ſuch Criminals as juſtified their Treaſons, and declared they were ready to act the ſame Tragedy over again the firſt Opportunity that offered.

The fifth Article of their Defence that they were under a Force.

5. The laſt Part of the Regicides Defence, I ſhall mention, is, that they were under a Force: The Power of the Uſurpers was irreſiſtible, and therefore it was hard they ſhould be puniſhed for ſubmitting to it.

The fifth Article conſidered.

This was generally allowed to be a reaſonable Plea, where it was ſtrictly true. No Government would puniſh their Subjects, for ſubmitting to an Uſurpation, where they were in no Condition to reſiſt it: Neither the Common or Statute-Law looks upon thoſe Men to be guilty of Treaſon, who with Reluctance ſerve and obey a Rebel, or furniſh him with Proviſions for fear of Death; even thoſe who ſerve a Pyrate, and aſſiſt in the taking honeſt Merchant-Men unwillingly, are never puniſhed as Pyrates.

But the caſe is widely different, where it appears that ſuch Men made it their Choice to ſerve a Rebel or a Pyrate, and partook of the Spoils they made; much more, when they accepted Offices and Commands under them, and aſſiſted voluntarily in ſupporting an unlawful Power. It is ridiculous for any Man to pretend he was forced to be a Judge, or a General. Uſurpers do not uſe to employ

thoſe

1660. 12 Car. II. those in Places of Truſt, that they take to be Enemies to their Deſigns: Therefore thoſe who had poſſeſſed any Poſts, Civil or Military, during the Uſurpation, had nothing to plead in their Defence, but their Repentance for the Miſchief they had done; and the Share they had in reſtoring that Conſtitution they once contributed to deſtroy. 1660. 12 Car. Proceedings againſt ARCHIBALD Marquis of ARGYLE, for High-Treaſon, in the Parliament of Scotland, in the Months of January, February, and March, 1660-1. 13 and 14 Car. II.

1660-1. 13 and 14 Car. II. Argyle's Trial.

Two Charges againſt him and his Adherents.

THERE were two Charges, or Setts of Articles, preferred by the Lord Advocate, Sir John Fletcher, againſt the Marquis and his Adherents, in this Parliament; the one dated the 23d of January, and the other the 31ſt of the ſame Month. In the firſt, they are charged with the Murders and Outrages, committed againſt the Family of the Lamounts, and Mac Donalds, who acted under the late King's Commiſſion; and in the other thoſe Facts are omitted.

The Subſtance of the firſt Charge.

The firſt Articles were exhibited in the Name of the ſaid Lord Advocate for the King: And of Sir James Lamount, or Lamond, of Inneryne, for himſelf, and in Behalf of the Mac Donalds, and the reſt of his Kindred, Friends, Vaſſals, Tenants and Servants; and charge the ſaid Marquis, George Campbell his Juſtice and Sheriff-Depute, James Campbell, and ſeveral more of the Officers, Servants, and Dependants of the ſaid Marquis, with High-Treaſon; in that they, from the Beginning of the Troubles in the Years 1639, 1640, 1641, and 1642, both ſecretly and avowedly appeared in conſtant Oppoſition to their late Sovereign King Charles I. That in the Year 1643, they convocated and met in a treaſonable and unlawful Aſſembly, and ordered and appointed treaſonable Levies of his Majeſty's Subjects, in Oppoſition to his Majeſty's Perſon, Authority, and expreſs Command; and afterwards actually invaded and entered his Majeſty's Kingdom of England, taking his Towns, killing his Subjects, and deſtroying their Eſtates, joining with the Engliſh Rebels and Sectaries, for the Deſtruction of his Majeſty's Perſon, Family, Authority and Government.

That they conſtantly oppoſed K. Charles I raiſed Forces againſt him, and invaded England;

joined the Engliſh Rebels;

delivered up the King to them;

oppoſed the King's Reſtoration;

raiſed an Army againſt him;

That the ſaid Marquis of Argyle and his Accomplices, in the Year 1646, in an unheard-of way of Treachery and Treaſon, delivered his Majeſty's ſacred Perſon into the Hands of the ſaid Rebels, who treacherouſly murdered him. And when the States of the Nation propoſed the raiſing an Army for delivering his Majeſty from his Captivity, the ſaid Marquis and his Accomplices oppoſed the ſame, and after the Act paſſed, declared their Diſſent: They alſo raiſed Forces without any Authority, in the Years 1648, and fell upon his Majeſty's Troops, killing his good Subjects, and waſting and deſtroying their Lands; and moſt baſely and traiterouſly invited the late Tyrant and Uſurper Oliver Cromwell, to enter Scotland, with an Army of Strangers, Traitors, and Sectaries; ſuſtained him, and his treaſonable Army, with all ſorts of Proviſions, feaſting and countenancing the Uſurper and his Officers, in the Metropolitan City of the Kingdom, and in his Majeſty's principal Fortreſs, the Caſtle of Edinburgh, which, by the Laws of all Nations, was High-Treaſon, and, in all probability, was the Ruin of that Kingdom; this Act immediately preceding the cruel Regicide and Murder of their ſacred Sovereign King Charles I. invited the Uſurper to invade Scotland.

That notwithſtanding the many Honours and Offices conferred on the Marquis, by the late King; and that his then Majeſty, King Charles II. had permitted the Marquis to aſſiſt at his Coronation; when the Marquis ſwore by the Eternal God, that he would ſupport his Majeſty to the utmoſt, and be a true and faithful Subject to his Crown, and live and die in his Service, againſt all Manner of Folk whatſoever: The ſaid Marquis had, notwithſtanding, diſloyally and baſely deſerted his Majeſty's Perſon and Army at Sterling, when they were on their March to England, in the Year 1651; and in the Year 1652, acknowledged the Uſurper's Government in a Commonwealth, without a King or Houſe of Lords, and obliged himſelf to be obedient to it: That he cauſed himſelf to be elected a Member of the Commons, in the Uſurper Cromwell's Parliament; and ſat, and voted for the ſaid Tyrant in his uſurped Authority, and excluding his Majeſty, and his Royal Family, from their Right to the Crowns of theſe Kingdoms. And in the Years 1653, or 1654, ſold and delivered to the Rebels ſeventeen Pieces of Cannon, and ſeven Hundred ſmall Arms: That in the Years 1654, or 1655, they aſſiſted the Rebels with Boats, that were going to attack the Earls of Glencairn and Middleton, and his Majeſty's Loyal Subjects, that were aſſembled in the North, to vindicate his Royal Authority and revenge the late King's Death; and afterwards joined the ſaid Rebels, in order to ſuppreſs the ſaid Earls and their Adherents; countenancing, counſelling, and conveying the Rebels through divers Places in the Highlands, in their Expedition againſt the King's Forces: That on the Death of the Uſurper, Oliver Cromwell, they aſſiſted at the Market-Croſs of Edinburgh, in proclaiming the Uſurper Richard, his Son; and the ſaid Marquis, procuring himſelf to Honours and Offices conferred on the Marquis.

His Oaths to ſerve the King; and yet deſerts him.

Acknowledges the Uſurpers.

Sits in their Parliament as a Commoner.

Voted the Expulſion of the King, and Royal Family.

Aſſiſted the Rebels in the North.

Proclaims Richard.

be elected a Member of the Commons, voted the Excluſion of his Majeſty, and his Royal Family.

Speeches againſt the Reſtoration.

And further to manifeſt the ill Intentions of the Marquis againſt his Majeſty, contrary to his Oaths and Duty, when ſome Miniſters were praying for his Majeſty's Happineſs, in the Years 1652, or 1653, he openly declared, They were Fools to pray for that wicked, falſe, malignant King, whom God had caſt off, and would never reſtore again; and boaſted, That he was the only Man that plotted the riſing of the Forces in the Weſt; which was the Occaſion of his Majeſty's ill Succeſs.

Receives 12000 l. of the Uſurper.

That he received Twelve Thouſand Pounds from the Uſurper, Oliver Cromwell, for the Service he had done him. That he correſponded, by Letters, with the Uſurper Richard, in the Years 1658, and 1659, and with Sir Archibald Johnſtoun, of Wariſtoun, his Fellow-Traitor, and ſat in that traiterous Meeting, or Council of the Rebels at London, called, The Committee of Safety, of which Wariſtoun was Preſident; and did again iſſue Declarations for excluding his Majeſty, and Family, from their Right to the Crown.

Sat in the Committee of Safety.

Outrages againſt the Lamounts and Mac-Donalds.

The reſt of the Charge conſiſts in an Enumeration of the Murders, and Outrages, committed by the Marquis, and his Adherents, on the Family of Sir James Lamount, and the Mac Donalds, ſome of whom they hanged up in cold Blood, contrary to their Capitulation; others they impriſoned, and laid in Irons, burning their Houſes, cutting down their Trees, and ſeizing their Lands and Goods, which they remained in Poſſeſſion of at the Time of this Proſecution.

2d Charge, that he attacked the King's Forces.

The ſecond Indictment, or Accuſation, charges the Marquis with gathering together, in a hoſtile Manner, his Friends, Servants, Vaſſals, and Followers, without any Authority; and that, under Pretence of oppoſing ſuch as he nick-named Anti-covenanters, and Oppoſers of the Reformation (but indeed his Majeſty's faithful Subjects) did march to Lyon, in Athol, in the Year 1640, and in his Tent there did publickly declare, in the Preſence of a great many Gentlemen, That it was the Opinion of many Divines and Lawyers, That a King may be depoſed for Deſertions, Venditions and Invaſions; meaning thereby, that the King's Majeſty might be deſtroyed; and venting theſe Treaſonable Speeches, with a Deſign to uſher in his many Treaſonable Actions, and Practices, done to his ſacred Perſon, Dignity, and Authority; which doubtleſs did occaſion, and was mainly Inſtrumental, both in his Depoſition and cruel Murder: Which wicked and treaſonable Speeches being reported by Mr. John Stuart, the ſaid Marquis had cauſed him to be put to Death, as a Leaſing-maker, though he was conſcious of the Truth of that Report.

Other Speeches.

Takes the Earl of Airlie's Houſe.

That he raiſed Forces, marched againſt the Earl of Airlie's Houſe, then held for his Majeſty; and having obliged the Garriſon to ſurrender, deſtroyed the ſaid Earl's Tenants and Friends; and afterwards burnt and demoliſhed that, and another Houſe of the Earl's with the Furniture, to expreſs his Hatred to the ſaid Earl for his Loyalty.

That in the Year 1640, he attacked his Majeſty's Caſtle of Dunbarton, held by Col. Henderſon, and forced it to ſurrender, carrying away the Cannon and Ammunition.

1660. 13 and 14 Car. II. Dunbarton Caſtle and burns the Counteſs of Sterling's Houſe.

That, to ſhew his implacable Malice againſt all who had ſhewn any Affection to his Majeſty, he did, in the Year 1645, burn the Houſe of the Counteſs of Sterling, to whom he had great Obligations, with all the Furniture. Several Inſtances follow of his attacking his Majeſty's loyal Subjects; and hanging them in cold Blood, after they had ſurrendered on Capitulations.

Other Murders and Outrages.

He is alſo charged again as the Occaſion of his late Majeſty's being delivered up to the Engliſh Rebels, and oppoſing the raiſing an Army to reſcue him out of their Hands: With levying an Army to oppoſe the Royaliſts, and calling in Cromwell to his Aſſiſtance.

Part of the former Charge repeated.

That he did traiterouſly contrive and vote the drawing up of a Letter, directed to Cromwell the Uſurper, wherein he and his Accomplices did promiſe, in the Name of the Kingdom of Scotland, to employ his utmoſt Endeavours, that none who had been active againſt the Sectaries, or been in Arms for the King at Sterling, or elſewhere, ſhould be employed in any Place of Truſt, without the Conſent of England, as appeared by the ſaid Letter, dated the 6th of October, 1648. That he alſo ſent Sir John Chieſly to the pretended Parliament in England, deſiring that the Noblemen and Gentlemen, that were taken Priſoners with Duke Hamilton, might be kept as Pledges for the Peace of the Kingdom, endeavouring thereby to enſlave his Country and fellow-Subjects, and bring them under the Power of Strangers. And having afterwards, on the 4th of May, traiterouſly taken upon him the ſupreme Authority of the Kingdom, he iſſued a Proclamation, declaring the Wives, Children and Families of Lewis, Marquis of Huntley; James, Lord Ogilby, and ſeveral other loyal Lords, out of the Protection of the Laws, and for tranſporting them out of the Kingdom.

Conſederates with Cromwell againſt the Loyalty.

againſt the Hamiltons and his own Country.

Outlaws and declares the ſame with Loyalty.

That there being an Overture made for recognizing and proclaiming his Majeſty King Charles II. which the Marquis durſt not oppoſe directly; yet he cauſed it to be clogged with ſuch Limitations and Reſtrictions as were deſtructive to his Dignity and Authority, and inconſiſtent with Monarchical Government, as appeared by the Commiſſions, Inſtructions, and Addreſſes ſent to his Majeſty: And to deter his Majeſty from coming over, cauſed that brave and loyal Lord, the Marquis of Montroſe, who acted by his Majeſty's Commiſſion, to be cruelly murdered at that very Time, with all the Circumſtances of Diſgrace and Diſhonour.

Puts him Conditions on King Charles II.

murders Montroſe.

That his Majeſty, however, coming over to Scotland, and the Uſurper Cromwell invading that Kingdom, the Marquis held a Correſpondence with him; and to advance the Deſigns of that Regicide, procured his Majeſty to be removed from the Army; and by his Influence on the Commiſſioners of the General Aſſembly, met at St. Cuthbert's Church, uſually called The Weſt Church, he procured a clandeſtine and ſurreptitious Act

from

1660-1. 13 and 14 Car. II

from them; wherein, beſides many ſlanderous and reproachful Expreſſions of his Majeſty and his Anceſtors, It was declared, that they diſclaimed, and would not own his Majeſty's Intereſt, becauſe he refuſed to ſubſcribe a Declaration drawn up by the Marquis, containing many ſcandalous, ſeditious, imperious, reproachful, and treaſonable Expreſſions, not only againſt his Majeſty's Authority and Government, but againſt his Father and Mother, and others his Royal Anceſtors; and that his Majeſty was forced to ſign the ſame, though the worthieſt and greateſt Part of the Kingdom did then deteſt and abhor the ill Uſage of his Majeſty in that Particular, when that Act of Tyranny was exerciſed by the Marquis, and a few ill Men of his Accomplices.

Compels the King to ſign a Seditious and Scandalous Paper.

And to manifeſt to the World, that it was always his Intention to deſtroy his Majeſty's Authority and Government, and oppoſe his Reſtoration, (beſides the traiterous Expreſſions already mentioned) he boaſted before ſeveral Noblemen and Gentlemen, That he would own any thing he had done; and if it were to do, would do it again, although he had known what would have been the Event of it; preſumptuouſly taking upon him, by outward Succeſs to give Judgment upon the ſudden and ſecret Councils and Determinations of God, thereby to alienate the Affections, Duties and Allegiance of his Majeſty's good Subjects, and harden and confirm others in their Treaſon and Rebellion againſt his Majeſty.

Boaſts of what he had done.

Makes Succeſs an Argument of the Juſtice of the Rebels Cauſe.

And laſtly, in a Conference betwixt the Marquis, Oliver Cromwell, and Colonel Ireton, The Marquiſs obſerved, that then the Danger was great, and they were all ruined if any of his Majeſty's Deſigns ſhould take Effect; and thereupon gave his poſitive Advice, that they ſhould proceed to the queſtioning of the King for his Life; declaring, They ſhould never be Safe, till they had taken away his Majeſty's Life. At leaſt he knew of the ſaid Treaſonable Deſign, and did not reveal it, as appeared by a Speech he made in that pretended Parliament, Anno 1649. Wherein he declared, the Uſurper Oliver told him, That England and Scotland could never be at Peace, untill the King were put to death.

Adviſes the proceeding Capitally againſt the King.

Biſhop Burnet, has given us a pretty juſt Abſtract of the Priſoner's Defence, in his Poſthumous Hiſtory: He ſays the Marquis chiefly inſiſted, that during the late Wars, he was but one among a great many more: He had always acted by Authority of Parliament, and according to the Inſtructions that were given him, as often as he was ſent on any Expedition or Negotiation. As to all Things done before the Year 1641, the late King had buried them in an Act of Oblivion, as his preſent Majeſty Charles II. had all thoſe done before the Year 1651. So that he had no Occaſion to make any Defence as to what had been done before that Time: That he was in London when moſt of the barbarities he was charged with were committed; nor did it appear he gave any Orders for them. It was well known that great Outrages had been committed by the Mac Donalds; and he believed his People, when they had the better of them, had taken cruel Revenges: This was to be imputed to the Heat of the Times and the Tempers of the People, who had been much provoked by the burning of the whole Country, and by much Blood that was ſhed. And as to many Stories laid to the Charge of his Men, he knew ſome them were mere Forgeries, and others agravated much beyond the Truth. But, what Truth ſoever there might be in them, he could only be anſwerable for what was done by himſelf, or by his Orders. As to his Compliance with the Uſurpation, he had ſtood out till the Nation was quite conquered; and in that Caſe, it was the received Opinion of Divines and Lawyers, that Men might lawfully ſubmit to an Uſurpation, when forced to it by inevitable Neceſſity. It was the Epidemical Sin of the Nation. His Circumſtances were ſuch, that more than a bare Compliance was required of him. What he did that way, was only to preſerve himſelf and Family, and was not done with a Deſign to oppoſe the King's Intereſt: Nor did his Majeſty's Service ſuffer, by any Thing he had done.

1660-1. 13 and 14 Car. II.

They did but retaliate the Injuries done them.

He was under a neceſſity of complying with the Uſurpers.

Had no Deſign againſt the King.

The Subſtance of his Defence.

Inſiſts on the Acts of Oblivion.

That he gave no Orders for the Barbarities he is charged with

During the Trial, the Lord Lorn, Son to the Marquis, obtained a Letter from his Majeſty to the Earl of Middleton, requiring him to order his Majeſty's Advocate, not to inſiſt on any Facts before the Indemnity paſſed in the Year 1651. And accordingly all the Part of the Charge, relating to what was done before that, was waved, and declared to be out of the Caſe: And the ſole Queſtion almoſt, that was debated in Parliament, was, Whether the Marquis's Compliance with the Uſurpation after the Year 1651, was forced; or wilful and malicious? Which it was impoſſible his Judges, who were moſt of them upon the Spot, and engaged, on one Side or the other, in the very Facts in Diſpute, could be ignorant of: Though the Biſhop affirms it was doubtful, till General Monk ſent down the Letters, wrote by Argyle to himſelf, which put the matter beyond Diſpute. Whereupon his Friends withdrew, and the Marquis was found Guilty of High-Treaſon, without one diſſenting Voice; and Sentence paſſed upon him as a Traitor: However the Parliament was ſo Indulgent to the Priſoner, as to give him all the Time he could ask, to apply to his Majeſty, and ſet ſuch Facts right as might have been miſrepreſented; and it was the 27th of May 1661, before he was brought to the Scaffold: When he made the following Speech to the People, which I chuſe to recite verbatim, in as much as it contains Proteſtations of his Innocence, which were the principal Part of his Defence, and in a great Meaſure diſcovers the Principles this Nobleman went upon, in oppoſing both King Charles I. and King Charles II.

" Righteous in all his Works, holy and bleſſed is his Name; neither come I to condemn others. I know many will expect that I ſpeak againſt the hardneſs of the Sentence pronounced againſt me; but I will ſay nothing to it. I bleſs the Lord, I pardon all Men, as I deſire to be pardoned of the Lord myſelf: Let the Will of the Lord be done; That is all that I deſire.

" I hope ye will have more Charity to me now, than ye would have had at another Time, ſeeing I ſpeak before the Lord, to whom I muſt give an Account very ſhortly. I know very well my Words have had but very little Weight with many: And that many have miſtaken my Words and Actings both: Many have thought me to be an Enemy to theſe great Works that have of late been brought to paſs. But do not miſtake me, good People: I ſpeak it in the Preſence of the Lord, I entered not upon the Work of Reformation, with any Deſign of Advantage to myſelf, or Prejudice to the King and his Government. As my latter Will which was Written 1655, and thereafter delivered to a Friend (in whoſe Hands it ſtill remaineth) can ſhow. As for theſe Calumnies that have gone abroad of me, I bleſs God, I know them to be no more: And as I go to make a Reckoning to my God, I am as free to any of theſe, concerning the King's Perſon and Government. I was Real and Cordial in my Deſires to bring the King Home, and in my Endeavours for him when he was at Home, and I had no Correſpondence with the Adverſaries Army, nor any of them, at the Time when his Majeſty was in Scotland: Nor had I any Acceſſion to his late Majeſty's horrid and execrable Murder, by Counſel or Knowledge of it, or any other manner of way. This is a Truth, as I ſhall Anſwer to my Judge. And all the Time his Majeſty was in Scotland, I was ſtill endeavouring his Advantage, my Conſcience beareth me Witneſs in it. So much to that Particular; and I hope Gentlemen you will all remember theſe.

" I confeſs, many look on my Condition, as a ſuffering Condition; but I bleſs the Lord, that he that hath gone before me hath trod the Wine-preſs of the Father's Wrath, by whoſe Sufferings I hope that my Sufferings ſhall not be eternal. I bleſs him that hath taken away the Sting of my Sufferings: I may ſay, That my Charter was ſealed to-Day; for the Lord hath ſaid to me, Son, be of good Cheer, thy Sins are freely forgiven thee; and ſo I hope my Sufferings ſhall be very eaſy. And ye know the Scripture ſaith, The Captain of our Salvation was made perfect by Sufferings.

" I ſhall not ſpeak much to theſe Things, for which I am condemned, leſt I ſeem to condemn others: It is well known, it is only for Compliance, which was the Epidemical Fault of the Nation. I wiſh the Lord to pardon them: I ſay no more.

" There was an Expreſſion in thoſe Papers, preſented by me to the Parliament, of the Contagion of theſe Times, which may by ſome be miſconſtructed, as if I intended to lay an Imputation on the Work of Reformation; but I declare that I intend no ſuch Thing; but only related to the Corruptions and Failings of Men, occaſioned by the prevailing of the uſurping Powers. 1660-1. 13 and 14 Car. II.

" Now, Gentlemen, concerning the Nation: I think there are three ſorts of People that take up much of the World, and of this Nation. There is, 1. The openly Prophane: And truly I may ſay, though I have been a Priſoner, I have not had my Ears ſhut: I hear aſſuredly that Drinking, Swearing, Whoring, were never more common, never more countenanced, than now they are. Truly, if Magiſtrates were here, I would ſay to them, if they lay forth their Power for glorifying God, by reſtraining this, they ſhould fare the better: If they continue in not reſtraining, they ſhall fare the worſe. I ſay no more, but either let People ſhun Prophanity, and Magiſtrates reſtrain it, or aſſuredly the Wrath of God ſhall follow on it. 2. Others are not openly prophane (every one will not allow that) but yet they are Gallio's in the Matter: If Matters go well, as to their private Intereſt, they care not whether the Church of God ſink or ſwim. But whatever they think, God hath laid Engagements upon Scotland: We are tied by Covenants to Religion, and Reformation: Theſe that were then unborn, are yet engaged; and in our Baptiſm we are engaged to it. And it paſſeth the Power of all the Magiſtrates under Heaven to abſolve them from the Oath of God. They deceive themſelves, and it may be would deceive others that think otherwiſe: But I would caveat this: People would be ready to think this a kind of Inſtigation to Rebellion in me; but they are far wrong that think Religion and Loyalty are not well conſiſtent: Whoever they be that ſeparate them, Religion is not to be blamed, but they. It is true; it is the Duty of every Chriſtian to be Loyal; yet I think the Orders of Things are to be obſerved, as well as their Natures; the Order of Religion, as well as the Nature of it. Religion muſt not be the Cock-boat; it muſt be the Ship. God muſt have what is his, as well as Cæſar what is his: And thoſe are the beſt Subjects that are the beſt Chriſtians. And that I am looked as a Friend to Reformation, is my glory.

" 3. There is another ſort that are truly Godly; and to them I muſt ſay what I fear, and every one hath Reaſon to fear; (it is good to fear Evil). It is true, the Lord may prevent it; but if he do not (and truly I cannot ſee any probability of it) Times are like to be either very Sinning, or very Suffering Times: And let Chriſtians make their Choice: There is a ſad Dilemma in the Buſineſs Sin, or Suffer; and ſurely he that would chuſe the better Part, would chuſe to ſuffer: Others that will chuſe to ſin, ſhall not eſcape ſuffering: They ſhall ſuffer, but it may be not as I do, but worſe: Mine is but Temporal, theirs ſhall be Eternal; when I ſhall be ſinging, they ſhall be howling. Beware therefore of Sin whatever you are aware of, eſpecially in ſuch Times.

Yet

" Yet, I cannot ſay of my own Condition, " but that the Lord, in his Providence, hath " Mind of Mercy to me, even in this World: " For, if I had been more favourably dealt " with, I fear, I might have been overcome " with Temptations, as many others are, and " many more, I fear, will be; and ſo ſhould " have gone out of the World, with a more " polluted Conſcience, than, through the Mercy " of God, now I have. And hence my Con- " dition is ſuch now as, when I am gone, will " be ſeen not to have been ſuch as many " imagined. It is fit God take me away, be- " fore I fall into theſe Temptations that I ſee " others are falling into, and many others, I " fear, will fall: I wiſh the Lord may prevent " it: Yet bleſſed be his Name, that I am kept " both from preſent Evils, and Evils to come. " Some may expect I will regrate my own Con- " dition; but truly, I neither grudge nor re- " pine, nor deſire any Revenge. And, I de- " clare, I do not repent my laſt going up to " London; for I had always rather have ſuffered " any thing, than lie under Reproaches as I " did. I deſire not that the Lord ſhould " judge any Man; nor do I judge any but my- " ſelf: I wiſh, as the Lord hath pardoned me, " ſo he may pardon them, for this and other " Things; and what they have done to me " may never meet them in their Accounts. " I have no more to ſay, but to beg the Lord, " that, when I go away, he would bleſs every " one that ſtayeth behind.

After he was undreſſed for the Block, he ſaid, " I deſire you, Gentlemen, all that hear " me this Day, to take Notice (and I wiſh that " all that ſee me, might hear me) that now, " when I am entring into Eternity, and am to " appear before my Judge; and as I deſire Sal- " vation and Happineſs from him, from my " Birth to my Scaffold, I am free from any " Acceſſion, by my Knowledge, concerning " Council, or any other way to his late Ma- " jeſty's Death: And I pray the Lord to pre- " ſerve his preſent Majeſty, and to pour his " beſt Bleſſings on his Perſon and Government; " and the Lord give him good and faithful " Counſellors —— Many Chriſtians may ſtum- " ble at this, and my Friends may be diſcon- " tented; but when Things are rightly con- " ſidered, my Friends have no Diſcredit of me, " nor Chriſtians no Stumbling-block; rather an " Engagement."

He is beheaded

After which, having taken leave of his Friends, and finiſhed his private Devotions, his Head was cut off by the Maiden, an Engine that goes with a Pulley, and lets down a ſharp Ax with ſuch a Force, that it never fails to ſever the Head from the Body at one Blow. His Head was ſet on the Tolbooth, in the Room of that of the Marquis of Montroſe, whoſe Funeral Obſequies were ſolemnized the eleventh of May (while Argyle lay under Sentence of Death) at the Expence of the Government, with uncommon Magnificence; a Debt juſtly due to the braveſt and moſt loyal of the King's Subjects, who had been ignominiouſly and barbarouſly treated by the Priſoner and his Party, for adhering ſo ſtrenuouſly to the Royal Cauſe.

Montroſe's Funeral.

Remarks on Argyle's Trial and Dying Speech.

The Priſoner, in his Defence, it is obſervable, denies almoſt every Article with which he is charged; inſiſting, that his Compliance with the Uſurpation was forced, and conſequently, he ought not to be proſecuted for it. In his Speech, on the Scaffold, he ſays, He deſigned no Prejudice to the King and Government; that he was real and cordial in his Deſigns to bring the King home, and in his Endeavours for him, when he was at home; and had no Correſpondence with his Adverſaries at that Time, or had any Acceſſion to, or Knowledge of, the late King's Murder; and all the Time King Charles II. was in Scotland, he was ſtill endeavouring his Advantage, his Conſcience bore him Witneſs: And yet we find the whole Parliament of Scotland declaring (without one diſſenting Voice) That his Compliance with the Uſurpation was wilful and malicious, and the Hiſtorians of all Parties are of the ſame Opinion. Not to inſiſt on the Evidence of Echard, that he received thirty thouſand Pounds, as a Reward for delivering up the King to the Engliſh Rebels at Newcaſtle; or of the Earl of Clarendon, who ſays, That all Men complained of the Marquis of Argyle, who proſecuted the King's Friends with the utmoſt Malice; or what Biſhop Burnet affirms, That the Letters written by Argyle himſelf put the Matter beyond Diſpute.

1660-1. 13 & 14 Car. II.

Rapin (who was a French Hugonot, and an avowed Advocate for the Presbyterians and their Leaders) has admitted Argyle to be the moſt dangerous and implacable Enemy King Charles I. or King Charles II. had in Scotland: For Proof whereof, I ſhall ſelect ſome few Paſſages, out of many others we meet with, in that admired Author. He ſays, Vol. xii. p. 468, of the 8*vo* Edition (Tindal's Tranſlation) " That it " had been reſolved at Edinburgh, that the " Committee of Eſtates ſhould meet the 5th of " February, and the Parliament, the 10th of " March; which Reſolution was taken, notwith- " ſtanding the Marquis of Argyle's Oppoſition, who " (though a Presbyterian as to Religion) was " of the ſame Principles with the Independants, as " to the Government of the State, and had made " a faſt Friendſhip with Cromwell and Vane.

Rapin's Conceſſions relating to Argyle.

Page 469. The Committee found it neceſſary to raiſe an Army of 40000 Men. It was not poſſible for the Marquis of Argyle, who was of the Committee, to prevent this Reſolution; but he found Means, however, to ſtir up the Commiſſioners of the General Aſſembly of the Kirk, who ſome Days after preſented to the Parliament certain Demands proper to ſpin out the Affair.

One of which Demands was, That if the Popiſh, Prelatical, or Malignant Party, ſhall again riſe in Arms, this Nation and their Armies, may be ſo far from joining or aſſociating with them, that on the contrary, they may oppoſe them, and endeavour to ſuppreſs them, as Enemies to this Cauſe and Government.

Another Demand was, That his Majeſty ſhall, for Himſelf and Succeſſors, agree to Acts of Parliament, enjoining the League and Covenant, and fully eſtabliſhing Presbyterian Government, Directory of Government, and Confeſſion of Faith, in all his Majeſty's Dominions.

Vol. xii. p. 476. it is ſaid, That the Marquis of Argyle, and the rigid Presbyterians, ſtrongly repreſented, both in publick and private, that under Colour of acting againſt the Independants in England, the Royaliſts, the Mortal Enemies to Scotland and the Presbyterians, were going to be ſet up again. These Repreſentations made ſuch Impreſſions on the People, that the Parliament could not help ordering, that thoſe who had not taken, or ſhould refuſe to take, the Covenant, ſhould not be received into the Army, or joined with it, at their Entrance into England. Theſe, and other Obſtacles, daily ſtarted by the Marquis of Argyle and the rigid Clergy, were the Reaſon the Parliament could not be ſo ſpeedy as the Authors of the Project expected. P. 533, he ſays, The Marquis of Argyle, who had not been able to prevent the raiſing an Army, got uppermoſt again, being ſupported by all who were againſt the War (with the Uſurpers) and being ſure of the Approbation of the People, levied 3 or 4000 Men, to oppoſe Monroe (the King's General) whom Lanerick (Lord Hamilton's Brother) had joined with ſome Troops, and hindred the Marquis of Argyle from making any Progreſs: But Cromwell broke all their Meaſures by making directly to Edinburgh. The Committee of Eſtates were forced to fly from thence, and ſhift for themſelves, for fear of being hemmed in between the Engliſh Army, and the Marquis of Argyle's Forces; and Lanerick and Monroe, finding it not in their Power to continue the War, came to an Agreement, &c.

P. 534. The Scene of Affairs being thus altered, and the King's Party diſperſed, Cromwell repaired to Edinburgh, where he was received with great Reſpect: He obtained the Reſtitution of Berwick and Carliſle, and having concerted all proper Meaſures with the Marquis of Argyle, returned in Triumph into England.

And we find Vol. xiii. p. 37. one of Argyle's modeſt Demands, on admitting King Charles II. to come to Scotland, was, that he would conſent, that all Matters Civil might be determined by the then preſent, and ſubſequent Parliament of Scotland; and all Matters Eccleſiaſtical, by the General Aſſemblies of the Kirk: And he compelled the King to grant this, and to ſign the Solemn League and Covenant, before he ſuffered him to ſet his Foot on Shore. 1660-1. 13 & 14 Car. II.

That he ſat in Oliver's and Richard's Parliaments as a Commoner, (by both of which the King and the Royal Family were excluded and proſcribed) he did not deny at his Trial: And that he accepted Commands and Employments under the Uſurpers in Scotland; ſat in the Committee of Safety in England, and perſecuted the King's Friends with the greateſt Malice of any Man of the Scotiſh Nation, is evident from the concurrent Teſtimonies of all his Contemporaries; for which he is, to this Day, applauded by the Sectaries, and deteſted by the Royaliſts, and the Friends of the Conſtitution. The Conclusion.

And yet this is the Man that affirms with his laſt Breath, That he had never any Deſign againſt the King or Government; that he was real and cordial in his Deſires to bring the King home, and in his Endeavours for him, when he was at home; and denies his holding any Correſpondence with his Adverſaries; declaring, that his Compliance with the Uſurpers was altogether forced. This his Conſcience bore Witneſs to, he tells us from the Scaffold: From whence it will not be difficult to collect, what Credit is to be given to the dying Words of this Nobleman, or to frame an Opinion of the Juſtice of his Sentence.

Vane's Tryal.

The Trial of Sir HENRY VANE, Knt. for High-Treaſon, in the Court of King's-Bench, the 2d and 6th of June, 1662. 14 Car. II.

1662. 14 Car. II.

The Charge.

THE Indictment charges the Priſoner with compaſſing the Death of his Majeſty King Charles II, and the Overt-Acts laid to prove it, were the keeping him from the Exerciſe of his Regal Authority, ſitting in the Uſurper's Councils, the accepting Civil and Military Poſts under them, and levying War againſt his Majeſty.

Sir Henry, at his Requeſt, had the Favour of hearing the Indictment read twice in Engliſh, but could not prevail on the Court, to let him hear it read in Latin; being told that, though the Records were in Latin, yet the Agitation of Cauſes ought always to be in Engliſh.

Exceptions to the Indictment over-ruled.

Then he excepted to the Indictment, that the Places and Perſons mentioned in it, were not ſufficiently aſcertained; and that the particular Acts of levying War were not ſet forth: He alſo queſtioned the Juriſdiction of the Court, for that the Facts, he was indicted for, were done by Authority of Parliament; and added, that it did not appear he was that Sir Henry Vane that was excepted in the Act of Indemnity: But not thinking fit to abide by his laſt Plea, and his Exceptions being over ruled, he pleaded Not guilty; and then the Court adjourned.

The Priſoner being brought to the King's-Bench Bar again, the 6th of June, challenged thirty two of the Pannel; after which the Jury was ſworn, and charged with him; and the King's Counſel, opening the Indictment, obſerved, that though the Priſoner might be charged with many notorious Treaſons, committed during the late Civil Wars, they ſhould confine themſelves to ſuch Facts as were committed within the Reign of his preſent Majeſty: And then the Witneſſes were produced, who proved the Priſoner's Hand to a Warrant, dated the 30th of January 1648, directed to the Officers of the Navy, to iſſue out Stores for a Summer's Guard of the narrow Seas. It was proved alſo, that the Priſoner was one of the Uſurper's Council of State, and acted as a Member of that Council, in February 1648, the Month after the late King was beheaded: that, by the Order of Parliament for erecting that Council, they were authorized to ſuppreſs all Perſons pretending Title to the Kingly Goverment of this Nation, from or by the late King, Charles Stuart his Son, or any claiming from or by them, or any other ſingle Perſon whatſoever; and they were empowered to command the Forces of the Common-wealth for for that End, and to raiſe more Forces, if they ſaw fit. Several Orders alſo, ſigned by Sir Henry Vane, the Preſident of that Council, for delivering out Arms to the Soldiers, for fitting out Ships, &c. were produced in Court: Other Witneſſes depoſed, that they ſaw Sir Henry Vane at the Head of the Soldiers, when they were muſtered in Southwark, and that he gave them five Pounds to drink. It was alſo ſworn, that he propoſed a new Model of Government; in which he aſſerted, It was deſtructive to the People's Liberties to admit any earthly King or ſingle Perſon, to the Legiſlative, or Executive Power in this Nation.

Vane's Defence.

The Priſoner in his Defence ſaid, that by King, in the Statute of 25 Ed. III. was to be underſtood a King regnant, in actual Poſſeſſion, and not a King de jure, out of Poſſeſſion: That an Interregnum was admitted by the Indictment, and all Enſigns of Authority, and Badges of Government, were viſibly in another Name and Stile; and the King's beſt Friends proſecuted their Suits in the Name, and by the Authority, of the Powers then in being.

He objected alſo to the Incompetency of the Evidence, becauſe the Witneſſes did not ſee him ſet his Hand to the Warrant produced in Court; and thought it was not fully proved, that he ſat in the Council of State; and if there were any ſuch Acts of Council, as had been read in Evidence, the Council acted by Authority of Parliament, and of ſuch a Parliament as was conſtituted in an extraordinary Manner, and made indiſſolvable but by its own Act: That this Parliament was a Power co-ordinate with the King, and whatſoever he had done by their Authority, could not amount to High-Treaſon, within the Statute of 25 Ed III. for which he cited an Ordinance of Parliament, made in the Year 1642, in which it was declared to be Treaſon, to lay any Imputation of Treaſon on either, or both Houſes.

That it was ſuch a Caſe as never happened before; that the Government being truſted to three Eſtates, they ſhould ſo fall out among themſelves, that the People could not tell which to obey. On ſuch Emergencies, it was impoſſible to act according to the ſtrict Rules of Law; and the Parliament being by the 17 Car. I. made a Power co-ordinate with the King, no Court inferior to the Parliament, by whoſe Authority theſe things were tranſacted, ought to be Judges in the Caſe: That the three Eſtates being disjoined, he thought it beſt Policy to preſerve the Government in its Root, the Commons, by whom it was preſerved, and at length reſtored to its former Courſe.

He urged alſo (as the Regicides had done before him) that by the 11 Hen. VII. whoever ſerved a King de facto, ought not to be queſtioned for it by a King de jure; and that thoſe who had the Power and Exerciſe of the Royal Juriſdiction, as to Peace and War, coining Money, Life and Death, &c. muſt be admitted to be the Power regnant, though they wanted the Name of King, and were as well within the Statute of 25 Ed III. as a Queen regnant, though not named, had been adjudged to be. If the Powers regnant had the Thing, though they wanted the Title, the Statute in Reaſon and Equity ought to be extended to them: Where the Reaſon is the ſame, there is the ſame Law, was a known Rule; and there was the ſame Reaſon the Subject ſhould be indemnified, when he acted under a Sovereign Authority, which had not the Name of King, as if it had: That the Statute of the 11 Hen. VII, was made, that the Subject might ſafely pay Allegience where he received Protection, and might not be in Danger of being deſtroyed by two Powers at the ſame Time: For the Power de facto will be obeyed, and make it Treaſon to do otherwiſe, be it Right or Wrong; and if the Subject was at the ſame time in Danger of committing Treaſon againſt a Power de jure, he was in a miſerable Condition. 1662. 14 Car. II

That, had the Protector taken the Name and Stile of King, no Treaſon could have been committed againſt the King de jure: And he hoped they would not take away his Life upon ſuch a Nicety; becauſe an uſurping Protector was not clothed with the Title, as well as Power, of King. The Uſurper's taking, or not taking, the Title of King, could not alter the State of his Crime, admitting he had the Power of a King.

The Reply to Vane's Defence.

To this Defence of the Priſoner's, the King's Counſel replied, That they admitted the Council of State, of which he was Preſident, acted by the Authority of what he called a Parliament, and of which he himſelf was a Member; but that the Houſe Lords, nor an eighth Part of the Commons, were permitted to ſit when theſe Treaſons were committed; and that the acting in, and under ſuch an End of a Parliament, was rather an Aggravation of his Offence, than an Excuſe; and further, that the Parliament was diſſolved by the Death of the late King: That as to the Co-ordination of a Parliament with the King, there was no Colour for ſuch a co-ordinate Power in our Law: The King was ever declared to be Supreme in his Dominions, both by Common and Statute Law: And as to the King's being out of Poſſeſſion, Watſon was indicted for High Treaſon, againſt King James I. before his Majeſty ſet his Foot in England; nor did it avail him to ſay, the King was never in Poſſeſſion of the Crown.

That the Statute of the 17 Car. I. did not give the Long Parliament a greater Authority than another Parliament, though it made them more durable; and if it had, that Parliament was diſſolved by the King's Death: that the Queſtion was not, whether a Parliament could commit Treaſon, but whether a few of the Commons, ſhaking off their Fellow-Members, and uſurping the Government, were not Traitors; and that Privilege of Parliament, even where a Parliament was lawfully conſtituted, was no Shelter for a Breach of Peace, or Felony, and much leſs for Treaſon: And the King's Council produced another Witneſs, that proved Sir Harry was a Member of the Committee of Safety, that pretended to Sovereign Authority in their Turn, and ſent down Arms after Lambert, againſt General Monk, who declared in Behalf of that Aſſembly, the Priſoner called a Parliament; and therefore the Priſoner had no Pretence in that Caſe to ſhelter himſelf under the Name or Authority of a Parliament. That the Priſoner was one of the Principal Actors in in deſtroying the antient Form of Government, and keeping the King out of Poſſeſſion; one of the Chiefs of the Uſurper's, and put that Force upon others, which he pretended to be under; and therefore had no manner of Colour to claim the Benefit of the Statute of the 11 Hen. VII.

Convicted. The reſt of the Arguments of the King's Counſel were the ſame with thoſe contained in the Trials of the Regicides; to which therefore I refer the Reader, and ſhall only add, that the Jury found the Priſoner Guilty.

Sir Henry Vane, being brought a third Time to the Court of King's-Bench, on the 11th of June, to hear Judgment, preſented a Bill of Exceptions to the Jndges to ſeal, but was informed, this was never done in Capital Caſes: Then he produced a Petition that the Parliament had preferred to the King, for remitting his Execution, with his Majeſty's Anſwer, which were read; but he was told, that Pardons were only for the Penitent; whatever his Majeſty or the Houſes might deſign once in his Favour, his Behaviour ſince, in juſtifying what he had done, and reviling the Adminiſtration, had made a great Alteration in his Caſe, and he had little Room to hope for Mercy.

He juſtifies the late Rebellion. Whereupon Sir Henry, after having repeated the Subſtance of his Defence, proceeded to extol the Covenant, juſtify the late Uſurpation, and reflect upon King Charles I. and thoſe who adhered to him; adding, that he found nothing would ſatisfy the preſent Government, but in his Perſon to condemn all who adhered to the Parliament, that they might be rendered Murderers and Rebels to Poſterity, upon Record: And this he ſaid muſt inevitably have followed, if he had voluntarily given up this Cauſe without aſſerting their and his Innocence; by which he ſhould have pulled that Blood upon his own Head, which now he was ſure muſt lie at the Door of others, and particularly of thoſe that knowingly and precipitately ſhould embrue their Hands in his innocent Blood, under whatever Form or Pretext of Juſtice.

He begged Pardon indeed for this Freedom; but ſaid, not only his Eſtate and Life were at Stake, but, what was more to him than Life, the Concerns of Thouſands that were in their Graves, and of all Poſterity in Time to come.

He is condemned. After which Sentence was pronounced againſt the Priſoner, as a Traitor: But the King pardoning all the Sentence but the beheading, he was drawn from the Tower, on a Sledge, to a Scaffold erected on Tower-Hill, on the 14th of June 1662, in order to his Execution.

His Speech on the Scaffold. When the Priſoner had mounted the Scaffold, he began a Speech to the People; wherein he ſaid, the Sheriff came to him that Morning, and told him, he had received a Command from the King that he ſhould ſay nothing reflecting on the Government; and that he anſwered, he ſhould order his Speech, as near as he could, ſo as to be leaſt offenſive, ſaving his Faithfulneſs to the Truſt repoſed in him, which he muſt ever diſcharge with a good Conſcience, unto Death.

Then he proceeded to harangue the Crowd, and tell them, he was not brought thither according to any known Law of the Land: He had indeed been before a Court of Juſtice, under whoſe Sentence he ſtood there; but that he had not the Liberty of laying before them the Grounds and Reaſons of thoſe Actions with which he was charged: That he preſſed the Judges to ſet their Seals to his Bill of Exceptions as his Right, and the Right of every free-born Engliſhman, by the Law of the Land; but was finally denied it—

1662. 14 Car. II.

Whereupon Sir John Robinſon, the Governor of the Tower, who was upon the Scaffold, ſaid, he muſt not be ſuffered to go on thus, railing at the Judges; and that what he affirmed was falſe: But Sir Harry ſtill continuing to rail at the Adminiſtration, the Trumpets were ordered to ſound, and drown the ſeditious Harangue; and the Priſoner, finding they would not ſuffer him to proceed on that Subject, turned to another Part of his Speech, which he held in his Hand, and gave an Account of his Converſion at fourteen or fifteen Years of Age, aſſuring the People that he had from that Time preſerved a good Conſcience towards God and Man, and for this he ſhould at laſt ſit down in Glory with Chriſt at his right Hand: He was ready to reſign his Spirit into the Hands of that God that gave it him. Then he returned to State Affairs again, and ſaid, that in whatever he had been engaged as to the Publick, his Deſigns had been for the Good of theſe Nations; appealing to the great God of Heaven, and to the Audience, if he had defiled his Hands with any Man's Blood or Eſtate, or ſought himſelf, in any publick Capacity or Place he had been in.

The CAUSE, he ſaid, had been three times ſtated. 1ſt, In the Remonſtrance of the Houſe of Commons. 2*dly*, In the ſolemn League and Covenant ——— Then the Trumpets ſounded again, and the Officer endeavoured to take the Paper from him, telling him he treated of Rebellion: Whereupon he tore the Paper in Pieces, and in a very diſcompoſed Manner ſubmitting to the Block, his Head was ſevered from his Body. He is executed.

A Copy of the entire Speech, being left with a Friend, was afterwards printed; but had little more in it, than a farther Juſtification of the Good old Cauſe, which he ſaid, was the Cauſe of God, and for the promoting the Kingdom of his dear Son Jeſus Chriſt: Concluding, that the preſent Storm, and the dark Clouds that yet hung over the Reformed Churches, were not unforeſeen by him, for many Years paſſed: So that the Coming of Chriſt in theſe Clouds, in order to a ſudden and ſpeedy Revival of his Cauſe, and ſpreading his Kingdom over the whole Earth, was moſt clear to the Eye of his Faith, even that Faith in which he died; whereby the Kingdoms of this World ſhould become the Kingdom of our Lord and of his Chriſt: Juſt before the Stroke was given, he ſaid, I bleſs the Lord, who hath accounted me worthy to ſuffer for his Name: Bleſſed be the Lord, that I have kept a Conſcience void of Offence to this Day: I bleſs the Lord I have not deſerted the Righteous Cauſe for which I ſuffer. No Men more maliciouſly, more treacherouſly, or more indefatigably fomented and carried on the Grand Rebellion againſt King Charles I. or contributed more to bring that Prince to the Block, than the two Vanes, Father and Son; which is ſaid to be occaſioned principally by that King's beſtowing his Favours ſo liberally on the Earl of Strafford, their Countryman, and Rival at Court; and no one Thing piqued them more, than that Earl's, taking the Title of Raby from a Caſtle or Seat which belonged to the Vanes, which Title His entire Speech publiſhed after his Death.

1662. 14 Car. II.

Title the Father himſelf expected, and pretended his Majeſty had promiſed to confer on him: Nor did any Man act more vigorouſly, in keeping King Charles II. out of the Poſſeſſion of his Throne, than Sir Harry Vane the younger, whoſe Trial we have juſt reviewed: No Man was more intimate with Cromwell and Argyle, or more conſcious to their blackeſt Deſigns; though he had the Addreſs to excuſe himſelf from acting as one of the late King's Judges; nor was any Man more zealous or inſtrumental in ſubverting the Conſtitution in Church and State.

The Subſtance of his Defence ſeems to be no more than this, I acknowledge I did with others uſurp the Government of theſe Nations, and having killed our King, and taken Poſſeſſion of his Dominions, I apprehend we thereby became rightful and lawful Sovereigns; and being thus poſſeſſed of the ſupreme Power, I held it was then High Treaſon in the ſucceeding King and his loyal Subjects, to oppoſe us, and attempt his Reſtoration. But ſurely this was the weakeſt, as well as the moſt impudent Defence that ever was made by a Rebel in a Court of Juſtice: He did not pretend the King had oppreſſed his Subjects, or forfeited his Right to the Crown; but that by Murder, Robbery, and a ſucceſsful Rebellion, they had acquired a Right to tyrannize over the Nation, and treat both Prince and People as their Slaves; a Defence more criminal than the Rebellion itſelf, and which deſerved only to be anſwered by the Ax or the Halter.

His Character by Burnet.

Biſhop Burnet, ſpeaking of this Gentleman, ſays, that he had a Head as darkened in his Notions of Religion, as his Mind was clouded with Fear; and though he ſet up a Form of Religion, it conſiſted rather in withdrawing from all other Forms, than in advancing any Opinions or Forms of his own: That he was of the Sect called Seekers, and ſeemed to wait for ſome new and clearer Revelations; and that though he had diligently ſtudied Sir Harry's Works, he ſaid, he could never diſcern what he aimed at. However, the Biſhop ſays, his Execution was mightily blamed, becauſe the King's Declaration from Breda, was a full Indemnity to all, except the Regicides: Beſides, he ſays Sir Harry did not approve of putting the King to Death, or of the Force put upon the Parliament; but for ſome Time withdrew from the Scene of Action, to ſhew his Diſlike of the Uſurpers Proceedings. But ſurely this Right Reverend Father was under a very groſs Miſtake; for, if we examine the Facts he aſſerts, we ſhall find in the firſt Place, that in the Declaration from Breda, all thoſe were excepted out of the Indemnity; and that Sir Harry Vane was excepted by Name. It is true, that upon Sir Harry's expreſſing ſome Abhorrence of his Treaſons, the Parliament, did Petition his Majeſty to reſpit his Execution, (not to pardon him, as his Friends ſuggeſt); and his Majeſty did return a general Anſwer, from whence it was ſuppoſed he would be favourably dealt with: But Sir Harry's Conduct afterwards, was ſo very provoking, juſtifying all that he had done, and ſhewing a Diſpoſition to act the ſame Tragedy over again, that he himſelf obſerves, that thoſe very Members who had been the forwardeſt to ſave, were afterwards the readieſt to abſolve the King from his Promiſe, as he calls it; though it is certain, his Majeſty made no other Promiſe, if he made any, than to reſpit his Execution, till it appeared how he would behave himſelf, for the Parliament asked no more. It is ridiculous alſo to think that the ſame Men who had ſolicited his Pardon, and obtained a Promiſe of it from the Crown, ſhould afterwards addreſs the King for his Execution. And the Biſhop himſelf acknowledges, that the principal Reaſon of ſuffering Juſtice to take Place on this Occaſion, was, the Apprehenſion the Government was under, that he would one Day embroil the Nation in a Civil War again, towards which it appeared he did not want Talents, Intereſt, or good Will.

Burnet miſtaken in ſome Facts.

1662. 14 Car. II.

Vane's Character by another Hand.

A celebrated Writer in giving a Character of Sir Harry Vane, ſays, he was a Man of great Natural Parts, and of a very profound Diſſimulation, of a quick Conception, and very ready, ſharp, and weighty Expreſſion; that he had an unuſual Aſpect, which, though it might naturally proceed from his Father and Mother, neither of which were beautiful Perſons; yet made them think there was ſomething in him extraordinary, and his whole Life made good that Imagination. He went from School to Magdalen College in Oxford, where his Life was not very regular, from the Univerſity he went to travel, firſt in France; but ſpent moſt of his Time at Geneva, and at his Return to England, appeared to have contracted great Prejudices and Bitterneſs againſt the Church, both as to her Government and Liturgy; which ſeemed at firſt to diſpleaſe his Father, who was hitherto conformable, and exceeding ſharp againſt thoſe who were not: After ſome ſhort ſtay in England, he thought fit to make a Voyage to New England where the Sectaries abounded, and had withdrawn themſelves from the Juriſdiction of their Eccleſiaſtical Governors: This Gentleman was no ſooner landed in New England, but his Parts and Quality, being the Son of a Privy Counſellor, but above all, his Principles gave him ſuch an Intereſt in that People, that they appeared infinitely fond of him, and in ſome ſhort Time elected him their Governor: But it ſeems he would have reformed even the Puritan Reformation, about which, the People and our Governor diſagreeing, and growing heartily weary of each other, he returned to Old England, where by his Fathers Intereſt, he obtained the Office of Treaſurer of the Navy, jointly with Sir William Ruſſel; and ſeemed well ſatisfied with the Government, till his Father appeared diſguſted, on the Earl of Strafford's having the Title of Raby (the Seat of the Vanes in Yorkſhire) conferred on him by his Majeſty. But afterwards aſſociating himſelf with Pym, the great Incendiary, in the Houſe of Commons, and all other diſaffected and ſeditious Perſons, he became one of the moſt violent Enemies againſt the Government, and with his Father communicated thoſe Secrets to the Commons, and made ſuch malicious Gloſſes on them, as at length proved the Ruin of the Earl.

1662. 14 Car. II.

The Trial of JOHN JAMES for High-Treaſon, in the Court of King's-Bench, the 14th of November, 1662. 14 Car. II.

James's Tryal.

The Charge.

THE Priſoner, being arraigned, held up his Hand with his Glove on, which the Court ordered to be taken off. The Indictment charged him with Compaſſing the King's Death, and the Subverſion of the Government, and the Overt Act, laid in the Indictment, to prove the Treaſon of his Heart, was his preaching at a Meeting-Houſe in White-Chapel, and declaring, (1.) "That the King was a bloody Ty-"rant, a Blood-ſucker and Blood-thirſty Man, "and his Nobles the ſame. (2.) That the King "and his Nobles had ſhed the Blood of the Saints "at Charing-Croſs, and the Blood of the Cove-"nanters in Scotland. (3.) That the King was "brought in to this End, to fill up the Meaſure of "his Iniquity; and that the King's Cup of Ini-"quity had filled more within this laſt Year, than "in many Years before. (4.) That he bemoaned "they had not improved their Opportunity, "when they had the Power in their Hands: That "it would not be long before they had Power "again, and then they would improve it bet-"ter: And he bewailed the Apoſtacy of the "People of God, and ſaid, They had not fought "the Lord's Battels thoroughly; but when the "Lord ſhould give his Work into their Hands a-"gain, they would do it better. (5.) That the "Death and Deſtruction of the King drew very "near.

The King's Counſel, having opened the Indictment, and obſerved that the late Rebellion was incited and fomented by ſuch ſeditious Diſcourſes as theſe, produced their Witneſſes.

The Evidence.

John Tipler depoſed, that being in a Yard adjoining to the Meeting-Houſe, he did, through a Window, ſee the Priſoner John James in the Pulpit, and heard him ſpeak the Words laid in the Indictment; adding, that he mightily applauded Oliver Cromwell, ſaying, that every Finger of his was a Champion: And that the Deponent informing Alderman Chard, a Juſtice of Peace, what he had heard, the Alderman came and apprehended the Priſoner in the Pulpit, and took all the Men that were at the Conventicle, committing ſuch of them as refuſed the Oath of Allegiance; but ſet the Women and the reſt at Liberty: And the Alderman made Oath of his ſeizing the Priſoner, &c. as the firſt Witneſs had depoſed. Osborne, another Witneſs, depoſed he was within the Meeting-Houſe, and heard the Priſoner ſpeak the words laid in the Indictment, or to that Effect: And another Witneſs depoſed, that, being in Tipler's Houſe, and hearing a Perſon ſpeaking very loud, he went out and heard the Speaker ſay, That the Lord had a great Work for his People to do; and that they were the People that muſt do it: But could not be poſitive that the Preacher was the Perſon that ſpoke them.

The Priſoner's Witneſſes.

On the other Hand, the Priſoner produced four Witneſſes that were at the ſaid Meeting, who depoſed, that the Words laid in the Indictment, were not ſpoken by the Priſoner; but they would not declare who they were ſpoken by.

He produced another Witneſs alſo, who depoſed, that Osborne ſaid he was frightened to give Evidence againſt the Priſoner; but Osborne averred upon his Oath, in open Court, that he ſaid no ſuch Thing.

His Defence.

The Priſoner ſaid in his Defence, That he had no Malice againſt the King, but prayed for his Soul; that he had never been in any Office or publick Employment againſt his preſent Majeſty or his Father, and denied he ſpoke the Words laid in the Indictment, or any others to that Effect; that he had always declared againſt Cromwell's Uſurpation, and ſuffered under it; and bid the Jury take Care therefore of ſhedding his Innocent Blood; for the Lord Jeſus Chriſt was King of Nations, as well as King of Saints; and that the Government of Right belonged to him. (Intimating that the Saints ought to have the Adminiſtration under him.) Whereupon the Chief Juſtice interrupted him and demanded; if he thought he was in his Conventicle at White-Chapel? He alſo ordered a Paragraph in the Act for the Preſervation of the King's Perſon, to be read, wherein it was declared, That whoever ſhould by Printing, Preaching, or Writing, endeavour to levy War againſt the King, or compaſs the King's Death, ſhould be judged a Traitor: And the Court informed the Priſoner that it was the Imagination of his Heart that was the Treaſon; his Preaching was but the Overt Act or Manifeſtation of the Treaſon: And whereas he objected, that the very Words laid in the Indictment were not proved, it was anſwered, that if Words to that Effect, which diſcovered the Treaſon of his Heart, were proved againſt him, that was ſufficient; it was not neceſſary to prove the very Words. It was obſerved alſo, that though the Priſoner and his Witneſſes denied his ſpeaking the Words; they had not ſhewn who ſpoke them, or what he did ſay: And that no Criminal would ever receive his Deſert, if his Denial, or the Denial of his Accomplices, on their bare Words, would acquit him: Whereupon the Jury, after a Quarter of an Hours Receſs, brought the Priſoner in GUILTY, and Judgment was pronounced on him as a Traitor.

He is convicted, and condemned.

John James being drawn on a Sledge, from Newgate to the Gallows at Tyburn, on the 26th of November 1662, obtained leave of the Sheriff to make a Speech to the People; wherein he firſt endeavoured to clear himſelf from being a Jeſuit (with which he was charged by ſome) by ſhewing he was born of mean Parents, and wanted that learned Education that Jeſuits uſually have: On the other Hand, he declared, he held the ſeventh Day ought to be the Chriſtian as well as the Jewiſh Sabbath; and ſaid, he did expect the viſible Kingdom of Jeſus Chriſt upon Earth, and that Jeſus Chriſt the Son of God was

His Speech at the Gallows.

King

1662. 14 Car. II.

King of all the Nations of the World; and according to Rev. xi. 15. the Kingdoms of this World were become the Kingdoms of the Lord and of his Chriſt, and he ſhould reign for ever and ever; which he ſaid could not be meant of a Spiritual Kingdom; for the Text ſaid expreſly the Kingdoms of this World: But maintained to the laſt, that what he was charged with was falſe, though ſeveral Witneſſes had ſworn it in Court, for which he hoped God would forgive them: And concluded, as Criminals uſually do, with pious Exhortations to the Multitude. After which he was turned off, and hanging till he was quite dead, he was embowelled and quartered as a Traitor; his Quarters ſet upon the City Gates, and his Head upon the Bridge: But his Head was afterwards taken from the Bridge, and ſet up near his Meeting-Houſe in White-Chappel.

He is executed.

Remarks on James's Trial.

This James appears to have been a Fifth-Monarchy-Man, whoſe Principles were indeed deſtructive of all Government: They raiſed a Rebellion in the City the very Year of the Reſtoration, and were with Difficulty ſuppreſſed, being thoroughly perſuaded they fought the Lord's Battels, and ſhould be ſupported by a Supernatural Power. The Govermnent therefore will be juſtified by all conſidering Men, in proceeding with Rigour againſt a Broacher of ſuch Doctrines; nor do I think he had any Reaſon to complain of Hardſhip on his Tryal: He inſiſted indeed, that the very Words laid in the Indictment, ought by Law to have been proved, but it appears from numerous Inſtances in the State Trials, that where any one is indicted for compaſſing the Death of the King, other Words of the like Tenor may be proved, as an Evidence of it, beſides thoſe laid in the Indictment. It is true, in an Indictment for a Libel, the very Words ought to be ſpecified, (and thoſe Words proved); but in an Indictment for High-Treaſon, in compaſſing the King's Death, and where Diſcourſes or Writings are laid as Overt Acts; There it is ſufficient to prove the Effect or Tenor of the Words laid in the Indictment; it is not neceſſary to prove the very Words.

The Trials of THOMAS TONGE, GEORGE PHILLIPS, FRANCIS STUBBS, JAMES HIND, JOHN SELLERS, and NATHANIEL GIBBS, for High-Treaſon, at the Old-Bailey, London, the 11th of December, 1662. 14 Car. II.

1662. 14 Car. II.

Tryal of Tonge, &c.

The Charge.

THE Indictment charges the Priſoners with compaſſing the Death of the King: And the Overt Acts, laid as an Evidence of it, were, their conſulting and agreeing, on the 31ſt of October then laſt paſſed, to depoſe his Majeſty, to alter the Government, to ſeize the King's Perſon in his Palace of Whitehall, ſurprize the Tower of London, Windſor Caſtle, &c.

The Evidence.

William Hill, the firſt Witneſs, depoſed, that he was at a Conſultation with the Priſoner Hind, and ſome others, at the Ship-Tavern; and that all, or moſt, of the Sects of Diſſenters, appeared to be concerned in this Plot againſt the Government (viz.) Fifth-Monarchy-Men, Anabaptiſts, Independents, Fighting Quakers, and the Congregational Churches; that they reſolved to endeavour a Deliverance from their Adverſaries at Whitehall, and had much Diſcourſe to that Effect: That at another Meeting with the Priſoners, Stubbs Hind Tonge and others, Mention was made of a Council of Six that conducted the Deſign; that he underſtood Ludlow was to be Commander in chief, that Horſes and Arms were ready for an Inſurrection on All-hallows Eve; that Windſor-Caſtle was to be ſurprized, and they expected a Riſing in the Weſt: That a Declaration was read among the Conſpirators, ſetting forth the Danger of Popery, and complaining of Monopolies; declaring for Liberty of Conſcience, and a free Common-wealth: And five thouſand Letters were prepared to be diſperſed in Town and Country, affirming that the Papiſts deſigned a general Maſſacre of the Proteſtants on All-hallows Eve, and inciting the People to take up Arms, and ſtand upon their Defence; and this was to ſerve for a Pretence for the intended Inſurrection of the Malcontents. He depoſed alſo, that there was a Deſign to ſeize the King's Perſon in Whitehall, together with the Duke of Albemarle, and the Lord Mayor; and they diſcourſed of extirpating all Kings, Princes and Dukes, that they might have a free State, and no more be troubled with ſuch Perſons, or with Lawn Sleeves or Surcingles: And this Witneſs heard that a Party of Horſe was to come to Town the Night before the intended Inſurrection. Riggs, another of the Conſpirators, depoſed, that on the 24th of October, the Day before they were taken, they had a Meeting, and diſcourſed concerning the taking Whitehall, and the Tower, Tonge, Stubbs and Hind, the Priſoners being preſent; that Gibbs told the Deponent, Ludlow was in Town, and that the Council of Six was broken up, and they had ſent Meſſengers into the Country to give Notice and make their Intereſts; that he had ſeen a Letter alſo, intimating that there would be a Maſſacre, and a Riſing of the Papiſts: And that, being with Phillips Tonge and Stubbs, Phillips propoſed the ſurprizing the King at Camberwell, as he came from Hampton-Court to ſee the Queen Mother at Greenwich; and Tongue ſaid, they might have ſuch an Opportunity twice every Week.

Bradley depoſed, that he was with the Priſoners Tonge and Stubbs, at Tonge's Houſe, and that they diſcourſed how Whitehall might be ſurprized; that he had at ſeveral other Times diſcourſed with the Priſoner Hind and others, about ſurprizing

1662. 14 Car. II.

furprizing the King, the Duke, the General, and as many more of the Council as they could ſeize: That the Priſoner, Gibbs, informing them the Scheme was ready to be put in Execution; their Council broke up, and Meſſengers were ſent into the Country to give Notice; and that Ludlow was in Town, and to be their General.

Tyler depoſed, That he had heard Tonge, and others, diſcourſe of ſurprizing Whitehall, and diſmounting the great Guns there, and of the Service it would be to ſeize the King, the Duke, and the Lord Albemarle: That Tonge ſaid he ſerved the Suttlers in the Tower, and was ſo well acquainted there, that he would undertake, at Ten or Eleven at Night, to ſurprize that whole Fortreſs, with forty Men: That he alſo ſerved the Suttlers at Windſor, and was ſo well acquainted with the Soldiers, and one of the Gunners there, that the Caſtle might eaſily be ſurprized: That the Conſpirators propoſed to convert the Government into a Common-wealth; to which End all Intereſts would unite, (viz.) Quakers, Fifth-Monarchy-Men, Anabaptiſts, Independents, Presbyterians, and Levellers; and, at their laſt Conſultation, they all obliged themſelves to ſee what Intereſt they could make among the Presbyterians; becauſe they looked upon them as the Perſons who had moſt Strength and Money: That the ſeveral Counties of England were ripe, and forward for Action; being in Dread of a Maſſacre by the Papiſts, on Allhallows Eve.

The Examination of Phillips read.

Then Phillips's Examination was read in Evidence, wherein he confeſſed, That Riggs, late Chaplain to Admiral Blake, (but at that Time a Brewer's Clerk) aſſured him, there would be a Riſing of divers godly People, in Arms, for Preſervation of Religion; and, that they intended to ſeize the King's Perſon at Camberwell. And the Examinant demanding of Riggs why they had not yet ſeized the King, he ſaid, they were not then ready; becauſe the Congregational Churches and they were not fully agreed; but that things were now near ready, both in Town and Country: That Riggs afterwards carried the Examinant to Tonge's Houſe, who had been formerly a Captain in the Rebels Army, but then ſold Tobacco and Brandy on Tower-Hill; and, that Tonge told Riggs, he had prevailed on ſome of the Soldiers at Windſor, to deliver up that Caſtle: That Riggs ſaid he was going to aſſiſt in the ſurpriſing two Caſtles in Kent: That Ludlow was to command, and that there was a Council of Six that conducted the Deſign, and ſat but one Day in a Place; nor were they to be ſpoken with by any, but the Agitators of each County, who were employed in preparing all Parties in the ſeveral Counties; and that the Six were of ſeveral Opinions, (Perſuaſions or Denominations of Diſſenters,) that all Parties might be united: That the Examinant, being a Serjeant of the Artillery, did promiſe to give them the Word, when the general Riſing ſhould be; and that all the ſeveral Churches (Sects) promiſed to join, and the Fifth-Monarchy-Men were to lead the Van.

That after the King ſhould be ſeized, they had a Declaration ready to diſperſe, againſt Biſhops and the Common-Prayer, and for Liberty of Conſcience. That one Baker alſo informed the Examinant, that there were Arms and Powder diſtributed in ſeveral Places; and their Friends were ready in all Counties, only waiting for the Day: That Riggs alſo acquainted the Examinant with their Deſign of ſurprizing the Tower, when Sir John Robinſon the Governor ſhould come Home late in the Evening.

Sir William Morrice and Sir Henry Bennet, Principal Secretaries of State, alſo depoſed, That they had received Letters from ſeveral Counties, of a Report that was ſpread about, That the Proteſtants were to have their Throats cut by the Papiſts, on a certain Day; and that theſe Rumours were propagated, in order to induce the People to join the Malcontents.

Sir John Talbot depoſed, That theſe Reports occaſioned great Diſturbances in Warwickſhire and Worceſterſhire. Sir John Weld, and Mr. Hodges, depoſed the like, as to Dorſetſhire and Shropſhire; adding, that ſeveral Perſons had been taken up on theſe Reports.

The Priſoners ſaid little in their Defence; but, that they had not engaged in any formed Deſign againſt the Government; though they could not deny, but they had heard ſome ſuch Diſcourſes as the Witneſſes teſtified. They obſerved alſo, that Hill and Riggs, two of the Witneſſes, had acknowledged themſelves Accomplices in the Treaſon they accuſed them of; and, therefore, were not legal Witneſſes: To which the Court replied, That Accomplices were lawful Witneſſes, till convicted; and, beſides, there were ſeveral corroborating Circumſtances to ſupport their Teſtimony. That the being preſent where Treaſon was ſpoken, and ſhewing an Approbation of it, was Treaſon in the Hearer, as well as the Speaker: Then the Jury withdrew, and within an Hour returned into Court with their Verdict, that Tonge, Phillips, Stubbs, Sellers, and Gibbs, were GUILTY. As to Hind, he confeſſed the Fact, and would not abide his Trial.

The Priſoners convicted.

The Priſoners being afterwards called to Judgment, and asked what they had to ſay why Sentence ſhould not be pronounced againſt them, threw themſelves on the King's Mercy, and were condemned as Traitors.

And condemned.

Of theſe ſix Priſoners, two were pardoned, (viz.) Hind and Sellers; but the other four, (viz.) Tonge, Phillips, Gibbs, and Stubbs, were drawn on Hurdles to Tyburn, on the 22d of December: Where, being permitted to ſpeak by the Sheriff, Tonge confeſſed he had been in Company where he had heard Men contrive the Buſineſs, for which he was condemned to die: And, that he was led to join with them, having been ſome Time in the Army, and held the Cauſe to be good.

Two pardoned.

Four ordered to be executed.

They confeſs their Guilt at the Gallows.

Phillips ſaid he had not any murderous Thought againſt the King; that he had ventured his Life for his Majeſty, and was far from any ſuch Thought: That he never acted againſt him in any Thing, but this; and it was his Ignorance in the Laws, that he did not diſcover the Plot; acknowledging, he was juſtly found Guilty.

Gibbs made a long Speech, or rather Sermon, under the Gallows, in the fanatick Strain; but all he ſaid to the Purpoſe, was, That he had had heard treaſonable Diſcourſes, and, was ſo far guilty, through his Ignorance in the Laws, that he did not reveal it.

Stubbs alſo, after having made a Recapitulation of his whole Trial, confeſſed his being in Company with the Conſpirators, and his hearing treaſonable Words, which he did not diſcover, being ignorant of the Law, he ſaid, in that Caſe; and begged his Majeſties Pardon.

The Four Executed.

After which the Priſoners were executed as Traitors, and their Quarters delivered to their Friends to be buried; but their Heads were ſet up either on or near Tower-hill.

Remarks on Tonge's Trial, &c.

The Continuers of Rapin pretend to queſtion the Truth of this Conſpiracy, though the Criminals confeſſed it at the Gallows; and they have made two Miſtakes in their Relation of it, which ſhews they took but little Care to enquire into the Matter, or elſe deſignedly impoſed upon their Readers. For, firſt there were but Four of the Conſpirators executed, whereas they make them to be Six: And, ſecondly, there were ſeveral more of the Conſpirators diſcovered, beſides thoſe that were executed; and, particularly ſome that were made Witneſſes againſt the Priſoners; and yet theſe accurate Writers affirm, That there were none diſcovered but the Six that were executed: (they ſhould have ſaid tried) and even with this Correction, what they aſſerted was far from being true.

Moder's her Trial.

The Trial of MARY MODERS, alias STEDMAN, (uſually called the German Princeſs,) for Bigamy, at the Old-Bailey, the 4th of June, 1663. 15 Car. II.

1663. 15 Car. II.

The Evidence.

THE Indictment charged the Priſoner with Felony, in marrying one John Carleton, her firſt Hubsand, Thomas Stedman, being alive.

Knot, the principal Witneſs, depoſed, That, about nine Years before, he gave the Priſoner in Marriage to Thomas Stedman, at St. Mildred's in Canterbury, ſhe being then about nineteen; That they were married by one Parſon Man; and that Stedman and his Wife lived together about four Years, in Canterbury, and had two Children; and, that he ſaw Stedman alive at Dover, the laſt Week: But, he could not tell whether they were married according to the Rites of the Church of England, or not; only he remembred the Marriage was ſome little Time before the Ordinance was made, that gave Juſtices of Peace an Authority to marry People. Other Witneſſes depoſed, That they ſaw Stedman, the firſt Husband, at Dover, the preceding Week; that he acknowledged he married Mary Moders, of Canterbury; that Knot gave her in Marriage, and, that he would have come up as an Evidence againſt her, if he had not wanted Money for his Journey.

Another Witneſs depoſed, That the Priſoner was on board her Husband's Ship in the Downs, bound for Barbadoes; and, that Thomas Stedman, her Husband, came with an Order, and fetched his Wife, the Priſoner, on Shore.

And Witneſſes being called to prove the Second Marriage, the Priſoner acknowledged that, but denied the Firſt.

The Priſoner's Defence.

The Priſoner ſaid, in her Defence, that this Proſecution was promoted by her Husband Carleton's Father, becauſe ſhe refuſed to make over what ſhe had to his Son. That ſhe was, indeed, a Foreigner, and Mr. Carleton underſtanding ſhe was a Woman of Subſtance, by a Letter he intercepted, ſolicited her with the greateſt Importunity, till he obtained her Conſent to marry him; and was ſo much in Haſte to ſecure her Fortune, that he married her firſt without a Licence, and, ſome few Days after, with a Licence: That upon her refuſing to comply with the Demands of the Father and Son, they had forged this Story of her being married to a Man at Canterbury. That ſeveral People of that City, had been brought to the Priſon, in Order to make them Witneſſes againſt her, but none of them knew her; and it was ſtrange no Regiſter or Certificate of her Marriage appeared, if ſhe was married at Canterbury; and no other Teſtimony, but the Evidence of this paltry Fellow Knot; and though they had depoſed ſhe was nineteen Years of Age, nine Years ago, ſhe was not one and twenty at this Time.

Obſervations of the Court on the Evidence.

The Court ſeemed diſſatisfied, the firſt Husband did not appear, and ſaid, they muſt not condemn a Perſon upon Hear-ſay, obſerving to the Jury, that the Evidence of the firſt Marriage, depended on the ſingle Teſtimony of Knot, and it was ſtrange if they lived together four Years, and had Children, that no Body elſe was brought to prove it: And that, if they did find her Guilty, ſhe muſt die, for that a Woman could not have the Benefit of Clergy; whereupon the Jury acquitted her.

Remarks on the Trial of Moders.

There ſeems to be very little Room for Remarks on this Trial, except it be, that unleſs both Marriages appear to have been celebrated by a Miniſter of the Church of England, or ſome Roman Catholick Prieſt, the ſecond Marriage is not Felony. And, though a Woman could not have the Benefit of Clergy then, ſhe may now, by a Statute made ſince the Revolution; or, at leaſt, what is equivalent to it.

1663. 15 Car. II. Turner's Trial.

The Trials of Colonel JAMES TURNER, and of JOHN TURNER, and ELY TURNER, his Sons, and MARY TURNER, his Wife, and of WILLIAM TURNER, an Accomplice, for Felony and Burglary, at the Old-Bailey, London, the 15th, 16th, and 19th of January, 1663. 15. Car. II.

1663. 15 Car. II.

The Charge.

THE Indictment charges the Priſoners, James, John, and William Turner, with Felony and Burglary, in breaking open the Houſe of Francis Tryon, Merchant, and robbing him of Jewels and Money, to the Value of thirteen or fourteen hundred Pounds. And the ſaid Mary Turner, and Ely Turner, were charged with receiving, comforting, aiding, and maintaining the ſaid John Turner, knowing him to have committed the ſaid Felony and Burglary.

To which Indictment the Priſoners having ſeverally pleaded not Guilty, James Turner, the Father, complained to the Court, that the Sheriffs had taken Poſſeſſion of his Houſe, and ſeized his Goods; and, upon this Occaſion, the Lord Chief Juſtice Hyde obſerved, that though the Goods of a Man, accuſed of Felony, were not forfeited till Conviction, yet it was prudent in the Sheriffs, and agreeable to Law, to take Care the Goods were not embezzled. However, he ſaid, the Priſoner might have what Part of them he would, for his preſent Supply; and, if any of his Friends would give ſecurity, they ſhould be forth coming, if he happened to be convicted, they might have the keeping of them.

The She-ſecure the Priſoners Goods, before Conviction.

The Evidence.

A Jury being ſworn, and charged with the Priſoners, the Witneſſes appeared; and firſt Sir Thomas Aleyn, who took the Priſoners Examination, depoſed, That hearing Mr. Tryon had been robbed, he went to viſit him, and took the Examination of Mr Tryon's Man and Maid, who ſaid they ſupped abroad, at a dancing School, that Evening their Maſter was robbed, and uſed frequently to go out to Supper, at Colonel Turner's, an intimate Acquaintance of their Maſter's, after their Maſter was in Bed, which gave the Deponent ſome Suſpicion that the Colonel might be concerned in the Robbery. He proceeded, therefore, to examine him, and his Wife and the Colonel; not making ſatisfactory Anſwers, he ordered his Houſe to be ſearched; but finding nothing there, he ſuffered him to go about his Buſineſs. That, the next Morning, Alderman Love informing the Deponent the Money was carried to a Houſe in the Minories, he went thither, and found Colonel Turner putting ſeveral hundred Pound Bags into a Cheſt, which confirmed him in his Suſpicions, and the Colonel deſiring to go to Mr. Tryon's, the Deponent went with him thither, and the Colonel acknowledged he knew the Thief that took the Money and Jewels, and promiſed Mr. Tryon he ſhould have them again, and afterwards produced moſt of them, except a Carkanet of Diamonds and Jewels, of the Value of 200 l. and ſaid, if they would not proſecute him, he would bring that, and whatever elſe was loſt; but the Deponent committed both him and his Wife to Newgate, they appearing to be acquainted with the Robbery.

Mr. Tryon depoſed, that about Eleven at Night, two Men came to his Bed-ſide, and one of them, who had a Lanthorn, waked him; and demanding who they were, they made him no Anſwer, but bound and gagged him, and uſed him barbarouſly. That about an Hour after they were gone, he rolled himſelf off the Bed, and, getting to the Window, cried out, Thieves! whereupon the Neighbours came to his Aſſiſtance; and going into his Warehouſe, he found the Money and Jewels gone, and obſerved it muſt be ſomebody that knew where he laid them, as James Turner the Priſoner did, with whom he was very intimate.

Hill, Mr. Tryon's Man, depoſed, That when he went out that Evening, he left his Maſter's Door double-locked, and the Jewels ſafe; but when he returned, all the beſt were gone. That queſtioning the Colonel, when he was in Cuſtody, how the Thieves got in, he anſwered, one of them got into the Houſe in the Day-time, and concealed himſelf there till Night, when he let the others in: And that, about a Year before, the Colonel would have had him got a Will forged for old Mr. Tryon, and made himſelf, and ſome Friends, Executors: That he was at Mr. Starkey's at Supper, when the Robbery was committed; and hearing of it, he ran Home, found the Doors open, and the Neighbours there.

Elizabeth Fry depoſed, That Mrs Turner treated with her, concerning lodging ſeveral Sums of Money at the Deponent's Houſe, and that the Colonel, and his Son Ely, brought as many Bags thither, as ſhe underſtood amounted to eleven hundred Pounds. Several other Witneſſes were examined, and confirmed the Teſtimony of theſe, particularly Mr. Vanden-Anchor, and the Neighbours, who came in on Mr. Tryon's crying out Thieves; and they obſerved that all Places had been opened with Keys, or Pick-Locks, to come at the Treaſure, and that nothing was broken.

Colonel James Turner's Defence.

Colonel Turner, in his Defence, averred, That he and his Family were in Bed and aſleep when the Robbery was committed, and that the Conſtable coming to his Houſe, and acquainting him with it, he immediately went to his Friend Mr. Tryon, to give him what Aſſiſtance he could; and that he afterwards went in ſearch of one Wild, that he ſuſpected had done it, and having found Wild, he promiſed to return the Money and Jewels again, on Condition he ſhould not

1663. 15 Car. II.

not be proſecuted, which the Priſoner promiſed he ſhould not, by Mr. Tryons's Directions; and that the Money was indeed brought to the Priſoner's Houſe, and afterwards carried to a Houſe in the Minories, and then Wild and his Confederates, promiſed to bring the reſt of the Things, but his, (the Priſoner's) being taken into Cuſtody prevented it.

The Evidence for the Priſoner.

Then Moſely the Conſtable was examined, on the Priſoner's Behalf, who depoſed, That he came to Mr. Tryon's on the Thurſday Night, hearing he was robbed, and found him bound. That the Deponent afterwards went to Colonel Turner's, and asked where his Sons were, and he ſaid, they were in Bed, and deſired him to go up and ſee.

A Servant of the Marquis of Dorcheſter, depoſed, That Colonel Turner's Sons were at his Lord's Houſe that Night the Robbery was committed, from Seven till Three a-Clock.

Colonel Turner's Maid depoſed, That her Maſter and his Sons were at Home all that Night the Robbery was committed, and the next: But it appeared that no Credit was to be given to her Teſtimony.

Mr. Cook depoſed, that he had known Colonel Turner twenty Years, dealt with him for ſeveral hundred Pounds, and truſted him, and found him very faithful. That he had ſeen Jewels in his Poſſeſſion, of the Value of eight or ten thouſand Pounds; and if he had been ſuch a Perſon as he was accuſed to be, he might have broke very advantageouſly. ——— Jefferies depoſed, That Mr. Tryon uſed to truſt the Colonel with Jewels of a conſiderable Value, and had a good Opinion of him: But the Witneſſes ſaid, It was generally reported the Colonel lived too high.

It being demanded of Mr. Turner, a Companion of the Colonel's, and taken with him, what he had to ſay in his Defence, he anſwered, he was never at Mr. Tryon's in his Life, till he was there with Sir Thomas Aleyn.

John Turner, the Colonel's Son, confeſſed he carried two Bags to the Houſe in the Minories, and that he ran away when Sir Thomas Aleyn came thither.

The Court direct the Jury.

The Court, in their Directions to the Jury, informed them, That as to Mary Turner, the Wife, though ſhe ſeemed to have a Hand in the Buſineſs all along, yet it appearing to be by the Direction of her Husband, ſhe could not be made an Acceſſary. And, as to Ely Turner, the Evidence could not affect him, for it appeared that John carried the Money, and not Ely; and obſerved, that where ſeveral Men came to break open and rob a Houſe, and ſome entered, and others of the Gang ſtood without, to prevent a Surprize, they were all guilty of the Burglary and Robbery: That if the Door was not broke open, but opened by Keys or Pick-locks, it was, nevertheleſs, Burglary. And that, if one of the Thieves came in in the Day-time, and let the others in in the Night-time, it was, nevertheleſs, a Burglary in them all.

1663. 15 Car. II.

Then the Jury withdrawing for about an Hour, brought in the Priſoner, Colonel James Turner, GUILTY, but the reſt were acquitted. And Sentence of Death being paſſed on the ſaid James, he was executedt the 21ſt of January, 1663-4, in Leadenhall-ſtreet, near the End of Lime-ſtreet, where Mr. Tryon's Houſe ſtood.

James Turner convicted. the reſt acquitted. James is executed.

His Confeſſion.

The Priſoner, before his Execution, confeſſed, that he, with the ſaid William Turner, one White, a Solicitor, and a Friend of White's, were the four Perſons that committed the Robbery; but, that neither his Wife, or Sons, knew any Thing of it. And he reſtored to Mr. Tryon, the Carkanet of Rubies and Diamonds, that was wanting, before he died.

Remarks on the Trial of Turner.

What is moſt remarkable in this Proceeding, is, that a Man, who lived in Credit and Reputation in the City, as Colonel Turner had done for a conſiderable Time, ſhould deſcend ſo low as to become a Felon and Houſe-breaker, and rob and abuſe his moſt intimate Friend: But, his having lived beyond his Income, and affecting to make a grand Appearance, it ſeems put him upon ſuch infamous Projects to ſupport his Extravagancies, and ſhews how difficult it is for a Man to retain either Honour or Honeſty, when he has waſted his Fortune in a profuſe Way of living.

But it may be obſerved further, that Mary Turner, and Ely Turner, the Son, were indicted as Acceſſaries in the Robbery, for receiving, aiding, and comforting John Turner, the Son, and not as acceſſary to the Felony and Burglary of James Turner, the Father; for a Woman is not puniſhable for receiving or harbouring her Husband, though ſhe knows him to be a Felon; and it would be hard to proſecute a Son for harbouring his Father, though he knew him to have committed a Robbery. But, in Strictneſs of Law, a Son, who receives and harbours his Father, knowing him to have committed Felony, is acceſſary to the Felony, after the Fact.

Twyne's Tryal.

The Charge.

THE Indictment charged the Priſoner with compaſſing the Death of the King: And the Overt Act, laid as an Evidence of it, was, his Printing a Treaſonable Pamplet, entitled, A Treatiſe of the Execution of Juſtice, wherein is clearly proved, That the Execution of Juſtice and Judgment, is as well the Peoples as the Magiſtrates Duty; and if the Magiſtrates pervert Judgment, the People are bound by the Law of God to execute Judgment without them, and upon them: But the treaſonable Paſſages laid in the Indictment, and taken out of the Body of the Book, were ſo ſcandalous, that the Government did not think fit to print them with the reſt of the Trial, which makes it an imperfect Piece.

The Evidence.

The Witneſſes produced to prove the Priſoner's printing the book were, firſt, John Walker, his Apprentice, who depoſed, that he (the Witneſs) compoſed (or ſet the preſs for) the firſt four Pages of the Book, and that his Maſter Twyne, the Priſoner at the Bar, delivered him the Manuſcript Copy: That he (the Witneſs) alſo compoſed the Title, and Part of the ſecond, third, and fourth Sheets; and his Maſter, he thought, compoſed the reſt, and corrected the Sheets; and was poſitive, that his Maſter worked off ſome of the Sheets.

Mr. L'Eſtrange was Licenſer of the Preſs.

That they uſually worked at the Preſs from two in the Morning till five: And that Mr. L'Eſtrange came and knocked at the Door while they were at work, and the Deponent looking out at the Window, and telling his Maſter, Mr. L'Eſtrange was there, his Maſter anſwered, he was undone: Whereupon he broke the Form (diſperſed the Letters) by his Maſters Direction.

Mr. L'Eſtrange depoſed, that, having Notice of a Preſs that had been at Work ſeveral Nights, in Cloth-Fair, he took a Printer and a Conſtable with him, and went to Twyne's Houſe, where he heard them at work; and when he knocked at the Door, they put out the Lights, and made him wait a Quarter of an Hour, before they let him in; but having got a Candle, he went up Stairs, and found a Form broken, only one Corner ſtanding entire, which the Printer that went with him, comparing with the Corner of a Page newly printed, they appeared to be the ſame; and at laſt they found the whole Impreſſion, thrown down a Pair of back Stairs: And that Twyne told him he had the Copy (the Manuſcript) of Mrs. Calvert's Maid, to whom he alſo delivered the Sheets he had printed; and that ſhe paid him forty Shillings in Part for his Work.

Dickenſon, another Witneſs, who attended Mr. L'Eſtrange to Twyne's Houſe, confirmed his Teſtimony, as did Thomas Mabb, another Witneſs.

Wickham the King's Meſſenger alſo depoſed, that he attended Mr. L'Eſtrange to Twyne's Houſe, and that there were two or three hundred Sheets thrown into the next Houſe wet, newly come off the Preſs; and that when he had the Priſoner in Cuſtody at his Houſe, he owned it was a very bitter Thing, and ſaid, it was his unhappy Fortune to meet with it: There were ſeveral other Witneſſes alſo examined, that corroborated the Evidence of the Former.

The Priſoner's Defence.

The Priſoner made no other Defence, than by a flat and poſitive Denial of the whole: He ſaid he neither read the Book, or heard it read; nor did he ſet his Men to work upon it, or know the Author, or from whence it came.

Then the Lord Chief Juſtice Hyde ſummed up the Evidence, and obſerved to the Jury, that there was as much Villany and Slander in this Libel, as could be invented; and that the Deſign of it was, to deſtroy the King's Perſon and Family, to rob him of the Affection of his People, and ſubvert all Government, Eccleſiaſtical and Civil.

The Priſoner convicted and condemned.

That it was one of the blackeſt Treaſons that could be committed, and that the Priſoner's Defence conſiſted only in a bare Denial of the Fact: Whereupon the Jury, after a ſhort Receſs, brought him in GUILTY, and Judgment was pronounced on him as a Traitor.

He is executed.

The Priſoner refuſing to diſcover who was the Author of this Treaſonable Libel, was executed ſome few Days after at Tyburn, in purſuance of his Sentence.

Remarks on Twyne's Trial.

Indeed the Printer and Publiſher of Treaſon are as guilty, in the Eye of the Law, as the Author; though it is very rare, that either Printer or Bookſeller ſuffer, where they diſcover who ſet them on work. I have not, I confeſs, ſeen the Libel, the Priſoner was proſecuted for; but the very Title ſeems to be High-Treaſon againſt every Form of Government on the Face of the Earth, declaring it tobe the Peoples Duty to execute Judgment on their Governors, whenever their Adminiſtration is not agreeable to their Notions of Juſtice and Judgment: And no Doubt but it muſt be a virulent Libel, when the Priſoner never attempted to defend one Paſſage in it.

Brewster's Tryal.

The Charge.

HE was charged in the Indictment, only with a Misdemeanor, in Printing a Libel entitled, The Speeches and Prayers of the late King's Judges, and selling and uttering the same: Part of the Words laid in the Indictment being taken out of a Letter, from Cook the Regicide to his Friend, a little before his Execution, wherein he says, The Cause for which I am in Bonds, is as good as ever it was: And I believe there is not a Saint that hath engaged with us, but will wish at the last Day, that he had sealed to the Truth of it with his Blood: I am satisfied, it is the most Noble and Glorious Cause, that has been agitated since the Apostolical Times; being for Truth, Holiness, and Righteousness; for our Liberties as Men and as Christians; for removing all Yokes and Oppressions: It is such a Cause, that the Martyrs would come from Heaven again to suffer for it, if they might: I LOOK UPON IT AS THE MOST HIGH ACT OF JUSTICE (THE MURDER OF THE LATE KING) that our Story can parallel, &c.

The Evidence.

Thomas Creek, a Printer, deposed, that Brewster, the Prisoner, delivered him Part of the Copy of the said Speeches to print, and that he Printed as far as Folio 36: That the first Impression was 3000; and he printed Part of a Second, and delivered the Books to such Bookbinders as Brewster directed him.

George Thresher deposed, that Brewster employed him to fold and stitch Part of the Books, and that he delivered them again to Brewster, who paid him for them: And other Witnesses confirmed the Testimony of these.

Brewster's Defence.

Brewster, in his Defence, observed, That the Witnesses did not testify that he had published the Speeches maliciously, or with any Design against the Government; and that it was not usual with Booksellers to read what they sold: Selling Books was his Trade; it was only a bare exercising his Trade, and he knew no Evil in it: That the Book also came out at a Time when there were no Licensers of the Press, no settled Rules for their Direction, and he did not think himself accountable for what was in it: That it was more than three Years since the Book was printed, and it was sold publickly, not clandestinely; and lastly, he offered to bring Evidence, that he was not a seditious or disaffected Person.

The Reply to the Prisoner's Defence.

To this the Court replied, That Malice was always implied where the Act was unlawful: Even where a private Person was slandered, Malice was implied; much more where the King and State were traduced: That it was also done seditiously and factiously; for what could tend more to Sedition, and to incite and encourage the People to murder their King, than the publishing those vile Expressions of a Wretch who had murdered his Prince (viz.) That he rejoyced in his Bonds: And that the Martyrs would willingly come from Heaven to die in such a Cause: And that all the Saints that engaged in it would wish they had sealed it with their Blood. The Drift of the Libel, the Chief Justice observed, was, to make the King's Subjects believe, that the horrid Murder of his Father was justifiable: But he would be bold to affirm, That so horrid a Villany had not been done upon the Face of the Earth, since the Crucifying of our Saviour; and that the Prisoner must not think to justify all manner of Sedition against the King and State, by saying that selling Books was his Trade: That it was justifiable, indeed, for a Counsel to plead for his Client; but if he uttered Sedition, under Pretence of defending his Client, he was punishable for it: So if a Bookseller would print and publish seditious and factious Books, he must suffer for it: He might be indicted and punished, for publishing a Libel against a private Man, or a Magistrate; much more, for one against the King and State: Nor was it any Excuse, to say, they were the Speeches or Words of dying Men; for if a Man would be as wicked at his Death, as he had been in his Life-time, and justify his Villany, the Publisher of it was punishable: So where a Highwayman at the Gallows should arraign the Justice of the Law, and the Judges that condemned him, the Publisher of such Speeches would suffer for it: And directed the Jury therefore, that if they found the Defendant had caused these Speeches to be printed or published, they should find him guilty of the Misdemeanor, of which he stood indicted; and observed, that the Government was very merciful to the Prisoner, that he was not proceeded against Capitally.

A second Indictment of Brewster.

Brewster was a second Time indicted for printing and publishing a Libel called the Phœnix; or, the Solemn League and Covenant; in which it was declared, That a King abusing his Power to the Overthrow of Religion, Laws, and Liberties, which are the very Fundamentals of this Contract and Covenant, may be controuled and opposed: And if he set himself to overthrow all these by Arms, then they who have the Power, as the Estates of a Land, may, and ought to resist by Arms; because he doth by that Opposition break the very Bonds, and overthrow the Essential of this Contract and Covenant: This may justify the Proceedings of this Kingdom, against the late King, who, in an hostile Way, set himself to overthrow Religion, Parliaments, Laws, and Liberties; and that the breaking this Covenant, was greater Sin than the breaking a Commandment.

It was fully proved, that the Prisoner, with some other Booksellers, his Partners, caused the said Libel to be printed, sold, and dispersed, privately about, three Years before; and it appeared to be taken chiefly out of Mr. Calamy's and Mr. Douglas's Sermons, which were in Print.

His Defence.

Brewster, in a Manner, confessed the Fact; but observed in his Defence, that he did but put together, what had been before printed separately with Licence; and brought Witnesses to prove he was conformable to the Church, and lived peaceably.

The Court direct the Jury.

Then the Chief Justice summed up the Evidence, and informed the Jury, that the asserting people might resist their Prince, and take up

1663-4. 15 Car. II.

Arms againſt him, was direct Treaſon, though the Priſoner was indicted but for a Miſdemeanor: And as for the Libel's being licenſed, it appeared, that Part of it was licenſed at Edinburgh, and Part of it here, during the Rebellion; and now to tell the People, after the King was happily returned, that they might do the ſame Thing again, was not to borne: Then Simon Dover was brought to his Trial.

1663-4. 15 Car. II.

Dover's Trial.

THE Priſoner deſiring he might have Counſel aſſigned him, and a Copy of his Indictment, it was granted him.

The Charge. The Indictment charges him with a Miſdemeanor, in Printing and Publiſhing the ſaid Speeches and Prayers: And the Fact being fully proved, the Priſoner did not deny it; but ſaid in his Defence, that there was no Law againſt Printing: That he did it for a Livelihood; and the Scripture ſaid, he was worſe than an Infidel, that did not provide for his Family: If he had tranſgreſſed, it was through Ignorance, and he was ſorry for it.

The Fact confeſſed; but excuſed.

The Reply. To this the Chief Juſtice replied, that though every Man ought to maintain his Family, yet he ought not to do it by abuſing the King and Government: That could be no Part of his Trade: A Thief might as well ſay, he ſtole to maintain his Wife and Children.

Brooks's Trial. Then Nathan Brooks, a Bookbinder, was brought to his Trial, for diſperſing and publiſhing the ſaid Libel, entitled, The Dying Speeches, &c. which was fully proved againſt him: And one Jury having been charged with all the three Priſoners, after an Hour's Receſs brought in their Verdict. (Viz.)

Brewſter convicted on both Indictments. That Brewſter was guilty of ſelling and writing the Libel entitled, The Dying Speeches, &c.

That Brewſter was alſo guilty of publiſhing the Libel entitled, The Phœnix; or, the Solemn League and Covenant.

Dover convicted. That Dover was guilty of printing and publiſhing that Libel entitled, The Speeches, &c.

Brooks convicted. And that Nathan Brooks alſo was guilty of ſelling the ſaid Speeches.

The Judgment paſſed on all three. Whereupon Brewſter was ſentenced to pay a Fine of an hundred Marks, and to ſtand in the Pillory.

Brooks and Dover, were each of them ſentenced to pay a Fine of forty Marks, to be ſet two ſeveral Days in the Pillory, and to be committed, without Bail, till the next Seſſions, when and where they ſhould all make an open Confeſſion of their Offences, in ſuch Words as ſhould be preſcribed by Authority, and afterwards be impriſoned, during the King's Pleaſure; and on their Diſcharge, ſhould enter into Recognizances of 400 Pound each, with two Sureties in 200 Pound each, not to print or publiſh any unlicenſed Books.

Remarks on the Trials of Brewſter, the Bookſeller, &c. It appears from theſe three laſt Trials, that it will not avail a Printer or Bookſeller, who prints or publiſhes a Libel, to ſay, he did not know what was in it; or that he did but exerciſe his Trade without any Malice or ill Deſign againſt the Government: But ſtill, where a Man appears to be well-affected to the Government, and that it was a meer Overſight, he is ſeldom dealt with rigorouſly; eſpecially if he declares who was his Author.

We may obſerve from hence alſo, that it is in the Power of the Proſecutor, to call the Offence what he pleaſes: Though the Fact be really an Overt Act of High-Treaſon, he may charge the Priſoner only with a Miſdemeanor; nor can the Jury find it to be any Thing elſe, though the Treaſon be never ſo evident: On the other Hand, where the Priſoner is charged with High-Treaſon, and it appears upon the Evidence, that the Offence amounts to no more than a Miſdemeanor, the Jury muſt acquit the Priſoner, and cannot find him guilty either of Treaſon or Miſdemeanor: It appears alſo, that in a Trial for a Miſdemeanor, a Man might have had Counſel formerly, but not where he was charged with High-Treaſon; though at this Day, by a late Act, he may have Counſel in Treaſon: However in Murder, and other Capital Offences, he is ſtill denied Counſel; unleſs where Matter of Law ariſes on the Frame of the Indictment, or on the Facts that are given in Evidence.

The Trial of BENJAMIN KEACH, for a Miſdemeanor, at the Aſſizes held at Aylesbury, the 8th and 9th of October, 1664. 16 Car. II.

1664. 16Car. II.

The Charge.

THE Indictment charges, that the ſaid Keach, being a Seditious, Heretical, and Schiſmatical Perſon, did write, print, and publiſh a ſeditious Book, or Libel, entitled, The Child's Inſtructor; or, a new and eaſy Primmer. Wherein were ſeveral damnable Poſitions, contrary to the Doctrine and Liturgy of the Church of England: And ſeveral Paſſages of the Libel were recited, wherein he aſſerted, That Chriſt ſhould reign upon Earth a thouſand Years; cenſured Infant Baptiſm, &c.

Confeſſed.

It was not only proved by Witneſſes, but the Priſoner confeſſed his writing and diſperſing the ſaid Book: But the Jury obſerving that one of the Paſſages in the Indictment did not agree with the Book, they were directed to find him guilty of all but that Clauſe; and they found him guilty accordingly.

His Sentence.

After which he was ſentenced to ſtand twice in the Pillory, to pay a Fine of twenty Pounds, to find Sureties for his good Behaviour and Appearance at the next Aſſizes; where he was to renounce his Errors, and make his Submiſſion; and the Book was ordered to be burnt by the Hangman. But after the reſt of the Sentence was executed upon him, he was ſet at Liberty, without making a Recantation.

A Remark upon it.

From this Proceeding, it ſeems, the publiſhing heretical Doctrines, contrary to thoſe of the eſtabliſhed Church, was puniſhable in the Courts of common Law formerly: But the Act of Toleration put an End to ſuch Proſecutions.

With this Proceeding ended the firſt Volume of State Trials. Firſt Edition.

The Trial of THOMAS Lord MORLEY, for Murder, in Weſtminſter-Hall, before EDWARD Earl of Clarendon, Lord Chancellor of England, Lord High Steward (pro hac vice); JOHN Lord ROBERTS, Keeper of the Privy-Seal, EDWARD Earl of Manchester, Lord Chamberlain; HENRY Lord ARLINGTON, Principal Secretary of State; the Earls of Oxford, Bedford, Suffolk, Dorſet, and twenty other Peers, the 30th of April, 1666. 18 Car. II.

1666. 18Car. II.

Reſolutions of the Judges, previous to the Trial.

ALL the Judges of England, met at Serjeant's-Inn, in Fleet-ſtreet, on the 28th of April, to conſider of ſuch Things, as might, in point of Law, ariſe at the Trial of the Lord Morley; and unanimouſly reſolved, 1. That, upon a Letter of the Lord High Steward, directed to them, they were to attend at the Trial, in their ſcarlet Robes, and the chief Judges in their Collars of SS.

2. That in Caſe the Peers, who are Triers, after Evidence given, and the Priſoner withdrawn, and they were retired to conſult of their Verdict, ſhould deſire to ſpeak with any of the Judges, to have their Opinion upon any Point of Law: Then, if the Lord Steward directed ſuch Judges to go, they ſhould go to the Lords: But they ſhould acquaint the Lords, that they were not to deliver any private Opinion, without Conference with the reſt of the Judges, and that only in open Court.

3. That, if the Lord Steward ſhould, in open Court, demand any of their Opinions, though in the Abſence of the Priſoner, they were to anſwer the Queſtion.

4. That, if any of the Witneſſes, which were examined before the Coroner, were dead, or unable to travel, and Oath made thereof, the Examinations of ſuch Witneſſes might be read, the Coroner making Oath, that ſuch Examinations were the ſame which he took, without Addition or Alteration.

5. That, in Caſe any Witneſs, who had been examined by the Coroner, was detained from appearing, by the Means or Procurement of the Priſoner, his Examination might be read.

6. That if a Witneſs, examined by the Coroner, was abſent, and Oath made that the Proſecutors had uſed all their Endeavours to find him, and he could not be found; this was not ſufficient to authorize the reading of ſuch Examination.

7. That no Words were, in Law, ſuch a Provocation as would leſſen the Offence of killing killing a Man, and reduce it from Murder to Manſlaughter: But if, upon ill Words both Parties ſuddenly fight, and one kill the other, this is but Manſlaughter; for it is a Combat betwixt two, upon a ſudden Heat, which is the legal Deſcription of Manſlaughter.

8. If, upon Words, two Men grow angry, and afterwards ſuppreſs their Anger, and fall into other Diſcourſe, or have other Diverſions for ſuch a Space of Time, as in reaſonable Intendment their Heat might be cooled; and ſome Time after they draw upon one another, and fight, and one is killed; This is Murder: Becauſe, being attended with ſuch Circumſtances, it is reaſonably ſuppoſed to be a deliberate Act, and a premeditated Revenge upon the firſt Quarrel; but the Circumſtances being Matters of Fact, the Jury are Judges of them.

Neither the Charge or Evidence given by the Editors of this Trial.

The Editors of this Trial have neither given us the Indictment, or Evidence, or the Defence the Priſoner made; but it ſeems to have been a common Indictment, for the Murder of Mr. Haſtings: They tell us only that one Witneſs depoſed, there was a former Grudge, and that another ſwore when the Lord Morley, the Priſoner, had run Mr. Haſtings through the Head, his Lordſhip ſaid, God damme, I promiſed thee this, and now I have given it thee. And that the Quarrel began at the Fleece-Tavern, about an half Crown the Lord Morley ſaid he had laid down.

The Evidence ſummed up by the Solicitor General, with his Obſervations upon it.

We learn more of the Circumſtances of this Caſe, from a Speech aſcribed to Sir Heneage Finch, the Solicitor General, than from any Thing elſe. This Gentleman, in ſumming up the Evidence for the King, obſerved, that there were but three Caſes in Law, which were capable of excuſing the Death of a Man. 1. When a Man kills another in his own Defence: 2. When he does it by Miſadventure, or mere Accident. And, 3. When he does it in Heat of Paſſion. The two firſt of theſe excuſe a toto, and are not ſo much as Felony: The laſt, a tanto: It is Felony, but within Clergy. But by the ancient Law, whoever killed a Man by the moſt caſual Misfortune in the World, muſt have died for it as a Murderer. And, even now, he that kills a Man, ſe defendendo, muſt not plead that he did it in his own Defence, but he muſt plead Not guilty; It being a Maxim in Law, that the Death of a Man connot be juſtified. Nay, the Jury cannot find him to be ſe defendendo, but they muſt find the ſpecial Fact, and leave it to the Court to find whether it were ſe defendendo, on the Circumſtances. For, if the Fact be ſo, That the Man did not fly to the Wall, or his laſt Refuge, before he gave the mortal Wound, he is a Felon ſtill. And, he that kills a Man by Accident, or Miſadventure, muſt take Care that the Action he was about, was abſolutely lawful and neceſſary; for if there, were an unneceſſary medling with edge-Tools or Fire-Arms; if there were unneceſſary Recreation in the Act which produced this Event, he is reſponſible to the Law for the utmoſt Conſequence. And, at this Day, if a Man that kills another in the City, eſcapes out of the City, the City is to be amerced for letting a notorious Malefactor eſcape.

1666. 18 Car. II.

If a Man meet another in the Street, and kill him without any viſible Provocation, the Law ſuppoſes there was Malice precedent, and judges this Act, Murder. And as it is Murder to kill a Man without Provocation, ſo is it, if the Provocation be ſlight and trivial.

A Caſe was tried before the Lord Chief Juſtice Popham, wherein it appeared, that a Kentiſh Gentleman, paſſing by another, made wry Mouths, and laughed, whereupon the other fell upon him, and killed him. The Chief Juſtice therefore and his Brethren were of Opinion, this was Murder, and the Man was hanged, this not being a competent Provocation. But, admitting the Provocation be great, yet, if the Man be not killed in the heat of Paſſion; if there be any Interval of Time, that the Law ſuppoſes the Blood might, and ought to have been cooled, and the Perſon then falls upon him that gave the Provocation; that which was Paſſion at firſt, is Malice at laſt; and that which would have been Manſlaughter then, is Murder now.

To come to the Point: There appears to be ſo little Provocation in this Caſe, that the poor Gentleman that was murdered, offered any Man five Pounds to tell him what the Quarrel was. His Lordſhip, indeed, ſays in his Defence, he hopes his Peers will conſider, that there was no other Provocation than the half Crown. I am ſorry for it: I am ſure the Laws of England allow no Man to take away another's Life, for half a Crown, without being guilty of Murder. Mr. Haſtings hears my Lord quarrel about half a Crown, and ſays, I wonder a Perſon of Honour ſhould make ſuch ado about an half Crown; and then throws down four half Crowns upon the Table, to make Satisfaction: Preſently Swords are drawn: Mr. Bromidge draws firſt, and hectors for my Lord. Then they are put up again; there is one Interval, and Time for Recollection. My Lord proceeds to quarrel with Mr. Haſtings, and calls his Sins to Remembrance, and knowing that Mr. Haſtings had been guilty of killing a Man not long before, tells him, We come not here to ſtab Folks. Mr. Haſtings, piqued to ſee himſelf ſo openly reproached, anſwered, he was a Gentleman, and as good a Gentleman as my Lord. I beſeech your Lordſhips to obſerve how Mr. Haſtings was treated: He was four Times drawn upon, twice by Bromidge in the Houſe, then in the Street; and a fourth Time under the Arch in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields. Mr. Haſtings ſays, I have no Quarrel to you, Captain: If there be any, it muſt be diſputed between me and my Lord. Some Witneſſes indeed, have been produced by my Lord Morley, (not upon Oath) who ſay, that Mr. Haſtings preſſed my Lord to fight, and ſaw him draw and attack, with the Three on the other Side. Street depoſed, that Mr. Haſtings reſolved to fight my Lord; and another depoſed, that my Lord ſaid, he would not fight; but this is not at all probable. It is plain, Mr. Haſtings ſaid, he would give any Man five Pounds, that would tell him what the Quarrel was: And why ſhould he, that knew of no Quarrel, deſire the Blood of my Lord Morley? Compare this with the Witneſſes that ſwear for the King; all three of whom expreſly ſay, they ſaw the Fight,

1666. 18 Car. II.

Fight, and the Beginning of it, though it cannot properly be called a Fight. It was a direct Aſſaſſination; for three of the Witneſſes ſwore, there were two upon Haſtings all the while. Mr. Haſtings being thus preſſed, ſteps back, to get a little Ground; then my Lord takes him at the Advantage, ſhortens his Sword, and runs him into the Head; for which, as there was no Provocation, Malice was by Law implied, and it was Murder in his Lordſhip.

Nor was there only Malice implied by Law, but Malice apparent confeſſed, and moſt evident; for, as ſoon as Mr. Haſtings was killed, my Lord Morley, with a moſt deſperate Imprecation, throws his Sword upon him, ſaying, God damn me, there you lie. Another Witneſs ſwears his Lordſhip ſaid, I have promiſed it you, and now you have it. Can your Lordſhips doubt now, whether my Lord killed Mr. Haſtings with a deliberate Hatred? You ſee he confeſſed it was in Diſcharge of his Promiſe; and my Lord is to be believed againſt himſelf. The Brother of Mr. Haſtings ſays, the Deceaſed told him, that he had the unhappineſs to have a Quarrel with my Lord almoſt ten Years before; and that, fighting with my Lord, he had the Misfortune to give him a Hurt. The Brother ſwears further, that my Lord Morley coming by, and the Deceaſed paying his Lordſhip due Reſpect, his Lordſhip received it with ſuch Contempt, that the Deceaſed ſaid he knew not what it meant; I doubt he bears me a Grudge. This was a Year and half before his Death; but within a quarter of a Year before, the Witneſſes depoſe, That the Deceaſed, his Father, Brother, and my Lord, being at an Alehouſe, the Brother went down Stairs, and when he came up again, he found my Lord with his Sword drawn; and the Brother ſwears that the Deceaſed then told him, that my Lord was always urging him to drink, and then ſought all Occaſions he could to give and take Offence. Thus, it ſeems, it was his Lordſhip's Cuſtom to urge Mr. Haſtings, and to give him frequent Provocations, as if he had ſought an Occaſion for Manſlaughter, and to kill him within the Protection of the Law.

I confeſs, an Affront offered to a Peer, is much more heinous than one offered to a private Gentleman; but then the Law has provided another Manner of Reparation for a Peer. The ſame Words that, being ſpoken of a Gentleman, will bear no kind of Action, when ſpoken of a Peer, become Scandalum Magnatum. The Peer recovers great Damages, and the King inflicts a Fine and Impriſonment; ſo that upon the Matter, the Offender is bound in Chains, and laid at my Lord's Feet. Now for his Lordſhip, whoſe Honour is thus guarded by Law, to avenge himſelf by his Sword, is moſt unpardonable. I do not preſume to ſay, that the killing of a Man is more capital in the Caſe of a Peer, than of a private Gentleman; but I affirm, that no Provocation in the World can make that to be but Manſlaughter in a Peer, which would be Murder in a Gentleman. The Quality of the Offender, may ſerve to inhance the Crime; but, ſince the World ſtood, it was never counted a Diminution of it, or an Apology for committing it. The ſame Duty to the King, the ſame Obedience to the Laws, the ſame Reverence for human Nature, the ſame Caution to avoid the Effuſion of Chriſtian Blood, is expected from a Lord, as from the meaneſt Commoner in England. It is the Caſe of all the People of England, who are highly concerned in the preſent Example: If they put their Truſt in the Law, as the greateſt Avenger of Blood in the World, and once find themſelves deceived, who knows what Conſequences may follow? What Feuds in Families; what Maſſacres it may produce? No doubt, but all the World will obſerve and mark the Iſſue of this Day; they will be curious to know what became of a Lord, in whoſe Eyes the Blood of a Gentleman was ſo vile and inconſiderable. If it were poſſible ſo great a Tribunal as this could either miſtake the Fact, or miſunderſtand the Law, what Judicature is there left on this Side Heaven, for Mankind to rely on? In this Place no Deteſtation of the Crime; no Paſſion of the Proſecutor; no Compaſſion of your Lordſhips towards a Peer of the Realm, is to have any Ingredient in the Verdict: And therefore, having obſerved to your Lordſhips, that there is Malice implied by the Law, and in a Manner confeſſed by the Party, beſides the direct and formal Malice which hath been proved, I now ſubmit all to the Judgment which the Law hath wiſely placed in your Lordſhips moſt noble Breaſts, with this only Obſervation; That it is the Voice of Blood that crieth; and I know your Lordſhips will give it ſuch an Audience as it ought to have; ſuch an Audience as may quiet it, and keep it from crying any more; ſuch an Audience as may cleanſe the Land from Blood, and be a Means to continue that due Veneration, which all Men have to your Lordſhips moſt righteous and impartial Proceedings.

The Solicitor-General having finiſhed his Speech, the Lord Steward directed the Lords Triers to withdraw, and conſider of the Evidence; but did not ſum it up.

The Lords and the Priſoner being withdrawn, Wine and Biskets were brought in for the Lord Steward, and the great Men preſent; and the Lords Triers having ſtaid out about three Hours, returned into Court, and took their Places; and, being called over, the Lord High Steward, demanded of my Lord Frechevile, (the loweſt of the Peers) If my Lord Morley was Guilty, or not Guilty? To which his Lordſhip anſwered (laying his Hand on his Breaſt) Not guilty of Murder; but guilty of Manſlaughter.

The Priſoner convicted of Manſlaughter.

In the ſame Manner the Lord-Steward putting the like Queſtion to the reſt, ſeverally, in their Order, they all returned the ſame Anſwer, except the Lord Wharton, and Lord Aſhley, who anſwered, Guilty of Murder.

Then the Lord Morley, the Priſoner, being brought in, the Lord Steward acquainted him, that his Peers had found him Guilty of Manſlaughter, and demanded what he had to ſay for himſelf: To which his Lordſhip anſwered, He deſired the Benefit of his Clergy, and the Benefit of the Statute; and the Lord Steward replied, He muſt have the Benefit of his Clergy; he conceived the Statute was clear in that Point; and asking the Opinion of the Judges, they all bowed, as a Mark of their Aſſent. Then the Lord Steward told the Priſoner, he was discharged, paying his Fees. After which the Court was dismissed, and the Lord Steward broke his Staff.

Remarks on Lord Morley's Trial.

Since the Editor hath omitted the Charge, the Evidence, and Defence, it is impossible to make any just Remarks on this Trial. Indeed, if we are to relie on the Observations made by the Solicitor-General, the Malice was pretty notorious: For it seems this Lord and Mr. Hastings, had fought a Duel ten Years before, and his Lordship was then wounded by him. Several other Quarrels had happened between them afterwards, and his Lordship had threatened the Deceased: And, as I apprehend the Case, this was a Duel of Four of a Side, who agreed to go from the Tavern where the Quarrel began, and fight in the Fields. And the Solicitor informs us, that the Witnesses deposed, That my Lord and another fell upon Hastings at once; and his Lordship shortned his Sword, and run the Deceased through the Head, saying, God damn me, I have promised it you, and now you have it; which, one would think, sufficiently discovered the Malice of his Heart; and, had he been tried by a common Jury, would have gone a great Way to have convicted the Prisoner of Murder. But whether there might not be something in that Suggestion of the Solicitor's, That Peers, being a superior Class of Men, are apt to imagine that nothing less than the Blood of the Offender can attone for an Affront given them by a private Gentleman, may require some Consideration.

1666. 18 Car. II.

I shall only observe further, that the Editor is mistaken in the Title of this Trial, where he makes it to be before The House of Lords: Whereas it was before a certain Number of Lords specially appointed for this Purpose.

Lord Clarendon's Impeachment.

Proceedings on the Impeachment of EDWARD Earl of Clarendon, late Lord High Chancellor of England, 1667. 19 Car. II.

1667. 19 Car. II.

A Debate on the Manner of it.

THE Earl being charged with several Crimes by Mr. Edward Seymour, in the House of Commons, the 26th of October, 1667. It was debated, whether they should impeach the Earl of High-Treason, in General Terms, or exhibit Articles against him: And a Committee being appointed to search Precedents, Sir Thomas Littleton reported, That in capital Cases, there was no Instance of a General Impeachment, till the Earl of Strafford's and Archbishop Laud's Impeachments.

Then a Committee was appointed to reduce the Accusation under certain Heads; which being reported, and read a second Time, it was moved, That it might be referred to a Committee, to see how far they were true, common Fame being too slender a Ground to form an Impeachment upon: But this was resolved in the Negative; and the several Heads for Articles were read again, to see if those Members that introduced them, could offer sufficient Reasons to induce the House to impeach the Earl: And, after the Articles were thus gone through, Sir Robert Atkyns observed, That the Inducements for their Belief, proceeded from a third Hand; and Mr. Colman shewed, That even in the Earl of Strafford's Case, the House would not proceed on any Article, till one Member spoke of his own Knowledge, and another engaged to make it good. However, the Question being put, That the House had sufficient Inducements to impeach the Earl, it was carried in the Affirmative.

The Heads for an Impeachment.

The principal Part of the Charge against the Earl, was, that he had advised the King to lay aside Parliaments, and govern arbitrarily by a Military Power: That he had got a greater Estate, under the Crown, than could be lawfully gained in so short a Time: That he had been guilty of Bribery and Corruption: That he had advised and effected the Sale of Dunkirk: That he had corresponded with Cromwell, and the King's Enemies, when he was beyond Sea: That he had betrayed the Nation in all Negotiations relating to the Dutch War; and betrayed and discovered his Majesty's secret Councils to his Enemies; and that he was the Author of that fatal Council of dividing the Fleet in the Year 1666: And they resolved, that the betraying his Majesty's Councils to his Enemies, was High-Treason; and therefore determined to impeach him of High-Treason. Accordingly, on the 12th of November, Mr. Edward Seymour impeached the Earl of High-Treason, and other Crimes and Misdemeanors, at the Bar of the House of Lords, in general Terms, desiring he might be sequestred from Parliament, and committed to safe Custody, and in convenient Time the Commons would exhibit Articles against him: But the Lords declared, at a Conference with the Commons, they had not committed the Earl of Clarendon, because their Accusation for High-Treason, was in General Terms.

Impeached of High-Treason generally.

A Debate between the two Houses concerning committing the Earl.

The Commons, on the other Hand, gave their Reasons at a second Conference, why a Peer ought to be committed on a general Impeachment; with which, the Lords, however, were not satisfied: But while the two Houses were disputing this Point, the Lords received an Intimation, that the Earl was withdrawn; together with a Petition from his Lordship, directed to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, which that House, on the 3d of December, communicated to the Commons; and in this he answers, Part of the Charge he found the lower House was framing against him, and says, If his Estate had been answerable to what was reported, it might reasonably have caused his Integrity to be suspected; but that he had never received or taken a Penny, but what had been the lawful Perquisites of his Office, in the best Times; and that it had been worth double to others, what it had been

to

to him: That all the Favours he had obtained from the King for others had not been worth five Pounds to him; ſo that he was as far from Corruption as from a diſloyal Thought, which after thirty Years Service of the Crown, in ſome Difficulties and Diſtreſſes, he never expected would have been objected to him in his Age: That what his Majeſty had beſtowed on him in Lands, was worth more than all he had beſides; and, though this exceeded his Merit, yet others had been as fortunate in the like Bounty, who had as ſmall Pretences to it.

And as to the attributing all Misfortunes and Miſcarriages to his Councils, as he was Prime Miniſter: He ſaid he ſerved a Maſter of great Underſtanding, who always joined other Perſons with him of great Ability and Experience, without whoſe Advice and Concurrence nothing was done.

That, for two Years after the Reſtoration, there was no Difference in the Councils, or any Complaints in the Kingdom; but from the Time Mr. Secretary Nicholas was removed (and ——Bennet, Earl of Arlington, ſucceeded) there had been great Alterations: The Petitioner's Credit at Court, and in the Council, had been much diminiſhed, ſince that Time; not above two Perſons having been brought into the Council, or preferred at Court, who could be ſuſpected of having any Kindneſs for him; and moſt of them of different Principles, both in Church and State, and who had taken all Opportunities of leſſening the Petitioner's Credit with the King, and others, by miſrepreſenting all he ſaid and did; though his Majeſty's Juſtice and Goodneſs was ſuch, that it made little Impreſſion on him.

That it was his Opinion, the Misfortunes of the Kingdom proceeded from the Dutch War, to which he was always averſe; no Alliances being formed, at the Commencement of it, with the neighbouring Princes: That after we entred into War with the Hollander, neither France or Spain had much Regard for us; and as he abhorred the entring into it, ſo he never gave any Advice towards the Management of it; ſave that he oppoſed the Payment of the Seamen by Tickets, and ſome other Particulars, that added to the Expence.

That he was not conſcious of having given Advice that had proved miſchievous or inconvenient to his Majeſty, or had been the ſole Manager of Affairs; for he had not been twice alone with his Majeſty the laſt Year; and very ſeldom, the three preceding Years; and very few Things had of late been hearkened to that he had propoſed.

That ſince the Diſtempers of the Times, and the Differences between the two Houſes were ſo great, and his Enemies had given out, that he would prevail with his Majeſty to diſſolve the Parliament, thereby to expoſe him to the Rage and Fury of the People; that he might not be looked upon to obſtruct his Majeſty's Service, or the Unity and Peace of the Kingdom, he humbly beſought their Lordſhips that he might not forfeit their Favour and Protection, by withdrawing himſelf from ſo powerful a Perſecution, in Hopes that he might be able hereafter to appear and make his Defence; when his Majeſty's Juſtice ſhould not be obſtructed by the Power and Malice of thoſe who had ſworn his Deſtruction.

1667. 19 Car. II.

The Commons propoſe a Bill of Attainder.

This Petition being read in the Houſe of Commous, they reſolved it to be Scandalous and Seditious, and a Reproach to the King, and the publick Juſtice of the Nation; and it was propoſed to bring in a Bill of Attainder againſt the Earl: But the Lords ſending them down a Bill for his Baniſhment, on the 13th of December, after ſome warm Debates, they reſolved to be contented with that; Yea's 65, No's 42.

An Act paſſed for his Baniſhment.

The Earl proſecuted by the Earl of Briſtol.

We meet with another Proſecution of the Earl of Clarendon in the State Trials alſo, ſome Years before, viz. Anno 1663, when the Earl of Briſtol preferred Articles of High-Treaſon againſt him in the Houſe of Peers; the moſt material whereof were, That the Earl of Clarendon had traiterouſly endeavoured to alienate the the Hearts of his Majeſties Subjects from him, by giving out, his Majeſty was enclined to Popery, and intended to alter the eſtabliſhed Religion.

That he had perſuaded his Majeſty, contrary to the Intereſt of the Nation, and againſt the Advice of the General, to withdraw the Engliſh Garriſons out of Scotland, and demoliſh the Forts built there at a vaſt Expence to this Kingdom; and that he had alſo adviſed and effected the Sale of Dunkirk: But the Lords having demanded the Opinions of the Judges, whether this Charge was legally brought before their Houſe, and whether there was any Treaſon contained in it;

Reſolved, that one Peer could not impeach another.

The Judges unanimouſly agreed, that a Charge of High-Treaſon could not, according to the Laws of this Realm, be exhibited by one Peer againſt another, in the Houſe of Peers; and that, admitting the Matters alledged in the Charge by the Earl of Briſtol were true, and though they were alledged to be traiterouſly done, there was no Treaſon in them; and the Lords concurring with the Judges in their Opinion, that Proſecution was dropped.

Remarks on the Earl of Clarendon's Diſgrace.

The Earl's Friends generally aſcribe his Diſgrace to his Zeal for the Church of England, in Oppoſition both to apiſts and Diſſenters; and it is obſervable, that he ſays in his Apology, he had little Intereſt at Court, ſince Secretary Nicholas was diſcharged (and Bennet Earl of Arlington ſucceeded him); That is, ſince the Papiſts influenced the Court, and joined their Intereſts with the Diſſenters to obtain a Toleration: They acknowledge alſo that many of the Cavaliers, who had been ruined in the late Rebellion, were become his Enemies, becauſe he neglected to make a ſuitable Proviſion for them, after the Reſtoration: His very grave and ſolemn Behaviour, rendered him diſagreeable alſo to the gay Part of the Court; for it is ſaid, he did not only reprove his Equals, when he thought they deſerved it, but ſometimes offered his Advice to the King, in ſuch a Manner, that the Wits about the Court would frequently ſay to his Majeſty, as the Chancellor paſſed by, There goes your School-maſter: And the Duke of Bucks, it is ſaid, would mimick the Chancellor, carrying a Pair of Bellows before him for the Purſe, while Colonel Titus carried the Fire-ſhovel as a Mace; and the King would laugh at the Buffoonery. Theſe, with more ſerious Applications of the Popiſh Party, and the Solicitations tations of the Ladies of Pleaſure, who dreaded his grave Lectures, were, in the Opinion of his Friends, the principal Occaſions of the Chancellor's Diſgrace.

1667. 19 Car. II.

But ſtill, it is thought, there was ſomething more than the Drollery of the Duke of Bucks, the Malice of the Papiſts and Diſſenters, or the Solicitations of the Ladies, to accompliſh this Great Man's Ruin: Particularly he is charged with neglecting, or rather preventing, the Settling a greater Revenue on the Crown at the Reſtoration, when the People were ready to grant whatever the King could demand: This, it is ſaid, made his Majeſty very cool towards him, when he came to feel the ill Effects of it: Neither was his Suffering the Vintners to build him a fine Palace, when the Nation was labouring under thoſe terrible Calamities of Fire, War, and Peſtilence; and ſcarce a Family of Diſtinction, but was mourning the Death of ſome near Relation, agreeable to the Prudence which this Miniſter was ſaid to be ſo eminent for; eſpecially ſince it was ſuggeſted to be built in Conſideration of his conſenting to the Monopoly of Wines: But whatever was the Occaſion of his Fall, one would have thought his paſſed Services, and his Alliance with the Royal Family, ſhould have procured him a milder Fate; and it is reaſonable to believe, that if the Duke of York, his Son-in-Law, had not had ſome Ends to ſerve in his Baniſhment, he might have ſupported him: Perhaps the Duke found him too good a Proteſtant, and might look upon him as an Obſtacle to his Deſign of introducing Popery; and particularly, that he hindred his Dutcheſs from being reconciled to the Church of Rome: And if both the King and the Duke had their private Views in ſending him on the other Side the Water; if the one thought the Diſtreſſes of the Crown proceeded from his Advice, and propoſed the enjoying a more unreſtrained Liberty in his Abſence; and the other hoped it would facilitate the Introducing his Religion, we need look no farther for Reaſons for the Baniſhment of the Earl. 1667. 19 Car. II.

But perhaps both the King, and the Duke, and the Nation in general, were in the End greater Sufferers by the Earl's Baniſhment, than himſelf: While he enjoyed an elegant Retirement, at Rouen in France, and wrote that admirable Hiſtory of the Civil Wars, the Court was reduced to the greateſt Diſtreſs, and the People, by the Artifices of deſigning Men, almoſt worked up into another Rebellion, occaſioned chiefly by the Weakneſs, or Wickedneſs, of thoſe Miniſters that ſucceeded the Earl. However defective his Adminiſtration had been, it is certain, his Majeſty changed much for the worſe; and poſſibly, had the Earl continued ſtill at Court, a great deal of that Diſtraction might have been prevented that happened afterwards. We had not been frighted out of our Senſes by a pretended Popiſh Plot: There might have been no Struggles for a Bill of Excluſion: He might, by his Wiſdom and long Experience, have found a Way to have ſecured our Religious and civil Rights, without breaking into the Line of Succeſſion, and driving the Succeſſor into a ſecond Exile: However the Duke might encourage or rejoice therefore, at the Baniſhment of the Earl, his Father-in-Law, had he been governed by his Councils, he might never have been driven from his Throne: But this is not the firſt Time that Families have ruined themſelves, by deſtroying thoſe Relations, who were beſt enclined, and beſt qualified, to ſupport them.

1668. 20 Car. II. Trial of Meſſenger, &c.

The Trials of PETER MESSENGER, RICHARD BEASLEY, WILLIAM GREEN, THOMAS APPLETREE, EDWARD COTTON, JOHN EARLES, WILLIAM WILKS, RICHARD FARREL, WILLIAM FORD, EDWARD BEDLE, RICHARD LATIMER, THOMAS LIMERICK, RICHARD WOODWARD, JOHN RICHARDSON, and JOHN SHARPLESS, for High-Treaſon, at the Old-Bailey, the 4th of April, 1668. 20 Car. II. 1668. 20 Car. II.

The Charge.

THEY were indicted for High-Treaſon, in levying War againſt the King, by aſſembling with other Perſons, to the Number of 500, in Eaſt-Smithfield and Moor-Fields, in the County of Middleſex, armed with divers Weapons, offenſive and defenſive, pulling down Bawdy Houſes, breaking open Priſons, &c.

Four Indictments.

There were four Indictments preferred againſt the Priſoners. The Firſt, againſt Peter Meſſenger, Richard Beaſley, William Green, and Thomas Appletree. A Second, againſt Edward Cotton, John Earl, William Wilks, Richard Farrel, and William Ford. A Third, againſt Edward Bedle, and Richard Latimer. And a Fourth, againſt Thomas Limerick, John Richardſon, Richard Woodward, and John Sharpleſs.

The Evidence on the Firſt.

The Witneſſes againſt Meſſenger and thoſe in the firſt Indictment, depoſed, that on the 24th of March laſt, a great Number of Perſons aſſembled in Eaſt-Smithfield and Moor-Fields, on Pretence of pulling down Bawdy-Houſes: That Beaſley marched before them as their Captain, with a naked Sword in his Hand, which he brandiſhed over his head; and that Meſſenger had a green

1668. 20 Car. II.

green Apron upon a Staff, which he flouriſhed as Colours: That the next Day, the 25th of March, they did the like: That ſome Houſes were pulled down, and Peverell the Conſtable, coming with his Staff in his Hand, charged them to depart, and keep the Peace; and that thereupon Beaſley wounded him with his Sword, and ſome of the Mob knocked him down, and took away his Conſtable's Staff: That William Green was amongſt them with his Staff in his Hand, and threw up his Hat and hallooed, and was taken by the King's Soldiers, who came to ſuppreſs them: That Appletree was amongſt them, and ſtruck firſt at Peverell the Conſtable, and aſſiſted in pulling down ſome Houſes.

The Evidence on the 2d Indictment.

The Witneſſes depoſed againſt Cotton, and the reſt of the Priſoners mentioned in the 2d Indictment, That the People being aſſembled in great Numbers, Sir Philip Howard came with a Troop of the King's Guards, and commanded them to diſperſe; and that, ſuppoſing it had been the Duke of York that commanded the Guards, they threw Stones at him; and ſome ſaid, unleſs the King gave them Liberty of Conſcience, it ſhould be a bloody May-Day: Others ſaid, they would kill the Guards, and pull down Whitehall; and continued together in a tumultuous Manner, till they were diſperſed by the Guards.

That the Priſoners were amongſt them both Days; and that Cotton aſſiſted in pulling down a Houſe in Shoreditch.

The Evidence on the 3d Indictment.

On the third Indictment, againſt Bedle and Latimer, it was proved, That great Numbers of People being aſſembled in a tumultuous Manner, at Clerkenwell, they broke open New-Priſon there, and releaſed four Priſoners, two whereof were committed for Felony: That they refuſed to diſperſe, ſaying, they had been Servants long enough, and now they would be Maſters, crying out, One die, and all die. That Latimer was very active in breaking the Priſon; and Bedle being purſued by one of the Soldiers, called to his Comrades to face about, and not leave him.

The Evidence on the 4th Indictment.

Upon the fourth Indictment, it was proved, that Limerick marched at the Head of one Company of the Mob, as their Captain, with a Club in his Hand: That he brought them to the Houſe of one Peter Burlingham, which they pulled down, and took away ſeveral of his Goods, to the Value of 30 l. and, that the reſt of the Priſoners, mentioned in this Indictment, were among the Multitude.

Special Verdicts found, as to ſome of the Priſoners.

The Jury found ſpecial Verdicts on the four Indictments, (the Facts being agreed to be according to the Evidence) againſt Meſſenger, Beaſley, Green, and Appletree, in the firſt Indictment; againſt Cotton in the ſecond Indictment; againſt Bedle and Latimer in the third Indictment; and, againſt Limerick in the fourth Indictment; and ſubmitted the Matter of Law to the Judges. But, as to the other Six, (viz.) Earls, Wilks, Woodward, Farrel, Richardſon, and Ford, the Jury acquitted them.

The reſt acquitted.

The Judges Opinions that the Facts were treaſonable.

The Judges being aſſembled at the Lord Chief Juſtice's Chamber, to conſider of theſe Verdicts, in Eaſter Term following, the Lord Chief Baron Hales was of Opinion, that theſe Facts did not amount to Treaſon, becauſe the Stat. of 1 M. c. 12. ſays, If any Perſons, to the Number of Twelve or more, aſſemble with Intent to pull down Encloſures, &c. and continue together an Hour after Proclamation made for them to depart, it ſhall be Felony. If ſuch Actions therefore had been Treaſon at Common Law, it had been to no Purpoſe, he obſerved, to make them Felony by Statute.

1668. 20 Car. II.

To which the reſt of the Judges, who were of another Opinion, anſwered, That this Objection had been made in the Caſe of Bradſhaw and Burton, in Popham's Reports; but there it was reſolved, That if People aſſembled to alter the Laws, or to ſet a Price on Victuals, or to lay violent Hands on a Magiſtrate, or the like; and with Force attempted to put the ſame in Execution, this was Rebellion and Treaſon at Common Law: And reſolved, that the Statute of 1. M. intended only, that if ſuch Perſons, as pretended to have received any particular Injury as to their common or other Intereſts in Lands encloſed, ſhould aſſemble to pull down the Encloſures, it ſhould be Felony; and indeed this was not Treaſon; But where the Deſign is general to pull down all Encloſures, in which none of them are particularly concerned, and they put this Deſign in Execution, this was Treaſon at Common Law. And it was held by all the Judges, that the 13. Eliz. which makes the Intention, in many Caſes, Treaſon, extends to nothing but where, if the Act had been done, it had been Treaſon at Common Law.

The Judges alſo reſolved, that this Inſurrection, with Intent to pull down Bawdy-Houſes in general, and to break open Priſons in general, and putting ſuch Deſigns in Execution by Force; either of them was a levying War againſt the King, and High Treaſon within the 25. Ed. III. And, as to the particular Caſes on the ſpecial Verdicts, all the Judges agreed, (except the Chief Baron) that as to Meſſenger and Beaſley, in the firſt Verdict, Cotton in the ſecond Verdict, and Limerick in the fourth; the Matter found againſt theſe four, was High-Treaſon; and they received Judgment, and were executed thereupon, as Traitors. But, as to Appletree in the firſt Verdict, and Latimer in the Third, there was a Difference in Opinion; for (beſides the Chief Baron) Atkyns, Tyrrell, Wyndham, and Wylde, held that the Verdicts were not ſufficient; becauſe it was not expreſly found, that they were aiding and aſſiſting. On the contrary, the Chief Juſtice, with Turner, Twiſden, Archer, Raynsford, and Morton, were of Opinion, that the Verdicts were full and plain: For, there being ſeveral Acts of Force found, to be committed by them, in Purſuance of their Deſign, there was no Neceſſity to find them aiding and aſſiſting. However, there being this Difference in Opinion as to theſe two, the Chief Juſtice recommended them to his Majeſty's Mercy, which was extended to them. And as to Green, in the firſt ſpecial Verdict, and Bedle in the Third, the Judges all agreed that the Verdicts were not ſufficient to denominate the Offence High-Treaſon; becauſe, they only found that they were preſent, but that no particular Acts of Force were committed by them, and it was not found they were aiding and aſſiſting. It was ſaid, they might might be preſent out of Curioſity: Whether they were aiding and aſſiſting, was a Matter of Fact which ought to be expreſly found by the Jury, and not left to the Court to judge upon any colourable Implication; and accordingly theſe two were diſcharged.

Remarks on the Trials of Meſſenger, &c.

Ever ſince theſe Trials, the aſſembling in a tumultuous Manner, with Arms, or Weapons of any kind, in order to reform the State, to procure an Alteration of the Laws, or to redreſs any Abuſes, Nuſances, or Grievances, of a Publick Nature, and actually endeavouring to put ſuch Deſigns in Execution by Force, has been adjudged High-Treaſon.

And it appears a little unaccountable, that Green, in the firſt ſpecial Verdict, who was found to be among the Mob, with his Staff in his Hand, to throw up his Cap, halloo, to encourage the Inſurrection; and Bedle, who was alſo with them at breaking open the Priſon, and called to his Companions to face about, and fight the Guards who came to ſuppreſs them, ſhould be deemed innocent in the Eye of the Law. If the Words, aiding and aſſiſting, were wanting in theſe Verdicts, there were certainly Words that amounted to as much; and, indeed, there are too many Inſtances in our Law, where Matter of Form is more conſidered, than the Merits of the Cauſe. 1668. 20 Car. The Charge.

THE Priſoner was indicted for Felony, in ſtealing Rings, Money, and other Goods, out of the Houſe of Henry Larrimore.

The Evidence againſt the Priſoner.

The principal Witneſs againſt Mr. Hawkins, was Larrimore, the Proſecutor, who depoſed, That on the 18th of September, being gone from Home with all his Family, to a Hemp-Plot, a little Diſtance from his Houſe, to pull Hemp; and, coming Home half an Hour before Sun-ſet, he found his Doors open; and, running up Stairs, he ſaw the Priſoner through the Chinks of the Boards, rifling a Box; in which, among other Goods, was a Holland Apron, a Purſe with two Gold Rings, two Ten-Shilling Pieces of Gold, and nineteen Shillings in Silver; all which he ſaw the Priſoner turn out of the Purſe, run out of the Houſe with them, and hide himſelf in a Cloſe of Beans.

That the next Day he got a Warrant from Sir Richard Piggot, and went with the Conſtable to ſearch the Priſoner's Houſe, which they broke open, on his refuſing them Entrance; and found, in a Basket filled with Rags, one of the Rings, and a Five-Shilling Piece of Silver, which he was poſitive the Priſoner took out of his Purſe the Day before.

Larrimore the Son, depoſed, that coming Home a little after his Father, he ſaw the Priſoner run out of the Houſe, down the Yard, and hide himſelf in a Cloſe of Beans; and asking his Father, if Mr. Hawkins had been there, his Father anſwered, he had robbed him.

Joan Beamſly alſo depoſed, that going Home with young Larrimore, ſhe ſaw the Priſoner run out of the Houſe, and hide himſelf in a Cloſe of Beans; and heard Larrimore, the Father, tell his Son, Mr. Hawkins had robbed him.

Richard Mayne the Conſtable depoſed, That Henry Larrimore, the Elder, bringing him a Warrant from Sir Richard Piggot, to ſearch the Priſoner's Houſe for ſtolen Goods, and the Priſoner refuſing them Entrance, they broke open his Doors; and Larrimore, the Elder, found in a Basket the gold Ring and Five-Shilling Piece; and thereupon he carried the Priſoner before Sir John Croke, who committed him; and the Deponent carried the Priſoner to Aylesbury Gaol.

Larrimore's Wife alſo depoſed, That when ſhe was his Servant, ſhe ſaw the Priſoner lurking about their Houſe in the Night-time. Richard Mantill, Son-in-law to Larrimore, alſo depoſed, he had ſeen him lurking about his Father's Houſe in the Night-time.

Dodſworth Croke, Eſq; depoſed, that he was poſitive the Ring, produced in Court, was ſtolen from Larrimore; for that he, the Deponent, pawned it to him.

Good depoſed, that he pawned the Five-Shilling Piece, produced in Court, and found in the Priſoner's Houſe, to Larrimore, at the Time of the Seſſions, held in July, 1668.

This Evidence againſt the Priſoner, appeared ſo ſtrong and concluſive, that the Lord Chief Baron Hales, who tried him, ſaid, there was Evidence enough to hang twenty Men: However, Mr. Hawkins ſhewed, that it was all a malicious Proſecution.

The Priſoner's Defence.

And firſt he obſerved, That, if the Priſoner had ſeen him rob his Houſe, it was ſtrange he did not call to his Neighbours to aſſiſt in apprehending him; and demanded why he ſearched other Houſes for the Goods he ſaw him ſteal: He obſerved alſo, that, when the Proſecutor went to Sir Richard Piggot for the Warrant, he did not charge him poſitively with the Felony: To which Larrimore gave no ſatisfactory Anſwer; and, the Priſoner, croſs-examining the Conſtable, he acknowledged that Larrimore deſired him to ſearch other Houſes, and did not tell him he ſaw Mr. Hawkins rob him. He acknowledged alſo, that it was Larrimore the Elder himſelf, that found the Ring and the Five-Shilling Piece; and another of the Priſoner's Witneſſes depoſed, that the reſt of the Company was in the Hall, when Larrimore pretended to find the Money in a Basket in the Buttery: The Goaler deposed, that the Constable told him, the Parson was a notorious Picklock, and advised him to watch him narrowly, and load him with Irons.

The Prisoner's Evidence.

Then the Prisoner examined one Chilton, a Shoe-maker, whom the Prosecutor had sub-pœna'd as a Witness; and Chilton deposed, that, having a Pair of Boots of the Prisoner's to mend, and telling him he would lay them in his Shop-Window when they were done, where the Prisoner might take them (for he should be abroad) the Prisoner accordingly took the Boots out of his Shop-Window: But when the Prisoner came afterwards to demand his Tythes, this Larrimore, Dodsworth, Croke, Richard Mayne the Constable, and others, advised him to indict the Parson for stealing the Boots; and threatned, if the Deponent would not fetch a Warrant for the Parson, Sir John Croke would indict him as accessary to the stealing of them: And Larrimore said, he would make the Deponent swear Mr. Hawkins had stolen the Boots, and actually sub-pœna'd him to the Assizes for that Purpose: That Croxton told him the Monday before, if he would swear Mr. Hawkins stole the Boots, he would bear him out as far as an hundred Pounds would go; and if that would not do, as far as five hundred Pounds would go; and would give him Bond to make it good: And two other Witnesses appeared, and attested the Truth of Chilton's Evidence.

Then the Lord Chief Baron ordering the Constable to produce the Search-Warrant, it appeared, that the Warrant was dated the Day before the Prosecutor pretended the Robbery was committed; whereupon his Lordship observed, that the Prosecutor was very cunning to know, on the 17th Day, that he should be robbed on the 18th, and that the Prisoner should rob him; and demanding of Mr. Hawkins, Why he refused to open his Doors, and suffer his House to be searched, he answered, that most of the Persons present were his inveterate Enemies: That Sir John Croke and Larrimore had often threatned to pull down his House, and hired People to force it open: That they hired one Jaires to get down his Chimney, and open his Doors, when the Family was abroad, and contracted with one Tyler for the same Purpose; and besides, they had an Execution against him, which Larrimore's Son had executed in Part a few Days before: And that he did offer, that Mr. Sanders, the other Constable, who lived next Door, might search as narrowly as he pleased: All which he proved by unexceptionable Witnesses: Whereupon the Chief Baron observed, that the Business appeared very foul on Sir John Croke's Part (who was then in Court.)

Mr. Hawkins observed further in his Defence, That this Prosecution of Larrimore's was commenced on his being sued for Tythes, and it would be easy, he said, for the Fanaticks to avoid the Payment of Tythes; if they could do it by hanging up the Clergy: That this Larrimore was an Anabaptist, and a notorious Enemy to the Church of England, and her Clergy in general; but particularly to himself, he having been obliged to sue him for his Tythes; and having indicted him for not coming to Church, and not baptizing his Children: That Larrimore's Malice also appeared in dissuading those that owed him Money, from paying him, and persuading others he owed Money to, to arrest him, and by dissuading those he had sued for Tythes, from agreeing with him, and telling them, Sir John Croke would force him to run his Country; all which he was ready to prove, and produced a Certificate under the Hands of an hundred of his Neighbours, attesting the Truth of what he asserted: But this Certificate, not being deemed Legal Evidence, was not read in Court.

1668-9. 20 Car. II.

Mr. Hawkins said further in his Defence, that it could not be supposed he should commit a Robbery in his own Parish in the Day-Time, where every body knew him: That he had Time enough to make his Escape, if he had been guilty of it; and it was strange he should find no other Place to hide the Ring and Five-Shilling Piece, than a Basket that hung up publickly.

Other Witnesses of the Prisoner.

Then the Prisoner called some other Witnesses, and particularly Mr. Wilcox, who deposed, that on Friday the 18th of September, when it was pretended the Robbery was committed, the Deponent was at Larrimore the Prosecutor's House, from Noon till near Night, driving a Bargain with Larrimore for Tiles and other Things; and that Mr. Hawkins was not there all that Afternoon, nor did the Deponent hear before his coming away (which was after Sunset) that Larrimore was robbed.

Sir Richard Piggot also deposed, that Larrimore and the Constable were with him for the Search-Warrant on the 17th, being the Day before the pretended Robbery (as the Warrant bore Date;) and that the Date was not mistaken.

A full Proof of the Conspiracy of Larrimore, Sir John Croke, &c. against the Prisoner.

Then Brown deposed, that he was entrusted by Sir John Lenthall, the Marshal of the King's-Bench, to be Sir John Croke's Keeper, who was his Prisoner; and that being with Sir John at his House at Chilton in Buckinghamshire, on Wednesday the 16th of Semptember, he heard a great Noise in the Night-Time, as he lay in his Bed, and fearing that Sir John was contriving an Escape, he started out of Bed in his Shirt, and stood at the Dining-Room Door, behind the Hangings, and there he heard Larrimore the Prosecutor tell Sir John Croke, that he had undone him by causing him to contend with the Parson, for he had entred him in most of the Courts in England, summoned him into the Crown-Office and Chancery, and he could not maintain so many Suits: Sir John answered, Is that all? Come Brother Larrimore, be contented; we will have one Trick more for Hawkins yet, which shall do his Work. Larrimore replied, You have put me on too many Tricks already, more than I can manage; and the Parson is too hard for us still: Sir John said, if thou wilt but act, I will hatch enough to hang Hawkins: Canst thou not convey Gold or Silver into his House, and have a Warrant ready to search it? and then our Work is done: Do but go to Sir John Piggot, and inform him you have lost Money and Goods, and desire his Warrant to search for them; and then take Dick Mayne the Constable, who is one of us, and will do what we desire him, and search the House; and when you find the Things, charge him with flat Felony, and force him before me;

I'll

1668-9. 20Car. II.

I'll ſend him to Goal without Bail, and we will hang him the next Aſſizes.

That the Saturday following, being the 19th of September, as the Deponent was coming home, he heard Mr. Hawkins had robbed Larrimore, and when he came into Sir John's Houſe, he ſaw a written Paper lie upon the Table; and ſoon after Larrimore, with the Conſtable and others, brought Hawkins to Sir John's, who took up the Paper, and read it to the Conſtable, and ſaid it was Mr. Hawkins's Mittimus; and the Deponent averred, that it was written, and lay on the Table before Hawkins was brought to Sir John Croke's: That, on Sunday Morning, he went to the Ale-houſe, where they had kept Mr. Hawkins all Night, and ſaw them carrying him to Goal: That ſaying to, Sir John, when he came home, They have carried the poor Parſon to Goal, he anſwered, Let him go, and the Devil go with him: Have I not often told you that, if my Brother Larrimore and I laid our Heads together, no Body could ſtand before us? And he (the Deponent) replied, I have often heard you ſay ſo; but never believed it till now.

But before Brown gave this Evidence, he declared in Court, that both Sir John Croke and Larrimore, had threatned him, if he came down to the Aſſizes to teſtify what he had heard of this Conſpiracy, they would ruin him and his Family; and for that Reaſon he was afraid to ſpeak, till the Court promiſed him Protection: And he had no ſooner given his Evidence, but Sir John Croke ſtole off the Bench unperceived.

Then ſaid the Lord Chief Baron, Larrimore, thou art a Villain; nay, I think thou art a Devil. ——Where is this Sir John Croke? and it being anſwered, he was gone, the Chief Baron ſaid, Gentlemen, Sir John Croke ſent me this Morning two Sugar-Loaves to excuſe his Abſence Yeſterday, but I ſent them back again: I did not ſo well know what he meant by them then, as I do now; ſure Sir John does not think the King's Juſtices will take Bribes? Mr. Hawkins have you any more to ſay?

To which he anſwered, I hope your Lordſhip and the Jury are fully ſatisfied of my Innocence; and his Lordſhip demanding of the Jury, what they thought, They ſaid, it was a very plain Caſe; and without going from the Bar, gave their Verdict that the Priſoner was Not Guilty.

Mr. Hawkins acquitted.

Mr. Hawkins moved, he might be diſcharged without paying his Fees, for that he was very poor, having been put to great Charges by this and other Troubles, the Proſecutors had brought upon him; but the Chief Baron anſwered, he could not give away other Peoples Rights; he muſt pay the Fees, if they inſiſted on them.

It ſeems before the Trial was well over, Sir John Croke, Larrimore the Proſecutor, and the reſt of the Conſpirators, fled out of Town,

Remarks on Mr. Hawkins's Tryal.

Whether Mr. Hawkins brought his Action againſt Sir John Croke, Larrimore, and the reſt of the Conſpirators, does not appear; but there is no Doubt, he would have recovered conſiderable Damages, if he had: They might have been indicted, and fined alſo, for ſo foul a Crime: And ſurely that Law was very equitable, which inflicted the ſame puniſhment on a falſe Accuſer, that he would have brought upon his innocent Neighbour. 1668-9. 20Car. II.

Mr. Hawkins tells us, the Proſecutors were Enemies to him on a double Account: 1ſt, Becauſe he was a Clergyman, and they were Diſſenters: And 2dly, Becauſe he would have his Dues; but it is ſurprizing their Malice ſhould extend ſo far as to take away his Life: And if the furious Zeal of Larrimore, an Anabaptiſt, with his Family and Friends of that Sect, ſhould put them upon ſuch vile Practices; yet nothing ſurely can excuſe Sir John Croke, a Gentleman of Quality, who contrived and executed ſo Infamous a Scheme. We have not, indeed, wanted Inſtances of Knights and Eſquires, who have ſupported and encouraged their Tenants and Dependants, in defrauding their Parſon of his Dues, and going to Law with him, till they have ruined him; but their Malice has ended uſually in throwing their unhapy Paſtor into a Goal, and ſeizing his Goods. Sir John Croke is the only Man upon Record, that ever deſcended ſo low as to become a Devil incarnate, falſly to accuſe his Miniſter of Capital Crimes, and take away his Life by Forms of Law, becauſe he inſiſted on his Tythes. This ſhould be a Caution to Gentlemen, when they contend with the defenceleſs Clergy, how they ſuffer their Paſſion to get the better of their Reaſon and Conſcience, and hurry them into Meaſures that muſt render them infamous to all Poſterity.

Is it not a glorious Action for a Gentleman of Quality and Fortune, to oppreſs and ruin a poor Prieſt of his own Religion! They have Enemies enough among the Sectaries, and the loweſt Claſs of Men. How mean a Part is it in a Gentleman then, who ſhould be a Patron and Protector of the Church and Clergy, to join with the Dregs, and Refuſe of Mankind, in diſtreſſing them; eſpecially when we ſee every other Perſuaſion and Denomination of Chriſtians, and even Infidels, treating their Prieſts with the higheſt Veneration! A certain Baronet, now living, who had encouraged his Tenants to go to Law with their Parſon, till they had ſeized his Goods in Execution, became afterwards ſo much aſhamed of his Victory, that he reconciled himſelf to the unhappy Man, proved one of his beſt Friends, and is ſtill every Day doing ſome ſubſtantial Kindneſs to the Perſon he was once zealous to deſtroy. May other Gentlemen make the like Reflections, and entertain a more friendly Correſpondence with the Clergy of their ſeveral Pariſhes, than they uſually do; and not make a ſervile Submiſſion the only Condition of their Friendſhip: And, on the other Hand, may the Clergy always behave themſelves with that Goodneſs and Prudence, as to merit the Eſteem and Friendſhip of the Gentry; and eſpecially of their Patrons and Pariſhioners, whoſe Welfare ought to be their principal Study.

The Trial of WILLIAM PENN, and WILLIAM MEAD, for a Riot and Conſpiracy, at the Old-Bailey, the 1ſt, 3d, 4th, and 5th of September, 1670. 22 Car. II.

Penn and Mead, their Trial.

The Charge.

THE Priſoners were indicted for a Riot and Conſpiracy; for, that they, with divers other Perſons, to the Number of three hundred, did, on the 14th of Auguſt, then laſt paſt, unlawfully and tumultuouſly aſſemble themſelves in Gracechurch-Street, to the Diſturbance of the Peace: And, that the ſaid William Penn (by Agreement between him and the ſaid William Mead, and abetted by him) did there ſpeak and preach to the ſaid William Mead, and the reſt of the People ſo aſſembled; whereby a great Concourſe and Tumult was made, and continued, to the great Terror and Diſturbance of his Majeſty's Subjects.

This Trial being collected only from ſome partial Minutes of the Priſoners is very imperfect.

The Priſoners fined for not pulling off their Hats.

The Priſoners relate, that as they were brought into Court, a Perſon took off their Hats; but an Officer was ordered to put their Hats on again, and they ſtood with their Hats on.

Whereupon the Recorder demanded, if they did not know it was the King's Court; and why they did not pull off their Hats, and pay that Reſpect to it they ought?

Penn anſwered, he knew it to be a Court, and he ſuppoſed it to be the King's; but he did not think pulling off his Hat ſhewed any Reſpect; and they were find forty Marks a-piece for their Contempt: Whereupon Penn obſerved, That they came in with their Hats off, and the Court had ordered them to be put on, and therefore the Bench ought rather to be fined than they.

The Evidence againſt them.

A Jury being ſworn, and charged with the Priſoners, the Witneſſes appeared; and firſt, James Cook, a Lieutenant of the Militia, depoſed, That, being ſent for to diſperſe a Meeting in Gracechurch-Street, he found Penn ſpeaking to the People; and that Mead came to the Deponent, and deſired him to let Penn go on, and when he had done, he would bring him to the Deponent: Other Witneſſes depoſed, that there were three or four Hundred People aſſembled in Gracechurch-Street: That Penn was preaching to them, and that Cook, an Officer of the Militia, and the Conſtables, came to diſperſe them, but they could not.

Then the Recorder demanding of Mead, if he was there? Mead anſwered, It is a Maxim in your Law, Nemo tenetur ſeipſum accuſare. Why doſt thou endeavour to enſnare me? Is this like a Judge, who ought to be of Counſel for the Priſoner?

Their Defence.

Penn added, We declare to all the World we believe it to be our indiſpenſible Duty, to meet inceſſantly upon ſo good an Account: Nor ſhall all the Powers on Earth divert us from adoring our God who made us.

To which the Court anſwered, you are not brought here for worſhipping God, but for breaking the Law.

Penn replied, they had broken no Law, and deſired to know on what Law the Indictment was founded; and talking very pertly to the Court, Penn was ordered to be put into the Bail-Dock, (a little Room near the Court, where Priſoners are ſecured till they are brought to the Bar.)

Then Mead ſaid, You, Men of the Jury, I ſtand here to anſwer an Indictment, a Bundle of Stuff, full of Lyes and Falſhood: They charge, that we met Vi & armis illicite & tumultuoſe: Time was, indeed, when I had the Freedom to uſe a carnal Weapon; (he had been a Captain) and then I thought I feared no Man. But now I fear the living God, and dare not make Uſe thereof, or hurt any Man; nor do I know I demeaned myſelf as a tumultuous Perſon; and therefore, William Penn properly demanded on what Law the Indictment was founded: Coke tells us, a Riot is, where three, or more, are met together, to beat a Man, to enter forcibly into his Land, or to cut down his Graſs, Wood, or Pales. — The Recorder added, Or to do any other unlawful Act: But, I thank you Mr. Mead, for telling me what the Law is, (pulling off his Hat) Mead anſwered, Thee may'ſt put on thy Hat; I have never a Fee for thee now.

The Lord Mayor replied, you profeſs yourſelf a meek Man, but deſerve to have your Tongue cut out for affronting the Court: And Mead continuing to revile and reproach the Judges, he was ſent after Penn into the Bail-Dock; and the Recorder proceeded to ſum up the Evidence: Whereupon Penn and Mead cried out, it was illegal to direct the Jury in their Abſence: To which the Recorder anſwered, You are preſent, you do hear; and continued his Directions to the Jury; who, being withdrawn, and returning into Court, ſaid, that Penn was Guilty of ſpeaking in Gracechurch-Street.

The Court thereupon obſerved, they might as well have ſaid nothing, if they did not find there was a Tumult, or unlawful Aſſembly there: And the Jury withdrawing again, returned the following Paper, ſigned by all of them.

The Jury give an imperfect Verdict.

We, the Jurors hereafter named, do find William Penn to be Guilty of Speaking or Preaching to an Aſſembly, met together in Gracechurch-Street, the 14th of Auguſt laſt, 1670. And that William Mead is Not guilty of the ſaid Indictment.

The Lord Mayor thereupon ſaid, you have heard that he preached, that he thereby created a Tumult, and that Mead abetted him; and they not only diſobeyed the Martial, but the Civil Power.

Penn anſwered, we did not make the Tumult, but they that interrupted us: We were, by Force and Arms, kept out of our lawful Houſe, and met together, in a peaceable Manner, as near to it as the Soldiers would give us Leave.

1670. 20Car. II.

They are kept two Days without Meat, &c.

Then an Officer was ſworn to keep the Jury without Meat, Drink, Fire, or Candle, till next Morning: When, returning into Court, they refuſed to give any other Verdict than they had done the Night before.

The Recorder told them, he would have a poſitive Verdict, or they ſhould ſtarve for it.

To which Penn ſaid, They had found William Mead, Not Guilty, and that was a Verdict.

The Recorder anſwered, You are indicted for a Conſpiracy; and one being found Not Guilty, and not the other, it cannot be a Verdict.

Fined 40 Marks for refuſing to give any other Verdict.

Penn replied, the Conſent of the Jury is a Verdict: And, if William Mead be not Guilty, I am acquitted of Courſe; I could not conſpire alone: And, the Jury being kept another Night without Meat and Drink, Fire or Candle; and, refuſing to give any other Verdict, were fined forty Marks a-piece, and committed to Newgate till their Fines were paid, for going contrary to plain Evidence.

The Priſoners alſo were remanded to Newgate again, till their Fines, for their Contempt of the Court, were paid.

Remarks on Penn and Mead's Trial.

The fining theſe Quakers for not pulling off their Hats, and inſulting the Court, was certainly lawful. The Priſoners ſeem to admit it, when they affirmed, The pulling off their Hats was not a Mark of Diſreſpect: But, ſurely, the Cuſtom of every Nation muſt determine what is, and what is not, a Mark of Diſreſpect. In the Eaſt, whoever enters a Temple, or appears in the Houſe of a great Man, pulls off his Shoes at the Door, and keeps on his Cap or Turbant: It would there be deemed a Piece of Rudeneſs to uncover the Head, or appear with Shoes on, before our Superiors. On the coutrary, here we look upon it as a Piece of Inſolence, to come into a Church, or before a Magiſtrate, with our Heads covered; and, a Court of Juſtice may reſent the Affront, and fine any Man who ſhall appear in Court with his Hat on. But, the Lord Chief Juſtice Holt, ſeems to have carried the Matter too far, when he would not ſuffer a Woman to come before him with a Hat on: Unleſs it was, that he thought her Hat contributed to diſguiſe her, and the Witneſſes would not know her ſo well as when it was off: For neither in Churches, or Palaces, was it ever expected, that a Woman ſhould appear bare-headed among us. 1670. 20Car. II.

But to proceed to the Quakers Defence: They pretended all Men, and parricularly Engliſhmen, were at Liberty to worſhip God in their own Way; and, therefore, their meeting at a Conventicle, could not be illegal, or ſuch an Aſſembly deemed riotous or tumultuous.

But, where is the Nation or People, that will ſuffer the eſtabliſhed Religion to be reviled and derided; or, which is much worſe, ſuffer ſuch Doctrines to be broached and encouraged, as ſap the very Foundation of the Religion of their Country, as the Quakers do that of the Chriſtian Religion; reſolving all the Hiſtory of the Goſpel into Fable and Allegory, and looking upon themſelves as much the Sons of God, as Jeſus Chriſt, who died for the Salvation of Mankind? And, as to the particular Laws of this Kingdom, every one knows that the Laws of Uniformity were then in full Force; and there were ſeveral Acts of Parliament for ſuppreſſing Conventicles; and, conſequently, ſuch People as ſet up other Forms of Worſhip, and aſſembled to propagate new and unheard-of Doctrines, inconſiſtent with the Religion eſtabliſhed, were Criminal in the Eye of the Law; and the Priſoners were, nevertheleſs, Guilty, though there happened to be ſome Fanaticks upon the Jury, that were reſolved to acquit them. On the other hand, it muſt be acknowledged, that the threatening and fining the Jurors, for giving a Verdict contrary to Evidence, was illegal: If the Jury would perjure themſelves, and go contrary to Evidence, there was no Remedy; for ſuch Facts can be tried only by a Jury. Had the Court a Power of compelling the Jury to alter their Verdict, then the Court would be Triers of the Fact, and we ſhould loſe the great Barrier of our Liberties. Much better two or three Quakers ſhould eſcape unpuniſhed, than ſuch a fatal Breach be made in our Conſtitution.

Barnardiſton and Soame.

The Trial between Sir SAMUEL BARNARDISTON, Bart. Plaintiff, and Sir WILLIAM SOAME, Knt. Sheriff of Suffolk, Defendant, upon an Action of the Caſe brought by the Plaintiff againſt the Defendant, for Damages he ſuſtained, againſt the Defendant's makeing a double Return at an Election for a Knight of the Shire for Suffolk, before the Court of King's-Bench, in Trinity-Term, 1674. 26 Car. II.

1674. 26Car. II.

The Declaration.

THE Declaration ſets forth, that whereas the King, the 8th of February, in the 25th Year of his Reign, by a Writ out of Chancery, directed to the Defendant, then Sheriff of Suffolk, commanded the Sheriff to cauſe an Election to be made of Knight of the Shire for the ſaid County, in the Room of Sir Henry North, then lately deceaſed; and the Plaintiff being being duly elected Knight for that County by the greater Number of Freeholders, and the Writ returned by the Defendant into Chancery, together with an Indenture between him, the ſaid Sheriff, and the Electors of the aforeſaid Election of the Plaintiff; yet the Defendant, the Sheriff, Officii ſui debitum minime ponderans, ſed machinans & malitioſe intendens ipſum Samuelem in hac parte minus rite prægravare, and to deprive the Plaintiff of the Truſt and Office of one of the Knights of the Shire for for the ſaid County, and to cauſe the Plaintiff to ſpend great Sums of Money; falſely, maliciouſly, and deceitfully, returned into Chancery, together the aforeſaid Indenture, another Indenture annexed to the ſaid Writ, purporting the ſame to be made between him the ſaid Defendant, then Sheriff, of the one Part, and divers other Perſons, declaring that the ſaid other Perſons, as the greater Part of the Freeholders of the ſaid County, did chuſe one Sir Lionel Talmach, Bart. otherwiſe called Lord Huntingtowre, Knight of the Shire for the ſaid County; whereas in Truth the ſaid Lionel was not choſen by the greater Part: By Reaſon of which falſe Return of the ſaid other Indenture, the Plaintiff could not be admitted into the lower Houſe at the Return of the ſaid Writ, nor till a long Time after; when he had petitioned the Commons, and ſpent divers great Sums of Money, proving his ſaid Election, and ſuſtained great Pains and Labour in that Behalf: But on the 20th of February, 26 Car. II. he was admitted into the Houſe, and his Election declared good; and avers his Damages amounted to 3000 l.

Notguilty pleaded.

To this Declaration, the Defendant pleaded Not guilty; but a Verdict was given for the Plaintiff, and 800 Pound Damages.

A Verdict.

Judgment for the the Plaintiff.

Whereupon Judgment was obtained in the King's-Bench for the 800 Pound Damages, and 98 Pounds Coſts of Suit.

A Writ of Error.

The Defendant, Sir William Soame, thereupon brought a Writ of Error, before the Juſtices of the Common-Pleas, and the Barons of the Exchequer in the Exchequer-Chamber, to reverſe the ſaid Judgment; and it was reverſed by the Opinion of two of the Juſtices of the Common-Pleas, and the four Barons of the Exchequer, who held it to be erroneous. Sir Robert Atkyns and Sir William Ellys, Juſtices of the Common-Pleas, however, were of Opinion, That the ſaid Judgment was good.

The Judgment reverſed.

The Reverſal confirmed by the Houſe of Lords.

After the Revolution, Sir Samuel Barnardiſton brought his Writ of Error in the Houſe of Peers, to reverſe the Reverſal of the Judgment given in the Exchequer; but the Houſe affirmed in the Reverſal of the ſaid Judgment. The Editor of this Trial hath not given us any of the Arguments of the Counſel in the Court of King's-Bench, or in the Exchequer-Chamber, either for the Plaintiff or Defendant. All the Arguments we meet with are thoſe of Sir Robert Atkyns and Sir William Ellys, Juſtices of the Common-Pleas (in the Exchequer-Chamber) for affirming the the Judgment given in the King's-Bench; and the Arguments of the Lord Chief Juſtice North for reverſing the ſaid Judgment.

Arguments for confirming the Judgment.

The two Judges that argued for confirming the Judgment given againſt the Defendant, in the Court of King's-Bench, held, 1ſt, That the Matter, ſet forth in the Plaintiff's Declaration, was Actionable: 2dly, That the Wrong and Injury complained of, was ſuch as the Law gave him a Remedy for: And 3dly, That he had taken his proper Remedy, by bringing his Action on the Caſe.

1674. 26Car. II.

They inſiſted that, where a Wrong or Injury was done, and a particular Damage ſuſtained, there the Common Law gave a Remedy by Action.

1. From the Nature and Quality of the Law, which was to do Right to all: For, ſhould there be any Caſe where a Perſon might receive an Injury and Damage, and yet have no Remedy or Redreſs, the Law would be defective.

2. From the Nature and Definition of an Action in our Law Books, which is declared to be nothing elſe but a Means or Remedy for a Man to have Right done him, that has received Wrong and Injury.

Then they proceeded to ſhew, that there was a Wrong or Injury done to the Plaintiff, and a particular Damage ſuſtained by him: He had, they obſerved, the Honour to be choſen to that great Truſt and Employment of a Knight of the Shire, by which he was entitled to ſeveral great Privileges, and to Wages for the Time he ſerved. And the Defendant having the Office of Sheriff, and being bound by his Office and Oath to do juſtly and truly, and well knowing the Plaintiff had the only Right to be returned; yet falſely, maliciouſly, and deceitfully, to deprive him of his Truſt and Office, and on Purpoſe to put him to great Charges, had returned another Perſon with him; by Means whereof the Plaintiff was hindered from ſitting in the Houſe, put to great Expence, and underwent great Trouble and Labour; after which, they thought it could not be made a Queſtion, whether the Plaintiff had received a particular Damage. Should a Man have an Action for a Penny Treſpaſs, for an Aſſault and Battery, where one only lift up his Hand to ſtrike, or for a few ill Words? and ſhould he have no Action for ſo notorious an Injury as this?

Then they proceeded to anſwer the Objections of thoſe that agreed for the Defendant Sir William Soame, which Sir Robert Atkyns obſerved, had more Wit than Weight in them: The Difficulty, he ſaid, lay rather in the great Power and Intereſt of the Parties to the Action, and of thoſe that concerned themſelves in the Example and Conſequence of it, upon a politick Account, than from any Uncertainty in the Law: There was a Deſign, he feared, to model the Parliament to the Humour of the Court; and cited Sir Edward Coke, 10 Rep. fol. 6. where he affirmed, That he never ſaw any Caſe of great Value proceed quietly, without many Exceptions in Arreſt of Judgment.

Objections anſwered.

1. To the firſt Objection, That this was a Matter of a publick Nature, and therefore the Action ought not to be brought by a private Man, or the Satisfaction made to any one Man.

Anſw. It was anſwered, that publick Injuries indeed, where all or very many were concerned, were proper for a publick Proſecution, as in the Name of the King; or by a Preſentment at a Leet or Quarter-Seſſions, &c. But if a particular Man receive a particular Damage, by the publick publick Offence or Injury, he ſhall have his Action, which is conſiſtent with the Proſecution for the Publick, as if a Man make a Ditch in the King's High-way: This is a publick Wrong, and preſentable at the Leet: But if a Man and his Horſe fall into that Ditch, and receive a particular Damage, he may have his Action upon the Caſe, againſt him that made the Ditch: So in this Caſe, this falſe and double Return was an Injury to the King and Kingdom: But it was more particularly an Injury to the Plaintiff, in that he was for ſome Time deprived of the Honour done him by his Country; hindered of diſcharging the Truſt committed to him by his Country; of doing Service to the King and Kingdom; and hindred of his Wages. And ſince it ſo nearly concerned the Government, they that were Judges ſhould be the more careful to diſcourage ſuch Abuſes committed by Sheriffs in Elections: It was of vaſt Concern to the King and Kingdom, that Elections ſhould be fair, and Returns duly made, without Partiality and indirect Means uſed; and they ought to encourage all Remedies againſt ſuch Abuſes and Practices: Beſides, the Plaintiff had been put to great Expences, and undergone great Labour and Trouble, which was a private and particular Damage, and therefore entitled him to his particular Action.

1674. 26 Car. II.

The Statute of 7 Hen. IV. Cap. 1. recites, that the Commons made Complaint to the King of the undue Election of Knights of the Counties, which, the Preamble ſays, were ſometimes made by the Affection of the Sheriffs; and that Statute, to prevent ſuch Abuſes, appoints the Return of Indentures under the Seal of the Sheriff, and the Seals of the Electors.

The Statute of 11 Hen. IV. cap. 1. recites, that no ſpecial Pain is ſet upon the Sheriff, if he makes a Return contrary to the former Statute; and therefore authorizes the Judges of Aſſize to inflict a Penalty of 100 Pound upon the Sheriff; and the Knights unduly returned were to loſe their Wages.

The Statute of 23 Hen. VI. cap. 15. ſets forth the great Abuſes committed in Elections, reciting, that of late divers Sheriffs, for their ſingular Avail and Lucre, had not made due Elections of Knights; and enacts, that ſuch Sheriff ſhould not only incur the Pains inflicted by the 8 Hen. VI. cap. 7. (viz. forfeit 100 Pounds to the King, and ſuffer a Year's Impriſonment without Bail,) but he ſhould forfeit to the Perſon duly choſen and not returned, an 100 Pound more; the Party grieved commencing his Action within three Months after the Beginning of the Parliament; and the Perſon unduly returned, was to forfeit likewiſe an 100 Pound to the King and 100 Pound to the Party wrongfully kept out.

So that a Perſon elected a Knight, and not returned, is by this Act declared to be agrieved and wronged: And if he have a particular Wrong done him, it follows, that he ought to have a particular Remedy and Satisfaction by the Common Law, if theſe Statutes had never been made; for theſe Statutes do not make him a Party grieved, but mention him as being ſo before; and, if he were ſo, the Law gave him a Remedy.

2. The ſecond Objection was, That this Action, concerning the Election of a Knight to ſerve in Parliament, belonged to the Juriſdiction of the Parliament only, and ought not to be determined by any inferior Court. 1674. 26 Car. II.

To this it was anſwered, That the Right of Election was not called in Queſtion: That was determined by the Houſe of Commons: This Action was in Purſuance of that Deciſion, and grounded upon it; and there are ſeveral Caſes that concern the Parliament, that the Judges of Weſtminſter-Hall have not at all Times taken Cognizance of; as what is a good Seſſion of Parliament, and what makes a Seſſion; whether Acts of Parliament are in Force, or not; and when the Members are entitled to Privilege.

And here, taking an Opportunity to enquire into their Juriſdiction, Sir Robert Atkyns mentioned the Opinion of Sir Robert Cotton, who affirms, That Writs of Summons for Knights of the Shire to ſerve in Parliament began in the 49th Year of Hen. III. and that the admitting Commoners into Parliament was done with a Deſign of leſſening and curbing the Power of the Lords, after the Defeat of the Earl of Leiceſter, and the Barons, at the Battle of Eveſham. To confirm which Opinion, it was obſerved, That the firſt Writ to the Sheriffs to ſummon Knights from every Shire, was found upon Record in the Cloſe Roll, 49 Hen. III. the very ſame Year: And Mr. Prynne, in his Preface to Sir Robert Cotton's Abridgment of the Records, ſays, The King and Lords were antiently Judges of the Legality of Elections of Members of the Houſe of Commons, even till the Time King Henry VII.

But (adds Sir Robert Atkyns,) We know that the Houſe of Commons is now poſſeſſed of the Juriſdiction of determining all Queſtions, concerning the Election of their own Members, ſo far, at leaſt, as concerned their being admitted or excluded from ſitting there: And here the Plaintiff ſhews the Determination of the Commons to be on his Side; and not only alledges that he was duly elected, but ſo returned by the Defendant himſelf: And that, though he were ſome time hindered from ſitting, on Occaſion of the falſe Return, and the Election brought into Queſtion by it, yet had he proved it clearly to the Houſe, and was admitted; and, taking it for granted that he was duly elected, he ſued in the King's Bench by this Action, to recover Damages for the Injury done him by the Defendant; for which the Houſe of Commons could not help him, having no Juriſdiction for that Purpoſe: They are not empowered to adminiſter an Oath, or give Damages.

3. It is objected, in the third Place, That this is an Action of a new Invention: Never any ſuch was brought before, unleſs that of Nevil againſt Stroud, which never received any Determination.

To which it was anſwered, That this was new indeed in the particular Circumſtances, as being brought for a malicious, double Return; but it was not new in the general Nature of the Action: For nothing was more common than Actions upon the Caſe where an Injury was done, and Damages ſuſtained; and Actions on the

1674. 26 Car. II.

the Caſe had been brought even againſt Sheriffs, for falſe Returns, in leſſer Matters; and that, where there was no Malice, or any of the aggravating Circumſtances that were in this Caſe particularly: Actions have been brought againſt Sheriffs for returning Juries inſufficient to pay Iſſues, and for not warning a Man in due Time, upon a Writ of Præmunire, or Attachment, whereby he ſuſtained Damage: Though this was but a bare Neglect, or Omiſſion, the loweſt of all Injuries; and yet, being accompanied with a particular Damage to the Party, and there was no Malice on the Sheriff's Part, it was held the Action would lie; much more ſhall the Action lie againſt the Sheriff in this Caſe, where the Return is not only falſe, but he knew it to be falſe; and did it maliciouſly, with a Purpoſe to hinder the Plaintiff from ſitting, and to put him to Expence; and the Plaintiff had actually received conſiderable Damages.

Caſes omitted and new, do often preſent themſelves; but every new Caſe does not require a new Law; for then the Legiſlative Power muſt be exerciſed continually: Though it differs from former Caſes in Circumſtances, it may fall under a general Rule, and be proceeded upon by Parity of Reaſon. Till of late Years Sheriffs have given no Occaſion for the like Action: We find no double Returns in antient Times: The Common Law complies with, and conforms to, the general Opinion and Genius of the Kingdom, and values what they generally eſteem and value, and diſeſteems what they value not.

Heretofore an Election to ſerve in Parliament was not ſo deſirable, and ſo much ſought after as it is now. A Patent of Exemption was granted, 42 Ed. I. to the Town of Torrington, on the Petition of the Inhabitants; reciting, that the Men of that Town never uſed to ſend Burgeſſes to Parliament, till the Sheriff, 21 Ed. I. ſummonitos fuiſſe malitioſe retornavit: So that (ſays Sir Robert Atkyns) a malicious Return to Parliament was no new Thing; and, as the Plaintiff in this Action had well ſued the Sheriff, for returning another with him, ſo he made no Doubt, as the Caſe then ſtood with the general Humour and Opinion of the People, thoſe of Torrington might have had their Remedy againſt the then Sheriff, for returning them ſummoned: The Law was ſtill the ſame, in that it ſtill ſet a Price and Eſteem upon that which the People generally eſteemed and valued.

4. The fourth Objection was, That there was not one Caſe in Law parallel to this, for a Sheriff to be ſued for returning the whole Truth, and ſomething more than the Truth; though Actions for falſe Returns were frequent.

To this it was anſwered, That this Action was for a falſe Return, and ſomething more. The Plaintiff alledges, That he did make a falſe Return, and the Jury having found it ſo, it muſt be believed. Though the Sheriff returned the whole Truth; yet, with that Truth he returned a Falſhood, and, till it was examined, it could not appear which was the Truth; and, in the mean Time, the Plaintiff ſuſtained all his Damage.

5. It was objected, That the Sheriff herein acted as a Judge; and therefore, if he erred, he was not to be ſued for it.

1674. 26 Car. II.

The Anſwer to which was, That this was true, where one was a Judge of Record; but here, the Sheriff was no more than an Officer appointed to take the Poll.

Object. 6. The Statute, 23 Hen. VI. Cap. 15. hath provided a Remedy againſt the Sheriff for Abuſes committed by him at Elections; and particularly, gives 100 l. to the Knight injured: And the Preamble of that Act, reciting, that a convenient Remedy for the Party grieved, was not ordained in the former Statutes, it was inferred from thence, that there was no Remedy for the Party grieved, at Common Law, before that Statute. To this it was anſwered, that they had already ſhewn that there was a Remedy at Common Law, before that Statute; and this Statute, being in the Affirmative, did not take it away, only gave another Remedy: And they put ſome Caſes, where Acts of Parliament had given Remedies; and yet there were other Remedies before, at Common Law, and the Party might ſue for either. Roll. Abr. 1 Part, Fol. 93. Caſe 20.

Arguments for reverſing the Judgment.

The Lord Chief Juſtice North, who argued for the reverſing the Judgment given againſt the Sheriff, took the following Method.

1. He endeavoured to remove the Prejudices the Caſe lay under:

2. Gave his Reaſons againſt the Action: And,

3. He conſidered what had been ſaid on the other Side, to maintain the Action.

1. He endeavoured to remove that Prejudice, That, becauſe an Action lay for the falſe Returns of Sheriffs, therefore it ought to lie in this Caſe; for, he obſerved, there were ſeveral material Differences between ordinary Returns, and this Caſe: In ordinary Returns, the Party is concluded, and without Remedy: In ordinary Caſes, the Sheriff may, and often does, take Security of the Plaintiff; or the Sheriff hath Means to ſecure himſelf by Law.

But, in this Caſe the Party is not concluded; for, upon a Petition to the Parliament, they may cauſe the Return to be altered: Nor may the Sheriff take Security of the Parties: This would be criminal in him: Nor can the Sheriff make a fruitleſs Return, or obtain the leaſt Delay to conſult his Safety. Theſe Differences are of that Nature, that they change the Caſe; and no Man can infer, becauſe an Action lies for falſe Returns in ordinary Caſes, therefore it lies in Caſe of a Return to Parliament.

2. He gave his Reaſons againſt this Action.

1. Becauſe the Sheriff, as to the declaring the Majority, was Judge; and no Action would lie againſt a Judge, for what he did judicially. There are many Qualifications, of which the Sheriff is Judge in this Caſe; as 1. Whether the Elector have forty Shillings per Annum. 2. Whether it be Freehold. 3. Whether he have it by a fraudulent Gift, only to get a Vote. 4. Whether the Candidate be reſident. And, 5. of many Incapacities, ſuch as Bribery, Force, &c. Such Queſtions frequently ariſe, and are of ſuch Difficulty ſometimes, that a Committee determines one Way, and the Houſe another: And, though it be objected, that the Sheriff may give an Oath concerning all Qualifications, and is to look no further; he anſwered, the Statute had, indeed, given the Sheriff Power to adminiſter an Oath; but, the Statute did not ſay, that whoever took that Oath, ſhould have a Voice; neither did the Statute of 23 Hen. VI. ſay, that the Sheriff ſhall not be charged with a falſe Return, that purſues this Way: If it ſhould be known to the Sheriff, that the Man, taking ſuch an Oath, ſwears falſe, the Sheriff muſt determine, according to his own Judgment, and not by what is ſworn: Concluding, that the Sheriff, therefore, as to declaring the Majority, was Judge; and, that there was the ſame Reaſon he ſhould be free from ſuch Actions, as any Judge in Weſtminſter-Hall.

It ought to be conſidered, alſo, what Diſadvantages a Sheriff lies under; what a Noiſe and Crowd there uſually is at ſuch Elections; what Importunity; nay, what Violence he ſuffers ſometimes, from the contending Parties: No other Judge had more need of Courage and Reſolution to determine uprightly: No other Judge determined in Caſes of greater Conſequence to the Publick, or greater Difficulty; and, ſhould he be expoſed to ſuch Actions, he would have Trouble enough. Let him return never ſo uprightly, the Party that is rejected will revenge it by a Suit, eſpecially if he may ſue at Common Law, to have boundleſs Damages, without running any Hazard to himſelf, but the Loſs of his Coſts.

2. His ſecond Reaſon againſt the Action, was, That it belonged to the Houſe of Commons, to examine both the Right of Election, and the Behaviour of the Sheriff: That theſe were incident; and, indeed, the only Conſiderations that could guide them in the Trial of ſuch Cauſes, if they were allowed: As it was admitted, that the Parliament was the only proper Judicature to determine the Right of Election, and cenſure the Behaviour of the Sheriff: How could the Common Law try a Cauſe, that could not determine thoſe Things, without which the Cauſe could not be tried?

No Action upon the Caſe will lie for a Breach of Truſt, becauſe the Determination of the principal Thing, The Truſt, does not belong to the Common Law, but to the Court of Chancery; and the Reaſon of this Caſe is as much ſtronger, as the Parliament ought to have more Regard paid to it, than the Court of Chancery.

They objected, indeed, that this Caſe might be tried after the Parliament had decided the Election; for then, what the Common Law could not try, was determined; and, as the Parliament could not give the Plaintiff the Coſts he was put to, theſe were to be recovered at Common Law.

Thus they would have the Determination of the Parliament, binding to the Sheriff, which could not be; for that Diſpute was between other Parties, and the Sheriff was not called to anſwer for himſelf; and it was againſt Law that any Judgment or Proceeding betwixt other Parties, ſhould bind the Intereſt of a third Perſon, or any Way conclude him. It was not fit that the Sheriff, who was not admitted to controvert their Determination, ſhould be concluded by it, and an Action brought upon it to make him pay the Reckoning: Had the Parliament believed, when they determined this Election, that they paſſed Sentence againſt the Sheriff to pay 800 l. they would, and ought in Juſtice, to have heard his Defence, before they determined it: For, had he been allowed to defend himſelf, he might have ſhewn a Majority, or an Equality of Voices; but, as he was not heard, ſo was he not ſo much as cenſured in that Diſpute. 1674. 26Car. II.

Nor does it follow that, becauſe the Parliament cannot give Coſts, therefore this new deviſed Action muſt lie, to help the Party to them; for then ſuch an Action muſt lie wherever a Wrong is to be remedied by Courſe of Law, and no Coſts are given for it.

At Common Law, no Coſts were given in any Caſe; and many Caſes remain at this Day, where the Statutes have given no Coſts; and yet no Actions will lie to recover thoſe Coſts. Beſides, the Parliament have had this Matter under Conſideration, as appears by the Statute 23 Hen. VI. and have appointed what ſhall be paid by the Sheriff that offends, (viz) 100 l. to the Party, and 100 l. to the King, beſides a Year's Impriſonment. The Parliament have ſtated what ſhall be paid for Compenſation, and what for Puniſhment; and would have provided for Coſts if they had thought fit.

3. His third Reaſon againſt this Action, was, becauſe a double Return was a lawful Means for the Sheriff to perform his Duty in doubtful Caſes; and, if ſo, all the Aggravations of falſo malitioſe & ſcienter, will not make the Thing actionable; for, whatever a Man may do for his Safety, cannot be the Ground of an Action.

If the Parliament did not allow a double Return, in doubtful Caſes, they ought never to accept a double Return; but this muſt of Neceſſity be the Courſe in doubtful Caſes: For, ſuppoſe the Election to be equal, or that the Election is void for Force, if the Sheriff doubts of the Validity of ſome Voices, ſhall he tranſmit his Doubts ſpecially to the Parliament? Was there ever any ſuch Thing done? Was there ever any other Way but to make a double Return, and fairly leave it to the Deciſion of the Parliament?

The Practice has been hitherto, to receive double Returns; and in this very Caſe the double Return was accepted, and the Sheriff no Way puniſhed for it, as he would, and ought to have been, if he had been blameable: And, as double Returns are accepted, and allowed by Parliament, they muſt be lawful; and, if ſo, this Action is not maintainable.

4. A fourth Reaſon againſt this Action, was, that there were no legal Damages occaſioned by the Sheriff: The Damages laid in the Declaration, are, 1. The being kept out of the Houſe. 2. The Pains and Charges the Plaintiff was put to, to get Admittance into the Houſe. But his being kept out of the Houſe is as much every Man's Damage, as the Plaintiff's; and, conſequently, neither he nor any particular Man can have an Action for it, except where a ſpecial Loſs is occaſioned by it, and here is no Loſs to the Plaintiff: For to ſit in Parliament is a Service in the Member, for the Benefit of the King and Kingdom, and not for the particular Profit of the Member: For which Reaſon the Statute of of 23 Hen. VI. does not give the Action to the Party for his particular Damage; but the Action given is a popular Action, only the Party grieved hath a Preference for six Months: But, if he does not sue within that Time, every Man else is at Liberty to recover the same Sum. 2. And as to the Pains and Charges he was put to, this was not occasioned by the Sheriff, but by the Deliberation of the House; and why should the Sheriff pay for that? It was a Course taken by the Parliament, for their own Satisfaction, and they found no Fault with the Sheriff for putting them to that Trouble. Had Sir Samuel Barnardiston been returned alone, and the Lord Huntingtowre had petitioned against that Return, there had been the same Charge to have defended that Return; so that it was the Contest of the opposite Party that occasioned the Charge, the Deliberation of the Parliament that occasioned the Delay; but neither of them can be imputed to the Sheriff.

There is no Difference between this Case, and that of bringing an Action against a Jury, for maliciously, knowingly, and on Purpose to put the Party to Charges, finding a Matter specially, whereby great Delay, and great Expences happened, before the Party could obtain Judgment; and yet no Man will affirm that an Action lies in that Case.

Besides, in this Case the Damages are found entire; and if both Parts, (viz.) the not sitting in the House, and the Pains and Charges, are not both actionable Causes, the Judgment is for that Cause erroneous. It is to be presumed, the Wages of Parliament will not be mentioned for Damages; for, in most Places, they are only imaginary; but if there were to be any Consideration of them that would not alter the Case, for they were due as from the first Day, and so no Damage can be pretended on that Score.

5. A fifth Reason against this Action, is drawn from the Statute of 23 Hen. VI. It is admitted that, if an Action lay at Common Law, this Statute hath not taken it away, there being no Negative Words in it; but it is not likely the Parliament would have made that Law, if there had been a Remedy for the Party before: If the Courts of Justice had by the Common Law, Jurisdiction to examine Misdemeanors concerning Returns, what needed the Parliament to have provided Law after Law, to give them Power therein; and, at last, to give the Party grieved an Action? Can any Man imagine, but that the Parliament took the Law to be, that the Party was without Remedy before? It is objected, that in those Times it was reckoned a Damage to be retained to serve in Parliament, which is the Reason that no Man then did bring his Action against the Sheriff for a false Return: But this cannot be true, for the Statute calls him the Party grieved, and provides a Remedy for him; and we see by the many Statutes about those Times, that it was a Mischief very frequent, and there wanted no Occasion for such Actions; which extremely strengthens the Argument, that no such Actions could be brought by the Common Law: By Littleton's Rule it may be concluded, therefore, the Action will not lie, for if it could have lain, it would have been brought before now:

1674. 26 Car. II.

Where a Sheriff mistakes the Person in his Return, he incurrs the Penalty of 23 Hen. VI. though it be without Malice; but the Course of the Parliament prevents his Suffering for this, by sending for the Sheriff, and causing him to amend his Return; and from thenceforth the amended Return is the Sheriff's Return; and there is no Record that can warrant any Action to be brought for a false Return. The Sheriff is secure from any Action that can be brought upon that Occasion; for which Reason there has of late Years been no Recovery upon the Statute, because all Persons chuse rather to compel the Sheriff to amend his Return, that they may be admitted to sit in the House, than to take their Remedy upon the Statute; for no Man can recover on the Statute first, and afterwards have the Return amended: Upon that Statute a Man cannot have a Remedy at Law, and also in Parliament; which seems to be wisely provided, to prevent any Contrariety of Determinations.

6. The sixth Reason against this Action, was, That the Sheriff is not permitted to take Security to save himself harmless in such Cases: And no Case can be put in our Law, where a Man is compelled to judge without Deliberation, and cannot take Security; and yet shall be liable to an Action.

It is objected by the other Side, that here is Malice found by the Verdict, and there can be no Danger or Inconvenience in punishing Malice: But Malice, upon which they would have the Scales turn in this Place, is not a Thing demonstrative, but interpretative, and lies in Opinion, and may give a Handle to any Man, to punish another by: This very Case shews that a good Man may reasonably be afraid of the Event of his Defence in such a Case; for, though the Matter went through a strict Examination in Parliament, it was, at last, decided but by a few Voices, and no Observation made of the Sheriff's Miscarriage there, though it appeared upon the Trial, that the Sheriff was guided by the Advice of his Friends, of Counsel, and of Parliament Men, who told him the only safe Course was to make a double Return; yet the Jury condemned him to pay 800 l. against the Expectation of the Court of King's-Bench. The Judges declaring publickly, that they could not have given such a Verdict, they bould not concur with the Jury in their Opinion: The Words falso & malitiose, were grown Words of Course, and put into every Action; Juries many Times had no Regard to them; and if they should make the Words falso & malitiose support an Action without a fit Subject Matter, all the Actions of Mankind would be liable to Suit and Vexation.

As to what is urged on the other Side, That where Falsity, Malice, and Damage do concur, there must be a Remedy at Law: This is generally true, but not universally; it does not hold in the Case of a Judge, of an Indictor, or a Witness, nor of Words that import no legal Slander, though they may bring Damage; and the Reasons that exempt those Cases from the general Rule, have the same Force in this.

The Judges have sometimes permitted a new kind of Action: But it has ever been upon great Deliberation, and where a general Convenience required it: The Common Law (it has been said)

complies

complies with the Genius of the Nation. I do not underſtand the Argument: Does the Common Law change? Are we to judge of the Changes of the Genius of the Nation? Whither may general Notions carry us at this Rate? For my Part, I think, though the Common Law be not written, yet it is certain, and not arbitrary: We are ſworn to obſerve the Laws as they are, and I ſee not how we can change them by our Judgments. As to the Genius of the Nation, that is moſt proper to be conſidered of by the Parliament, who have the Power of altering the Laws.

In the Caſe at Bar, I look upon the Sheriff as a particular Officer of the Parliament, for the managing Elections, and as if he were not Sheriff: I look upon the Writ, as if it were an Order of Parliament, and had not the Name of a Writ: I look upon the Courſe of Parliament, which we pretend not to know, to be incident to the Conſideration of it: So that it ſtands not upon the general Notion of Remedy in the common Courſe of Juſtice. My Brother Maynard indeed tells us, We are not to think the Caſe too hard for us, becauſe of the Name of Courſe of Parliament: For Judges have puniſhed Abſentees from Parliament; they have determined what is a Parliament, what is an Act of Parliament, how long an Ordinance of Parliament ſhall continue, and may puniſh Treſpaſſes done in the very Parliament; which I ſhall not diſpute: But ſince I cannot find, that Courts of Juſtice have, at any Time, meddled with Caſes of this Nature, but upon expreſs Power given them by Acts of Parliament, I cannot conſent to this Precedent: I am confident, when there is Occaſion, the Parliament will diſcern it, and make Laws to enlarge our Power; and I ſee no Harm in the mean Time, if Sheriffs ſhould be ſafe from this new deviſed Action, which they call the Common Law: If they miſdemean themſelves, they are anſwerable to the Parliament, whoſe Officers they be; or may be puniſhed by the Statutes made for regulating Elections: I conclude therefore, that the Judgment was not warranted by the Rules of Law; that it introduced Novelties of dangerous Conſequence, and therefore ought to be reverſed.

The Judgment of the King's-Bench, as has been intimated already, was accordingly reverſed in the Exchequer-Chamber; and when Sir Samuel Barnardiſton brought his Writ of Error in the Houſe of Peers, Anno 1689, to reverſe the Reverſal of the Judgment given in the Exchequer, the Houſe of Peers confirmed the Reverſal of the ſaid Judgment.

Five Lords only entred their Diſſent, for the following Reaſons.

Proteſt of ſome Lords, on the confirming the Judgment by the Peers.

1. Becauſe they apprehended it was a denying Sir Samuel Barnardiſton the Benefit of Law, which gives Relief in all Wrong and Injury: And though this be an Action of the firſt Impreſſion, yet there being a Damage to the Plaintiff, the Common Law gives him this Action to repair himſelf; and if it were not ſo, there would be a Failure of Juſtice, which cannot be admitted.

2. Becauſe the allowing this Reverſal tends to the giving Power and Encouragement to Sheriffs to make falſe and double Returns, by which Means the Right of Elections will be avoided, which tends to the packing of a Houſe of Commons, and may overturn the whole Frame of Government, and eſtabliſh what Religion and Government a packed Parliament think fit. 1674. 26 Car. Bolton. S. Stamford.

This Action was promoted by the whole Poſſe of Whigs, who had ſuch an Influence on Jurymen, in and about the City of London, in thoſe Days, that they could get what Verdicts they pleaſed; and if they had carried this Point, they apprehended, no Sheriff would have dared, for the future, to refuſe returning their Friends, where the Election was doubtful: And though, as the Laws then ſtood, it was the Opinion of the Judges, and of the Houſe of Peers afterwards, that the Sheriff was not liable to an Action on the Caſe for Damages, on making a falſe or double Return; yet the Statute of 7 and 8 W. III. cap. 7. hath ſince given the Party wronged double Damages, with Coſts of Suit, to be recovered in the Courts of Law, where a Sheriff, or other returning Officers, ſhall make a falſe or double Return. Remarks on the Trial between Barnardiſton and Soame.

Double Damages given on a falſe or double Return.

This Statute declares, That all falſe Returns made of a Member to ſerve in Parliament, are againſt Law; and if any Perſon ſhall return a Member to ſerve in Parliament, contrary to the Determination in the Houſe of Commons of the Right of Election, ſuch Return ſhall be adjudged a falſe Return, and the Party grieved (viz.) The Party duly elected) by ſuch falſe Return, may ſue the Officers and Perſons making or procuring the ſame or any of them, at his Election, in any Court of Record, at Weſtminſter-Hall, and ſhall recover double Damages, with Coſts of Suit.

If any Officer ſhall wilfully, falſly, and maliciouſly return more Perſons than are required to be choſen by the Writ or Precept, the like Remedy may be had againſt him, and the Party or Parties that procure the ſame, or any of them, by the Party grieved.

All Contracts, Promiſes, Bonds, and Securities, to be given to procure the Return of any Member to ſerve in Parliament, ſhall be adjudged void: And whoever makes ſuch Contract, or gives any Gift or Reward to procure ſuch falſe or double Return, ſhall forfeit 300 l. one third to the King, another to the Poor of the Place, and the other to the Informer, with Coſts of Suit.

All Actions upon this Statute to be brought within two Years after Cauſe.

The Copy of the Clerk of the Crown's Book to be Evidence of a falſe or double Return.

An Action brought by a Member for Damages; miſlaid.

In the fifth Year of Queen Anne, one brought an Action on the Caſe, and declared he was elected Member of Parliament for a certain Borough, purſuant to the Queen's Writ, &c. and that the Defendant returned two other Perſons to be elected: And that he, the Plaintiff, petitioned the Houſe, and was adjudged by them to be duly elected, and his Name ordered to be inſerted in the Return, and the Name of another to be raſed. After Verdict for the Plaintiff on Not Guilty, the Defendant moved in Arreſt of Judgment

1674. 26 Car. II.

Judgment, That there was no Cauſe of Action, for it appeared, the Plaintiff had the Effect of his Election: He was returned and had his Place; there was nothing wanting, wherein he could pretend himſelf injured, but the Coſts he had been at; and as to them, it ought to be ſuppoſed, the Houſe conſidered them: And as the Plaintiff endeavoured to ſupport his Action by the aforeſaid Statute of 7 and 8 William III. Sir Thomas Parker argued for the Defendant, That the Declaration could not be taken to be founded on that Statute, becauſe the Fact was not laid agreeable to it, nor was it ſuch an Action as was intended by the Statute; for Firſt, an Action grounded on a general Prohibition of a Statute, ought not to be for the Party only, but for the Crown and the Party, a Fine being due to the Queen for the Breach of the Statute, as well as Satisfaction to the Party injured. 1674. 26 Car II.

Per Curiam, Where a Statute introduces a new Law, by giving an Action where there was none before, or by giving a new Action in an old Caſe, the Plaintiff need not conclude, contra formam Statuti; but if a Statute gives the ſaid Action, with the Difference of ſome Circumſtances, as double Damages, (as this Statute does) the Plaintiff muſt either conclude, contra formam Statuti, or make his Caſe ſo particularly within the Statute, that it may appear to be ſo; and becauſe he had not done it in this Caſe, Judgment was given for the Defendant. Coudell v. John Hill, 5 Annæ B. R. 2 Salk. 504. 505.

1675. 27 Car. II. Shirley & Fagg.

Debates and Reſolutions of the Houſe of Lords and Commons, concerning their reſpective Privileges, in the Caſe of SHIRLEY and FAGG, &c. 1675. 27 Car. II. 1675 27 Car II.

THE Editor of theſe Proceedings has given us a Tranſcript of the Votes of the Houſe of Commons and their Journals, in relation to this Affair, with which he has filled a dozen Folio Pages. I ſhall not tire my Readers with Matters of Form, but give them ſuch a State of the Caſe, as I apprehend moſt acceptable to them.

The Caſe, a Conteſt between the two Houſes concerning their Privileges.

Doctor Thomas Shirley having brought an Appeal in the Houſe of Peers, againſt a Decree of the Court of Chancery, in Favour of Sir John Fagg, a Member of the Houſe of Commons; the Commons ordered Doctor Shirley to be taken into the Cuſtody of their Serjeant at Arms, for Breach of Privilege; with which the Deputy Serjeant acquainted the Doctor in the Inner Lobby of the Houſe of Lords: This occaſioning ſome Diſturbance at the Door of the Houſe of Peers, the Lord Mohun, being acquainted with the Matter, forcibly took the Warrant from the Deputy Serjeant, and Doctor Shirley made his Eſcape.

The Commons, being acquainted with this Tranſaction, ſent to demand Juſtice of the Houſe of Peers againſt the Lord Mohun; but were anſwered, That that Lord had done nothing but his Duty: Whereupon the Commons reſolved, That whoever ſhould appear at the Bar of the Houſe of Lords, to proſecute a Suit againſt any Member of the Lower Houſe, ſhould be deemed an Infringer of the Privileges of Parliament. On the other Hand the Houſe of Peers reſolved, That it was the undoubted Right of the Lords in Judicature, to determine, in Time of Parliament, Appeals from inferiour Courts, though the Members of either Houſe were concerned, that there might not be a Failure of Juſtice.

The Commons perſiſted, That it was an undoubted Right of their Houſe, that none of their Members be ſummoned to attend the Lords; and afterwards proceeded to that unprecedented Reſolution, That there lay no Appeal to the Juriſdiction of the Lords in Parliament, from Courts of Equity; and took into Cuſtody Serjeant Pemberton, and the reſt of the Lawyers, who were Counſel in the Cauſe, and ſent them to the Tower, with their own Member Sir John Fagg, for ſubmitting to the Orders of the Houſe of Peers. The Counſel impriſoned by the Commons.

At a Conference of both Houſes on this Difference, the Lords inſiſted, That the Order of the Commons for impriſoning the Lawyers, was illegal and arbitrary, and an Indignity offered to the King, in that his higheſt Court of Juſtice, the laſt Reſort in all Cauſes; that it was an Uſurpation, and a Breach of the Privileges of the Peers, to have their Orders controverted and obſtructed by the Lower Houſe, who were no Court, and had not Authority to adminiſter an Oath: That it was an Invaſion of the Subjects Liberties, and a Breach of Magna Charta, to impriſon, or reſtrain any Perſon of his Liberty, but by due Proceſs of Law: That their Lordſhips therefore had ſet at Liberty the ſaid Counſellors, and prohibited the Lieutenant of the Tower, and other Keepers of Priſons, and all other Perſons, to detain and moleſt them. Set at Liberty by the Lords.

The Commons anſwered, That it was no Indignity to his Majeſty, for the Commons to puniſh a Commoner by Impriſonment, who violated their Privileges; that their Lordſhips claiming to be the ſupreme Court, and aſſerting his Majeſty to be higheſt in that Court of Judicature, was a Diminution of the King's Dignity, who was higheſt in his Royal Eſtate, in full Parliament: That their Lordſhips alſo did highly intrench on the Rights and Pri-

1675. 27 Car II. vileges of the Houſe of Commons, by denying them to be a Court, or to have any Authority or Power of Judicature, which, if admitted, would leave them without any Power or Authority to preſerve themſelves: And as to their having violated Magna Charta, &c. neither the great Charter, or any other Law, took away the Laws and Cuſtoms of either Houſe of Parliament; nor could the Commons find by Magna Charta, or any other Law, or antient Cuſtoms of Parliament, that their Lordſhips had any Juriſdiction, in Caſes of Appeals from the Courts of Equity; and that the Enlargement of thoſe Perſons, impriſoned by the Order of the Houſe of Commons, and the threatning all Officers and other Perſons, who ſhould impriſon or detain them, was a Breach of the Privileges of the Houſe of Commons; and therefore they had cauſed the ſaid Counſellors, &c. to be retaken by their Serjeant at Arms, and committed to the Tower.

The Counſel recommitted by the Commons.

The King finding theſe Diſputes run very high, ordered both Houſes to attend him at Whitehall, and in his Speech told them, He was ſorry their Enemies had found Means to create theſe Diviſions among them: That he thought the beſt Means of compoſing theſe Differences, would be by free Conferences, where they might convince each other by their Reaſons, or enable him to judge rightly of their Differences; but he was determined not to ſuffer theſe Diſputes to grow to Diſorders; nor, while they were debating about their Priviledges, permit his own to be invaded.

The King's Speech to the Houſes on this Conteſt.

The Lords afterwards ſent the Uſher of the Black Rod to the Tower, to demand the four Lawyers; and Sir John Robinſon the Governour refuſing to releaſe them, they addreſſed the King to remove him from that Poſt; but his Majeſty anſwered, He had conſidered the Circumſtances of the Matter, and was not ſatisfied how he could with Juſtice remove him.

The Governor of the Tower refuſes to releaſe the Counſel

The Lieutenant of the Tower was afterwards ſerved with Writs of Habeas Corpus, to bring the four Lawyers before the King and Parliament: On the contrary, the Commons promiſed the Lieutenant their Protection; and reſolved, That no Commoner, commited by them for Breach of Privilege, ought by Habeas Corpus, or any Authority whatſoever, to be brought before the Houſe of Peers; and that the Order of the Peers, for iſſuing out the Writs of Habeas Corpus, was illegal. Whereupon his Majeſty, finding there was no Probability of ſeeing the Diſpute ended amicably, came to the Houſe the 9th of June, and prorogued the Parliament to the 13th of October; and then the Priſoners were releaſed of Courſe.

The Commons protect him in it.

The Parliament prorogued.

The Parliament meeting again, in purſuance of their Prorogation, the 13th of October, the King made a Speech to both Houſes, wherein he ſaid, He was more than uſually concerned for the Event of that Seſſions; he did not deſire to remember the Cauſes of the late Prorogation, and hoped nobody elſe would, unleſs to learn from thence, how to avoid the like Occaſions of Debate; deſired they would conſider how fatal the Conſequence might be, and how little Benefit was like to redound to the People by it. 1675. 27 Car II.

Another Speech of the King's on this Occaſion.

However the Diſpute between the two Houſes, in the Caſe of Shirley and Fagg, was again revived this Seſſion; for Shirley having continued his Proceſs, the Commons again voted it a Breach of Privilege, and ordered Fagg to make no Defence at the Lord's Bar; and having agreed to a Conference with the Lords on this Subject; the 19th of November they delivered their Lordſhips a Paper to the following Tenor (viz.) That the King having recommended to them the avoiding this Difference, and if that could not be prevented, to defer the Debate till the publick Bills, for the Good and Safety of the Kingdom, were perfected; the Commons thought it a great Misfortune, that, contrary to that excellent Advice, a Day had been appointed by the Lords, for hearing the Cauſe between Shirley and Fagg, and propoſed the putting off that Matter for a ſhort Time; to which their Lordſhips ſhewing no Inclination, the Commons the next Day reſolved, That whoever ſhould proſecute an Appeal before the Lords, againſt any Commoner, from any Court of Equity, ſhould be deemed a Betrayer of the Rights and Privileges of the Commons of England, and be proceeded againſt accordingly; and ordered this Reſolution to be poſted up in the Lobby, Weſtminſter-Hall, and other publick Places: Whereupon the Lords reſolved, That the Paper poſted up againſt the Judicature of the Houſe of Peers, was illegal, unparliamentary, and tending to the Diſſolution of the Government; and ſeveral violent Speeches were made in the Houſe of Lords, particularly by the Earl of Shaftesbury, who declared, "That THEIR ALL WAS AT STAKE; that though he had all the Duty imaginable for his Majeſty, and ſhould give Way to any Thing almoſt, that he ſhould think of Importance to his Affairs; yet, in this Caſe, it being to alter the Conſtitution of the Government, which was not only their Lordſhip's Concern, but the Concern of the pooreſt Man in the Kingdom, he would be bold to ſay, The King could give none of them a Recompence for it.

1675. 27 Car II.

The Diſpute reviewed.

The Earl of Shaftesbury's Speech on this Occaſion.

"What are empty Titles? What is preſent Power, to a great Eſtate, wherein I have no Property fixed? It is the maintaining the Conſtitution of the Government, that ſecures your Lordſhips, and every Man elſe, in what he hath. The greateſt Title, with the greateſt preſent Power and Riches, is but a mean Creature, and maintains thoſe in abſolute Monarchies, no otherwiſe than by ſervile or low Flatteries, and upon uncertain Terms. My Lords, would you be in Favour with the King? It is a very ill Way to it, to put yourſelves out of a Capacity to be conſiderable in his Service. I do not find in Story, or in modern Experience, but that it is better, and a Man is much more regarded, that is ſtill in a Capacity to ſerve his Prince and Country, than he that hath wholly deprived himſelf of All, for his Prince's Service: I do therefore

1675. 27 Car. II.

" fore declare, that I will ſerve my Prince " as a Peer, and will not deſtroy my Peerage " to ſerve him.

This Speech inflamed the Houſe of Peers to that Degree, that it was moved on the ſudden to addreſs his Majeſty to diſſolve the Parliament, and call another (the very point Lord Shaftesbury aimed at); and being put to the Vote, it was carried in the Negative, only by two Voices (50 againſt 48): However the King, finding it impoſſible to accommodate the Differences between the two Houſes, prorogued the Parliament on the twenty ſecond of November, to the fifteenth of February come twelve Months, that they might have time to cool before another Seſſion.

I ſhall conclude this Affair with the Proteſt of thoſe Lords who were for addreſſing the King to diſſolve the Parliament; for which they gave theſe Reaſons:

Proteſt of the Lords, who were for diſſolving the Parliament.

1. We conceive that it is according to the antient Laws and Statutes of this Realm, that there ſhould be frequent and New Parliaments.

2. It ſeems not reaſonable that any particular Number of Men ſhould, for many Years, engroſs ſo great a Truſt of the People as to be their Repreſentatives in the Houſe of Commons; and all the other Gentry and Members of Corporations of the ſame Degree and Quality, ſhould be ſo long excluded. Neither is it advantageous to the Government, that the Counties, Cities and Boroughs, ſhould be confined for ſo long a Time to ſuch Members; the mutual Correſpondence and Intereſts of thoſe who chuſe and are choſen, admitting of great Variations in length of Time.

1675. 27 Car II.

3. The long Continuance of ſuch as are entruſted for others, and who have ſo great a Power over the Purſe of the Nation, muſt naturally endanger the producing Factions and Parties, and the carrying on of particular Intereſts and Deſigns, rather than the Publick Good.

And we are the more deſirous of ſuch an Addreſs, on account of this unhappy Breach between the two Houſes, for which the Houſe of Peers have not given the leaſt Occaſion, having done nothing but what their Anceſtors and Predeceſſors have done, and what is according to their Duty, and for the Intereſt of the People: And it is in our Opinion become altogether impracticable for the two Houſes, as the Caſe ſtands, jointly to purſue thoſe great and good Ends for which they were called.

Signed by Buckingham, Shaftesbury, and twenty more.

The Caſe of FRANCIS JENKES, committed to the Gatehouſe by the Privy Council, for ſeditious Words, 28 June, 1676. 27 Car. II.

1676. 27 Car. II.

Jenkes's Caſe.

THIS is no more than the Complaint of Francis Jenkes, and his Friends, for his being committed by the Privy Council, for Words the Bretheren apprehended to be innocent, and his not being admitted to Bail ſo ſoon as he expected; in which Relation (told by themſelves) no doubt, they have been partial enough. The Fact for which he was committed appears by the following Warrant (as recited by them.)

The Warrant for his Commitment.

" Whereas it appears to his Majeſty in " Council, by the Examination of Sir Thomas Gold and Sir John Shorter, Knights, " Sheriffs of the City of London; John Wells, " Common-Crier of the ſaid City, and John Green, one of the Attornies of the Lord-" Mayor's Court, taken upon Oath before " the Lord Chief Juſtice Rainsford, That " Francis Jenkes, of the ſaid City, Linnen-" Draper, did, on the 24th of this inſtant " June, at a Common Hall then aſſembled " at the Guild-hall of the ſaid City, for " chuſing Officers for the enſuing Year, in " a moſt ſeditious and mutinous manner, " openly move and ſtir the Perſons then " preſent, that before they did go on to " the Choice of new Officers (which was the " only occaſion of that Aſſembly) they " ſhould go to the Lord Mayor, and deſire " him to call a Common Council that might " make an Addreſs to his Majeſty, in the " Name of the City, to call a new Parliament. And whereas the ſaid Francis Jenkes " being now called in, and heard before his " Majeſty in Council, was ſo far from denying, or extenuating his Offence, that he " did, in a preſumptuous and arrogant Manner, endeavour to juſtify the ſame:

" Theſe are therefore to command you, " to take into your Cuſtody the Body of the " ſaid Francis Jenkes, herewith ſent you, and " him to keep ſafely, until he ſhall be " delivered by due Courſe of Law, for which " this ſhall be your Warrant.

Dated at the Council-Chamber at Whitehall the 28th Day of June, 1676, and ſigned by twenty of the Lords of the Privy Council.

Bail deferred.

Mr. Jenkes and his Friends relate, that they attended Mr. Secretary Williamſon with ſufficient Bail the next Day after the Commitment, as they did, afterwards, the Lord Chief Juſtice Rainsford and the Lord Chancellor; but they all gave them dilatory Anſwers.

Then they applied themſelves to the Juſtices of Peace of Weſtminſter, at their Seſſions; who told them there was no Precedent of a Perſon's being bailed by Juſtices of Peace, who were committed by the Privy Council.

They

1676. 27 Car. II.

They applied again to the Lord Chancellor, who told them, A little Submiſſion, in a proper Place, would do, (viz. a Petition to the Council): But they found he had a Mind to come out with a high Hand.

He is, after 2 Months, admitted to bail.

After the Priſoner had lain about two Months in the Gatehouſe, the Council voluntarily admitted him to Bail. I cannot learn there was any further Proſecution againſt him for theſe Miſdemeanors, of ſeditiouſly ſtirring up the Citizens to petition for a Parliament, and his Inſolence to the Privy Council. The Man appears to have been one of Lord Shaftesbury's Faction, and was afterwards tried for a Riot in Guildhall, in the Year 1683, as will appear in a future Trial.

1676. 27 Car. II.

And though it be looked upon by the Brethren, to be ſo great a Piece of Oppreſſion not to bail one immediately, who has been committed for Sedition, and a Contempt of the Privy Council; yet we find no Court or Magiſtrate will bail one committed for a Contempt by the Houſe of Commons: And whether the Privy Council have not as much Law, for committing and detaining ſuch a Perſon in Priſon, as the Commons, may be a Moot-Point.

1677. 29 Car II. Lord Shaftesbury's Caſe.

The Caſe of ANTHONY Earl of SHAFTESBURY, on a Writ of Habeas Corpus, argued in the Court of King's-Bench, the 27th and 29th of June, 1677. Trin. 29 Car. II.

1677. 29 Car. II.

Habeas Corpus, the Return.

THE Earl was brought into Court on the Return of an Alias Habeas Corpus; the Tenor whereof was, That the ſaid Anthony Earl of Shaftesbury was committed to the Tower on the 16th of February, 1676, by Order of the Houſe of Lords, for High Contempts committed againſt that Houſe; to remain in Cuſtody during his Majeſty's Pleaſure, and the Pleaſure of that Houſe.

The Return being filed on the Motion of the Earl's Counſel, they were ordered to attend the Judges and the Attorney-General, with their Exceptions to it; and then the Earl was remanded: And on the 29th the Exceptions to the Return were argued.

Arguments for diſcharging or bailing the Earl.

The Earl's Counſel inſiſted, That the Cauſe of Commitment was inſufficient, becauſe it was too general and uncertain; and cited More 893, Vaughan 140, and 1 Rolls 218. And that the Commitment of the Jurors for acquitting Penn and Mead, contra plenam & manifeſtam evidentiam, was reſolved to be too general; becauſe the Evidence ought to have appeared as certainly to the Judge of the Return, as it appeared before the Judge authorized to commit; and that the Commitment being by the Houſe of Lords made no Difference: This Court had often determined concerning Privilege of Parliament: That if the Parliament was diſſolved, there was no Queſtion but the Priſoner might be diſcharged on a Habeas Corpus; and yet then the Court muſt examine the Cauſe of Commitment, and conſequently might examine a Parliamentary Matter: That the Commitment during the King's Pleaſure, and the Pleaſure of the Houſe alſo, was illegal; becauſe the Priſoner could not apply himſelf in ſuch a Manner as to obtain his Diſcharge.

That though the Houſe of Lords was the Supreme Court, yet their Juriſdiction was limited by Common and Statute Law: That at a Conference held between the Lords and Commons, 3 April, 4 Car. it was agreed, That no Freeman ought to be committed by the King, or Privy Council, or any other (in which the Houſe of Lords were included), unleſs ſome Cauſe of the Commitment were ſet forth; and ſo the Law was declared to be in the Petition of Right.

That where a Subject was reſtrained of his Liberty, this was the proper Court to apply to; and this Court had a Supreme Power, as to this Purpoſe, over all Courts: On a Habeas Corpus iſſuing from hence, the King ought to have an Account of his Subject; and if the Commitment by the Houſe of Lords was illegal, this Court was obliged to diſcharge the Priſoner, as well as if he had been illegally impriſoned by another Court: That the Earl had been impriſoned five Months already; and it was falſe Impriſonment, not only where the Commitment was unjuſt, but where it was of too long a Duration. The Parliament was adjourned; and as the Law was now taken to be, might continue adjourned ten or twenty Years, and make the Impriſonment perpetual: And that this was not an ordinary Adjournment, it being entered on their Journal, that they ſhould not meet at the Day of Adjournment; but be adjourned or prorogued to another Day, if the King did not ſignify his Pleaſure to the contrary by a Proclamation.

Arguments againſt diſcharging or bailing the Earl.

The King's Counſel on the other Side admitted, That if this Commitment had been by an inferior Court, it could not have been maintained; but it being by a Court that was not under the Controul of the King's-Bench, and that Court ſitting at this Time, it was otherwiſe: That this Caſe differed from all others that had been mentioned, in two Circumſtances, 1. The Perſon was a Member of the Houſe by which he was committed. 2. That Court being ſuperior to this, although the Contempt had been particularly expreſſed: And of what Opinion ſoever this Court had been as to the Nature of it, they could could not have diſcharged the Earl, and have taken upon them a Juriſdiction over the Houſe of Peers: That the Words during Pleaſure were no more than what the Law would have ſupplied; and if Judgment was given that one be impriſoned during the King's Pleaſure, his Pleaſure ought to be determined by a Pardon. They urged further, That it would be very inconvenient, if the King's-Bench could, during a Seſſion of Parliament, take Cognizance of the Matter; for then this Court might judge one Way, and the Houſe of Peers another. It had been reſolved by the whole Court, in the the Caſe of Barnardiſton and Soame, that an Action of a double Return could not be brought in the Court of King's-Bench 'till the Commons had determined the Right of Election, leſt there ſhould be different Judgments given in the ſame Caſe: That when a Judgment of the Houſe of Lords came down to that Court, they were obliged to execute it, and could never examine or correct their Judgments: That though Impriſonments for Contempts had been frequent by the one and the other Houſe, no Perſon ſo committed ever ſought his Enlargement in the King's-Bench before. This Court, indeed, was obliged to grant an Habeas Corpus; but it appearing upon the Return, that the Cauſe belonged ad aliud examen, they ought to remand the Party.

1677. 29 Car. II.

The Judges declare they have no Power to bail or diſcharge him, on a Commitment by the Lords, during the Seſſion.

Then Mr. Juſtice Jones delivered his Opinion ſeriatim, That ſuch a Commitment by another Court, would have been ill; but that the Courts of Weſtminſter had never taken Cognizance of Privilege of Parliament, unleſs where it was an Incident to the Caſe before them, which was of their Cognizance: But the direct Point now before them, was a Judgment of the Houſe of Lords, and this Court could not judge of any Law, Cuſtom, or Uſage of Parliament. And as to the Continuance of the Impriſonment, the King might pardon the Contempt under the Great Seal; or diſcharge the Impriſonment under his Privy Seal: He would not ſay what might have been done, if the Seſſions had been determined; but this Court, as the Caſe was, could neither diſcharge or bail the Earl.

1677. 29 Car. II.

Mr. Juſtice Wild alſo delivered his Opinion, That they could not meddle with the Tranſactions of the Houſe of Peers during a Seſſion of Parliament, which was not determined; and therefore the Certainty or Uncertainty of the Return was not material; but if the Seſſion had been determined, his Opinion would have been, the Earl ought to be diſcharged.

Sir Richard Rainsford declared, That this Commitment was an Execution of a Judgment given by the Lords for a Contempt; and that, if he ſhould be bailed, he would be delivered out of Execution; and that for a Contempt in the Face of the Court, there was no other Judgment or Execution: That this Court had no Juriſdiction, as the Caſe ſtood, and therefore the Earl ought to be remanded; but waived giving his Opinion, Whether it would not have been otherwiſe, in Caſe of a Prorogation.

Mr. Juſtice Twiſden alſo was of Opinion, That the Earl ought to be remanded; and he was accordingly ſent back to the Tower, where he remained ſeven Months longer, and then was diſcharged on making his Submiſſion in the Houſe of Peers. His Offence was, his affirming, That the Houſe was diſſolved by having been prorogued for above a Year; in which Notion the Duke of Bucks, the Earl of Salisbury, and the Lord Wharton, concurred, and were all ſent to the Tower for aſſerting it; but the reſt acknowledging their Error, were ſoon diſmiſſed; while Shaftesbury, for perſevering in that Notion, drew upon himſelf the Reſentment of the Court, as well as of the Houſe, and was continued a Year in Priſon.

Remarks on the Lord Shaftesbury*'s Caſe.*

This Caſe of Commitments by either Houſe, ſeems now to be fully ſettled: Where either Houſe commits any of their reſpective Members, the King's-Bench will neither diſcharge or bail them during the Seſſion; but on a Prorogation, or Diſſolution, the Perſons ſo committed are diſcharged of courſe.

The Charge

THE Indictment charges this Noble Lord with aſſaulting, and knocking down, Nathanael Cony, Gent. on the 4th of February (then laſt paſt) and with ſtriking, bruiſing, and kicking him after he was down, of which Blows and Bruiſes he languiſhed until the Tenth of the ſame Month, and then died: And ſo the ſaid Philip Earl of Pembroke, &c. did felonioufly, wilfully, and of his Malice afore-thought, kill and murder the ſaid Nathanael Cony.

The Evidence for the King.

The King's Counſel having opened the Indictment, the Witneſſes were produced; and firſt Mr. Goring, who depoſed, that on Sunday, the 3d of February laſt, he had been drinking with Mr. Cony, the Deceaſed, in the City, where they ſtaid very late; however, in their way Home they called at Long's Tavern in the Hay-Market, to take another Bottle; and, as they were ſtanding at the Bar, the Lord Pembroke came out of a lower Room, and invited Mr. Cony (whom he knew)

1678. 30 Car. II.

and the Deponent to come in: That, after ſome Time, there aroſe a Diſpute between the Lord Pembroke and the Deponent, about their Families and Play, wherein the Noble Lord, thinking himſelf injured, threw a Glaſs of Wine in the Deponent's Face; and then my Lord roſe up and drew his Sword, and the Deponent laid his Hand upon his Sword; but Captain Savage ſtepped between them, and with the Drawer, ſhoved the Deponent out of the Room, at which Time he heard a Noiſe behind him, and ſaw my Lord making towards Mr. Cony: That the Deponent, after he was out, miſſing his Friend, and having left his Sword, Hat and Wig, in the Room, made a Noiſe at the Door to get in again, and the Landlord riſing out of his Bed, and coming down, the Deponent deſired he might have his Things again, and go in and ſee what they had done, with Mr. Cony; for he feared he was in Danger: But the People of the Houſe perſuaded him to go into another Room, and they would bring Mr. Cony to him; and after he had waited half an Hour, they came and told the Deponent he might go in now if he pleaſed, and going in he found Mr. Cony lying upon the Chairs, and no Body elſe in the Room: That he took a Candle to ſee if he was wounded, endeavouring to awake him, but could not; and the Drawer ſaid he was only dead-drunk, and would come to himſelf: That thereupon he directed the Drawer to get ſome Blankets and Pillows, and ſet ſome Chairs, to make the Place broader, and watch with him 'till he waked, which the Drawer promiſed to do: That going to viſit Mr Cony on Tueſday, he told the Deponent he had been very much abuſed in my Lord's Company; my Lord Pembroke threw him down, and ſomebody trod upon him, and kicked him, and he expected Satisfaction of my Lord: He hoped the Deponent would carry his Lordſhip a Challenge: That asking the Deceaſed who trod upon him, he anſwered, he knew not, for he was in a Swoon; it was either my Lord Pembroke, or ſome of his Creatures for him: That he complained of his Belly, Sides, and Shoulders, and ſaid my Lord Pembroke had done him the Injury in throwing him down.

Mr. Richard Savage depoſed, he was with my Lord Pembroke, at Long's Tavern in the Hay-Market; and his Lordſhip, hearing Mr. Cony make a great Noiſe at the Bar, went out, and invited him and his Friend, Mr. Goring, into his Room: That after ſome Time Mr. Goring uſed impertinent Language, and told his Lordſhip he was as good, or a better Gentleman than himſelf; whereupon his Lordſhip threw a Glaſs of Wine in Goring's Face, and drew his Sword, and Goring being about to draw his, the Deponent took it from him, and broke it, and perſuaded his Lordſhip to put up his Sword; but, to prevent more Words, the Deponent ſhoved Mr. Goring out of the Room: That while he was thruſting Goring out, he heard a Buſtle behind him, and turning about, ſaw the Lord Pembroke ſtrike the Deceaſed, who immediately fell down, and then my Lord gave him a Kick: That finding the Deceaſed did not ſtir, my Lord and the Deponent took him off the Ground, and laid him on the Chairs, and covered him up warm; that they chafed his Temples, and he opened his Eyes, but did not ſpeak: He did not ſee his Lordſhip kick the Deceaſed more than once, and that with no great Force.— That he went two Days after to ſee Mr Cony, and he asked the Deponent if my Lord ſtruck him, for he did not know; but finding himſelf much in Pain, he thought he had fallen, partly through Drink, and partly through Fits he uſed to have.

1678. 30 Car. II.

Mr. Shelly depoſed, he was in the Room when Mr. Cony and Mr. Goring came in, and they were both in Drink: That Goring propoſed Play, and my Lord ſaid he would throw with him for 500 l. and was ſending for the Money; but then Goring would not play; and his Lordſhip ſaying he believed he was an idle Fellow, Goring replied, his Name was a better Name than his Lordſhip's, and himſelf a better Gentleman: Whereupon my Lord threw a Glaſs of Wine in his Face, and they both drew their Swords; but Savage ſtepped between, and put Goring out of the Room; and my Lord deſiring Cony to go out with his Friend, Cony ſaid, he did not know why his Friend was put out; whereupon my Lord knocked him down, and lifted up his Leg pretty high, as if he would have kicked him; but he could not ſay he kicked him: He ſaw them afterwards lay Cony upon the Chairs, and he was ſenſeleſs; and he believed his being in Drink, as well as the Blow, was the Occaſion of his Fall; for he ſaw the Deceaſed twice afterwards, and he ſaid he had a Fit, and did not impute any Thing to the Lord Pembroke. Captain Fitz-Patrick gave the ſame Evidence, concerning the Deceaſed's being knocked down by the Lord Pembroke, and left ſenſeleſs upon the Chairs, as the former Witneſſes had done; but was not certain his Lordſhip kicked the Deceaſed.

Doctor Bruce depoſed, That coming to viſit Mr. Cony, the Day after the Accident, he found him in ſuch extreme Pain between his Shoulders, that he could not bear to be touched: That the Wedneſday following he complained of Pains in his Belly; but they could ſee no Blemiſh, either by diſcolouring or bruiſing, and ſo left him then in a hopeful way of Recovery.

Mr. Hemes depoſed, That he was ſent for to Mr. Cony, the Day after the Accident, and he complained of Pains all over his Body, but eſpecially on his Shoulders and Buttocks; and the Doctor applying Plaiſters, and ordering him to be anointed, he could hardly bear they ſhould touch him; but they ſaw no Swelling or Bruiſe: He complained of an inward Soreneſs in his Belly from firſt to laſt, and being opened after he was dead, they found a great deal of Blood gathered together in the lower Part of his Belly, of a blackiſh livid Colour.

Mr. Jackſon depoſed, That the Deceaſed was of a ſtrong, healthful Conſtitution, and not ſubject to any dangerous Diſtemper: That he went to viſit him the Wedneſday after ter the Accident, and he told the Deponent he had been troubled with very unuſual Swoonings, and at that Time fell into a Fit: That he complained of great Pain in his Belly, and ſaid it was occaſioned by ſome ill Uſage he had lately received: He had been drinking with my Lord Pembroke.

The Priſoner's Witneſſes produced in his Defence.

1678. 30 Car. II.

Alice Avery (Mr. Cony's Nurſe) depoſed, That he came Home about Eight o'Clock on the Monday Morning, and was very ill, he could ſcarce ſtand; ſaid he was very ſore, and full of Pain, and had been in ſome Company, where he had received a great deal of Wrong: That he had been beaten and kicked more than ordinary, and was never ſo abuſed in his Life: And about two Hours before he died, he wiſhed to God he had never been in my Lord Pembroke's Company; for he did think in his Conſcience my Lord had been the Death of him.

Mr. William Brown depoſed, He was upon the Coroner's Inqueſt the Day after Mr. Cony died: That his Body was prodigiouſly ſwelled: On his right Breaſt there was a great black Bruiſe, and on the left Side a great black Spot: That they deſired to ſee his inward Parts, and found the Caul waſted away, and in the Bottom of his Belly a great Quantity of ill-looked Blood.

Richard Wheeler alſo depoſed, He was of the Inqueſt, and obſerved a great Bruiſe on the right Breaſt of the Deceaſed, and another on the left Side of his Belly: That the whole Body was very much ſwelled, and Blood ſettled in the Bottom of his Belly.

Charles Cony (Brother to the Deceaſed) depoſed, That, viſiting his Brother the Day after the Accident, and underſtanding the Lord Pembroke knocked him down, they both concluded how the Misfortune came, though his Brother (the Deceaſed) could not remember what was done; and therefore, to know the Truth, they ſent for the Drawer, who aſſured them my Lord never ſtruck him: That his Brother was in ſuch Pain, he could not bear to be touched; but on ſome Applications on Tueſday, he was pretty much at Eaſe: He roſe on Wedneſday, and on Thurſday was ſo well, that he dined with ſome Friends in his Chamber, and on Saturday was ſo well, that he would have gone Abroad; and the Deponent did not think he would have died, till about two Hours before he expired; and when the Report of my Lord's having abuſed him was mentioned, he was diſpleaſed at it.

Mr. Jackſon, the Surgeon, depoſed further, That they found an extraordinary Quantity of extravaſated Blood at the Bottom of his Belly when it was opened; and he believed it to be occaſioned by ſome Violence that was done him.

The Priſoner's Witneſſes produced in his Defence.

Then the Priſoner's Witneſſes being called, Doctor Conqueſt depoſed, That the firſt Time he attended the Deceaſed, as a Phyſician, was about three Months before this Accident, and then he was ſent for to him at a Tavern, where the Deceaſed had a fainting Fit, and lay dead for half an Hour: That the next Day he attended the Deceaſed at his Lodgings, and found him very ill, and melancholy, inſomuch that he weeped, and ſaid that he found ſo great an Oppreſſion at his Heart, that he could not ſpeak; however, the Deponent could not diſſuade him from going Abroad that Day, and he went out, and drank very hard: That the Deponent had been ſent for twenty Times to recover him out of his Fits; but he would take no Advice: That he acknowledged he had been a hard Drinker of Wine, and ſtrong Waters upon it, which the Deponent believed cauſed the Stagnation of Blood in his Body, and might occaſion the fainting Fits; and he believed his Entrails had received no Prejudice by Kicks or Bruiſes, becauſe he ſaw him take two or three Clyſters after this Accident: That the very Saturday Night before he died he drank three whole Tankards of cold ſmall Beer, which gave him a violent Fit of the Gripes; and the Deponent being ſent for again, he found the Deceaſed had vomited all Night, and was dying away, and having brought him to himſelf again, he ſtill ſwore he would have more ſmall Beer: That the Deponent ſaw him opened, and there was clotted Blood among the Bowels, the breaking out of which he aſcribed to the great Quantity of ſmall Beer the Deceaſed had drunk, and the Gripings that followed; and the Bowels were none of them touched.

Doctor Lower depoſed, That he attended the Deceaſed with Dr. Conqueſt after this Accident; and Mr. Cony told him, his Fits came upon him ſuddenly, by Sickneſs upon his Stomach, and ſaid nothing of any Bruiſe or Hurt: Nor had the Deponent any Reaſon to ſuſpect that any ſuch Thing was the Cauſe of his Illneſs; for he had no Symptom of a Fever, either in Tongue, Pulſe, or Urine; which would have been, if the Diſtemper had been owing to any Thing of that kind.

Mr. Raven, the Surgeon, depoſed, That he viewed the Body carefully, and found no Blackneſs, or Blueneſs, or Marks of Bruiſes: That when the Body was opened, there iſſued ſome clotted Blood: The Caul was conſumed; the Heart as looſe as a Rag, and the Lungs ſtuck to each Side of his Ribs: That in all natural Deaths there is extravaſated Blood in the lower Belly; and the great Quantity that was there, he imputed to his drinking ſmall Beer after ſtrong Liquors, which ſet him a vomiting, by the Violence whereof the Blood was thrown down into the Belly.

Viner, Long's Drawer, depoſed, That he came into the Room when my Lord Pembroke ſtruck the Deceaſed (though he denied, when he was ſent for by the Deceaſed, and his Brother, that my Lord ſtruck him): That afterwards they laid the Deceaſed upon Chairs, and he fell off ſeveral Times, and the Deponent helped him up again: That, when he came to himſelf, he ſaid he was very ſick, and had ſeveral fainting Fits; and that at Seven in the Morning they ſent him to his Lodgings in a Chair.

The King's Counſel's Obſervations on the Evidence.

The King's Counſel, in their Obſervations on the Evidence, ſaid, There were two ſorts of Malice, the one expreſs, i. e. When a Man can be proved to have had an ill Will before-hand to the Perſon killed (which they did did not pretend to be in this Caſe): The other ſort of Malice, which alſo in Law gives the Denomination of Murder to the killing of a Man, is Malice implied; which is, when a Man, without any Provocation given by the Party ſlain, ſhall bring another by Violence to his Death: For the Law ſuppoſes, that no Man, without Provocation, would kill his Brother, unleſs he had Malice to him beforehand; and this was the Malice they charged the Priſoner with, That he killed the Deceaſed without Provocation.

1678. 30 Car. II.

This Noble Lord ſeems to reſt his Defence on the Evidence that had been given for him; I do not perceive he made any Remarks on it: Whereupon the Lords withdrew to their Houſe above, and after two Hours Debate among themſelves, coming down into the Hall again, the Lord High Steward numbered the Voices, and declared, That Six of their Lordſhips had found the Priſoner Guilty of Murder, Eighteen had found him Not guilty, and Forty had found him Guilty of Manſlaughter: And it being demanded what he could ſay why Judgment ſhould not paſs upon him, to die according to Law? He claimed the Privilege of his Peerage (which is equivalent to a Commoner's Claim of Clergy): Whereupon the Lord High Steward told him, That as Clergy was allowed to a Commoner in ſuch Caſes, on his reading, and being burnt in the Hand; ſo a Peer, convicted of ſuch Felony, was to be delivered without either: But his Lordſhip would do well to take Notice, That no Man could have the Benefit of that Law more than once.

Convicted of Manſlaughter.

Has the Benefit of his Peerage.

1678. 30 Car. II. Clergy diſcloſed but once.

Here we ſee different Evidence given by different Witneſſes: Some of the Coroner's Inqueſt declare, that the Body had ſeveral Bruiſes upon it; on the other Hand, a Phyſician and a Surgeon aver, there were none: One Surgeon declares that his Death was occaſioned by ſome Violence; another Surgeon and a Phyſician depoſe, he died a natural Death: But a Majority of the Lords, it ſeems, were of Opinion, that the Deceaſed died of the Kicks and Bruiſes he received from Lord Pembroke; otherwiſe they could not have found this Noble Lord guilty of Manſlaughter. Had he been tried by a Jury of Commoners, he might poſſibly have been found guilty of Murder; for I do not find the Deceaſed gave him any Provocation; unleſs his demanding, Why his Friend was turned out of the Room, be deemed ſuch a Provocation, as will juſtify one Man's knocking another on the Head: But this may ſerve to ſhew us what Advantage a Noble Peer has, when he contends with a Plebeian; the former is ſure to meet with moſt indulgent Judges, who will infallibly look upon his Cauſe as their own, and aſſert their Privileges over the lower Claſs of Men.

The Charge.

THE Indictment charges the Priſoner with High-Treaſon, in compaſſing the Death of the King: And the Overt-Act laid to prove it, was certain treaſonable Words, ſaid to be ſpoken by him, the 14th Inſtant, in French, importing, That the King was a great Heretick, and the greateſt Rogue in the World: Adding, Here is the Heart, and here is the Hand that would kill him: The King and Parliament think all is over; but the Rogues are miſtaken.

The Evidence.

The Priſoner making no Challenges to the Panel, a Jury was ſworn, and the Witneſſes produced: And firſt, Captain William Carſtairs depoſed, That the Priſoner, and one Fromante, a Frenchman, being at the Black-Lion Ale-houſe in King-ſtreet, the 14th of that Month, Fromante ſaid in French, That the King of England was a Tormentor of the People of God; and the Priſoner anſwered again in French, He is a great Heretick, and the greateſt Rogue in the World; and ſtriking his Hand on his Breaſt, and ſtamping five or ſix Times, added, Here is the Heart, and here is the Hand that would kill him: The King and Parliament think all is over; but the Rogues are miſtaken. That the Deponent was in a Room oppoſite to the Priſoner, and both Doors being open, he ſaw him, and heard him ſpeak theſe Words, and the next Day he cauſed the Priſoner to be apprehended.

Alexander Southerland depoſed, That he was with Captain Carſtairs, at the Black-Lion, and heard the Priſoner ſpeak thoſe Words, and that he immediately wrote them down in French, as they were ſpoken.

Philip Garret depoſed, That he was with his Captain William Carſtairs, at the Black Lion; but not underſtanding French, his Captain told him the Priſoner ſaid he would kill the King; and bid the Deponent enquire the Priſoner's Name, and where he lived, which he did.

The Priſoner's Defence.

The Priſoner, in his Defence, acknowledged he was at the Black-Lion Alehouſe, but denied he ſpoke the Words; and obſerved, that the French might be tranſlated I will kill myſelf, rather than I will kill him myſelf: That their Diſcourſe was very innocent; they were ſpeaking of the Happineſs of this Government compared with that of France: That he abhorred the Words he was charged with, having always behaved himſelf as a Loyal Subject; and he muſt be a Madman to ſpeak ſuch Words in a Publick Houſe, with the Doors open, as the Witneſſes depoſed.

Then

A Witneſs for the Priſoner.

Then he called a Witneſs to his Character, who depoſed, He had often heard the Priſoner ſpeak very dutifully and loyally of the King; and that he deteſted the Principles of the Jeſuits, though he was a Papiſt.

The partial Directions of the Chief Juſtice.

The Chief Juſtice, however, in his Directions to the Jury, told them, The Words were fully proved, that they would bear no other Conſtruction than had been put upon them, That the Government was daily expoſed by the dangerous Plots of the Papiſts, and deſired that they would begin with this Man, and make him an Example to deter others from the like Practices: Accordingly the Jury found the Priſoner guilty without going from the Bar; and he was condemned to die as a Traitor, and executed at Tyburn.

The Priſoner convicted, and executed.

Remarks on Staley's Trial.

This poor Man had the Misfortune to be accuſed of theſe treaſonable Words at the Time the Nation was firſt alarmed by the Popiſh Plot; and every thing was believed that tended to blacken the Papiſts: But even Biſhop Burnet, one of the Whig Chiefs, was of Opinion he was innocent: He tells us, that the Proſecution of Staley the Goldſmith, for the Popiſh Plot, was very hard; for that Carſtairs, the principal Evidence againſt him, was a profligate Villain, and did it only to get a little Money out of Staley, as he (Doctor Burnet) then aſſured the Earl of Shaftesbury; but that Earl would hear nothing againſt the Witneſs, and ſaid, They muſt ſupport the Evidence: And all thoſe who undermine the Credit of the Witneſſes, were to be looked upon as publick Enemies.

1677. 29 Car. II.

Biſhop Burnet adds, That Doctor Lloyd, who viſited Staley a little before his Execution, told him, That the Priſoner proteſted he knew of no Plot, nor ever ſpoke the Words charged upon him, or any thing to that Purpoſe; but he was a Roman Catholick, and entruſted with the Caſh of a great many Noblemen and Gentlemen of that Perſuaſion, and therefore thought a very fit Man, by the People who hatched this pretended Plot, to open the bloody Scene with: Theſe were Circumſtances they concluded would not fail to induce the credulous Jury to find him guilty, and their Expectations were unhappily anſwered.

Coleman's Trial.

1678. 30 Car. II.

THE Priſoner making no Challenges to the Pannel, the Jury was ſworn.

The Charge againſt him.

The Indictment charged him with High Treaſon, in compaſſing the Death of the King: And the Overt-Acts laid to prove it were, two Letters he ſent to Father Le Chaiſe, the French King's Confeſſor, in which he deſired Le Chaiſe to procure the Aſſiſtance of the French King againſt his Sovereign, in order to alter the Eſtabliſhed Religion, introduce the Romiſh Superſtition, and ſubvert the Government; and his receiving a Letter from Le Chaiſe, in Anſwer to one of the ſaid Letters, wherein Aid and Aſſiſtance was promiſed from the French King: The revealing his ſaid Treaſons to Monſieur Rouvigni, the French Envoy, and moving him to be an Accomplice with him in the ſaid Treaſons; and his ſending three Letters to Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, then reſiding in France, to ſolicit Le Chaiſe to procure Aid of the French King for the Purpoſes aforeſaid, were laid alſo as Overt-Acts of the Treaſon of his Heart.

He complains of ſome Hardſhips.

The King's Counſel diſplaying their Oratory, and highly aggravating the Charge againſt the Priſoner while they opened the Indictment, Mr. Coleman ſaid, It was hard he might not be allowed Counſel, when Crimes were charged againſt him with ſuch Skill and Advantage: The Premiſſes indeed were ſtrong and artificial; but he muſt deny the Concluſion, for he could ſafely and honeſtly ſay, he was not a Traitor.

Another thing that ſeemed moſt dreadful to him was, The violent Prejudices, at that Time, againſt every Man in England who was a Roman Catholick: If one of that Perſuaſion, though never ſo innocent, ſhould appear at that Bar, Prejudice would ſo bias human Nature, he ſaid, that unleſs the Court leaned extremely on the other Side, Juſtice would hardly ſtand upright. Then the Witneſſes appeared: And firſt Oates, the Jeſuit, depoſed, That he carried Letters over to France to the Fathers at St. Omers, and to Le Chaiſe, the French King's Confeſſor, which he believed were written by Mr. Coleman, but they were ſubſcribed by no Body; and that in one of them, the Writer thanked Le Chaiſe for ſending the Engliſh Catholicks ten thouſand Pounds, which he aſſured him ſhould be employed in cutting off the King of England, and rooting out the Proteſtant Religion, as it was intended.

The Evidence.

Then Oates gave an Account of a Conſultation, held by the Jeſuits, at the White Horſe in the Strand, in Auguſt laſt, wherein it was reſolved to cut off the King by Aſſaſſins, or by his Phyſicians adminiſtring Poiſon to him: That four Ruffians were ſent to Windſor to murder his Majeſty, and the Sum of foreſcore Pounds ſent thither to encourage them; and that Coleman gave the Meſſenger who carried it a Guinea to make haſte; that Grove and Pickering were employed to ſhoot the King, and Coleman privy to it; and that Sir George Wakeman being offered ten thouſand Pounds to poiſon the King, Coleman adviſed 1678. 30 Car. II. advised the giving him fifteen thousand Pounds: And lastly, that Mr. Coleman had a Commission from the Pope to be Secretary of State on the expected Change of Government.

Bedloe was the next Witness, a Person who had been employed by some English Catholicks, as a Letter-Carrier to foreign Courts: He deposed, That he brought a Commission from Rome for Mr. Coleman to be Secretary of State; (for, according to the Witnesses of this pretended Plot, the Pope was to have the Sovereign Dominion of England, and whoever had the Name of King, he was to act as Viceroy to his Holiness). He deposed also, that he carried over a large Packet of Letters from Coleman to Father Le Chaise, and brought Answers from that Father, and the English Monks at Paris, about a Plot for destroying the King, and subverting the Government and the Protestant Religion: That when he delivered the Letters to Mr. Coleman, at his House near Westminster-Abbey, Harcourt the Jesuit was with him; and the Deponent heard Mr. Coleman say, If he had a hundred Lives, and a Sea of Blood, he would spend all to establish the Church of Rome in England; and if there were an hundred Heretical Kings, he would see them all destroyed.

Coleman's Letters. But the principal Evidence produced against the Prisoner, were the Copies of some Letters found in his House, which he acknowledged he wrote to Father Le Chaise, and the Answer of Father Le Chaise to the first of them.

In the first Letter, Coleman informs Le Chaise of the Correspondence he held with Father Ferryer, the French King's former Confessor, by Means of Sir William Throckmorton, who belonged to an English Troop in the French King's Service; and moves Le Chaise, as he had formerly done his Predecessor, to prevail on the French King to afford them Money and Assistance, to bring about the Change of Religion in England.

In answer to which, Le Chaise tells him, he read his Letter with great Satisfaction, and should be very glad, on his Part, to assist in seconding his good Intentions.

A second Letter was produced, which Mr. Coleman had prepared in the Name of the Duke of York, his Master, and was intended for Mons. Le Chaise; but he confessed before a Committee of Lords, he prepared it without the Duke's Privity; and that, when he shewed it the Duke, he was angry, and rejected it. In this he acknowledges the French King's Kindness in offering his Purse and Assistance against the Designs of the Duke's Enemies; and tells that Monarch, He has the same Opinion of the Parliament, and of the Lord Arlington, he had, (viz.) That they were not in the Interest of the King his Brother, of his most Christian Majesty, or of himself; and that it was necessary they should make use of their joint Credit to prevent their ill Designs: That the Lord Arlington, and several more, endeavoured, by a thousand Deceits, to break the good Intelligence that was between the King his Brother, his most Christian Majesty, and himself, and to abuse them all three; of which he thought fit to advertise him, and desire his Friendship and Assistance to prevent their ill Designs. 16-8. 30 Car. II.

In the third Letter which Coleman actually sent to Le Chaise he says, We have here a mighty Work upon our Hands; no less than the Conversion of three Kingdoms, and by that, perhaps, the utter subduing of a pestilent Heresy which hath domineered over a great Part of this Northern World a long Time; there never was such hopes of Success since the Death of our Queen Mary, as in our Days, when God has given us a Prince who is become (may I say a Miracle) zealous of being the Author and Instrument of so glorious a Work: And that which we rely on next to Providence, and the Favour of my Master the Duke, is the mighty Mind of his most Christian Majesty, whose generous Soul inclines him to great Undertakings: That they were a little unhappy in having Monsieur Rouvigny his Majesty's Minister at the English Court (because he was a Protestant): Had he been a Minister who would have taken their Case to Heart, and represented it justly to his most Christian Majesty, he did not doubt but he would have assisted them with such a Supply of Money, as would have put their mutual Interests out of danger; but, wanting those Advantages, he was afraid they should lose Ground the next Session, rather than gain any.

Mr. Coleman's Defence. Mr. Coleman, in his Defence, said, That notwithstanding the two first Witnesses pretended such an Acquaintance and Familiarity with him, he did not know either of them; and that Oates, when he was before the Council, told the King, he never saw him (Mr. Coleman) before, nor could say any thing positively against him: To which Oates gave no better Answer, than that he could not see well by Candle-light; and when Mr. Coleman appealed to Bedloe himself, whether he had ever seen him in his Life, Bedloe answered, He saw him in the Gallery at Somerset-House, when he came from a Consult there.

As to the Letters, wherein he desired the French King's Assistance to bring about an Alteration of Religion, He said, it evidently appeared he desired no other Assistance than that of Money, whereby they proposed to obtain Liberty of Conscience, and some better Terms for those of their Persuasion; and that it was natural for all Men to endeavour to promote the Religion they were of, which he hoped was not Treason, if they did not endeavour to introduce it by Force.

That there was nothing in the Letters that intimated any Design against the King's Life or Government, with which he was charged: On the contrary, it appeared, that his Aim was to make both his Majesty and the Duke as great as possible; and that he proposed a strict Alliance with France for that very End: it could not therefore be said, that his Correspondence with Le Chaise tended to the Death or Destruction of the King. Besides, It was now four Years since these Letters were written, and could not be brought as Evidence of a Plot that was pretended to be upon the Anvil at this Juncture.

Mr.

1678 30 Car. II.

The Court direct the Jury.

Mr. Coleman having ended his Defence, the Lord Chief Juſtice ſummed up the Evidence, and told the Jury, That it was plain from Mr. Coleman's Letters, he intended to bring in the Roman Catholick, and to ſubvert the Proteſtant Religion; and by Conſequence they intended to kill the King, as the likelieſt Means to effect their Deſign: That his Letters plainly convicted him of endeavouring to bring in Popery by a foreign Power: And though he pretended they deſigned to introduce their Religion by procuring Liberty of Conſcience, he knew this was very unlikely to produce that Effect; for, though ſome had ſo little Wit as to turn Fanaticks, very few, when they were left to themſelves, would turn Papiſts: That Mr. Coleman, indeed, was bred a Proteſtant, his Father a Clergyman of Suffolk; and for him to turn Papiſt, being a Man of Parts, he looked upon this Circumſtance to be an Argument againſt him: He believed he muſt be moved by ſome By-Ends and Secular Motives; his Penſion was his Conſcience, and his Secretary's Place probably the Bait; and inveighed bitterly againſt the bloody Principles of thoſe of the Priſoner's Religion; but barely repeated the Evidence that had been given by Oates and Bedloe, giving little Credit to it probably.

He is convicted.

The Jury being withdrawn, after a very ſhort Receſs, brought the Priſoner in GUILTY; and the next Day he was brought to the Bar to receive Sentence; when the Lord Chief

The Speech of the Chief Juſtice, on pronouncing Sentence.

Juſtice made a Speech, and told him, he would not have him go out of the World under a Miſtake, and think himſelf innocent for waiving the Teſtimony of the two Witneſſes: It was apparent from his own Letters, he was guilty of contriving and conſpiring the Deſtruction of the Proteſtant Religion, and to bring in Popery by the Aid and Aſſiſtance of a Foreign Power: That he who ſubverted the Proteſtant Religion here, by Conſequence brought in a Foreign Authority, and did an Act in Derogation of the Crown, and in Diminution of the King's Supremacy, and endeavoured to bring us under a Foreign Dominion (the Pope). And though he might intend to bring in Popery by procuring a Diſſolution of the Parliament, and obtaining Liberty of Conſcience, and ſuch innocent Means, it was greatly to be feared other Methods would have been taken (at leaſt by his Confederates) if thoſe had failed; and he that enters upon an unlawful Act, is guilty of all the Conſequences that attended it, though he did not deſign them. Then he exhorted him to repent, and diſcover the whole Plot, and not be deluded with vain Hopes of having his Sentence reſpited: They might flatter him, to ſtop his Mouth, 'till they had ſtopped his Breath, and he doubted he would find that to be the Event. He bid him again not be deceived with the Expectation of a Pardon; for the Nation was, at that Time, in ſuch Diſorder, and the People ſo alarmed with ſecret

Godfrey ſaid to be murdered about this Time.

Murders, or daily Outrages, that though the King, who was merciful to a Fault, ſhould be inclined that way, he verily believed both Houſes of Parliament would interpoſe between that and him: There was nothing could ſave him; he muſt ſurely die, and that ſuddenly. After which, he was ſentenced to die the Death of a Traitor.

1678. 30 Car. II.

Condemned. His Speech on this occaſion.

Mr. Coleman thanked his Lordſhip for his charitable Advice: He acknowledged, Confeſſion was extremely neceſſary to a dying Man; but the Confeſſion he ſuppoſed his Lordſhip meant, was of the Crimes he was condemned for; namely, A malicious contriving the Deſtruction of the King and Government: But he renounced all the Mercy God could ſhew him, if he had not already diſcovered all he knew: That he never made, or received, or ever heard of, any Propoſition towards invading the King's Life, his Crown or Dignity; or to make any Invaſion or Diſturbance to introduce any new Government, or to bring in Popery by Violence or Force: That it was poſſible he might be miſtaken in his Opinion, that Popery would come in with Liberty of Conſcience; but that he thought Chriſtians ought to wiſh all People of the Religion they profeſs themſelves, if they were in earneſt: That he ſhould not now diſpute the evil Principles with which his Lordſhip charged thoſe of the Church of Rome; but if he thought them guilty of ſuch Things, he ſhould not be of them: And as to his endeavouring to bring in the Religion of the Church of Rome by the Aid and Aſſiſtance of the King of France, he never intended or meant by that Aid and Aſſiſtance, any Force in the World, but ſuch Aids and Aſſiſtances as might procure them Liberty of Conſcience.

The Priſoner was executed at Tyburn the third of December following, and died profeſſing his Innocence to the laſt.

Remarks on Coleman's Trial.

As to the Evidence of Oates and Bedloe againſt Mr. Coleman, it appeared highly improbable at that time; but, ſince the Conviction of Oates of Perjury, by ſuch Numbers of Witneſſes, muſt be looked upon as a notorious Forgery, to ſupport the Credit of the pretended Popiſh Plot.

The ſole Queſtion is therefore, Whether Coleman's Letters contained High-Treaſon in them? There is no doubt but he had attempted to introduce Popery; but then it as evidently appears that he intended to do it by promoting a ſtrict Union between the King of England, the Duke of York, and the French King: There is not any thing that looks like a Deſign of depoſing his Majeſty, or of putting a Force upon him: He hoped by Money, and the Influence of the Courts of Great Britain and France, to get the Parliament to conſent to a Toleration, or Liberty of Conſcience in that Reign; and in the Reign of his Maſter the Succeſſor, he certainly hoped the Roman Catholick Religion would be re-eſtabliſhed: But both in the Lord Strafford's Caſe, and Biſhop Laud's, an Endeavour to alter Religion or Government (with which they were charged) by any other Means than by Force, was held not to be Treaſon; though here, the Lord Chief Juſtice ſeems to maintain, that a bare Endeavour to change the Religion or Government of this Realm, by any Means whatever, was was Treaſon. It muſt be admitted, that Mr. Coleman's Correſpondence with the Court of France, was highly Criminal, if it tended only to corrupt the Members of the Commons by French Money: But ſhould all People be deemed guilty of High-Treaſon who endeavour to procure a Repeal, or Alteration of our Laws by an undue Influence on the Members of Parliament, we ſhould involve a great many in the Guilt of Treaſon, that do not think themſelves in Danger of it.

The Trials of WILLIAM IRELAND, THOMAS PICKERING, JOHN GROVE, THOMAS WHITE, alias WHITEBREAD, and JOHN FENWICKE, for High-Treaſon, at the Old-Baily, London, the 17th of December, 1678. 30 Car. II.

1678. 30 Car. II.

The Charge THE Indictment charged the Priſoners with compaſſing and imagining the Death of the King: The Overt-Acts laid to prove which, were their aſſembling on the 24th of April then laſt paſt, in the Pariſh of St. Giles's in the Fields, in the County of Middleſex, and there conſulting and agreeing to put the King to Death, to alter the Eſtabliſhed Religion, and introduce Popery: Their agreeing that Pickering and Grove, two of the Priſoners, ſhould kill the King; and that White, Pickering, Grove, and the reſt of their Accomplices, ſhould ſay a certain Number of Maſſes for the Soul of Pickering, and pay Grove a Sum of Money; and plighting their Faith to each other not to divulge the ſaid Treaſons: Pickering and Grove's providing Arms, and lying in wait at ſeveral Times and Places to murder the King; and the Conſpirators employing four other Perſons unknown, to murder the King at Windſor.

The Priſoners making no Challenges to the Jurors, the firſt Twelve in the Pannel were ſworn, and charged with them; after which the Evidence was given.

Oates's Evidence. And firſt, Titus Oates depoſed, That in December laſt, the Priſoner Whitebread was appointed Provincial of the Jeſuits by their General at Rome; and that Whitebread, being afterwards at London, ſummoned ſeveral Jeſuits to appear at a Conſultation there on the 24th of April laſt; and that upon this Summons nine Jeſuits went from St. Omers to London; among whom were, the Rector of Liege, Sir Thomas Preſton, Marſh Rector of Ghent, Williams Rector of Wotton, Sir John Warner, and the Deponent (Oates); and that accordingly they appeared at the White-Horſe in the Strand, where the Conſult began on the ſaid 24th of April; but they divided themſelves, and had Meetings in ſeveral other Places afterwards, at ſome of which a Reſolution was ſigned, That Pickering and Grove ſhould perſevere in their Attempts to kill the King; and that Grove ſhould have 1500 l. and Pickering 30,000 Maſſes ſaid, as a Reward for that Service: And that he ſaw Whitebread, Ireland, and Fenwicke, and about forty more, ſign this Reſolve: That ſoon after the Conſult, the Deponent went over to St. Omers, and in May was followed thither by Whitebread, who ordered him (Oates) to return to England and kill Dr. Tongue, who had tranſlated The Jeſuits Morals: That accordingly he came to London about the middle of June; and ſome Days after, Aſhby came thither after him from St. Omers, and brought Inſtructions from Whitebread. Firſt, That 10,000 l. ſhould be offered Sir George Wakeman to poiſon the King. Secondly, That the Biſhop of Hereford and Dr. Stillingfleet ſhould be murdered: And Thirdly, That Pickering and Grove ſhould go on with the Deſign of murdering his Majeſty. That in Auguſt following there was a Conſult of the Jeſuits and Benedictins at Wild-houſe, where was preſent Fenwicke the Priſoner, and one Harcourt; and four Ruffians being ſent to Windſor to kill the King, they ſent fourſcore Pounds to them the next Day, and Coleman gave the Meſſenger a Guinea to make Haſte.

The Priſoners Defence. That the ſame Month of Auguſt, Whitebread ſent further Inſtructions to Harcourt, Rector of London, to foment a Rebellion among the Malcontents in Scotland, and directed him to ſend ſome to preach among the Presbyterians in their Field Conventicles, and inſinuate the Danger they were in from Epiſcopal Tyranny.

That in the Months of May and June, he ſaw Pickering and Grove waiting in St. James's Park, with their ſcrewed Piſtols, to kill the King; That in March before, Pickering followed the King, and had a fair Opportunity of killing him; but durſt not fire, becauſe his Flint was looſe; for which he did Penance, having thirty Laſhes given him by way of Diſcipline.

That Bedingfield writing Whitebread Word that the Deponent (Oates) had diſcovered their Plot in September laſt, Whitebread beat and reviled the Deponent for it at his Chamber, and commanded him to go beyond Sea; and he was afraid of ſomething worſe, for they aſſaulted him in his own Lodgings.

The Chief Juſtice's Directions to the Jury. That Whitebread had an Authority to grant Military Commiſſions, and actually iſſued ſome hundreds; particularly, that he ſealed one for Sir John Gage, of Suſſex, which the Deponent delivered himſelf; but that the Commiſſions to the General Officers were ſigned by Joannes Paulus de Oliva, General of of the Jeſuits: And the Deponent cloſed his Evidence with a Declaration, That he (Oates) always gave it as his Judgment, that it was ſafer to poiſon the King, than to piſtol or ſtab him. It being demanded of Oates, if he could produce any two Witneſſes that ſaw him at London in April, when he pretended the firſt Conſult was held? He anſwered, he lay at Groves's Houſe, but did not bring one Witneſs to prove it; and the Maid of the Houſe depoſed he never lay there.

Bedloe's Evidence.
